CHICAGO'S FAR SOUTH SIDE

MARCH 1980–JULY 1985

Frank Lumpkin never forgot the first phone call that afternoon. Although he was off work that Friday with a broken foot, he had stopped by the pay office at Wisconsin Steel, where he'd labored for more than thirty years, to pick up checks totaling $8,084.57, money he was due in back vacation pay. He still had thirteen weeks of vacation coming, accumulated over five years, and he was about to take a long-planned trip to Africa. But March 28—"Black Friday," as it would be called—was about to become absolutely unforgettable.

Wisconsin Steel's hulking metal sheds stretched south and a bit eastward from the intersection of Torrence Avenue and East 106th Street in a neighborhood that most residents called Irondale, even if Chicago city maps labeled it South Deering. William Deering was a long-forgotten industrialist who had cofounded International Harvester Company in 1902; Wisconsin's oldest corporate ancestor, Brown's Mill, dated from 1875 and had been South Chicago's first steel plant. Six years later, Andrew Carnegie opened a larger mill just north from where the Calumet River flowed into Lake Michigan, and by the dawn of the twentieth century the southwestern crescent of that lakeshore, stretching from the Calumet eastward across the Indiana state line to Gary and Burns Harbor, had become the most dense concentration of steel mills in the world.

Steelmaking was dangerous and strenuous work, as Frank Lumpkin well knew, but steelworkers had significant freedoms. "There were no time clocks, and they could come out for lunch," a nearby barber recounted. "The workers figured that they could get their hair cut on company time because it grows on company time."

By 1980 the region's mills had sustained generation after generation of working-class families whose breadwinners didn't need to graduate high school to get jobs that paid three times what college graduates could earn as public school teachers.

Frank and his wife Bea had raised four children during their thirty-one years of marriage, and they had just moved to South Shore, a middle-class neighborhood a bit northwest of where Carnegie's mill—now United States Steel's huge South Works—employed almost three times the 3,450 men who worked at Wisconsin. South Shore was a comfortable area for an interracial couple—Frank was black, Bea white—and tolerant too of a couple who had spent many years as dedicated members of the Communist Party USA. Frank's fellow workers at Wisconsin—black, white, and Hispanic—didn't view him as a radical, just an outgoing man who had worked his way up through the odd series of job titles a steel mill offered: chipper, scarfer, millwright.

A little after 3:00 P.M. that Friday, Frank limped across Torrence Avenue to the Progressive Steel Workers (PSW) union hall, just north of 107th Street. The PSW was a so-called "independent" union, not part of the United Steelworkers of America or any labor federation, but it was actually no more “independent” than it was “progressive.” Its first president, William Reilly, was a Wisconsin steelworker, but he left his union post to become chief labor spokesman for International Harvester, Wisconsin Steel’s corporate owner. PSW’s current president, forty-three-year-old Leonard “Tony” Roque, had been in office since 1973, and he had engineered an almost 50 percent increase in union dues, increased his own salary by thousands of dollars, and was overseeing a $150,000 expansion of the union hall. Roque was widely seen as nothing more than a flunky for the political king of South Chicago, 10th Ward alderman Edward R. “Fast Eddie” Vrdolyak, whose law firm received an annual retainer of $30,000 from the PSW and whose election campaigns the union also contributed to. Vrdolyak was a graduate of the University of Chicago’s highly prestigious law school, but some acquaintances remembered him more for the charge of attempted murder that had been filed against him, and then dropped, during his law school years.

The phone call Frank would always remember came when he was speaking with union vice president Steve Plesha at about 3:30 P.M. The message was abrupt: Wisconsin Steel was closing, the workers were being sent home, and the gates were being locked.

“He looked at me and I looked at him because I couldn’t believe it. I had just been there twenty minutes ago,” Frank recalled a decade later. What’s more, just the night before PSW had held a meeting where both Roque and Ronald K. Linde, board chairman of Wisconsin Steel’s new owner, Envirodyne Industries, had reassured some fifteen hundred members that reports about Wisconsin possibly closing were incorrect.

But the 3:30 P.M. phone call should have been less surprising than it was. Three weeks earlier, Crain’s Chicago Business—in fairness, a publication not often read by South Chicago steelworkers—had reported that Wisconsin faced “imminent bankruptcy” because its former corporate owner, International Harvester, which still bought some 40 percent of its steel from Wisconsin for use in Harvester’s farm equipment, was increasingly crippled by an ongoing United Auto Workers strike that had begun on November 1, 1979. Ironically, November 1 had also been the date when Wisconsin’s new owner, Envirodyne Industries, secured a package of loans, guaranteed by the U.S. Department of Commerce’s Economic Development Administration (EDA), to modernize its plant.

International Harvester had begun trying to sell Wisconsin in 1975, and for good reason: in 1976, Wisconsin lost $4.6 million, bringing its cumulative losses since 1970 to $77 million. By early 1977 Harvester was in serious discussions with Envirodyne, a tiny enterprise boasting just a dozen employees that focused on acquiring larger companies through stock swaps. Envirodyne had no experience in the steel industry and badly needed cash to cover an existing bank loan, but Harvester was willing to accept $50 million in notes, secured primarily by the two iron ore mines in upper Michigan, one ore ship, and coal properties in Kentucky that Wisconsin Steel also owned. More crucially, Chase Manhattan Bank was willing to provide $15 million in cash to Envirodyne. The Chicago Tribune labeled the purchase “a minnow trying to swallow a whale,” but nonetheless the sale closed on July 31, 1977, and Wisconsin’s hefty ongoing annual losses continued: $32 million on revenues of $236 million in the twelve months ending in September 1979. Thanks to EDA’s loan guarantees, six insurance companies provided $75 million, and Chase Manhattan ponied up another $15 million for current operating expenses.

The Crain’s story went on to say that “without a strong infusion of working capital,” beyond the 1979 loans, “Wisconsin’s collapse is unavoidable,” and on March 27, the Chicago Tribune’s widely respected business editor, Richard Longworth, reported that the second $15 million from Chase had been expended and that the federal EDA would support additional money for Wisconsin only if International Harvester would advance Wisconsin new funds too.

Harvester, which had recently sustained losses of $225 million during the first quarter of its 1979–80 fiscal year, worried that Wisconsin’s iron and coal mine assets were vulnerable to potential seizure by external creditors. Thus, earlier on March 28, Harvester foreclosed on those properties and the ore ship. But Harvester had failed to consult with Chase Manhattan before acting, and, according to Wisconsin plant manager George J. Harper, several hours later, Chase “impounded all our inventories and stopped all our shipments. At that point, we were literally dead,” Harper explained. “We had to start telling the workers that we were shut down.”

As one employee recounted, “We got no warning of this closing at all. I was loading boxes and the foreman came up and just told me to go home. I figured they’d run into some kind of problem with the trucks.” As Harper remembered, “We just dumped them in the street with nothing to show for what they had done. . . . It was anything but honorable and anything but diplomatic. . . . It makes you feel sick inside.”

Harper and the workers also didn’t know that Chase had frozen Wisconsin’s bank accounts. By 5:00 P.M., the foremen were instructed to tell the men on their shifts not to come back to work. Frank had returned home by that time, and his foreman telephoned him there. “Lumpkin,” he said, “don’t expect to come back to work. It looks bad.” By early Saturday morning, the news had spread to all of the workers and their families. One woman remembers being a fourteen-year-old girl when her father worked at Wisconsin. She never forgot her mother waking her on Saturday morning to tell her what had happened: “They called the ore boat back,” with the coast guard radioing it to return to South Chicago. “It was a crucial moment of rupture,” she explained, when the “widespread belief in future prosperity for oneself and one’s family” and the stability that flowed from that assumption was first called into question. Wisconsin’s closing “would tear through a fabric that had sustained generations” and portended “the collapse of the world as I had known it in Southeast Chicago.” For her dad, the mill’s demise “upended the world as my father knew it.”<sup>1</sup>

By midday on Monday, March 31, a sense of trauma, crisis, and fear had spread across the Southeast Side as people gradually realized that all of Friday’s paychecks were now worthless. Both of Envirodyne’s Wisconsin holding companies had filed for bankruptcy. One lawyer involved told Richard Longworth, “I pleaded with Chase to at least take care of those checks that bounced. Chase said they couldn’t see any legal responsibility. I told them there’s more than a legal responsibility involved here,” but that was rejected.

Scores of other businesses—industrial suppliers closely tied to Wisconsin Steel and retail establishments patronized by Wisconsin workers—immediately began to suffer their own financial consequences. By Wednesday, April 2, the Daily Calumet was reporting that more than a thousand workers at Chicago Slag & Ballast and the Chicago West Pullman & Southern Railroad, both of which had serviced Wisconsin, had also lost their jobs. The Daily Cal’s editorial page predicted “a chain reaction within the community” as “unemployment will spread forth from the plant,” and warned its readers to grasp “the all-too-real possibility” that Wisconsin “might never reopen.” If so, “in a short time, the life and breath of the community will cease to exist, and the neighborhood will be as dead as Wisconsin Steel.”

Each day the news grew worse. Before the week was out, the Daily Cal was reporting a total of “nearly 7,000 ‘ripple effect’ layoffs” by employers whose businesses had been tied to Wisconsin. The federal bankruptcy court authorized the EDA to spend up to $1 million to purchase the coal that was necessary to avoid shutting down the coke ovens—which once cooled become unstable and are impossible to restart—but as Easter weekend began, former Wisconsin workers complained that there was a two-week lag in unemployment checks, that food stamp applications were being rejected if children did not have Social Security numbers, and that Wisconsin wouldn’t let them into the plant to get their personal tools and work shoes. “All I feel now is hatred,” one worker told John Wasik, the Daily Cal reporter who was chronicling the debacle. South Chicago Savings Bank announced a three-month moratorium for Wisconsin borrowers with outstanding loans, and offered new emergency loans to the former workers too. The Daily Cal warned that “the longer the plant sits idle, the greater are the chances it will never reopen. . . . At stake is more than dollars and cents, more than jobs and employment . . . there are people at stake.”<sup>2</sup>

One voice that remained utterly silent even as the crisis moved into its third week was PSW president Tony Roque. But on Wednesday, April 16, about thirty men went first to the Chicago office of the federal National Labor Relations Board, and then to the Illinois State Department of Labor to complain about the PSW's utter passivity, only to be told they should file claims in bankruptcy court. Their efforts made the front page of the next day's Daily Cal, and the story concluded by telling interested workers to call Frank Lumpkin at home. Roque responded immediately by sending letters to every member announcing a general meeting on Sunday, April 27—in the ballroom of the mammoth Chicago Hilton hotel, in the downtown “Loop,” more than fifteen miles north of South Deering.

The PSW's Hilton meeting generated angry jibes—“Why have they rented the Hilton when their members can't even buy food?” one wife asked the Tribune's Richard Longworth—but when testimony in the federal bankruptcy case revealed that workers' compensation coverage for the skeleton crew manning the coke ovens and blast furnace had ended on April 1, the PSW struck Wisconsin, pulling those workers from the plant. Only the EDA's willingness to pay the $35,000 a week in natural gas costs prevented the coke ovens from going cold.<sup>3</sup>

As Wisconsin's final death rattle was sounding, two progressive Chicago clergymen—Father Tom Joyce, a Claretian priest who directed the Claretians' Peace and Justice Committee, and Dick Poethig, director of the Presbyterian Church's Institute on the Church in Urban Industrial Society, decided to attend a mid-May gathering at St. Thomas More College in Covington, Kentucky, a "National Conference on Religion and Labor." One of the featured speakers was Presbyterian minister Rev. Chuck Rawlings, who talked about his recent experience as principal organizer of the Ecumenical Coalition of the Mahoning Valley (ECMV), in northeastern Ohio.

As they listened to Rawlings, Tom Joyce and Dick Poethig could tell how similar the effects of the closing of Wisconsin were to what had occurred near Youngstown, Ohio, three years earlier. They also recognized that it had been clergymen, not union leaders, business interests, or elected officials, who had led the local community's response.

On September 19, 1977, the Lykes Corporation announced the closing of Campbell Works, with a loss of more than forty-one hundred jobs. When Chuck Rawlings, who worked for the Church and Society department of the Episcopal Diocese of Ohio, heard of the closing, he called Episcopal bishop John H. Burt, who in turn phoned James W. Malone, the Roman Catholic bishop of Youngstown. An interfaith breakfast was convened, and Rawlings circulated a memorandum calling for church leaders to confront the steel crisis. In the meantime, Youngstown attorney Staughton Lynd contacted the Washington-based National Center for Economic Alternatives (NCEA), whose codirectors, Gar Alperovitz and Jeff Faux, believed the shutdown called for an infusion of investment capital from the federal government, which would require an "unusual political mobilization" featuring "a dramatic local and national moral campaign." In a New York Times op-ed essay, Alperovitz and Faux called for a Tennessee Valley Authority-style "development corporation" with "mixed community and employee ownership" to oversee such a federal investment.

Rawlings's band of Ohio bishops and pastors called themselves the Ecumenical Coalition of the Mahoning Valley (ECMV), and they convened a "Steel Crisis Conference," at which Alperovitz was the featured speaker. Out of that came "A Religious Response to the Mahoning Valley Steel Crisis," which was signed by more than two hundred clergy members. In this pastoral letter, the clergymen echoed Alperovitz in declaring that "this is not in any sense a purely economic problem." They were "convinced that corporations have social and moral responsibilities," and said they were "seriously exploring the possibility of community and/or worker ownership" of a reopened Campbell Works.

U.S. Steel chairman Edgar Speer condemned their efforts as "nothing short of a Communist takeover," but ECMV, taking advantage of $335,000 in federal support from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, commissioned Alperovitz to undertake a six-month study to determine if Campbell could be reopened. National newspapers like the Times and the Washington Post covered the effort, especially once Alperovitz announced a preliminary finding that about $500 million would allow Campbell to reopen with about half of its prior workforce. But White House aides to President Jimmy Carter would support only $100 million and quietly asked Harvard Business School professor Richard S. Rosenbloom to evaluate Alperovitz's analysis while postponing any decision until after the November 1978 midterm elections.

In March 1979, the White House notified the ECMV that their proposal had been rejected. Chuck Rawlings thought he and his colleagues had been “naive” to expect federal help, especially when Youngstown parishioners had remained far more silent than their pastors, but when Tom Joyce and Dick Poethig spoke with Rawlings after his presentation at the May 1980 conference about Wisconsin’s demise, his advice was decisive—“Go back and organize!”—and Tom and Dick agreed to do just that.<sup>4</sup>

Joyce knew even before he returned to Chicago that the first person he would contact was Leo Mahon. Fifty-four years old at the time of Tom’s call, Mahon had been pastor of St. Victor Roman Catholic Church in Calumet City, the first suburb just south of Chicago’s southeastern city limits, since 1975. Mahon had been ordained a priest of the Chicago archdiocese in 1951. Early on, he worked with Puerto Rican parishioners and learned Spanish while also rubbing shoulders with a young community organizer named Nicholas von Hoffman and von Hoffman’s well-known mentor, Saul Alinsky, the father of community organizing. Within a few years, Mahon became head of the archdiocese’s Committee for the Spanish Speaking, which planned to start a mission in Panama. Archbishop Albert Cardinal Meyer, whom Leo adored, chose Mahon to lead it, and in early 1963 Leo left for Panama, where he spent the next twelve years.

The San Miguelito mission flourished under Leo’s leadership, but government officials took a dim view of his pastoral defense of human rights, and pliable Catholic leaders in Panama twice put Leo on trial for heresy. After Cardinal Meyer died, in early 1965, the Vatican named St. Louis native John Patrick Cody as his successor, and Cody was far less supportive of Leo’s work. When Leo returned from Panama to Chicago in 1975, Cody, perhaps out of fear of Mahon’s possible radicalism, refused to take advantage of his Spanish and Latin American expertise and instead “exiled him” to Calumet City.

Leo had left San Miguelito despondent, knowing that Cody’s attitude meant his long-standing expectation of becoming a bishop would come to naught, but at St. Victor Mahon found a core of energetic and committed young adult parishioners with whom he quickly bonded. Father Leo was “a breath of fresh air,” Jan Poledziewski recalled, selecting female altar servers and using the Sunday Bulletin to advocate for the Equal Rights Amendment. “He empowered laypeople” and “everyone just adored him,” Christine Gervais remembered. “He was such a charismatic person that if he asked you to do something, you just couldn’t wait to help him out.”<sup>5</sup>

Sometime in late May 1980, Tom Joyce and Dick Poethig met Leo at St. Victor and asked him to lead a clergy effort to respond to Wisconsin’s closing. “It was quite obvious that the man to see was Leo,” Tom later explained. “Right away, within five minutes, he says, ‘Yes, we’ve got to do something about it.’” Dick Poethig remembered it similarly: “He had the right feeling, right off the bat.” The three clergymen agreed they would invite some ecumenical colleagues on both sides of the nearby Illinois–Indiana state line to an initial meeting at St. Victor on Friday, June 6.

Come that day, sixteen clergymen and four laypeople joined the initial trio at St. Victor, and, as Joyce wrote in a memo the next day, reached “unanimous agreement that the Church or the parishes and congregations should organize in an effort to get some community say into the steel mill closings.” On June 23, nine of them again assembled at St. Victor, with Tom Joyce stating that their “only model” was the clergy response in Youngstown. He went on to say that the community deserved to have “a modernized, efficient, competitive steel industry” based upon “modernization of the present plants.” At a third meeting on July 7, they chose August 23 as the date to host “a workshop for key leadership people in the community, labor and church.” For that session, Leo emphasized that their effort must not be seen as simply pro-union but instead be “distinctly a religious response.”<sup>6</sup>

Later on July 7, Frank Lumpkin and twenty-four other former Wisconsin workers assembled at the union hall of United Steel Workers Local 65—which represented employees at U.S. Steel’s huge but shrinking South Works—and signed a declaration that “we are tired of waiting” and that action was needed “Now.” When contractors for Chase Manhattan Bank tried on July 22 to remove the existing steel inventory, which Chase had arranged to sell for $16 million, from the Wisconsin site, angry former workers blocked the plant gates; on August 5, when contractors sought to remove a crane, the ex-workers prevented that too.<sup>7</sup>

On Monday night, July 28, Frank Lumpkin’s group of workers, now calling themselves the Save Our Jobs Committee (SOJC), were joined by Mary Gonzales, a Chicago native in her late thirties who, with her new husband, Greg Galluzzo, had begun working in the Southeast Side communities just before Wisconsin’s demise. Gonzales and Galluzzo had first met eight years earlier, when Greg was a Jesuit seminarian working for Chicago’s Pilsen Neighbors Community Council and Mary was married with several young children. By 1979, Mary was a single mother of three daughters and Greg was leaving the priesthood, and late that year Mary was hired by the Latino Institute as director of advocacy while Greg was working for the Illinois Public Action Council (IPA), which traced its organizational roots back to Saul Alinsky, who had died in 1972. Together they began to work in the Southeast Side’s increasingly Hispanic—primarily Mexican—neighborhoods, but as of February 1980, when they married, their only office in South Chicago was their car.

