SUBJECT: OAS Attempt to Enlist the Cooperation of the United States for its anti-de Gaulle Activities

1. In May 1961, an attempt was made in Lisbon, Portugal by two members of the Organisation de l'Armee Secrete (OAS) to enlist the support of the United States Government (specifically the Central Intelligence Agency, although the name was never actually pronounced) in their operations against de Gaulle. The attempt was made by Captain Jean Rena Souetre and Captain Guarin (fuz). Captain Souetre identified himself in the OAS organization as coordinator of external affairs serving under Major Pierre Sergeant. Souetre said that he foresaw the U. S. role as that of convincing other governments to cease suppressing OAS activities in their respective countries, and later perhaps providing monetary or material support. Souetre said he intended to provide some information about the activities of his organization which would be of interest to the U. S. In answer to a question on his status in Portugal, Souetre explained that he travelled on various passports, one of them being a U. S. passport. He claimed to be documented as a naturalized citizen from Martinique. He stated that he had U. S. contacts who could arrange documentation.

2. The CIA representative told Souetre that de Gaulle was the Chief of State of an old and respected ally of the U. S., and that the U. S. had absolutely no intention of working with any person or group against the duly-constituted government of France.

3. Available information from both press and official French sources indicates that Souetre is the name of a former French army captain who escaped from a detention camp in 1961. Subsequent to
