

Navalny's health and Russian elections

Alexei Navalny, the Russian nationalist who was groomed by the West to be Putin's "most important opponent," has died in prison. Western media will use this to launch a new frontal attack on Russia, but what interest should Russia have in his death?

Source: https://www-anti--spiegel-ru.translate.goog/2024/nawalnys-gesundheit-und-russische-wahlen/?\_x\_tr\_sl=de&\_x\_tr\_tl=en&\_x\_tr\_hl=de&\_x\_tr\_pto=wapp

from Anti-Mirror

February 16, 2024 3:22 pm

To say it straight away: The death of every human being is a tragedy and commentators who feel compelled to make malicious comments because of Navalny's death will be banned!

I don't want to write an obituary for Alexei Navalny here, that would certainly be inappropriate. I will not comment on his death either; there will be official reports on that soon. The Western media will of course take up the issue and launch a new campaign against Russia, accusing the Russian government and Putin personally of murdering Navalny.

That brings us to the topic, because the question arises as to whether the Russian government could have any interest in Navalny's death. And the answer is no, because although Navalny was built up by the Western media to be a "super-opposition" against Putin, he hardly played a role in Russia even when he was free. And after his suspended sentence was converted into prison for previous crimes and repeated probation violations, he became quiet anyway and no longer played a role in Russia.

Navalny no longer played a role for the Russian government, which is why his death is likely to be regretted there, as it will now be the pretext for another Western media campaign to discredit Russia.

Novichok and the 2020 Russian elections

The West unleashes anti-Russian media campaigns before virtually every election in Russia. And Navalny was unlucky twice shortly before elections in Russia.

On August 20, 2020, according to Western legend, Navalny was poisoned with Novichok. Evidence of this was never presented and the story contains many contradictions, but the Western media presents it as proven fact. The alleged poisoning of Navalny and his medical treatment in Germany dominated the media for months at the time and the Russian government was blamed.

In Russia there is National Election Day once a year, when all elections from local to parliamentary elections (except presidential elections) are held on one day. This National Election Day is always at the beginning of September; in 2020 it was September 13th. If the Western version of the poisoning of Navalny by the Russian government were true, the Russian government would be pretty stupid because, about three weeks before the election, it would have created a reason to poison the mood before the election to its own detriment and to create an international media campaign that could drive the radical opposition to the polls.

I don't want to speculate here about what really happened to Navalny back then, but one thing is clear: the Russian government certainly did not benefit from the alleged poisoning, but its opponents did.

And again shortly before the election

Now Navalny's death has been reported and of course the West will again accuse the Russian government and of course Putin personally of killing Navalny. But the same applies - even more so - as it did with the alleged poisoning in 2020: the Russian government has nothing to do with it, but its opponents do.

Navalny no longer plays a role in Russia today and poses even less of a threat to the Russian government than in 2020. But the media hype from the West is likely to be gigantic.

And as luck would have it, the Russian presidential elections will take place in exactly one month. Again, as in 2020, something happened to Navalny right before an election in Russia and again it was the Russian government that was stupid enough to present an issue right before an election that the West could use against them?

Russian prisons

Unfortunately, it is a well-known fact in Russia that you can easily smuggle almost anything into Russian prisons for a little money. I spoke to people who were in prison in Russia. They told me that if you have the necessary change, you have a cell phone, internet and pretty much everything your heart desires, but it's actually forbidden. There is still a problem with corruption in Russia, even though the Russian government is doing its best to combat corruption. This has caused "prices" to rise, but unfortunately corruption itself is far from being defeated.

I know from an informed source that the prison where Navalny was imprisoned is apparently investigating whether a substance that could have been used to poison Navalny may have been smuggled in. For a corresponding sum, it is not a big problem to find a prisoner who would agree to something like this, and not only in Russia.

In Russia, as is also shown by the drone attacks deep in the Russian hinterland, in which the drones are obviously launched from Russian territory, there are many pro-Ukrainian forces, for example, who are prepared to harm Russia and commit terrorist attacks. The murders that Ukrainian secret services have committed in Russia and which they boast about show this clearly. Furthermore, it is no secret that the CIA is also involved in the murder programs of the Ukrainian secret services in Russia; even the US media has openly reported this .

Anyone who trusts the West lives dangerously

The US-led West uses its helpers and, if necessary, abandons them when they are no longer useful. There are plenty of famous examples of this. Saddam Hussein was an ally of the US, which supported Iraq in the war against Iran in the 1980s. After the war, Hussein asked the US ambassador in Baghdad whether he could be “reimbursed” in Kuwait for the losses that the unsuccessful war had cost his country. She did not contradict his idea of occupying Kuwait to compensate for his war costs, the rest is history: Saddam was groomed to be the “new Hitler”, arrested by US soldiers and ultimately executed.

Another example is Mikheil Saakashvili, who became Georgia's president in a Western-backed coup and even launched a war against Russia because he relied on American assurances that the West would help him take back breakaway territories by force. The rest is history: Saakashvili stood alone against Russia and today sits in a Georgian prison, forgotten by Western media and politicians.

This list could be continued. You can see that the West likes to build up people who are useful to it, but also easily abandons them when they no longer have any “value”.

I am not suggesting that Navalny was murdered, or by whom. I'm just pointing out the fact that the story raises a lot of questions, especially the fact that if anything happened to him, it always happened a maximum of a month before Russian elections and was gratefully exploited by Western media.

In addition, Navalny has lost his “value” for the West in prison, because he has largely been forgotten in Russia and no longer plays a role. His organization is based in London and its influence on public opinion in Russia is now virtually nil. As cynical as it may sound, Navalny is now worth more to the West dead than alive, while from the Russian government's perspective it is the other way around.

The campaign begins

We will see whether Navalny died of natural causes, but the Western media will not believe the Russian statements and claim that Navalny was murdered on behalf of the Russian government. Whether coincidence or not, the timing of his death before the upcoming Russian presidential elections plays into the West's hands.

And now, just a few hours after his death became known, this “game” begins. Der Spiegel has put a live ticker online in which the campaign has already started. Merkel declared that Navalny was a “victim of Russia's repressive state power”, German lobbyist Marie-Agnes Strack-Zimmermann announced that Navalny's death was “not a coincidence right now” (I see it that way too, although of course she means it differently), Chancellor Scholz has stated that Navalny “paid for his courage with his life” and so on. These were just the reports from the first 30 minutes of the live ticker, so there is likely to be a lot more to come.

The question remains whether all these Western politicians and journalists will react with such dismay if one day – God forbid – the death of Julian Assange in British or US custody is reported.

I honestly feel sorry for Navalny. He allowed himself to be exploited by the West and paid for with millions , but he paid for it with his life.

---

In my new book "The Ukraine Cartel - The double game about a war and the multi-million dollar business of the family of US President Biden", I factually and neutrally, based on hundreds of sources, reveal previously concealed facts and evidence about the US President Joe Biden's family's multi-million dollar business in Ukraine. Given current events, the question arises: Is a small group of greedy profiteers possibly willing to bring us to the brink of a third world war for their personal profit?

The book has just been published and can only be ordered directly here from the publisher .