Mary and Greg went person by person through South Chicago, focusing on its Catholic parishes. Their long-range goal was to have “a citywide coalition” of permanent, neighborhood-based advocacy groups. By early March, they had conducted scores of one-on-one interviews, established contact with five parishes, and had five small nascent groups of residents meeting and talking.

Mary’s father had worked at Wisconsin Steel for thirty-five years, never missing a single day, before dying of brain cancer at age sixty-two. Mary had not heard any advance rumors about Wisconsin closing, but when it did, “it just reverberated through that whole neighborhood,” with thousands of families losing all of their health care coverage. Doing one-on-one interviews all across South Chicago, she recalled years later, the most common refrain was “I don’t have a doctor.”

By June, their new organization had a name—the United Neighborhood Organization (UNO) of Southeast Chicago—and Mary had drafted a proposal to circulate to potential funders. Wisconsin’s demise had created not only “tremendous unemployment,” but also “psychological pressure on families.” Life “has changed in a shattering fashion,” and more than two dozen people out of the several hundred they had approached were now actively participating in the nascent UNO. “The staff’s main function will be to train leadership,” Mary’s proposal said, and they hoped to publicly launch UNO as a southeast-wide organization within eighteen months. “Never since the Depression has this community been hit so hard.”<sup>8</sup>

Leo Mahon’s August 23 conference at Calumet College in Whiting, Indiana—just across the state line from southeastern Chicago’s largely white East Side—was a four-hour event that attracted a good crowd and good press coverage. Leo presented a vision that was grand, or grandiose, given how little he knew about Chuck Rawlings’s unsuccessful effort to save Youngstown’s steel economy. A statement issued on behalf of the conveners asked how management “can morally justify divestiture” in light of “its unwillingness to invest its profits” to modernize antiquated plants. They went on to say that local parishioners must force “the industry to see its responsibility to the community rather than simply to shareholders,” yet Leo confessed to a reporter, “I had one of my parishioners tell me we’re two years too late.”

The conveners believed the conference gave them “a mandate to organize a permanent structure,” and Dick Poethig imagined they might attract $60,000 in support from the Presbyterian Church and a combined $35,000 from Cardinal Cody and the Catholic bishop of nearby Gary, Indiana. Leo suggested they name themselves the Calumet Religious Community Conference—soon changed to Calumet Community Religious Conference, or CCRC—and that they hire Roberta Lynch, who had contacted him when she heard about his efforts to mobilize the community in response to Wisconsin’s closing; Roberta had two uncles who were priests in Panama, so she had long heard of Leo Mahon. Roberta brought experience from working for progressive Southeast Side Illinois state representative Miriam Balanoff. By the end of August, CCRC hired Roberta as its first staff member, at a salary of $500 a month.<sup>9</sup>

Two days after CCRC’s conference, the PSW’s attorney informed the federal bankruptcy court that PSW, Chase Manhattan, and International Harvester had reached agreement that Chase would cover 100 percent of the March 28 checks that had bounced—$1.3 million, including vacation pay—and 30 percent of an additional one week’s wages—some $1.1 million—that Wisconsin workers were owed contractually. An earlier offer of just the $1.3 million had been rejected seventeen hundred to sixty-two, but the new deal elicited an angry protest by several hundred workers because this agreement also cleared the way for Chase to sell the accumulated inventory that the workers had previously blocked. The Tribune reported that these workers “also marched on their union headquarters,” but Tony Roque “refused to meet with them.”

During September, reports spread that Thomas Fleming, a businessman who had helped Envirodyne acquire Wisconsin Steel, had encouraged an African American friend, Walt Palmer, to pursue reopening the mill. Savvy journalists were highly dubious, but on October 6 Palmer, Tony Roque, and Chicago mayor Jane Byrne appeared before what the Tribune called “1,500 cheering steelworkers” at the downtown Auditorium Theatre to announce that Wisconsin Steel would reopen on November 1. Byrne stated that President Carter—just four weeks away from a tight reelection face-off against Ronald Reagan—had said federal support was available, and “as soon as there’s agreement on the financial plan presented by Mr. Palmer, you can count on the steel mill opening.” According to the Tribune’s Richard Longworth, Palmer was “a mesmerizing speaker,” who received “a standing ovation” from the workers, many of whom “had tears of joy in their eyes as they left.” But it was only a political chimera, and nothing more. By the end of October Byrne was claiming that the government would loan $10 million to rehabilitate Wisconsin’s coke oven, but she admitted that Walt Palmer was “no longer in the picture.”<sup>10</sup>

CCRC’s efforts to become an active organization met with mixed success, as Roberta Lynch was having trouble organizing groups of parishioners. At the CCRC Steering Committee’s monthly meeting, she said that “getting people involved at the congregation level is taking much more time than we had originally anticipated.” Neither the bishop of Gary nor Cardinal Cody had offered any firm financial support, and as 1980 was ending, CCRC’s clergymen worried that “a fully-staffed and functional organization” would not be in place prior to 1982, and they reduced Roberta’s work to just half-time.<sup>11</sup>

By the end of October, Mary Gonzales and Greg Galluzzo had a small UNO office in the heart of South Chicago's commercial district. On Thanksgiving, in full alliance with Frank Lumpkin's Save Our Jobs Committee (SOJC), UNO staged its first protest action as thirty former Wisconsin workers, and their families, descended upon the "Gold Coast" block where Jane Byrne lived in a forty-third-floor condominium apartment, chanting, "The mayor is a turkey." Much of Mary's work focused on organizing parents at an overcrowded elementary school to push for construction of a new building. By the outset of 1981, she and Greg had won financial support for UNO from Tom Joyce's Claretian Social Development Fund and also from two small, progressive Chicago funders, the Wieboldt Foundation and the Woods Charitable Fund, the latter of which had just hired its first staffer, a young woman named Jean Rudd.<sup>12</sup>

At CCRC's first monthly meeting in early 1981, Roberta Lynch echoed something Dick Poethig had said two months earlier: "there is still not a widespread sense of crisis about the steel industry in our area." What's more, she admitted, "the vagueness of CCRC's program makes it difficult for people to see what they might accomplish by getting involved." Dick Poethig suggested that CCRC mount "a mortgage-protection campaign to prevent the unemployed in the region from losing their homes" and pursue "state legislation calling for advance notice of a plant closing" plus state funding "for retraining the unemployed."

A CCRC training session in mid-February allowed Roberta to describe why she, like Leo, rejected Saul Alinsky's confrontational approach to community organizing. She said they would not use a model where "you find a target, you look for ways to bring people quickly into confrontation with it" yet only "on a very narrow . . . basis . . . looking to win a very quick victory." The CCRC, she said, should not be "deluding people" with any easy victory "to get this or that" because that "isn't going to have meaning in terms of what the real problems are." Instead, since the church is "a tremendously vital and important force," reaching out to "clergy people in every congregation in the region" would allow CCRC to become "an organization that can go to U.S. Steel and say we represent 200 churches, 50,000 people in the Calumet region." But so far congregations' responses had been "very mixed," since "one of the big problems we have is just . . . convincing people that a problem exists." In a subsequent memo, Roberta again emphasized how CCRC needed "to identify an initial program," for "a concrete focus is essential if we are to convince people to work with us." Investing time made sense to parishioners only if they believed it was "building toward something that will have an actual impact," and she confessed, "I have certain hesitations about whether we will really be capable of carrying out sustained activity."<sup>13</sup>

Early in 1981 the federal bankruptcy court awarded title to the Wisconsin Steel site to the federal EDA. The EDA imagined selling the plant, perhaps for use as a "mini-mill" that would employ less than half of Wisconsin's onetime work force, but everyone realized that with Ronald Reagan's inauguration, the chances of federal action to prop up antiquated steel plants had vanished. Nonetheless, Frank Lumpkin announced that 150 former Wisconsin workers would travel to Washington, D.C., to lobby for federal action. Frank estimated that only 10 percent of the ex-employees had found new jobs, and he stressed that all benefits had now run out. When the workers visited the House gallery, six members of Congress rose to speak on their behalf, including Chicago's Harold Washington.<sup>14</sup>

In April, Roberta Lynch resigned to pursue a full-time job. CCRC continued to meet for the rest of 1981, but without even a part-time paid staffer, little meaningful outreach activity was taking place. In stark contrast, Mary and Greg's UNO of Southeast Chicago was receiving funding commitments from multiple sources ranging from the United Way of Metro Chicago and the Chicago Community Trust to the Wieboldt Foundation and the Roman Catholic Church's national Campaign for Human Development (CHD), a then relatively low-profile program with a social-action support mission very similar to Tom Joyce's much smaller Claretian program. Mary also contacted Jean Rudd at the Woods Fund, and by the end of 1981 UNO had scheduled a large ceremony for May 8 to publicly launch the organization. Similarly, Frank Lumpkin and his Save Our Jobs Committee, with UNO acting as their fiscal agent, successfully approached small foundations such as the Crossroads Fund for modest support to ensure SOJC's future. More significantly, thanks to progressive attorney and legendary former Chicago alderman Leon Despres, Frank secured the pro bono services of a savvy young attorney, Tom Geoghegan, so that from mid-1981 onward, SOJC would be an increasingly active participant in the legal arm-wrestling about liability for Wisconsin Steel's demise.<sup>15</sup>

Most important, by early 1982 Greg Galluzzo had added to UNO's staff a thirty-one-year-old organizer who quickly found his way to Calumet City to introduce himself to Leo Mahon. Jerry Kellman had grown up in the New York City suburb of New Rochelle, drifted through two years of college, first in Madison, Wisconsin, and then Portland, Oregon, and by 1971 was undergoing Alinsky-style training by the Industrial Areas Foundation (IAF) staff, the truest—and most aggressive—disciples of the late community organizing guru. That training led to organizing assignments in Chicago, suburban DuPage County, Philadelphia, and Lincoln, Nebraska, where he put together a citizens coalition made up primarily of one congregation's parishioners. By 1979, Kellman was back in Chicago and in graduate school, first at Northwestern and then at the University of Chicago. Galluzzo knew immediately that he wanted to add Kellman's faith-based organizing expertise to UNO's expanding work on the Southeast Side.

In February 1982, Leo told Tom Joyce, Dick Poethig, and his other colleagues about Kellman, and they agreed to invite him to CCRC's next meeting. The organization's bank account balance totaled $473, but UNO and the Latino Institute had Kellman's salary covered and within four weeks Jerry, Mary, and Greg sent Leo a detailed three-page memo titled "Our Suggestions for a Church-Based Organization in the Calumet Region." "We agree with you that the Calumet Region needs organizing if it is to avoid becoming an economic wasteland," they wrote, but there were two essential challenges: first, "how to organize enough strength to change the situation, rather than set people up for still another defeat," and second, "how to sustain the organizing over an extended period of time by developing the parish as a community through the organizing process."

The trio wanted to expand UNO's Catholic-parish-based organizing from Chicago's Hispanic neighborhoods southward into parishes in majority-white suburban towns like Calumet City, with Kellman doing that outreach. Once a core group of at least ten parishes was organized, the effort could expand to Protestant churches. Funding for the expansion could be sought from CHD and foundations like Woods and Wieboldt, so that by 1984–85 Kellman could add staff to do "leadership development within each parish and congregation." Then those parishes could "come together for common programs which affect the entire region. The issues start small, but grow progressively larger as the organization grows stronger and as the leaders become increasingly sophisticated." Leadership training would be ongoing, and "the professional staff is there to share what they know, not to make the leadership dependent on them."<sup>16</sup>

Leo took their proposal to his CCRC colleagues, telling them, "I feel that this is the kind of direction our organization must take.” He half-humorously told his own parishioners that “the talk around Calumet City . . . is that the parish of St. Victor’s is openly going ‘Communist.’” Frank Lumpkin, the actual Communist, was continuing his work for SOJC, and the Tribune’s Richard Longworth published a moving profile of Frank and his colleagues, in which Frank estimated that five hundred former Wisconsin workers had left town, fifteen hundred were still unemployed, and twelve hundred or so, including his friend Daniel “Muscles” Vitas, had found some type of new job, Vitas as a school crossing guard.

UNO’s May 8 founding convention was “a sight of such inspiration that few will forget it,” observed Father Tom Cima, UNO’s new board chairman and pastor of Our Lady Gate of Heaven Parish in Jeffery Manor—a primarily black middle-class neighborhood located between South Chicago and South Deering. UNO and SOJC collaborated in a downtown protest at which marchers chanted “We want jobs,” and progressive Catholic clergy throughout Chicagoland—as most residents called the metropolitan area—were overjoyed when on July 10 Joseph Bernardin, the liberal archbishop of Cincinnati, was named archbishop of Chicago, succeeding the widely reviled John Patrick Cody, who had died on April 25.<sup>17</sup>

Of seemingly lesser consequence, in the summer of 1982 Mary and Greg’s corps of southeastern Chicago organizers received a new recruit. The twenty-two-year-old Bob Moriarty had grown up in an Irish working-class Chicago suburb, and during his junior year at Northwestern University in Evanston, the town just north of Chicago, he had taken a community organizing seminar taught by a professor named John McKnight. A fifty-year-old Ohio native and navy veteran, McKnight had worked for the Chicago Commission on Human Relations, directed the Illinois chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), and headed up the Midwest office of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. In the latter role, McKnight had been in the room when Martin Luther King Jr. negotiated a much-criticized end to his 1966 civil rights protests that had roiled Chicago, and from that post, McKnight had moved to Northwestern.

Beginning in the mid-1970s, McKnight wrote a series of influential articles on how service economies reduce citizens to consumers and clients. Writing first in the Christian Century in 1975, McKnight explained that each time a social problem, or need, is identified, “citizens have an increased sense of deficiency and dependence.” Two years later, McKnight expanded on that analysis and argued that service economies “are peopled with service producers and service consumers—professionals and clients.” The former controlled the relationship, and “the client is less a person in need than a person who is needed” in order to justify the salary or income of the provider. As “the interpretation of the need necessarily becomes individualized,” it disables “the capacities of citizens to perceive and deal with issues in political terms.”

By 1979, McKnight had honed his analysis further. “A service economy needs ‘deficiency,’ ‘human problems,’ and ‘needs’ if it is to grow. . . . This economic need for need creates a demand for redefining conditions as deficiencies” and “the power to label people deficient and declare them in need is the basic tool of control and oppression.” As government social welfare bureaucracies expand, “the professional servicers now receive more money for their help than the recipients receive in cash grants.” Quite possibly, McKnight contended, “there are more people in Chicago who derive an income from serving the poor than there are poor people. . . . The welfare recipient is the raw material for the case workers, administrators, doctors, lawyers, mental health workers, drug counselors, youth workers, and police officers. Do the servicers need the recipient more than she needs them? . . . Who really needs whom?” McKnight believed that professionals willing to cast aside their own self-interest must commit themselves

“to reallocation of power to the people we serve so that we no longer will need to serve.”<sup>18</sup>

John McKnight was unquestionably the most influential social analyst in 1980s Chicago, and he brought Bob Moriarty to organizing. But Greg Galluzzo thought the twenty-two-year-old Moriarty was too young for the congregation-based organizing that UNO was moving toward under Jerry Kellman’s tutelage, so by September 1982 Moriarty was going door to door in South Deering, just like Mary Gonzales had in South Chicago two years earlier. Moriarty’s job was to warn residents that Waste Management Incorporated (WMI), a huge garbage conglomerate that already operated a four-hundred-acre landfill farther south, below 130th Street, had just applied for a city permit to open a new landfill on the 289-acre “Big Marsh,” located just south of 110th Street and west of Torrence, only a few blocks from residents’ homes and the Bright Elementary School on South Calhoun Avenue.

One day Bob knocked on the door of a home on 108th Street, hardly four blocks from the now-shuttered gates of the Wisconsin Steel plant. Moriarty introduced himself to a woman named Petra Rodriguez, who was interested in his information, but Rodriguez also had a hugely consequential recommendation for him: “You should meet my daughter.” And so Bob walked around the corner to her home at 10814 South Hoxie Avenue and brought to Chicago organizing the most important recruit of the decade. The next eight years of Chicago politics would be different because he did so.

Mary Ellen Rodriguez Montes was a twenty-four-year-old stay-at-home mother of three young children. In Spanish, her name was Maria Elena, but to her family, and to the young organizers she would work with, she was simply Lena. “She was very smart, very beautiful, very tough,” Bob remembered, and a “quite extraordinary person,” another organizer explained. A priest who knew Lena well recalled her as “a real dynamo. She was also very attractive: great charisma and personality and very engaging.”

Lena easily recalled Bob’s first visit: “I remember him coming to the door.” She knew about the Love Canal environmental disaster near Niagara Falls, New York, and Chicago newspapers were reporting that a company called SCA Chemical Services had asked the Illinois Environmental Protection Agency (IEPA) for permission to move toxic chemical waste from downstate Illinois to an incinerator located at 11700 South Stony Island Avenue, just southwest of where WMI wanted to locate its landfill. Lena and her husband Ray agreed to host the first meeting of Bob’s recruits in their second-floor living room. Another young stay-at-home mom who attended was Alma Avalos. One year younger than Lena, she had grown up on Petra Rodriguez’s block and now had two young children. Bob, Lena, and Alma then spent the next several weeks recruiting other South Deering residents to protest against the two facilities.

Before the end of October they were ready to act. They wanted a public meeting, in South Deering, with IEPA director Richard Carlson, but they got no response. Then Moriarty, along with another organizer, Phil Mullins, who had come to UNO from Pilsen, suggested taking a busload of residents, along with their children, to Governor James R. Thompson’s office in downtown Chicago. Arming the children with sticky caramel apples, the group made its way to the governor’s suite via an unsecured back stairway. With Lena and Alma in the lead, the group said they weren’t leaving until they spoke to Carlson. Unhappy staffers got Carlson on the phone, and he promised a meeting, but by the upcoming Election Day, November 2, one still had not been scheduled. Jerry Kellman happened to know where the governor voted, so another bus trip was scheduled for what turned out to be a chilly, rainy day. After a wait of several hours, Thompson’s limousine finally appeared, and the group dashed toward him brandishing picket signs. With plenty of journalists looking on, a public meeting was quickly promised.

Four weeks later, on the evening of December 6, Carlson traveled to the Trumbull Park Fieldhouse, on South Deering's northwestern flank, to speak to a crowd of more than two hundred residents. Moriarty and his recruits had prepared carefully for the session. They were concerned, however, by the presence of Foster Milhouse, a well-known precinct captain in Alderman Vrdolyak's 10th Ward political organization and a leader of the old-line South Deering Improvement Association (SDIA), a group that traced its roots back to an infamous August 1953 race riot. When the Chicago Housing Authority (CHA) accidentally assigned one black family to the housing project that adjoined Trumbull Park, SDIA's membership responded with violence. After more African American families moved in during the next four years, even greater violence erupted in July 1957. When Milhouse began heckling at the outset of the December 6 meeting, Moriarty's recruits responded quickly. "We call him Judas," Moriarty remembered, and "they just jeer him out of the hall . . . 'Judas, Judas, Judas.'" Once Milhouse was dispensed with, Carlson quickly agreed to the residents' requests, but it was Lena who emerged as the star of the evening. "I somehow kind of like blossomed in this room," she remembered. "I actually enjoyed it," and indeed "felt called to it." Also present was her husband Ray, who "really had an interest in being a lead person" and who "seemed a little bit upset about it," Lena explained, when his wife emerged as the residents' lead spokesperson. Ray "was a decent guy, but really insecure," Bob recalled, and Alma described it similarly: "jealousy."<sup>19</sup>

Carlson's appearance put their group on the map, and by the end of the year, they had chosen a name to distinguish themselves from the larger UNO: Irondalers Against the Chemical Threat, or IACT. In February 1983, a wary Alderman Vrdolyak met with them about WMI's proposed landfill. Lena recalled that he "met with us on the site of Waste Management's proposed dump and from where we stood, we could see our homes. He said, 'Gee, I didn't realize that it was this close to the houses.' I said, 'Does this mean you're going to oppose it?' And he said, 'Oh no, I'll reconsider and get back to you.' Well, he never did get back to us."

In the meantime, when incumbent mayor Jane Byrne, whom Vrdolyak energetically backed, finished second in the Democratic mayoral primary on February 22, Vrdolyak's political fortunes took a turn for the worse. Byrne got 33 percent, and Cook County State's Attorney Richard M. Daley—a son of the late Richard J. Daley, Chicago's powerful mayor from 1955 until his death in late 1976—placed third with 30 percent. The upset winner was African American congressman Harold Washington, who rode a tidal wave of enthusiasm among black voters to a 36 percent plurality. Washington still had to win the general election against Republican former state legislator Bernard Epton, and the racial symbolism of Chicago electing its first black mayor—or white voters uniting to stop it—cast the contest in starkly racial terms.

Washington visited the IACT activists at Bright School on March 29, and on April 12, he narrowly edged Epton, winning 51.7 percent against the Republican's 48 percent. Analysts concluded that only 12.3 percent of the city's white voters, primarily from the generally liberal lakefront wards, voted for Washington. Seventeen days later, on April 29, 1983, Chicago's first black mayor took office.<sup>20</sup>

Throughout the latter part of 1982 and the first five months of 1983, the outlook for Southeast Side steelworkers grew worse and worse. There was even more concern when word got out that PSW president Tony Roque had signed an agreement with Chase Manhattan in August 1980 that allowed the workers to recoup their bounced checks, but that also potentially released International Harvester from most if not all of its pension obligations to Wisconsin's former workers. Roque had not understood the legal implications of what he had signed. Some families were becoming so desperate that SOJC had initiated free food distribution twice each month and received additional funding support via UNO.

For decades, U.S. Steel's South Works, located well north of 95th Street, had been the unchallenged behemoth of the Calumet region's steel mills. Its 1973 workforce of ninety-nine hundred had shrunk to seventy-four hundred in 1979, fifty-two hundred in early 1981, and then forty-eight hundred in the spring of 1982, but in September 1982, U.S. Steel chairman David M. Roderick announced that the company would build a new rail mill at South Works thanks to concessions from both USW Local 65 and the state of Illinois. The new facility would add up to one thousand jobs, and completion was targeted for late 1983. "If we were going to be shutting down South Works, we wouldn't be building the rail mill here," Roderick assured Chicago journalists and state officials. Six months later the USW accepted an openly concessionary contract, hoping that laid-off workers would be brought back. Then, in May 1983, Roderick reversed himself and told U.S. Steel's annual meeting that South Works might indeed be closed due to the impact of environmental regulations on such an aged plant. The same week that Roderick spoke, a comprehensive survey of Southeast Side neighborhoods showed "a job loss rate of 56 percent since 1980" and "an unemployment rate of 35 percent."<sup>21</sup>

In late May, more than 150 IACTers and other antidumping protesters descended upon WMI's annual meeting in tony suburban Oak Brook. The protest drew significant press attention, and next the IACTers—who had revised their name to Irondalers to Abolish the Chemical Threat, rather than just "Against"—blockaded the entrance to WMI's large Calumet Industrial District (CID) landfill south of 130th Street, creating a backlog of scores of garbage trucks. Chicago police, unsure whether the remote location was in Chicago or instead in Calumet City, made no arrests. In the meantime, Mary Ellen Montes, who was seeking an appointment with the city's new mayor, met with his sewer commissioner on June 10, and six days later the IACTers again blocked the CID entrance. This time Chicago police had a map, and seventeen of the sixty protesters were arrested, including Lena. Her mother Petra spoke to reporters, and Moriarty and others went door to door in South Deering to raise bail money.

Everyone was released in time for a 10:00 A.M. meeting the next day with new mayor Harold Washington. At least one woman showed Washington the visible bruises she had from her arrest, and the mayor agreed to speak at an IACT meeting in South Deering. By midsummer, IACT had access to a crucial meeting place which previously had been denied it: St. Kevin Roman Catholic Church, on the east side of South Torrence, just north of the rusting Wisconsin Steel plant and by far the neighborhood's largest church. Up until early 1983, St. Kevin's pastor had been Father Bernard "Benny" Scheid, a notoriously hateful and sometimes drunken political ally of Alderman Vrdolyak. Two years earlier, when the Chicago Sun-Times had publicly exposed the extent of then-Cardinal Cody's financial misdeeds, Scheid wrote a letter to the paper's editor warning him to "get your affairs in order. We pray for your sudden and unprovided death every day."

Fortunately for IACT and South Deering, Scheid's successor was Father George Schopp, who for several years had worked with Greg Galluzzo and UNO as pastor of St. Francis de Sales Parish on the East Side. Schopp was inheriting a parish that included not only Lena and Alma, but, far more menacingly, Scheid's buddies and Vrdolyak precinct captains like Foster Milhouse ("we used to call him Fester Outhouse," Schopp recounted) who were "kind of a goon squad." But Schopp was already familiar with Vrdolyak's iron grip control of Southeast Side politics, and his arrival at St. Kevin dramatically altered the parish's political role, as all of Chicago would soon see.

In late August, Harold Washington announced that he was blocking WMI's attempt to open a landfill in Big Marsh as well as a proposed expansion of the nearby existing Paxton Landfill on East 120th Street. Then, on Wednesday evening, August 24, Washington came to South Deering to speak to an IACT-organized crowd of some six hundred people packed into St. Kevin's large basement hall. As the Tribune's headline the next morning put it, "Washington Invades Ald. Vrdolyak's 10th Ward Turf."

Both George Schopp and Dennis Geaney, Leo's associate pastor from St. Victor, were worried about what Benny Scheid and Vrdolyak's lackeys might try to do, so Schopp asked a number of supportive priests to stay close to Scheid. As reporters scanned the crowd and a television crew set up their camera, Scheid "assured me that he would work over the crowd by telling them that Washington was an ex-convict and still a big crook," Geaney recalled a few weeks later. Once Washington arrived and the meeting got under way, Geaney happened to sit beside Petra Rodriguez, "who told me that the chairperson was her daughter, Mary Ellen Montes. This tiny woman steered the tight ship of 600 people like a seasoned sea captain. Benny and the 10th Ward Regulars never got an opening." Scheid "got up and started blustering, trying to berate Mary Ellen," Schopp recalled, but Lena was unbowed and the hecklers were silenced.

Washington was a powerful and emphatic speaker, and he took control of the crowd. "There is an over-concentration of waste facilities in this community" and the multiple dumps posed a significant danger. "I am appalled things have gone this far." Washington singled out WMI by name: "I believe this company has a horrible record of violating the public trust and endangering the public health," he said. "We'll do whatever it takes to get to the bottom of this. We're investigating this now. Apparently Waste Management has quite a bit of influence over certain key people," an obvious allusion to Vrdolyak, who had received at least $18,500 in political contributions from WMI.

As Washington concluded, the crowd rose to give him a standing ovation, but Lena, standing beside him, immediately intervened: "The meeting's not over yet, Mr. Mayor. We're not finished." She then sternly insisted that Washington give a yes or no answer to each of five specific IACT demands for city action, and as she recited them, Washington smilingly said "yes" each time. After her fifth one—"Are you committed to stopping Waste Management?" to which Washington responded, "Yes, I am"—Lena reached up, "threw her arms around him and kissed him" on the cheek, as 10:00 P.M. news viewers all across Chicagoland soon witnessed. Washington looked smitten. "Now I know why she is your leader. She's quite a politician," he told the crowd. To Lena herself, the mayor was even more complimentary: "Boy, you're a tough woman. I don't want to mess with you. I'll do anything you want me to do," and Washington gave her his private home phone number.

Observers were blown away by Lena's aplomb. "It was an impressive performance by Mary Ellen," environmental expert Bob Ginsburg remembered. "She held him there until he agreed" and "it made UNO a citywide player" operating from the veritable backyard of a powerful city council figure who had already become Washington's greatest political nemesis. "It was a big deal." Dennis Geaney felt likewise: Lena "was too astute to let him use his charisma as a substitute for hard answers." Phil Mullins, who had just succeeded Bob Moriarty as UNO's IACT organizer, was astonished. "It was an awesome meeting. . . . It was amazing. It just changed everything."<sup>22</sup>

George Schopp felt the backlash, "big time. . . . It sent Vrdolyak off the wall." Former alderman and Vrdolyak ally John Buchanan told the priest, "You're part of a Communist conspiracy." Different repercussions came from beyond the neighborhood. The CID landfill below 130th Street received almost two-thirds of Chicago's garbage. It and the older Paxton Landfill at 122nd Street were essential sites; after all, the city's waste had to go somewhere. The chairman of the Zoning Board of Appeals saw the Southeast Side locations as simple common sense: "from a land use point of view, that is an area that has become dedicated to this type of business." The other most relevant city official viewed WMI in economic development terms: "Their proposal is no different from a steel mill starting to expand. I'm looking at it as an industry expanding, and we need jobs." The Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry agreed, which led to a Tribune headline saying "Dumping Ban Called Threat to Business." Unlike with landfills, the city had no regulatory authority over the SCA incinerator at 117th Street, and in early October the Reagan administration's Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) gave what the Tribune called "the largest commercial toxic waste incinerator in the United States" a permit to burn PCBs inside Chicago's city limits. The chemical waste company confidently declared: "This is a state-of-the-art incinerator. It will not pose a health threat to residents."<sup>23</sup>

But the most pressing threat to the Southeast Side's well-being was the ongoing uncertainty of what U.S. Steel would do with South Works, where the active workforce was down to twelve hundred. Although the ongoing shrinkage of South Works' employee roster was not as sudden or dramatic as the Wisconsin catastrophe, the cumulative job loss over time was almost three times greater, and it was the result of industry-wide trends, not a series of missteps. Between the late 1970s and the mid-1980s, the domestic U.S. steel market shrank dramatically, especially because of greatly reduced demand from the U.S. auto industry and a more than 50 percent growth in the import of steel from abroad.

Throughout the fall of 1983 and into early 1984, U.S. Steel's leadership continued to threaten a possible shutdown of South Works unless environmental protections were seriously loosened and the United Steelworkers union surrendered even more far-reaching contract concessions. Two days after Christmas, U.S. Steel announced that it would shrink the plant to just its beam mill and one electric furnace, reducing the workforce to just eight hundred. Members of Congress were joined by Archbishop—and now Cardinal—Joseph Bernardin in denouncing U.S. Steel's behavior, and Tribune business editor Richard Longworth wrote an angry column, declaring that U.S. Steel's behavior "violated every standard of decency and broke every obligation to the workers and the community that made it rich." The company had betrayed "every principle of economic fair play established over the last fifty years" and new federal legislation might be necessary "to protect the country from companies like U.S. Steel." Indeed, "U.S. Steel is operating so far outside the rules of normal free enterprise that it is challenging the entire American industrial system." Among those responding to the essay was St. Victor's Father Dennis Geaney, who commended Longworth and rued the damage done to "people who are being treated like obsolete machinery."<sup>24</sup>

While IACT and the Southeast Side steel crisis were making news throughout the summer and fall of 1983, Jerry Kellman reactivated CCRC in tandem with the Catholic parishes that stretched across Cook County's suburban townships, the area that comprised the archdiocese's Vicariate XII. Mary Gonzales and Greg Galluzzo also were expanding UNO's organizational reach into three more predominantly Hispanic Chicago neighborhoods: Back of the Yards, Little Village, and Pilsen, where Danny Solis was transforming the Pilsen Neighbors Community Council into a UNO affiliate. Before the end of the year Mary and Greg also added to UNO's staff Peter Martinez, a veteran IAF organizer. Martinez had known and clashed with Kellman a decade earlier, and his arrival not only increased tensions between Jerry and Greg, but it spurred Kellman's gradual shift from UNO to Leo Mahon's CCRC. Jerry sought support for CCRC from the archdiocese's CHD, the Woods Fund, and Tom Joyce's Claretian Social Development Fund, emphasizing that his congregational organizing would lead parishioners toward "understanding social action as part of a faith commitment."

By midsummer, Kellman had visited pastors across the vicariate and had won the support of urban vicar Father Ray Nugent. Combining the vicariate's numerical designation with the Book of Ecclesiastes' (3:1-2) well-known invocation of "time," Kellman and the pastors came up with "Time for XII" as the name for a program which would work hand in glove with CCRC to train lay leaders in each parish to listen to fellow parishioners' thoughts about the region's economic crisis.

Cardinal Bernardin gave Time for XII his enthusiastic support, and on August 29 he endorsed it at a meeting of three hundred parish leaders from across the vicariate. Kellman and Leo Mahon believed it would take until October 1984 to raise the necessary funds—in part through contributions from each church—to hire staff and begin work at the more than twenty parishes that said they would sign on. In the interim Kellman would kick off "pilot projects" at St. Victor and at Father Paul Burke's Holy Ghost Parish in neighboring South Holland.

At St. Victor Parish, Leo's—and soon Jerry's—right-hand layman was the energetic Fred Simari. Under the tutelage of Leo's first young associate pastor at St. Victor, Bill Stenzel, Fred had proceeded through the archdiocese's three-year diaconate school. At almost forty years old, Fred was six years older than Kellman, who quickly impressed him as an "incredibly hard worker" who "was great at what he did." Also involved at St. Victor were two other key parishioners, Gloria Boyda and Jan Poledziewski. Within St. Victor, "lots of laypeople got involved," Jan recalled, another of whom was Christine Gervais. "We just went into different homes and spoke to the people and then kind of brought back all of our information," Gervais remembered. We "just sat and talked," especially about what families needed. People just "refused to believe that the steel industry was going down," because for many families, the plants were the only jobs that three successive generations of breadwinners had known.

By the beginning of 1984, Kellman was expanding beyond St. Victor and Holy Ghost, and at Annunciata Parish on the East Side Kellman used a small retreat as an opportunity to explain Time for XII. Soon thereafter Jerry spoke with one young man from the parish, Ken Jania, about joining him to do further outreach. Jania, newly married and running a small, failing East Side restaurant, jumped at the chance, and by May 1984, Ken was CCRC's second paid staff member.

"My job was to connect with the parishioners," Jania recalled, "to make a presentation in front of church" and "organize and start the interview process with parishioners." On the East Side, in predominantly Polish Hegewisch, Chicago's southeasternmost neighborhood, in Calumet City and other southern suburbs, there were "hundreds of interviews that we documented." The job was harder than it sounded, for "it was very difficult for me to come from that neighborhood and to go and do those interviews, because in many cases I knew the people" going back to high school. "It was very difficult with these families" since "they'd lost everything" when a father's steel plant job disappeared. "He's got nothing," since "their skills didn't translate to anything," and that meant "absolute desperation," with prolonged unemployment signaling how "the traditional blue collar nuclear family's exploded."

As IACT's Alma Avalos explained, "I don't think the reality really sunk in until after a couple of years passed." As Christine Walley, the most poignant chronicler of the Southeast Side's disintegration, later wrote, "it sometimes felt as if our entire world was collapsing." Permanent closure of the mills, whether Wisconsin or especially South Works, "was simply unfathomable," and for many men "the stigma of being out of work was deeply traumatic." In her household, following the Wisconsin shutdown, "my dad became increasingly depressed, eventually refusing to leave the house. . . . He would never hold a permanent job again." The Southeast Side's economic demise also "caused untold social devastation" among neighbors as another former Wisconsin worker attempted suicide and a third drank himself to death. Her father lived on, wallowing in "the deep-seated bitterness of a man who felt that life had passed him by." All across the Calumet region, it slowly dawned on people that a "world we thought would never change" had suddenly proven "far more ephemeral" than anyone had imagined possible.

Jerry Kellman's reenlivened CCRC had an expanded geographic reach thanks to Vicariate XII's archdiocesan links with neighboring Vicariate X, which encompassed all of the Chicago neighborhoods that comprised Greater Roseland. Far more crucial, however, in early 1983 Leo Mahon's protégé and former associate pastor, Bill Stenzel, was assigned to the small, struggling Holy Rosary Church at the southwest corner of 113th Street and King Drive. Stenzel had spent some previous months with Father Tom "Rock" Kaminski at neighboring St. Helena of the Cross Parish on S. Parnell Avenue at 101st Street. One of Stenzel's tasks was to merge an even weaker nearby parish, St. Salomea, a historically Polish church, into Holy Rosary, which had been traditionally Irish. Holy Rosary had some deeply committed parishioners, like Ralph Viall, a white man in his fifties, and Betty Garrett, an African American woman who had moved to Roseland in 1971, but the merger faced no opposition because there was hardly anyone either Irish or Polish or—excepting Ralph Viall and his friend Ken—indeed white left in Roseland.<sup>25</sup>

If any one neighborhood in America epitomized the experience of "white flight" in its most traumatic form, Roseland was it. The name went back to the earliest white settlers, Dutch immigrants who first arrived in 1849 to build homes and farms in the area around what would become 103rd to 111th Streets at South Michigan Avenue—the same street that fifteen miles northward becomes Chicago's "Magnificent Mile" shopping district. In 1852 the Illinois Central and Michigan Central Railroads interconnected just a little to the southeast, and the settlement that grew up there would be called Kensington. Over the next quarter century Chicago's role as major rail hub grew dramatically, and in 1880 the already-famous sleeping car magnate George Pullman chose an area just to the northeast—between what later would be 103rd and 115th Streets—to build a new manufacturing plant as well as a company town he would name after himself. By the turn of the century, Pullman's burgeoning plant employed many workers who lived in Roseland and Kensington, and in the coming decades and the World War II era, thousands of men—white men—who found well-paying jobs in the steel plants east of there, across the large geographic divide of Lake Calumet and its attendant marshes, made their homes in Roseland or the adjoining neighborhoods of West Pullman and Washington Heights, both of which, like Kensington, were often lumped into Greater Roseland.

Black people were almost nonexistent in those neighborhoods. To the north, between 91st and 97th Streets astride State Street, a small black community called Lilydale grew up in the years after 1912, and by 1937, its residents successfully protested for the construction of a neighborhood public school. At the time of the 1930 census, Kensington had 170 black residents. In 1933, when an African American woman purchased a duplex some fifteen blocks southwestward, near 120th Street and Stewart Avenue, white neighbors bombed the property. A decade later, when white real estate developer Donald O'Toole announced the construction of Princeton Park, a new neighborhood of primarily single-family homes for African Americans just west of Lilydale, eleven thousand whites petitioned unsuccessfully to block the development. The end of World War II created a serious housing shortage, and when the CHA moved the families of several black war veterans into a reconstructed barracks project on the east side of Halsted Street at 105th Street, it took more than a thousand law enforcement officers to finally end three nights of violent white protest riots.

Following World War II, Greater Roseland's racial composition changed gradually, and then incredibly abruptly. Blacks were 18 percent of the population in 1950, but the proportion increased to 23 percent in 1960, to 55 percent in 1970, and then to 97 percent by 1980. But those statistics, while dramatic, nonetheless fail to convey how stark the transformation was. In 1960, West Pullman was 100 percent white; by 1980, it was 90 percent black. Washington Heights, 12 percent black in 1960, was 75 percent so by 1970, and 98 percent by 1980. In central Roseland, the dominant church presence, reaching all the way back to the original settlers, was the four congregations of the Christian Reformed Church (CRC) and four more of the Reformed Church of America (RCA). One of the CRC churches considered reaching out to new African American residents in early 1964, but then dropped the idea in July 1968, concluding that the neighborhood was in "rapid decline" by the spring of 1969. As in other neighborhoods all across Chicago's vast South Side, the onset of the real cataclysm could be dated quite precisely: April 4, 1968, when Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in Memphis. "From that day on, everything changed," one resident told Louis Rosen, who wrote a powerful memoir of the transformation before becoming a successful musician. "It was rapid. It was awful," one white person recalled. "It was an exodus."

That is what happened in Roseland. In hardly twelve months in 1971–72, all four self-governing CRC churches abandoned the neighborhood and moved to the white suburbs. Of the RCA churches, one decamped in 1971, a second in 1974, and a third in 1977; the last survivor held out well into the 1980s. Of all the statistics measuring white flight, one may capture the price that the neighborhoods—and the new residents—paid more powerfully than any other: in 1960, fifty-eight M.D.s practiced in Roseland. Twenty years later, in 1980, after a population increase of five thousand residents, there were only eleven.

While virtually all whites fled, one Christian Reformed couple in their late thirties walked against the tide. Rev. Tony Van Zanten had finished seminary in the early 1960s, spent some time in Harlem and then over a decade in Paterson, New Jersey, another city experiencing serious decline. In August 1976 Tony and his wife Donna relocated to Chicago and opened Roseland Christian Ministries Center in the heart of South Michigan Avenue's once-vibrant business district. They fully realized how "the racial change in Roseland was a very radical and very swift one," maybe more stark than in any other place. "There were no social services at all," Donna remembered. "There was nothing there for the new people."<sup>26</sup>

Standing against the tide were the Roman Catholic parishes that for decades had stood within fifteen blocks or so of each other all across Greater Roseland. Several closings and mergers had taken place in the previous decade as the area's Catholic population shrank due to the racial turnover, but new African American members energized some parishes. Father Paul Burak was newly ordained when he arrived at St. Catherine of Genoa in West Pullman in 1972, when white flight was near its peak and the population, for the moment, was roughly 50 percent black and 50 percent white. St. Catherine's retired pastor, Father Frank Murphy, had been a forceful proponent of racial equality, but that hadn't stemmed the flight. "I experienced a lot of struggle and confusion about the parish" through the early and mid-1970s, Burak recounted. "Every weekend I would meet someone saying 'Father, this is our last weekend here.'" Burak left St. Catherine in 1978, only to return in 1981, and by then few white parishioners remained. Tom Kaminski arrived at St. Helena in 1977, and only a few elderly white people were still in the congregation.

At first glance, the massive white depopulation of these neighborhoods promised a wonderful opportunity—thousands of newly available, often well-constructed brick bungalow-style homes—for African American Chicagoans whose families had for decades been trapped within the clear racial boundaries of Chicago's South and West Side neighborhoods. But the reality of Roseland's racial transformation again made black families highly vulnerable to exploitative white real estate "professionals," this time due almost entirely to federal government policy choices. The Federal Housing Administration (FHA), by 1968 part of the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), was indisputably the villain, but until the mid-1970s, almost no one fully fathomed—or sought to expose—the consequences of government policy-making gone awry.

At first only one little-known housing policy expert, Calvin Bradford, was determined to unmask a widely ignored evil. The term "redlining" was well known, if not well understood, but in newly African American neighborhoods like Roseland, it was not lenders' refusal to make conventional home mortgage loans available to black home buyers that wreaked widespread damage, but how the FHA, starting in August 1968, made government-insured loans available to such purchasers—often through exploitative mortgage bankers, and even for properties of dubious quality—that ended up decimating newly black neighborhoods in which such insured loans were concentrated.

Bradford and a coauthor figured out that while seeking to "encourage inner-city lending," the FHA caused local mortgage bankers to simply maximize the number of black purchasers they could entice to buy homes. As a result, thousands of black families were issued mortgages that they were not qualified to successfully carry—especially in an urban economy where blue-collar jobs like those at the Southeast Side's steel mills were vanishing by the thousands year after year. The result was "massive numbers of foreclosed and abandoned properties," with the FHA insurance actively encouraging fast-buck lenders to foreclose as quickly as possible on as many properties as they could.

As Bradford explained in a subsequent essay, the federally insured loans provided "the certainty that FHA will take the property from the lender after foreclosure and pay the claim," and that led to lax underwriting and the profligate issuance of loans because "neither the mortgage companies that originated them nor the investor that purchased them—basically FNMA [popularly known as Fannie Mae, the Federal National Mortgage Association] cared about the soundness of the loans." Indeed, as Bradford later observed, "the financial incentives were so great that scores of real estate agents, lenders, and even FHA officials engaged in fraud in order to make sales to unqualified and unsuspecting minority homebuyers." The end result, as dramatically witnessed in Roseland, was "the government taking all of the losses and the communities suffering all the devastation" of foreclosed and abandoned homes.<sup>27</sup> shopping district. One group, the Greater Roseland Organization (GRO), founded in 1969, tried to ease the racial transition. The GRO was comprised of smaller, neighborhood-specific groups such as the Pullman Civic Organization and the Roseland Heights Community Association, and it included both older white residents, like Holy Rosary's Ralph Viall, and newly arrived African Americans, like Mary Bates and Lenora Rodgers. With funding support from both CHD and the Chicago Community Trust, GRO emerged in the early 1980s as the only audible voice speaking for the neighborhood.

The summer of 1980 saw the first stirrings of gang influence in Roseland, and in September the long-famous Gatelys Peoples Store, the largest business on South Michigan Avenue, closed. A citywide study of different neighborhoods' needs described Gatelys' closure as "psychologically . . . probably the most serious blow imaginable" to Roseland's economic well-being. Then early in 1981, in three separate incidents, three teenage students at Fenger High School were shot and killed. By this time, close to five hundred properties in Roseland and West Pullman were in foreclosure, and more than sixteen thousand people, one-quarter of Roseland's population, were receiving public aid. A study of recent job losses in the area highlighted Wisconsin's closing and stated, "Many of these workers were Roseland residents." Their prospects for new steel plant jobs were nonexistent, the report underscored: "People in these types of jobs are not merely out of work, they are out of careers."

A parallel study, focusing on men who had lost their jobs at U.S. Steel's South Works, found that 47 percent had not found new employment, but that summary statistic concealed a significant racial disparity: 67 percent of black workers were still unemployed, as compared to only 32 percent of whites. "Once laid off from their mill jobs," the study noted, "blacks in particular remain the least likely to find new jobs."

In early 1983, Lenora Rodgers mounted a renewed push to win foundation funding for GRO. She told one foundation that "community organizing and an issue-based community organization is the key to neighborhood preservation." She said GRO's greatest need was to hire organizers, since "organizers help to identify new and potential leaders" who could mobilize Roseland against the dangers engulfing it. But Rodgers's efforts were unsuccessful, and by April 1984 GRO was no longer responding to letters from potential funders.<sup>28</sup>

As Jerry Kellman extended CCRC's presence into Roseland early in 1984, he accepted office space at Bill Stenzel's Holy Rosary Parish in lieu of dues. IACT and UNO continued their antidumping protests, with Lena's name appearing in Chicago newspapers almost weekly. On January 30, 1984, a city council committee, spurred by Alderman Vrdolyak's desire to at least appear to be against dumping, approved a one-year moratorium on new landfills within the city. In mid-February Lena joined U.S. Representative Paul Simon, a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate seat held by Republican Chuck Percy, as he toured South Deering and its neighboring waste sites. Two days later, when the full city council approved the one-year moratorium, Vrdolyak amended the measure to exempt liquid waste handlers and transfer stations, leading Mayor Washington's backers to oppose the diluted ban.<sup>29</sup>

March 1984 was the fourth anniversary of Wisconsin Steel's shutdown. Mayor Washington spoke at an SOJC anniversary rally, and on March 28, Frank Lumpkin and others picketed International Harvester's downtown headquarters. Frank told one reporter he believed four hundred of the three thousand ex-Wisconsin steelworkers had died in the last four years. Later he told a U.S. congressional subcommittee that nowadays in South Chicago "the only ambition a kid can have is to steal hubcaps. There is nothing else there. There's no jobs." The Daily Calumet reported on the closings of more and more retail businesses; a UNO meeting on jobs drew more than five hundred neighborhood residents plus Mayor Washington's top three development and employment aides.<sup>30</sup>

By August 1984, Jerry Kellman was ready to publicly launch the reborn CCRC. Thanks to Leo Mahon's core parishioners from St. Victor—Fred Simari, Jan Poledziowski, Gloria Boyda, and Christine Gervais—CCRC was ready to play an active role in a retraining program for one thousand former heavy industry workers in several south suburban Cook County townships, funded with $500,000 from the U.S. Department of Labor under the 1982 Job Training Partnership Act. And thanks to Bill Stenzel's hosting of Kellman at Holy Rosary church in Roseland, Kellman was beginning to pull together a new network of virtually all-black Catholic parishes across Roseland under the distinct rubric of the Developing Communities Project (DCP), with DCP for the moment a "project" or "subgroup" of CCRC.

Kellman asked each parish for two lead representatives. From Holy Rosary came Stenzel's two most active parishioners, Ralph Viall and Betty Garrett. At St. Catherine of Genoa, Father Paul Burak suggested two people he felt had "a passion I think for social justice": Dan Lee, who had attended deaconate school, and Cathy Askew, a young white single parent with two mixed-race daughters who was teaching at St. Catherine's School. St. Catherine's senior deacon, Tommy West, was interested too, but he channeled much of his community work through another parish well north of 95th Street, St. Sabina. At St. Helena, Father Tom Kaminski volunteered himself and Eva Sturgies, an active parishioner who lived on 99th Street. From St. John de la Salle at 102nd and South Vernon Avenue, eleven blocks north of Holy Rosary, Father Joe Bennett asked Adrienne Bitoy Jackson, a young woman with an office job at Inland Steel, and Marlene Dillard, who lived in the London Towne Homes cooperative development east of Cottage Grove Avenue. Not every Roseland pastor responded with enthusiasm. At Holy Name of Mary Parish, Father Tony Vader brushed off Kellman but told his associate pastor, Father John Calicott, the only African American priest on the Far South Side, to do what he could.

The most unusual Catholic parish Kellman contacted was Our Lady of the Gardens, a church that traced its beginnings only to 1947 and which was staffed by fathers from the Society of the Divine Word. When Kellman visited Father Stanley Farier, the priest recommended two women of different circumstances: Loretta Augustine, in her early forties, who lived in a single-family home in the Golden Gate neighborhood west of the church, and Yvonne Lloyd, a fifty-five-year-old mother of eleven who lived in the Eden Green town house and apartment development just west of both Golden Gate and the sprawling public housing project from which the parish drew its name: Altgeld Gardens.<sup>31</sup>

Altgeld Gardens was a by-product of World War II. When Chicago faced a dire housing shortage during the war years, officials looked to the land south of 130th Street, west of the CID landfill and Beaubien Woods Forest Preserve, north of the Cal-Sag Channel (a man-made tributary dug during the 1910s) and east of St. Lawrence Avenue. This area had in earlier decades served as the sewage farm for George Pullman's eponymous town a mile northward. The Metropolitan Sanitary District's massive sewage treatment plant, opened in 1922, was located just north of 130th Street. Construction began in 1943 on a 1,463-unit "war housing development" on the 157-acre site. The first families moved in come fall 1944, and a year later, in August 1945, a formal dedication ceremony featuring local congressman William A. Rowan plus Chicago Housing Authority (CHA) chairman Robert R. Taylor, an African American, took place before a crowd of five thousand. More than seven thousand residents were already living there, the Tribune reported, "nearly all Negroes." An elementary school and then a high school, both named for the black scientist George Washington Carver, who had died in 1943, were soon part of the new development, but by 1951 school parents were protesting the presence of an open ditch carrying raw sewage that abutted the school grounds. In 1954 another five hundred apartments, officially called the Philip Murray Homes, were added to the Altgeld development.

For its first fifteen to twenty years, residents described Altgeld—or, more colloquially, just “the Gardens”—as “this heavenly place,” “just paradise,” as two different residents recalled. “It was just really a wholesome place to live,” a third remembered. “There was a feeling of family throughout the entire development,” said a fourth. The Gardens was its own world: almost anyone who worked had to own an automobile because public bus service to and from Altgeld was poor at best. “We felt so isolated and away from the mainstream of what was occurring in Chicago. . . . We were cut off from a lot of opportunities,” one resident explained.

Loretta Freeman Augustine grew up in Lilydale, married a man from Altgeld at age nineteen, and lived in an apartment there from 1961 to 1966, when the couple moved to a single-family home in Golden Gate, just to the west. “The community had a stability” during those years. “People had nice lawns with beautiful flowers,” and it was “very much a family-oriented community.” The Carver High School basketball team, under Coach Larry Hawkins, won the Illinois state championship in 1963.

By the late 1960s, things had changed for the worse. Many blamed the CHA, which had evicted residents when their incomes rose above the ceiling allowable in public housing. “People were being forced out because they were over the income,” one woman recalled. Dr. Alma Jones, hired as Carver Elementary School’s principal in 1975, had had a similar experience some years earlier at the CHA’s LeClaire Courts. “It was absolutely beautiful,” but “my husband got a raise, and they put us out: excess income,” she recalled. “I was devastated because I had just had twins . . . it was heartbreaking.” It was also destructive. “That eliminated everybody who was upwardly mobile, because if you . . . started to progress, then they put you out, which was the worst thing that could possibly happen” because “you take out the element of folk who know how to live in a community.”

One young man who grew up in Altgeld in the 1950s returned to the Far South Side twenty-five years later as a police officer. Initially “there were very few troubled families. I would say less than 5 percent. When I returned, I saw that the 5 percent was still residing in that development, but so were their children, and grandchildren, it was just a procession. The 5 percent had expanded to 85 percent.” Another resident said, “It began to change in the 1970s. I don’t think it really started to decline until the drugs became prevalent.” A 1972 Tribune article marking the twenty-fifth anniversary of Our Lady of the Gardens parish described Altgeld as a place “from which long-time residents are striving to get out” and stated that drugs and crime were the Gardens’ top problems. As Father Al Zimmerman commented, “With no job prospects, the temptation to turn to drugs is powerful.”<sup>32</sup>

In April 1974 Altgeld made news in a different fashion when the entire facility was evacuated after a tank containing 500,000 gallons of silicon tetrachloride ruptured at a tank farm just ten blocks to the north. “A dense cloud of fumes half a mile wide” drifted toward the project, and almost twelve hours passed before residents were allowed to return home. More than two hundred people were hospitalized from exposure to “a heavy cloud of hydrochloric acid” that was generated when clueless workers turned firehoses on the tank, making the emissions far worse, rather than notify public officials. Chicago soon filed suit against Bulk Terminals, the tank’s owner, and the Tribune quoted a state official as saying, “It should be a criminal offense to know of a leakage of toxic materials without reporting it immediately.”

A 1982 citywide neighborhoods study found that Altgeld’s needs were especially dire. “The physical isolation of this community from the rest of the city” was so great that “residents of this area are rural rather than urban poor,” it noted. Tenants believe “that job training is one of their community’s most important needs,” but people who had never held a job needed to be taught “how to look for work.” Yet “many do not own cars,” and public transport was still “frightfully poor.” The Gardens’ one small food store shocked the outsiders. Not only did it smell “particularly bad,” but rats were now regularly “visible in the food store during daylight hours.” That study pointedly advised that “Altgeld Gardens needs an advocate and/or organizer to improve the coordination of the many municipal services provided to the development, and to work with the private sector to help create employment opportunities for local residents.”

Altgeld residents were theoretically represented by a local advisory council, but by the early 1980s, the council had for years been dominated with an iron fist by its president, Esther Wheeler, or “Queen Esther” to many dismayed residents. “Her whole concern was nobody would take her place, or usurp her authority,” Carver principal Alma Jones later explained. “She was extremely authoritarian and she owned Altgeld.” But come September 1982, residents had a new opportunity to organize against the toxic waste, garbage, and sewage that surrounded them, when Hazel Johnson, a forty-seven-year-old widow and mother of seven who had first moved to the Gardens in March 1962, founded People for Community Recovery (PCR) and attracted a small band of active members.

Hazel’s husband John had died of lung cancer in 1969, at age forty-one, and by the early 1980s, questions arose about the long-term health of those living at Altgeld. In late April 1984, Hazel saw a television news story about a study of cancer rates in the Far South Side. Its statistics were alarming, yet Illinois EPA director Richard Carlson brushed aside the findings. In response, Hazel contacted the IEPA, which tried to placate her with some pollution complaint forms. She responded by distributing several hundred of them throughout the Gardens over the ensuing six months.<sup>33</sup>

In late 1983, a new organizing effort began in the Eden Green community. Madeline Talbott and Keith Kelleher, two Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN) organizers, had met Tom Joyce while working in Detroit, and Tom’s Claretian Social Development Fund provided the initial seed money to launch ACORN in Chicago. ACORN’s Eden Green organizer was Grant Williams, who had worked for ACORN in Philadelphia and St. Louis. Williams viewed Eden Green as more promising turf than Altgeld, but after a founding meeting of South Side United Neighbors, Williams expanded his work into the Gardens. He contacted Lena and her IACT colleagues about the new-dumps moratorium, but in Altgeld, the residents’ biggest concern was the poor public bus service to the outside world. By March 1984 Williams had interested a reporter from Chicago’s premier African American newspaper, the Defender, in Altgeld’s transit plight, and a community meeting to oppose possible service cuts by the Chicago Transit Authority drew a good crowd.

By summer, Williams had signed up some eighty-three dues-paying members for ACORN—$16 a year—but by late August, he was moving to Detroit, and a brand-new University of Chicago graduate, Stuart Pittman, would take over in September.<sup>34</sup>

Before the end of summer 1984, Jerry Kellman also made his first successful forays toward enlisting some Protestant pastors to join his previously all-Catholic CCRC. His first two recruits were Rev. Bob Klonowski of Hegewisch's Lebanon Lutheran Church and Rev. Tom Knutson of First Lutheran Church in Harvey, a far-from-prosperous suburban town two miles southwest of Altgeld Gardens. Also joining CCRC was St. Anne Parish in suburban Hazel Crest, whose new pastor, Father Len Dubi, had known Kellman for more than a decade. The city parishes' DCP designees first met Kellman and their CCRC colleagues from St. Victor and the other predominantly white congregations at Tom Knutson's church in Harvey.

An early August issue of the Daily Calumet ran a prominent story heralding CCRC's "phoenix-like return." It quoted Kellman as saying he hoped sixty churches would join by October, and that by year's end he wanted to have "a full range of support programs for laid off workers." His top goal was to devise "a long-range plan for economic development," and within a year he hoped to have "three or four full time employees." Fred Simari and Gloria Boyda from St. Victor were appointed to a task force overseeing the new federally funded suburban job retraining program, but the program would not be able to accept applications until December or January.<sup>35</sup>

Throughout the fall of 1984 and early 1985, IACT, Hazel Johnson's PCR, and even ACORN appeared more visibly active than CCRC and DCP. A mid-September appearance by IEPA director Richard Carlson at St. Kevin drew an angry crowd that erupted in shouting when he insisted that the Southeast Side's bevy of waste facilities posed no threat to anyone's health. Marian Byrnes from Jeffery Manor, a widowed, recently retired schoolteacher who had founded the Committee to Protect the Prairie to avert construction on the undisturbed, 117-acre Van Vlissingen Prairie north of 103rd Street, forcefully told Carlson, "We will never believe you! You might as well go home!" That tussle was quickly overshadowed when the Chicago Sun-Times reported that water from at least three residential wells just south of Altgeld Gardens contained cyanide, benzene, and toluene. Most Chicago residents were no doubt surprised that anyone within the city limits had to rely upon wells for water service, but city officials had been aware of the issue for three months. Homeowners in the tiny, seven-home enclave called Maryland Manor paid city taxes but had neither paved streets nor water and sewer service. The residents were wary enough of their cloudy well water that they used it only for toilets and the like, as opposed to drinking, but the extensive press coverage was a huge embarrassment for Mayor Washington, one that would have been worse had the press known that the issue had been handed off to an intern over the summer.

In late October, just two weeks before the November general election, Lena and her colleagues successfully targeted incumbent U.S. senator Chuck Percy after he skipped a UNO candidates' forum with Democratic challenger Paul Simon. UNO followed Percy to a black radio station, WVON, and stormed the building, causing the beleaguered senator to take refuge in a women's restroom. Percy remained locked inside there for some hours, and the standoff made for memorable local television news footage. On November 6, Simon defeated Percy by fewer than ninety thousand votes out of more than 4.6 million that were cast.<sup>36</sup>

When the U.S. EPA denied an IACT request to review the state's finding of no health threat, Lena told the media the refusal was "quite ironic" in light of the Maryland Manor contamination. In mid-November, when state officials authorized the cleanup of an abandoned dump at 119th Street that contained 1,750 barrels of unknown chemical waste, Governor Thompson showed up wearing a protective suit, boots, and a mask to tell journalists that the site was "a monument to man's greed and disregard for the health and safety of fellow citizens.” Along with Frank Lumpkin’s SOJC, UNO also continued to push city officials to open a job retraining center on the Southeast Side, but environmental issues had now replaced economic ones at the top of the local agenda.<sup>37</sup>

ACORN’s fall 1984 efforts in Altgeld Gardens underscored that shift. Once Stuart Pittman took over from Grant Williams, the small group changed its name to Altgeld Tenants United (ATU). Williams had warned Pittman that local advisory council (LAC) president Esther Wheeler was “kind of nuts,” but when ATU sought to use the project’s community building for a neighborhood-wide meeting, Wheeler summoned “your Leader” to meet with her executive board. ATU still drew more than one hundred residents to an October 30 meeting, but Wheeler showed up to accuse Pittman of having an intimate relationship with an elderly and devout ATU leader: “That white boy is shacking up with Maggie Davis.” It was a ludicrous allegation, but Wheeler’s role in Altgeld caused untold harm to the Garden’s residents. As Pittman reported to ACORN’s Madeline Talbott, “the grocery store”—the one whose visible population of daytime rats had astonished outsiders several years earlier—“has a plaque award for community service in it from Esther Wheeler and the LAC.”

ATU reached out to both the city’s sewer department and to CHA’s Altgeld head manager, Walter Williams, who told the organization, “I’ll resign my job before giving in to tenants’ demands.” The sewer department deployed workers, who told residents Altgeld’s sewers were the worst they had ever seen and would take months to clean, but work was halted after one week by the CHA, which would have to foot the bill. In response, over a dozen ATU members picketed CHA headquarters in the downtown Loop on November 14 and then held a press conference.

The African American Defender gave them front-page coverage, and the local 9th Ward alderman, Perry Hutchinson, took an interest, telling the Defender that “Chicago has forgotten about south of 130th Street” and the people marooned there. But Pittman was disappointed that turnout at ATU meetings was declining. When he arranged a January 23 tour of WMI’s huge CID landfill east of Altgeld, only ten people showed up. Hoping to spur greater interest, he adopted Lena and IACT’s tactic from almost two years earlier, and on February 19 sixteen ATU protesters blocked garbage trucks’ entry into the landfill. Pittman, the elderly Ms. Davis, and one young man were arrested. For a second blockade on March 7, only eight people participated, and the protest resulted in three more arrests. Pittman had privately given ACORN notice four months earlier that he would be leaving as of March 15, 1985, and when he departed no one immediately replaced him. At their final meeting, ATU members wondered whether they should join Hazel Johnson’s PCR.<sup>38</sup>

In mid-January 1985, PCR received attention citywide for the first time when Hazel held a press conference to publicize the IEPA complaint forms she had circulated within Altgeld over the previous six months and to highlight that the city’s one-year moratorium on new landfills would expire on February 1. One week later, Mayor Washington called a City Hall press conference, and with both Lena and Hazel standing behind him, recommended a six-month extension of the ban, which was unanimously approved by the city council. Washington also appointed a Solid Waste Management Task Force to study the city’s landfill options. Lena, Hazel, and Bob Ginsburg from Citizens for a Better Environment were all named to the panel, as were 9th and 10th Ward aldermen Hutchinson and Vrdolyak and South Chicago Savings Bank president James A. Fitch; Washington administration insiders like Jacky Grimshaw and Marilyn Katz were also included to assure that the task force would not go astray.

By early spring 1985, however, rumors had gradually spread that the city administration was quietly considering an entirely different new landfill possibility, centered on 140 acres of Metropolitan Sanitary District property south of 130th Street on the east bank of the Calumet River, a location generally spoken of as the O'Brien Locks site after a nearby dam. A city Planning Department draft report had discussed the idea a year earlier, and while Mayor Washington reiterated his opposition to any dump at the 116th Street Big Marsh location when he spoke at UNO's annual convention at St. Kevin in late April, concerned residents of Hegewisch and its northern Avalon Trails neighborhood—both just east of the O'Brien property—publicly criticized Lena and UNO for not pressing Washington for a similar commitment concerning the O'Brien site.

The weekly Hegewisch News began to sound the alarm, with editor Violet Czachorski proclaiming that while Hegewisch residents had supported people in South Deering in opposing any Big Marsh landfill, now UNO and IACT were failing to take a similarly principled stance when a landfill was proposed for Hegewisch's backyard rather than theirs. Writing in the News, University of Illinois at Chicago geographer James Landing, who in 1980 had created the Lake Calumet Study Committee to help protect that body, warned that a “lack of unity among neighborhood groups . . . serves the interests of the dump companies.”<sup>39</sup>

Harold Washington and his top aides were devoting attention to Roseland as his four-year term approached its halfway mark. In part their concern was stimulated by the Borg-Warner Foundation, whose executive director, Ellen Benjamin, had taken an interest in the neighborhood and had commissioned a “needs assessment” from a team at the University of Illinois at Chicago. Roseland had lost more than sixty-eight hundred jobs between 1977 and 1983, and loss of employment meant “many people are having trouble maintaining their houses, keeping food on the table” and avoiding foreclosure. The researchers conducted 115 interviews in Roseland, and while 33 respondents named jobs as the top problem, almost twice as many—64—described how “crime and gangs have proliferated and the feeling of insecurity has increased.” Before the report was issued, Washington's top staffers were briefed on the findings. “Highest infant mortality rate in city,” “highest number of foreclosed homes in the nation,” South “Michigan [Ave.] business district gone,” their notes recorded. With just one exception, community groups were disappointing: “Good Roseland Christian Ministries,” the staff notes emphasized.

At 1:30 P.M. on Sunday, March 17, a man wearing a long dark coat and a baseball cap with the Playboy logo drew a gun on cashier Lavergne McDonald inside Fortenberry Liquors at 36 East 111th Street in central Roseland. She screamed, and the gunman fled. Fifteen minutes later, Roger Nelson, a seminary student who had interned at Roseland Christian Ministries, his fiancée, and his parents finished chatting with Tony and Donna Van Zanten after church services and crossed South Michigan Avenue just north of 109th Street to the lot where their car was parked. The same gunman came up to them, ordered them into the car, and instructed them to hand over their valuables. Roger's father, fifty-year-old Northwestern College of Iowa professor Ronald Nelson, was in the driver's seat, with the gunman crouched by the open driver's door. As the quartet fumbled through their belongings, Donna Van Zanten and her son Kent approached and were also ordered into the back seat. Ronald Nelson handed the man his car keys and checkbook, but the gunman angrily said, “I don't think you gave me all you have.” Nelson protested, but the gunman handed back the checkbook, called Nelson a “Goddamned lying bastard,” and fired one shot into the left side of Nelson's abdomen.

As Ronald Nelson lay dying at the scene, the gunman fled past two men working on a car nearby. "Brothers, you all be cool," the gunman called out. "You know them was honkies over there." One of the men was on work release for possession of a stolen car, but the gunman's appeal to race fell flat: they not only knew Roseland Christian Ministries, one of them knew Roger Nelson from his work there. After police arrived, a shaken Donna and Kent Van Zanten accompanied officers on a ninety-minute drive throughout the neighborhood while Roger and his fiancée went to a station house with detectives to look at photos of possible suspects.

Twelve days later, one of the car repairers identified a photo he believed matched the gunman; police also received an anonymous telephone tip that the man they wanted went by the nickname "Squeaky." Detectives went to 10727 South Indiana Avenue, less than four blocks from the scene of Nelson's murder, and told the older man who answered the door that they wanted to speak with Clarence Hayes. "Hey, Squeaky," he called upstairs. Hayes wasn't home, nor was he on five subsequent occasions when police stopped by, but on Sunday morning, April 14, the thirty-four-year-old three-time ex-convict and drug addict was arrested at a nearby currency exchange. That afternoon, Lavergne McDonald, Donna and Kent Van Zanten, and both of the car repairers picked Hayes out of a police lineup, as did Roger Nelson and his fiancée when they arrived in Chicago that evening.

Ronald Nelson's murder—a white victim, a black gunman, a Sunday church parking lot—drew more news coverage than anything else that had happened in Roseland in years. Eighteen months later Clarence Hayes was convicted of murder and multiple counts of armed robbery and sentenced to death; after appellate review he was sentenced to life in prison. Over a quarter century later, he was still challenging his conviction in the courts, but on the thirtieth anniversary of Nelson's murder Clarence Hayes remained safely ensconced in the maximum-security Stateville Correctional Center in Crest Hill, Illinois.<sup>40</sup>

March 28, 1985, was the fifth anniversary of Wisconsin Steel's sudden shutdown. Frank Lumpkin, now sixty-seven, was one of the few ex-workers whose more than thirty years at the plant meant he was collecting his full pension. Those not so fortunate received little if anything: Felix Vasquez, age fifty-seven, was receiving $150 a month for his twenty-four years of work. Lawyer Tom Geoghegan, whose lawsuit on their behalf against International Harvester was mired in the courts, told one reporter that men like Vasquez "were cheated by a company they gave their whole lives to."

Thanks to ongoing support from the Crossroads Fund, Lumpkin's Save Our Jobs Committee (SOJC) remained active, but in South Deering, the plant was now little more than "heaps of rusted scrap." An anniversary rally drew only two hundred people, and one former worker told the Tribune that South Deering was now "a battered hulk of a neighborhood" strewn with "battered, empty hulks of men." Now, five years later, no one at all doubted that "Black Friday" had indeed been "the end of an era."

The former Wisconsin workers were not alone. At South Works, most of the south half of the mill had been demolished during the previous winter, and the remaining workforce was static at eight hundred. The Southeast Side's third major mill, Republic Steel, on the East Side, had a storied history—ten striking workers had been shot dead by Chicago police on Memorial Day 1937. By the mid-1970s, however, it was known to suffer from a "morale problem," and longtime United Steelworkers Local 1033 president Frank Guzzo "throws up his hands when discussing the increasing number of men who are drinking on the job." The consequences were severe: in early 1976, 46 percent of the steel shipped from Republic was “rejected because it was not up to standards,” a problem Frank Lumpkin had also seen at Wisconsin.

As of early 1982 Republic had an active workforce of five thousand, but eighteen months later that number had been halved. Then, in early 1984, Republic was bought by the Ling-Temco-Vought (LTV) conglomerate, which six years earlier had acquired Youngstown Sheet & Tube in Ohio. Guzzo tried to put a bright face on the move, but workers grew increasingly unhappy with Guzzo’s concessionary attitude. In April 1982, Guzzo had won reelection over a young challenger by a margin of 1,167 to 935 in a multicandidate field, but as the April 1985 election neared, a different outcome loomed.

Guzzo’s top challenger both in 1982 and three years later was thirty-year-old Maury Richards, a tall, physically imposing man who was attending law school part-time and who in 1984 had mounted a credible insurgent challenge against an East Side state legislator and bar owner who was a Vrdolyak lackey. When the April 1985 ballots were tallied at Republic, it was clear that an era had ended there as well when Frank Guzzo finished fourth with just 331 votes and Maury Richards prevailed with a plurality of 538. However dim the future might be for steelmaking on Chicago’s Southeast Side, the workers now had a new voice, one almost forty years younger than Frank Lumpkin.<sup>41</sup>

As 1985 dawned for Jerry Kellman’s CCRC, Time for XII, and DCP trio, he and Ken Jania were joined by a third organizer, an old IAF colleague of Kellman’s named Mike Kruglik. A 1964 graduate of Princeton University, Kruglik had spent several years as a history graduate student at Northwestern University before shifting into organizing in 1973. He spent the mid-1970s working in Chicago, but by 1979 Kruglik was in San Antonio, Texas. Then, late in the fall of 1984, the Roman Catholic Church’s national Campaign for Human Development committed at least $42,000 to CCRC for 1985, and Kellman invited Kruglik back to Chicago to take the lead in building DCP. Several months later the Woods Fund, which had just designated community organizing as its “primary interest,” indicated that it would provide a further $30,000 to support CCRC and DCP salaries.

When Ken Jania was offered a much better paying job and left CCRC in March, Kellman asked Adrienne Jackson, who had been conducting parishioner interviews as a volunteer, to come on board full time, and she took up outreach to new churches. Mike Kruglik focused on expanding DCP’s reach across Greater Roseland; a public meeting at St. Thaddeus parish just south of 95th Street attracted both the 21st Ward alderman and Nadyne Griffin, an energetic woman in her late forties who had lived in the Lowden Homes town house project north of 95th Street for many years. She took an immediate liking to Kruglik, but other DCP members, who already found Kellman’s hard-driving style to be grating, thought Kruglik was just more of the same.

In late April or early May, the tensions came to a head. “My compadres felt Mike was kind of pushy,” St. Catherine deacon Dan Lee remembered. “So one night we had a little caucus, and it was just us. Mike wasn’t there, Jerry wasn’t there.” The small group agreed that “we are talking about black issues,” Dan recounted. “When we talk to Mike, it’s like we can’t get through. . . . We need a black person to be our mentor. We need a black person. . . . Let’s talk to Jerry.” Dan, Loretta Augustine, and Yvonne Lloyd went to Kellman. “Nothing against Mike, but we want somebody black over here because we are black,” Dan recalled. Kellman didn’t argue. “Okay, if that’s what you want, that’s what I’ll do.” From 1980 forward, the entire UNO and CCRC organizing effort had failed to employ an experienced black organizer; only parish volunteer Adrienne Jackson, just added to staff, was African American.

Kellman tried to make good on his commitment, but no plausible candidates could be found. “Jerry was busting his behind to find a black organizer,” CCRC’s Bob Klonowski recalled, but was “just having no luck.” Reluctantly, Kellman asked the DCP members to stick with Kruglik after all, but Loretta Augustine took the lead in saying no: “He’s not what we feel we need.” Loretta was “a very strong-willed person,” her colleagues knew, “very outspoken . . . if she didn’t like something, she let you know,” and her verdict on Kruglik was final.

But it was Father John Calicott, the African American associate pastor from Holy Name of Mary, who hammered the point home most forcefully. Calicott had seen the same pattern too many times before throughout the Chicago archdiocese. “I just had a problem with white folks always figuring that they knew more about what to do for us than we did,” he later explained. He had had the same reaction when he first met Kellman. Jerry was “well intentioned, really wants to do the right thing, but cannot hear,” Calicott recalled, and when Kellman had first introduced Kruglik to the DCPers, the same dynamic reoccurred. Calicott posed several questions, asking, essentially, “Are you willing to listen to our ideas?” In essence Mike replied, “Well, yes, but you know, this is the way we’ve done it before, and we know this is going to work.” That “really left a bad taste in my mouth,” Calicott recounted.

When Kellman again asked them to accept Kruglik, and Loretta said no, Calicott spoke up to second Loretta’s refusal: “Let’s get somebody who knows us!” As Loretta vividly recalled, Calicott didn’t stop there. “The priest pointed his finger at Jerry, and he said, ‘I don’t know where you’re looking, but there’s got to be somebody out there who looks like us and thinks like us and understands our needs. So wherever you’ve been looking, you go back and look again.’” Yvonne Lloyd remembered those five words just as Loretta did: “go back and look again,” but “Jerry was livid,” Loretta recalled. Kellman insisted he would not jettison Kruglik, and Calicott said fine, but not for DCP. “The whole room was just absolutely quiet,” Loretta remembered, but Kellman agreed that he would look again.

Mike Kruglik was not happy about what had happened. “The people said, ‘We don’t want you because you’re not black,’” he acknowledged years later. Kellman, feeling “desperation,” told CCRC clergyman Bob Klonowski he would shift gears and advertise for a “black organizer trainee” in addition to an experienced organizer. Since the late 1970s, a little-known national organization called the Community Careers Resource Center had published Community Jobs, a small newsprint magazine comprised mainly of want ads that came out ten times a year. Community Jobs did not have many individual subscribers, but many university and public libraries paid twenty dollars a year to subscribe. It was not a publication they saw any point in retaining—who could possibly want to read job ads from 1985?—and so a quarter century later only one single library would still possess the June 1985 issue containing the job ad that Jerry Kellman submitted.

Community Jobs organized its ads geographically, so on page 3, under a large “Midwest” heading and directly below an ad for “Canvass Director, North Dakota,” appeared Jerry Kellman’s ad with a boldface title, “Two Minority Jobs Chicago.”

The Calumet Community Religious Conference (CCRC) is an Alinsky organizing project in the industrial heart of Chicago. This region was once a world leader in steel production. However, in the past four years, 50,000 jobs have been lost. CCRC has pulled together 60 churches from the far Southside of Chicago and suburban Cook County to address this economic crisis. Half of CCRC’s budget comes from local church dues. The project is also committed to church renewal.

A PLACE IN THE WORLD

HONOLULU, SEATTLE, HONOLULU, JAKARTA, AND HONOLULU

AUGUST 1961–SEPTEMBER 1979

Barack Hussein Obama departed Nairobi’s Embakasi Airport on the evening of August 4, 1959, bound for New York, via Rome, Paris, and London. He was twenty-five years old—not twenty-three, as he would later claim—and he was leaving behind a nineteen-year-old wife, Grace Kezia Aoko, who was three months pregnant with a second child, and a sixteen-month-old son, Roy Abon’go.

Obama’s dream was to have an education beyond what was available in colonial Kenya. A possession of Great Britain since the late nineteenth century, Kenya lacked any post-secondary educational institution aside from a newly opened technical college. Three years earlier, a dynamic young Kenyan politician, Tom Mboya—who, like Obama, was a Luo, Kenya’s third-largest ethnic group—had visited the United States and begun making it possible for young Kenyans to seek higher education opportunities there. Mboya was introduced to Bill Scheinman, a wealthy young businessman likewise interested in African decolonization, and thanks largely to Scheinman’s personal largesse, as many as thirty-nine Kenyan students enrolled at a variety of U.S. colleges and universities during the years 1957 and 1958.

By 1958, Barack Obama and his young wife were living in Kenya’s capital of Nairobi, yet the first twenty-four years of his life had been anything but easy. The second child, and first son, of Hussein Onyango Obama and Habiba Akumu, he was born near Kendu Bay in the Nyanza region of western Kenya, close to Lake Victoria. Hussein Onyango had served as a cook with the British colonial military forces, traveling widely. Hussein’s third child, Hawa Auma, later recounted that “he loved all the whites, and they loved him.” Another younger daughter, Zeituni Onyango, remembered Hussein as “unyielding and unapologetic. . . . My father never shed the attitude of a soldier,” nor his belief in corporal punishment for wives as well as children.

When Barack Hussein was nine years old and his older sister Sarah Nyaoke about twelve, Hussein Onyango moved the family—now including a second wife, Sarah Ogwel—from Kendu Bay to the village of Kogelo, well north of Lake Victoria in the Alego area of Nyanza, where his ancestors had historic roots. But Alego was wild and rugged, and within a few months, a pregnant Habiba Akumu escaped from her husband and three children and returned to Kendu Bay. In despair, Barack and Sarah soon tried to follow her but were returned to Kogelo to live with their stepmother, Sarah Ogwel, while their father increasingly worked in Nairobi. Decades later Sarah would tell her stepgrandson that his father “could not forgive his abandonment, and acted as if Akumu didn’t exist. He told everyone that I was his mother.”

In Kogelo Barack attended Ng’iya Intermediate School, and in 1949, at age fifteen, he took the Kenya Africa Examination. In early 1950, he was admitted to Maseno Mission School, Kenya’s oldest secondary institution. School records initially described Barack as “very keen, steady . . . reliable and outgoing,” but during his senior year school administrators took a strong dislike to him and effectively expelled him.

Classmates acknowledged that Obama had become “rude and arrogant” toward teachers, and the white English principal fingered him as the primary author of an anonymous letter criticizing the school’s practices. Wherever the blame lay, Obama was out of school without having graduated, and a furious Hussein Onyango instructed him to move to Mombasa, Kenya’s eastern port city, to earn his own living.

By some time in 1955, Barack had relocated to Nairobi, where he was a clerk typist in a law firm and also did some work for a British engineering firm. At a Christmas Day 1956 dance party back in Kendu Bay, he met sixteen-year-old Grace Kezia Aoko, and the next month, they were married and moved into Obama’s Nairobi apartment. Fourteen months later, Kezia gave birth to Roy Abon’go. Soon thereafter, sometime in mid-1958, Barack met Betty Mooney, the forty-four-year-old American woman who would become his ticket to the United States.<sup>1</sup>

For more than a decade before arriving in Nairobi in 1957, Betty Mooney had worked closely with world-renowned literacy advocate Frank Laubach, whose “each one teach one” method had helped millions across the globe learn to read. Mooney had spent eight years in India before moving to Baltimore to oversee the training of additional literacy teachers at the Laubach-sponsored Koinonia Foundation. In Nairobi, she quickly won the active support of Tom Mboya, who introduced her to a large crowd at one of his weekly political rallies. Then, in the summer of 1958, she and Helen Roberts, another American literacy teacher, began preparing a series of elementary instructional readers in Swahili, Luo, and Kamba.

In September 1958, Mooney hired the young Barack Obama as her secretary and clerk and paid him the handsome sum of $100 monthly. Before long Obama was taking a lead role in the writing of two Luo readers Mooney’s team was producing. Laubach himself visited Nairobi in November 1958; a photo published in the monthly newsletter Mooney had just launched pictured her, Laubach, and “Mr. B. O’Bama.”

This was a great opportunity for Obama to perfect his own English literacy, and Mooney quickly became impressed by his abilities. “Barack is a whiz and types so fast that I have a hard time keeping ahead of him,” she wrote Laubach. “I think I better bring him along and let him be your secretary in the USA.” Indeed, getting to the U.S. was Obama’s express goal, and by early 1959, even without a diploma from a secondary school and with only some UK correspondence courses on his record, he wrote to several dozen U.S. colleges and universities seeking undergraduate admission for fall 1959. He had read about one of them in the Saturday Evening Post, a weekly U.S. pictorial magazine, in Mooney’s office. The University of Hawaii was described as being a “Colorful Campus of the Islands.” The article praised the “multi-racial make-up” of the university’s student body and emphasized that Hawaii was “one of the few spots on earth where there is little racial prejudice.”

In early March, Barack Obama received notice of his acceptance from the University of Hawaii, plus a certificate to show U.S. consular officials in order to obtain a student entry visa. Classes would begin on September 21. Betty Mooney was overjoyed, and quickly wrote Frank Laubach to request his help. Barack “is extremely intelligent and his English is excellent, so I have no doubt that he will do well.” Mooney wanted to pay both Obama’s tuition and half of his estimated $800 annual room and board, but she wanted Kenyan officials—and apparently Barack too—to view these funds as a scholarship rather than a personal gift, and Laubach agreed to help. “I remember him very well, and agree that he is unusually smart. I have no doubt that he will do a very good job.” Enclosed with his reply to Mooney was a copy of a letter addressed to the University of Hawaii, which stated that the Laubach Literacy and Mission Fund had granted Obama $400 toward his first year of studies.

Barack worked to complete the Luo primers and also advertised in Kenya's Luo language newspaper, Ramogi, for contributions toward his upcoming expenses in Hawaii. Gordon Hagberg, an American whose family had employed Hussein Onyango Obama while they resided in Nairobi, asked his employer, the African-American Institute (AAI), to assist with Obama's airfare, explaining that Obama "is what could be called a self-made man." In late July the U.S. consul general formally issued Barack's nonimmigrant student visa, and AAI booked and paid for his flights. Obama wrote to Frank Laubach, thanking him "for all that you have done for me to make my ways for further studies possible," including the essential $400 that actually came from Betty Mooney. Barack hoped to see Laubach during the three weeks that Betty had arranged for him to stay at Koinonia, outside Baltimore, before going to Hawaii. On Sunday morning, August 9, 1959, Barack Hussein Obama arrived on a British Overseas Airways Corporation Comet 4 at New York's Idlewild Airport and was granted entry to the United States.<sup>2</sup>

Even before Obama registered for his fall semester courses on September 21, one of Honolulu's two daily newspapers, the Star-Bulletin, ran a photo of the twenty-five-year-old freshman in an article entitled "Young Men From Kenya, Jordan and Iran Here to Study at U.H." Obama had secured a room at the Atherton YMCA, just across University Avenue from the campus, but he told the newspaper he was already surprised by the high cost of living. He enrolled in a roster of unsurprising freshman courses—English Composition, World Civilization, Introduction to Government, Business Calculations—and as the first and only African student on campus, and perhaps the only student always wearing dark slacks and dress shirts rather than casual Hawaiian clothing, Obama was immediately a standout presence at UH.

Obama frequented a campus snack bar with lower prices than the main cafeteria, and he soon fell in with a band of friends. Neil Abercrombie was a newly arrived graduate student in sociology from Buffalo, New York; undergraduates Andy "Pake" Zane and Ed Hasegawa had grown up on Oahu—Hawaii's commercial hub—and the Big Island—Hawaii's most rural isle—respectively. Abercrombie recalled Obama as "an unforgettable presence" with a "James Earl Jones voice. It was resonant, deep, booming and rich. It carried authority. He spoke in sentences and paragraphs." Zane agreed. It was "a simply amazing voice," sometimes "mesmerizing."

But Abercrombie remembered Obama for more than just his voice. "He was always the center of attention because he had an opinion on everything and was quite willing to state it. . . . He had this tremendous smile, a pipe in his mouth, dark-rimmed glasses with bright eyes. He was incandescent." Abercrombie told journalist Sally Jacobs how Obama "talked about ambition, his ambition for independence in Africa in general, and his own personal ambition to participate in the emerging nationalism in Kenya . . . it was the central focus of his life. He was full of such energy and purpose." Obama's brimming self-confidence was usually engaging rather than off-putting. "He thought he was the smartest guy in the room, I think, and with good reason . . . everybody else thought so too," Abercrombie recalled. "I could easily call him the smartest person I've ever met."<sup>3</sup>

Just two weeks into the fall semester, the UH student newspaper, Ka Leo O Hawaii, published a story on Obama, in which he said he chose UH over other acceptances from San Francisco State College and Morgan State College in Baltimore but again referred to Honolulu's high cost of living. He spoke of his homeland's desire for independence from Britain, saying, "Kenyans are tired of exploitation." Several weeks later, Ka Leo O Hawaii ran a photograph on its front page of Obama talking with university president Laurence H. Snyder about UH's newly proposed trans-Pacific East-West Center. In late November, the Honolulu Star-Bulletin printed its second story on Obama, under the headline "Isle Inter-Racial Attitude Impresses Kenya Student." This time Obama was quoted as saying he was surprised that "no one seems to be conscious of color" in Hawaii, adding that "people are very nice around here, very friendly." He hoped to finish his degree in three years and hoped to take up some type of government work when he returned to Kenya.

Sometime in November, Betty Mooney, returning to the U.S. via Asia and the Pacific, stopped in Hawaii for several days and was "much impressed" with how well Obama was doing. So was Frank Laubach when he passed through Honolulu several weeks later. In early December Obama sought permission from U.S. immigration officials to work part-time, citing the "high cost of meals," and he was approved for up to twenty-five hours weekly. Once the 1960 spring semester began, Obama participated in a model United Nations exercise that debated race, and in early June, he submitted a strongly worded letter to the editor criticizing a Star-Bulletin editorial that had denounced "Terror in the Congo." "Speaking as one who has been in the Congo," he wrote, Africa needed to throw off "the yoke of colonialism" as "the time for exploitation, special prerogatives and privileges is over."

By midsummer, Obama had moved first to an apartment on Tenth Avenue east of the university, then to one on Eleventh Avenue, and finally westward to a neighborhood just north of the Punahou School. In late July 1960, he submitted a routine request to extend his student visa, noting that he was earning $5 a day as a dishwasher at the Inkblot Coffee Shop while also taking a full summer-session course load. After summer session ended, Obama earned $1.33 an hour from Dole Corporation—Oahu's principal pineapple grower—during August and September as an "ordinary summer worker."

During his time in Honolulu Obama exhibited an increasing appetite for alcohol. Drinking and talking were two of Obama's favorite pastimes, but there was also a third. As one female student later told Sally Jacobs, Obama "was always ready to engage you as a woman beyond the normal conversation, you know, to take it one step further. Today you'd call it 'coming on.'" Another woman agreed. "He was flirtatious," but "he was too close in my personal space. . . . I thought he was a little bit almost aggressive in his way of meeting and being around women." Among Obama's Luo friends in Kenya, "he-man-ship" was "no big deal," and one of his closest acquaintances later boasted that Luo men of their generation had a "habit of waylaying foreign women and literally pulling them into bed."

When fall 1960 classes began on September 26, Obama's seven courses included Russian 101. A fellow student was a virginal seventeen-year-old freshman with an incongruous first name who still lived at home with her parents. By early November 1960, however, Stanley Ann Dunham was pregnant.<sup>4</sup>

Stanley Ann Dunham was born on November 29, 1942, at St. Francis Hospital in Wichita, Kansas. She received her forename not from her identically named father but from her mother. Seventeen-year-old Madelyn Payne had secretly married twenty-two-year-old Stanley Armour Dunham a month before her own high school graduation in June 1940. Stanley's mother, Ruth Armour Dunham, had named her second son after the explorer Henry M. Stanley, her eldest son Ralph would later explain, and the Dunhams didn't see Stanley as "a man's name or a girl's name, it was a family name."

Ruth Dunham had committed suicide by swallowing strychnine in 1925, at age twenty-six, after learning that her husband was busy womanizing. Her sons, ages seven and eight, grew up living with their maternal grandparents in the small town of El Dorado, Kansas, and would only "very rarely" ever see their father again.

Teenaged Madelyn Dunham was also a devoted fan of the actress Bette Davis, who six months earlier, in a popular feature film titled In This Our Life, had played a southern belle character named Stanley Timberlake. Asked decades later why she had named her daughter Stanley, all Madelyn would say is “Oh, I don’t know why I did that.”

Madelyn’s family had been far from pleased about her marriage to Stanley Dunham, who had failed one year of high school and whose older brother Ralph described him as “a Dennis the Menace type” given to naughty high jinks. One of Madelyn’s younger brothers later said, “I think she was looking at Stanley as a way of getting out of Dodge,” and the newlyweds soon set out on a road trip to the San Francisco Bay Area. By 1941 they were back in Kansas, with Stanley apparently working in an auto parts store before enlisting in the army a few months after Pearl Harbor. With her husband away and a new baby to care for, Madelyn moved in with her parents and commuted to a night shift job at a new Boeing B-29 bomber plant in Wichita. Stanley had become a sergeant by the time his unit entered France some weeks after D-Day, but in April 1945 he was reassigned back to Britain before being discharged that August, following Germany’s defeat and Japan’s announced surrender.<sup>5</sup>

Just a few weeks later, Stanley, his wife, and his daughter all arrived in Berkeley, where he began taking classes at the University of California. But academic work was not Dunham’s forte. His older brother Ralph, who was working on a Ph.D. at Berkeley, remembered that Stan could not cope with the foreign language requirement. Madelyn’s younger brother Charles heard from his sister that Stanley was more interested in reading murder mysteries than doing his course work, and he expected Madelyn to write his term papers for him. “What can you do when your wife won’t support you in getting an education?” Stan later told Charles.

Madelyn was unhappy with their situation, and in mid-1947, Stanley, Madelyn, and four-year-old Ann drove eastward with Ralph Dunham. Following a July 4 stopover at Yellowstone National Park, Ralph dropped the young family off in Kansas, inscribing a copy of C. S. Forester’s Poo-Poo and the Dragons for his niece: “To Stanley Ann Dunham / As a going away present from her Uncle Ralph / Summer of 1947.” More than sixty-five years later that volume and Ann’s other childhood books would lie well preserved in a box in Honolulu.

Stanley enrolled in several classes at Wichita State University, but within months, he had taken a sales job at the Jay Paris Furniture Store in Ponca City, Oklahoma, two hours south of Wichita. One colleague later remembered Stan as a successful, first-rate salesman, knowledgeable about both furniture and his customers. He was also remembered as “a smart guy who liked to tell you how smart he was.” In Ponca City, Madelyn initially stayed home before realizing that she had to have a job. “The evening cocktail hour gets earlier every day. If I don’t work, I’ll turn into an alcoholic.”

Ann began first grade at Ponca City’s Jefferson Elementary School in September 1948, and in 1950, she transferred to another for third grade after the family moved to a different home. Then, in the spring of 1951, Stanley moved the family more than 250 miles southwest, to Vernon, Texas, when he took a new furniture store job, and Ann completed third grade there, as well as all of fourth, fifth, and sixth, before the peripatetic family again moved, this time back to El Dorado, Kansas. Stanley worked first at a Farm & Home store, then got a better job at Hellum’s Furniture in Wichita, while Ann attended seventh grade in El Dorado.<sup>6</sup>

During the summer of 1955, the Dunhams moved yet again, this time all the way westward to Seattle, where Stanley had a job at the huge Standard-Grunbaum Furniture store. They moved into an apartment northeast of the University of Washington's campus, and Ann walked to nearby Eckstein Middle School for eighth grade. The next summer they moved to Mercer Island in Lake Washington, southeast of downtown Seattle, and Ann began ninth grade at the brand-new Mercer Island High School. They rented a nice apartment in Shorewood, and sometime in 1957 Stan changed jobs once more, working at Doces Majestic Furniture.

Throughout high school, Ann went by her given name of Stanley, or Stannie. She made a good number of friends and was taught by some outspokenly progressive teachers. One friend later recalled that Stanley showed little interest in clothes or boys; instead, she and her friends would take a long bus ride to the lively "UDub" campus neighborhood, an unusual expedition for Mercer Island teenagers. At home, tensions about money sometimes brought on loud arguments between Stan and Madelyn, who had found a job as an escrow officer at a bank in nearby Bellevue. Stanley also had a strained relationship with her father, and one high school friend said she "hated her father at the time that I knew her."

Sometime during her senior year, she and a male classmate set off on a nonromantic road trip that took them as far south as Berkeley, California, before anguished parents and law enforcement officials located them there. Stan Dunham flew down and drove them back to Seattle. Also during her senior year, Stannie saw a much-heralded foreign film, Black Orpheus, which was French director Marcel Camus's adaptation of the famous Greek legend, set in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. She would still recall the movie a quarter century later, and she may have been especially struck by the film's male lead, black Brazilian actor Breno Mello.

Toward the end of Stannie's senior year, Stan heard about a job opportunity that was even farther west than Seattle—in Honolulu. Albert "Bob" Pratt, who operated Isle Wide furniture distributors, was adding a retail outlet, and he hired Stan Dunham to run it. The rental home where Pratt's family lived, at 6085 Kalaniana'ole Highway, had a backyard cottage, and Stan relocated there sometime before Stannie's high school graduation. On the day after commencement in June 1960, she and her mother flew to Honolulu.

Stannie had not wanted to move to Hawaii, especially given her great attraction to UDub in Seattle, but she was still five months shy of her eighteenth birthday. So, in September 1960, she enrolled as a freshman at the University of Hawaii, taking a philosophy course and perhaps others in addition to Russian 101.<sup>7</sup>

How Stanley Ann Dunham's relationship with Barack Obama commenced and developed remains deeply shrouded in long-unasked and now-unanswerable questions. A quarter century after she became pregnant, her son, temporarily back in Honolulu, would write to his girlfriend that "one block from where I sit, the apartment house where I was conceived still stands." By early 1961, Barack Obama Sr. was living in apartment 15 at 1704 Punahou Street, just across the street from Punahou School, and while literary license shrank three or four blocks to one, that is where Ann Dunham said her pregnancy originated in November 1960.

When the final exam for that Russian 101 course took place on January 28, 1961, Ann Dunham as well as her parents knew she was almost three months pregnant. According to later documents—no contemporary one has ever been located—on Thursday, February 2, 1961, Ann and Barack took a brief interisland flight from Honolulu to Maui and were married in the small county seat of Wailuku, with no relatives or friends present. Obama's closest confidante, his younger sister Zeituni Onyango, recounted her older brother's version of what had occurred: "the father of Ann said that they have to marry." Stanley Dunham insisted that his pregnant daughter get married rather than give birth to a bastard. But why did they go to the time and expense of flying from Honolulu to Maui? Stanley and Madelyn likely did not want any potentially embarrassing questions arising at either Isle-Wide furniture or at the Bank of Hawaii, where Madelyn had been hired as an escrow officer. They knew that marriages on Oahu were regularly listed in both of Honolulu's daily newspapers, but ones occurring in the outer islands were not.<sup>8</sup>

Ann Dunham Obama did not register for spring classes at the University of Hawaii. In contrast, Obama was honored with a Phi Kappa Phi certificate for his freshman-year grade point average and then a few weeks later was named to the Dean's List because of his fall 1960 GPA. A young English professor, writing to AAI in support of Obama's request for scholarship assistance for his sophomore year, reported that "Obama has done an exemplary job of getting along with people" and called him "a genuinely enlightened twentieth-century man." Obama's friends Neil Abercrombie and Andy Zane were leading local racial equality efforts, and when a national governors' conference brought outspoken segregationist governor John Patterson of Alabama to Honolulu in June 1961, he was greeted at the airport by about two dozen picketers holding signs proclaiming "Welcome to the Land of Miscegenation." The lone black participant certainly represented the truth of that slogan, and he told a reporter that "Hawaii gives them an example where races live together," but he asked "not to be identified" other than as a UH student.<sup>9</sup>

But in that student's own personal context, the races actually did not live together. During her pregnancy, Ann continued to reside with her parents at 6085 Kalaniana'ole Highway, and Obama remained in his apartment on Punahou Street. When UH's foreign-student adviser, Mrs. Sumie McCabe, learned of Obama's new marriage some two months after it occurred, she immediately called the Honolulu office of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service to tell the INS about his changed circumstances. INS agent Lyle Dahlin memorialized McCabe's call in a memo that went into Obama's file, noting that "the problem is that when he arrived in the U.S. the subject had a wife in Kenya." McCabe said Obama "is very intelligent," but he "has been running around with several girls since he first arrived here and last summer she cautioned him about his playboy ways. Subject replied that he would 'try' to stay away from the girls. Subject got his USC [U.S. citizen] wife 'Hapei' and although they were married, they do not live together, and Miss Dunham is making arrangements with the Salvation Army to give the baby away. Subject told Mrs. McCabe that in Kenya all that is necessary to be divorced is to tell the wife that she is divorced and that constitutes a legal divorce. Subject claims to have been divorced from his wife in Kenya in this method."

The INS was powerless to take any action absent a criminal conviction for bigamy, but Dahlin recommended that Obama be "closely questioned" before he was approved for another extension of his student residency visa and that "denial be considered." If Ann were to petition on his behalf, "make sure an investigation is conducted as to the bona-fide[s] of the marriage." Subsequent documents in Obama's own hand would soon demonstrate that he in no way really considered himself divorced from Kezia. He had grown up in a family and ethnic culture where multiple wives were the norm, and he was not telling the truth about that to McCabe. There are no documents or anyone's recollections to support Obama's claim that Ann Dunham intended to give birth to their child and then put it up for adoption. Obama's closest relative, his sister Zeituni, dismissed the possibility out of hand when the memo first came to light decades later: “no African especially in Kenya would think of giving his child away.”

So when Dr. David A. Sinclair delivered Barack Hussein Obama II at 7:24 P.M. on Friday, August 4, 1961, at Kapiolani Maternity & Gynecological Hospital on Punahou Street, just three blocks south from where the child had been conceived, the Salvation Army was not called. Instead, Madelyn and Stan each called their siblings with the news. Madelyn’s younger brother Charles recounted her description of the new baby: “He’s not black like his father, he’s not white. More like coffee with cream.” Ralph Dunham remembered Stan calling him from the hospital and Madelyn getting on the phone too. Stan’s younger sister Virginia Dunham Goeldner recalled him phoning her too and, fifty years later, expressed astonishment that some of her longtime neighbors in Maumelle, Arkansas, doubted the fact of her grandnephew’s birth. “Why did Stanley call and say he was born and why were they over at the hospital? Why did he bother to call” on that Friday night?

The birth occurred exactly two years to the day, and indeed almost exactly to the hour, since Barack Hussein Obama had boarded his flight at Nairobi Embakasi. On Monday, Ann Dunham Obama signed her son’s Hawaii State Department of Health birth certificate, and it was signed on Tuesday by Dr. Sinclair and the local registrar of births. Five days later, on August 13, the Honolulu Advertiser’s listing of “Births, Marriages, Deaths” on page B6 included in the first category “Mr. and Mrs. Barack H. Obama, 6085 Kalaniana’ole Hwy., son, Aug. 4.” The next day’s Honolulu Star-Bulletin carried the same listing on page 24, with copy editors at that paper spelling out “Highway” and “August” in full. The birth certificate only contained the address for “Usual Residence of Mother”; there was no request for an address following “Full Name of Father,” so the newspapers presumed that the newborn’s parents lived together.<sup>10</sup>

Less than four weeks after his son’s birth, Barack Hussein Obama applied for and quickly received a routine one-year extension of his student residency visa. Lee Zeigler, newly arrived from Stanford University, had replaced Sumie McCabe as UH’s foreign student adviser, and a different INS agent, William T. Wood II, not Lyle Dahlin, reviewed and approved Obama’s application. Obama said he had received $1,000 in scholarship support via the African-American Institute, but again requested to work for up to twenty-five hours a week to meet the balance of his expenses. He also indicated that sometime subsequent to March 1961 he had moved from Punahou Street to 1482 Alencastre Street, well east of UH’s campus. Barack listed Ann S. Dunham as his spouse, and Agent Wood’s summary memo noted, “They have one child born Honolulu on 8/4/61—Barack Obama II, child living with mother (she lives with her parents & subject lives at 1482 Alencastre St.)” But Wood noted something else too: “U.S.C. spouse to go to Wash. State University next semester.”

Sometime soon after Wood wrote that memo, Ann and her weeks-old son flew from Honolulu to Seattle: not so she could attend WSU, in far southeastern Washington State, but to enroll at her beloved UDub, which she had wanted to attend a year earlier. Ann and baby Barack stayed briefly with a family friend on Mercer Island before settling into an apartment at 516 Thirteenth Avenue East in Seattle’s Capitol Hill neighborhood, well south of the university. According to her UDub transcript, she registered for two evening courses, Anthropology 100: Introduction to the Study of Man and Political Science 201: Modern Government. Classes began in late September.

But why did Ann Dunham Obama take her newborn and leave her husband, parents, and Honolulu for the familiar confines of Seattle? She clearly preferred UDub and its environs over UH, but she told half a dozen old high school friends, as well as a woman who also lived at 516 Thirteenth Avenue East and babysat young Barack while Ann attended classes, that she loved her husband. But the young couple never chose to live together at any time following the onset of Ann's pregnancy, and Ann relocated herself a long airplane flight away as soon as her son was old enough to travel. None of the direct participants—Ann, Obama, Madelyn, and Stan—ever offered a clear explanation that has survived in anyone's recollections a half century later.

Obama had taken to calling his son's mother Anna, not Ann, and she seems to have adopted this as well, according to both the 1961–62 Polk City Directory for Seattle, which lists “Obama Anna Mrs. studt” and her neighboring babysitter, Alaskan native Mary Toutonghi, who also remembered her as Anna. Ann did well in her fall courses, earning an A in anthropology and a B in political science; she did even better in the winter term that ran from late December 1961 through mid-March 1962, getting As in both Philosophy 120: Introduction to Logic and, interestingly, History 478: History of Southern Africa. Mary Toutonghi babysat regularly during those months on the evenings Ann attended classes, and years later she would recall infant Barack as “very curious and very alert,” “very happy and a good size.” In March Ann enrolled in three regular daytime courses, obtaining Bs in Chinese Civilization and History of Modern Philosophy but changing English Political and Social History to just an audit.<sup>11</sup>

With Ann in Seattle, Obama launched into his senior year at UH. Only Neil Abercrombie was aware of Obama's relationship with Dunham or that he had fathered a child in Honolulu. One new graduate student, Robert Ruenitz, would later admit that “for any of us to say that we knew Obama well would be difficult. He was a private man with academic achievement his foremost goal.” Another 1961 grad student, Cambodia native Naranhkiri Tith, debated nuclear arms with Obama at a widely publicized campus symposium. Obama labeled the issue not a “balance of power” but a “balance of terror” and asserted that most U.S. foreign aid took the form of weapons and other military assistance. Tith and other graduate students also partied regularly with Obama, who “loved to drink” to the point of becoming “totally drunk” at repeated parties. “He also was a womanizer,” Tith recounted years later.

Even so, Obama's academic success continued apace. In mid-January he addressed the NAACP's Honolulu branch on “Changes in Africa Today,” and in early February, he was featured prominently in a “Dear Friend” fund-raising appeal distributed by Bill Scheinman and Tom Mboya's African-American Students Foundation. Sent in the name of Ruth Bunche, whose diplomat husband Ralph in 1950 had been the first African American ever to win the Nobel Peace Prize, the letter briefly profiled two young men “of whom we are especially proud” out of more than five hundred African students who were then studying in the U.S. One was completing a graduate degree in engineering at Columbia University; the other was Obama, “an honor student of the University of Hawaii where he will complete a four year course in three years.” The letter predicted Obama would soon qualify for the national academic honor society, Phi Beta Kappa, and in late April he was elected to membership.

With graduation only a month away, Obama was also a featured speaker at a large Mother's Day event organized by the Hawaii Peace Rally Committee to oppose nuclear weapons. The afternoon event drew hundreds to Ala Moana Beach Park. Liberal Democratic state legislators Tom Gill and Patsy Mink were joined on the speakers' platform by four clergymen and several UH professors. The crowd included powerful International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) director Jack Hall, and conservative counterprotesters from the Young Americans for Freedom (YAF) who waved signs advocating continued U.S. nuclear weapons testing.

Speaking to the crowd, Obama denounced “foreign aid which is directed toward military conquest or the acquisition of bases.” Speaking as an African, “anything which relieves military spending will help us,” and if peace were to replace nuclear confrontation, “we will be able to receive your aid with an open mind and without suspicion.”<sup>12</sup>

In early May 1962, Betty Mooney Kirk, who had married and relocated to her husband’s hometown of Tulsa, Oklahoma, wrote to Tom Mboya in Nairobi to seek his help in finding someone to sponsor Obama for graduate school, “preferably at Harvard.” She enclosed a copy of Barack’s résumé, which she had prepared, and it stated that Obama already had applied to and been accepted for graduate study at Harvard, Yale, the University of Michigan, and the University of California at Berkeley. Harvard alone had offered financial aid, in the limited amount of $1,500, but Betty hoped Tom could find further assistance because Barack “has the opportunity and the brains.” Mboya replied with congratulations, but according to Betty was “not very hopeful” about locating available funding.

Betty’s colleague Helen Roberts was back in Nairobi, and, perhaps at Betty’s urging, was actively assisting Kezia Obama, now the single mother of two young children—Rita Auma had been born in early 1960, six months after her father’s departure for the U.S. Kezia was sometimes in Kogelo with her two children and Barack’s father and stepmother Sarah, sometimes with her parents in Kendu Bay, and other times staying with her brother Wilson Odiawo in Nairobi. Roberts helped Kezia take some educational courses, and told one friend that Kezia “is very anxious to be a suitable wife for Barack when he returns.” Roberts remarked, “I think Barack will notice quite a difference in her when he at last returns.”

In late May 1962, Obama wrote to Mboya and apologized for not having written in a long time. He bragged about his academic achievements at UH, falsely claiming to have already earned an M.A. degree in addition to his impressive three-year B.A. and a 3.6 GPA. Reciting his Phi Beta Kappa and Phi Kappa Phi honors as well as an Omicron Delta Kappa award, he told Mboya—twice, in almost identical sentences—that these were “the highest academic honours that anyone can get in the U.S.A. for high academic attainments.” What’s more, he was about to leave for Harvard, “where I have been offered a fellowship for my Ph.D. I intend to take at least two years working on my Ph.D. and at most three years. Then I will be coming home.” Obama closed by telling Mboya, “I have enjoyed my stay here, but I will be accelerating my coming home as much as I can. You know my wife is in Nairobi there, and I would really appreciate any help you may give her.”<sup>13</sup>

His letter to Mboya did not mention his second wife or third child, nor did he ever say anything about them to Helen Roberts or to the hugely supportive Betty Mooney Kirk. As his eldest son would ruefully put it years later, by the end of his time in Hawaii “Barack’s life was now a series of compartments.” On June 17, 1962, Obama received his B.A. degree—and not any M.A.—at UH’s commencement. Three days later the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, in an article headlined “Kenya Student Wins Fellowship,” reported how the “straight A” economics major was headed to Harvard to obtain his Ph.D. “He plans to return to Africa and work in development of underdeveloped areas and international trade at the planning and policy-making level,” the story explained. “He leaves next week for a tour of mainland universities,” beginning in California, prior to entering Harvard.

In Seattle, Ann’s spring quarter classes had concluded, and her high school friend Barbara Cannon

Rusk, who had moved to Utah after graduating, “came back to Seattle in the summer of 1962.” One day, Rusk stopped by Ann’s apartment on Capitol Hill. Her initial visit “was after June, and could have been as late as September. I visited her a couple of times,” she recalled more than forty years later. “She wasn’t in classes, and didn’t have a job. I recall her being melancholy. . . . I had a sense that something wasn’t right in her marriage. It was all very mysterious,” as her husband was already headed to Harvard. “I didn’t ask her about the relationship.”

Also years later, another young woman whose Mercer Island family had known the Dunhams very well, Judy Farner Ware, would recount to Janny Scott, Ann’s biographer, a distinct memory of meeting Ann and Obama in what she recalled was Port Angeles, Washington—the ferry port at the top of western Washington State’s Olympic Peninsula, just across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Victoria, British Columbia. She remembered the meeting because an openly flirtatious Obama all but hit on her. Had Obama traveled north from San Francisco to see his second wife and second son in Seattle, and then perhaps they toured the region? Ann didn’t own a car or know how to drive, and neither Ann nor Obama ever mentioned such a visit to anyone in later years.

Ann and her son were still in Seattle when Obama left Honolulu for the mainland. Perhaps it should be presumed that Obama did set eyes on his newborn son back in August 1961 before Ann and the baby left for Seattle—though no one’s surviving accounts say that did occur—but unless Obama made some equally unrecorded, unremembered visit to Seattle before heading eastward, he would not have seen his son for years to come. In truth, as one scholar would acutely put it, Barack Hussein Obama was only “a sperm donor in his son’s life.”

Almost three decades later, his eldest daughter would meet Ann Dunham and ask her what had happened between her and her father. Ann’s story then was that Obama had asked her to join him at Harvard, but “she had not wanted to go. She had loved him, but she had feared having to give up too much of herself.”<sup>14</sup>

By mid-July 1962, Obama had gotten as far east as Oklahoma, where he stopped in Tulsa to visit Betty Mooney Kirk and her husband. By no later than August 17, he was in Baltimore, at the Koinonia Foundation’s campus, where he had stayed exactly three years earlier. While there, he updated his immigration papers, telling the INS his study at Harvard would be supported by $1,000 each from Frank Laubach’s Literacy Fund and the Phelps Stokes Fund, in addition to his university fellowship. On his “Application to Extend Time of Temporary Stay,” Obama listed himself as married, but under children entered only one name: “Roy Obama.”

By September, Obama had arrived at Harvard, and Ann and her now one-year-old son had returned to Honolulu. Stan and Madelyn had moved from Kalanianaʻole Highway to an apartment on Alexander Street, but Ann and young Barack initially stayed at 2277 Kamehameha Avenue, close to UH. Ann sat out the fall semester, but in January 1963, she resumed taking classes as a sophomore. Sometime prior to the end of 1963, Stan and Madelyn relocated to a house at 2234 University Avenue, and Ann and her son soon moved in with her parents.

As Ann adapted to a heavier academic load, and Madelyn worked long days at her bank job, young Barack spent most of his time with his fit and youthful forty-five-year-old grandfather. Obama Sr.’s old friend Neil Abercrombie, still a graduate student at UH, saw Stan and young Barry—as his grandparents called him—around town during Barry’s childhood. “His grandfather was the most wonderful guy” and it was readily apparent that “Stanley loved that little boy,” Abercrombie remembered. “He took him everywhere,” including to an arrival ceremony for two Gemini astronauts who had splashed down safely in the Pacific after an aborted space flight. Barack would “remember sitting on my grandfather’s shoulders” at Hickam Air Force Base and “dreaming of where they had been.” Abercrombie recalled: “In the absence of his father, there was not a kinder, more understanding man than Stanley Dunham. He was loving and generous.”

Indeed, among the dozens of photos of young Barry from his childhood, it is impossible to find one where he is not smiling broadly. Stan’s boss’s daughter, Cindy Pratt Holtz, remembers Stanley bringing Barry with him to the Pratt furniture warehouse. Young Obama was “so full of life, a twinkle in the eye, giggling all the time.” In the fall of 1966, five-year-old Barry began kindergarten at nearby Noelani Elementary School, and Aimee Yatsushiro, one of his two teachers, remembers him similarly: “always smiling—had a perpetual smile.” Obama later said, “My earliest memory is running around in a backyard gathering up mangoes that had fallen in our backyard when I was five” or perhaps four. “A lot of my early memories,” he added, are “of an almost idyllic sort of early childhood in Hawaii.”<sup>15</sup>

In the meantime, his barely twenty-one-year-old mother had found new happiness in tandem with her studies. “Lolo” Soetoro—officially Soetoro Martodihardjo, after his Javanese father’s name—first arrived in Honolulu from Yogyakarta, Indonesia, in September 1962 as a twenty-seven-year-old graduate student in geography. After his first year of classes, Soetoro spent the summer of 1963 at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois, and at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, but that fall he returned to UH for the final year of his two-year master’s program. He and Ann met each other sometime during those months. One mutual friend recalled that “he had a good sense of humor, and he loved to party.” Ann would later remark how attractive Lolo was in tennis shorts. “She liked brown bums,” her most outspoken friend would tell biographer Janny Scott, and by early 1964, Ann and Lolo were a public couple. Seemingly because of this new romance, on January 20, 1964, Stanley Ann Dunham Obama signed a “Libel for Divorce,” as Hawaii legal process termed the form, and five days later the complaint was officially filed in Honolulu circuit court. A copy was addressed to Barack H. Obama in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Obama had been at Harvard for almost eighteen months. He was one of thirty-five newly admitted doctoral students in the Department of Economics, and in a December 1962 letter to a friend in Hawaii, Obama confessed that “the competition here is just maddening.” The heavy reading load made every week “pretty rough,” and while “I find Harvard a very stimulating place at least intellectually,” his focus was “my own research on the theory I am trying to build.” He added, “I will stay here at least for two years to three years depending on when I am able to finish my dissertation,” but after he received a C+ and two Bs in his first semester, Harvard refused to renew his fellowship to cover his second year of classes. Two senior economists nonetheless praised Obama’s “intelligence, initiative, and diligence,” and thanks once again to Betty Mooney Kirk and the African-American Institute, external funding allowed him to continue.

Barack first lived at 49 Irving Street before moving into a top-floor apartment at 170 Magazine Street with a Nigerian fellow, one of about eighty African students at Harvard—a vast change from his unique status in Honolulu. Obama actively mentored younger Kenyan students from around greater Boston; George Saitoti, who was eighteen years old when he knew Obama, told biographer Sally Jacobs “we looked upon him as a model. He really gave us inspiration.” In the fall of 1963, Obama’s brother Omar Onyango, a decade younger, arrived in Boston to attend the posh Browne & Nichols School, just west of Harvard, thanks to his older brother's social acquaintance with a young woman whose father was the school's treasurer.

That same young woman, like a number of Obama's African friends in Cambridge, also witnessed a continuation—and perhaps an intensification—of the heavy drinking and heavy-handed pursuit of women that had marked Barack's three years at UH. "He'd dance in a very suggestive way, no subtlety," that female friend recounted to Sally Jacobs. "He used suggestive, provocative language, I would say overly sexual. . . . It was kind of a God's gift to women thing." One Nigerian friend recalled telling a drunken Obama to leave a young woman alone, and an African undergraduate woman told Jacobs about consoling a fellow female undergraduate who had been an Obama girlfriend until she learned he was already married, presumably to Kezia.

In late January 1964, Rev. Dana Klotzle, who oversaw the Unitarian Universalist Association's (UUA) sponsorship of about a dozen East African students who, like Omar, were attending secondary schools around Boston, notified the local INS office of a troubling development. A young Kenyan woman who was attending school in Auburndale, Massachusetts, had suddenly flown to London on January 10 on a round-trip ticket. UUA had terminated her sponsorship and would not accept her back; an INS agent phoned the school for additional information. The dean of women said the girl had claimed she was visiting a sick sister, but there was no evidence of a sister in Britain. What's more, she had been "receiving advice from another student from Kenya, one Obama who is likely her boy friend and who is at Harvard." The Unitarians suspected she had flown to London to obtain an abortion. Obama had been phoning the school seeking her reinstatement and also had called a second school, which refused to accept her. Rev. Klotzle, the memo reported, thought Obama was "a slippery character." The Boston INS office then notified the U.S. consul in London of the girl's flight and Obama's involvement.

In Hawaii, on March 5, Judge Samuel P. King held a brief hearing on Ann's divorce petition; fifteen days later, he signed a "Decree of Divorce." Ann was "granted the care, custody and control of Barack Hussein Obama, II," with Obama Sr. having "the right of reasonable visitation." Pursuant to Ann's request, "the question of child support is specifically reserved until raised hereafter." As with Ann's initial complaint, a copy was mailed to Obama in Cambridge.

Four weeks later, Obama visited the Boston INS office to extend his student residency visa for another year. For the new application, Harvard certified that "Mr. Obama expects to be registered as a full-time student during the academic year 1964–65," but the INS agent reviewing the file noted the January contretemps and a supervisor instructed him to "hold up extension for present." The agent made several calls to Harvard, in part because Obama had left blank both the marital line and the one about employment, stating there that he could not remember where he had worked in the U.S. The agent noted: "Harvard thinks he's married to someone in Kenya and someone in Honolulu, but that possibly he belongs to a tribe where multiple marriages are O.K." Obama's doctoral qualifying exams were soon approaching, and the director of Harvard's international students office wanted to hold off on questioning Obama until those were finished.

Obama was aware of the inquiries, and he called the INS to say he now remembered working at the Institute of International Marketing in Cambridge during the summer of 1963. Harvard officials told the INS that Obama might also be married to someone in Cambridge, and in mid-May David Henry, director of Harvard's international students office, called INS agent M. F. McKeon to say he had conferred with both a graduate school dean and the chairman of Harvard's Economics Department.

"Obama has passed his general exams, which indicates that on academic grounds, he is entitled to stay around here and write his thesis," McKeon wrote in a memo memorializing the phone conversation. "However, they are going to try to cook something up to ease him out. All three will have to agree on this, however. They are planning on telling him that they will not give him any money, and that he had better return to Kenya and prepare his thesis at home." That would take several weeks, but "at this time Harvard does not plan on having Obama registered as a full-time student during the academic year 1964–1965 as stated on" Obama's application a month earlier.

On May 27, 1964, Harvard's David Henry sent Obama a life-changing letter. It began by acknowledging that Obama had completed his course work and that only his thesis remained to be completed before he could get his Ph.D. But the letter also said that neither the Department of Economics nor the graduate school had the funds to support him in Cambridge. It then said, "We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that you should terminate your stay in the United States and return to Kenya to carry on your research and the writing of your thesis." He was given until June 19—which was hardly three weeks away!—to arrange for his departure. Henry indicated that copies of the letter were going to graduate school associate dean Reginald H. Phelps, a historian of modern Germany, and Economics Department chairman John T. Dunlop, a distinguished professor who would go on to become dean of Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences and then U.S. secretary of labor.

Unspoken in Henry's letter—though crystal clear in Obama's INS file—was Harvard's unwillingness to continue hosting a man whose sexual energies, whether inter-African or serially miscegenous, would not be tolerated in tony Cambridge as they had been in multihued Honolulu. Two weeks later an INS form letter instructed Obama that he had until July 8, instead of June 19, to depart the United States. On June 18, an understandably agitated Obama phoned the Boston INS office and insisted that he be given specific grounds for why his residency extension was being denied. An INS agent emphasized that the decision was final, but Obama called again the next day and asked to speak to the district director, who refused to take the call. Obama declared he lacked funds to leave the U.S., and the next day he asked a Harvard secretary to call the INS on his behalf. She too was told INS's ruling was final. At that point, Obama apparently gave up; on Monday, July 6, 1964, he departed from New York's newly renamed John F. Kennedy International Airport bound for Paris and then Nairobi, which, as of seven months earlier, was now the capital of newly independent Kenya.<sup>16</sup>

On the other side of the United States, Ann Dunham and Lolo Soetoro were married on Monday, March 15, 1965, on Molokai, a smaller Hawaiian isle southeast of Oahu. Neither Ann's son nor her parents attended the ceremony, which took place only three months before Lolo's current residency visa would expire. He had received his M.A. in geography in June 1964, but a month later both UH and the INS approved another one-year residency during which he could get practical experience working for local engineering and surveying firms.

INS documents indicate that Ann and Barry never moved to 3326 Oahu Avenue, where Lolo was living, but instead remained at 2234 University Avenue with Stan and Madelyn. The looming question of whether Lolo would be able to remain in the U.S. beyond June soon brought both him and Ann into extensive contacts with the INS that mirrored what her ex-spouse had experienced a year earlier.

Sometime during May or June 1965, UH's East-West Center (EWC), which had sponsored Lolo's graduate study, received a cable from the Indonesian embassy in Washington requesting Soetoro's immediate return to Jakarta. But Lolo and Ann had already taken the initiative to win an extension of his visa, and following two joint interviews at the Honolulu INS office, on June 7 Lolo's residency permit was extended until mid-June 1966. On July 2, when Lolo informed the EWC of that, he was summoned to a July 6 meeting to be reminded "that the East-West Center still retained visa sponsorship and authority" regarding his residency. Lolo said he had sought the extension because his wife was suffering from a stomach ailment that might require surgery, but later that day EWC phoned INS, which immediately summoned both Lolo and Ann to another interview on July 19. In the interim, Ann, using Dunham as her surname, applied for and received her first U.S. passport.

Officials from the EWC visited the Honolulu INS office to explain that their agreement with the Indonesian government required that "every effort will be made to return students at the completion of their grants." Thus EWC "shall appreciate any effort which you can make to insure that Mr. Soetoro will be returned to Indonesia as soon as possible."

Before the July 19 session, Lolo submitted a statement to the Honolulu INS office noting that in his homeland "anti-American feeling has reached a feverish pitch under the direction of the Indonesian communist party." This was supported by widespread U.S. press reports. Lolo asserted, "I have been advised by both family and friends in Indonesia that it would be dangerous to endeavor to return with my wife at the present time." In addition, "I would meet with much prejudice myself in seeking employment" because of his U.S. educational background, and "land belonging to my family has already been confiscated by the government as part of a communistic land reform plan," a policy that press reports again corroborated. Citing his "former compulsory association with the Indonesian army while still a student," Lolo also feared being dragooned into battlefield service in Indonesia's armed conflict with Malaysia if he returned home.

Soon after the July 19 interview, INS Honolulu recommended denial of any ongoing residency for Lolo. But almost two months later, the EWC notified Indonesia's San Francisco consulate that Lolo would return to Indonesia in June 1966—and his wife would accompany him. This was just days before Indonesia was plunged into months of bloody, widespread violence in which hundreds of thousands of the previously ascendant Communists and perceived sympathizers were slaughtered by the Indonesian army and allied militias. That turmoil commenced with an unsuccessful, Communist-backed revolt against the army leadership by a small band of junior officers on September 30, 1965.

For the next six months, the violently anti-Communist army leadership took firm control of the country and a half million or more civilians were killed. Even with knowledge of the tumult, Ann, on November 30, gave the INS an affidavit acknowledging, "I don't feel that I would undergo any exceptional hardship if my husband were to depart from the United [States] to reside abroad as the regulations require." Those rules would allow Lolo's readmission, as her husband, after two years' absence from the U.S., a preferable course to being hamstrung by EWC's deference to Indonesian authorities.

If the elimination of the anti-American Communist presence in Indonesia is what caused Lolo and Ann to change their strategy, that has gone unrecorded. Ann's affidavit did, however, say she was "living with my parents in the home which they rent" and that "my son by a former marriage lives there with us." INS's efforts to revoke Lolo's existing extension petered out, and on June 20, 1966—the last possible day—Lolo Soetoro flew out of Honolulu bound for Jakarta.<sup>17</sup>

After Lolo's departure, Ann took a secretarial job in UH's student government office and also began doing some temporary nighttime tutoring and paper grading. That gave her an income of about $400 per month, and she told INS officials she hoped to save enough money to join Lolo in Indonesia in summer 1967. "We figure on going and staying until my husband's time is up and then come back together." With young Barry in kindergarten at Noelani Elementary School, and Stan and Madelyn both working full-time, Ann spent $50 to $75 a month for a babysitter on weekdays from 2:30 P.M. to 5:00 P.M. In December 1966, she told INS that she expected to complete her B.A. degree in anthropology in August 1967 and would join Lolo in Indonesia that October. She was already attempting to secure employment at the U.S. embassy in Jakarta.

INS did not appear open to waiving the two-years-abroad requirement for Lolo, and in May 1967 INS agent Robert Schultz phoned Ann for an update. "She and her child will definitely go to Indonesia to join her husband if he is not permitted to return to the United States sometime in the near future, as she is no longer able to endure the separation," Schultz noted. "Her son is now in kindergarten and will commence the first grade next September and if it is necessary for her and the child to go to Indonesia, she will educate the child at home with the help of school texts from the U.S. as approved by the Board of Education in Honolulu." Unbeknownst to Ann, this description of young Barry's educational plight would set in motion a change in the INS's attitude about a waiver. Still, in late June, she applied to amend her 1965 passport, taking Soetoro rather than Dunham as her surname.

In August 1967, just as Ann was receiving her B.A. from UH, INS, layer by bureaucratic layer, gradually agreed to grant Lolo a waiver, and two months later notified the State Department of that intent. Nine months would then pass before the Honolulu INS office realized that State had never responded. In the interim, sometime in October 1967, twenty-four-year-old Ann Soetoro and six-year-old Barry Obama boarded a Japan Airlines flight from Honolulu to Tokyo. During a three-day stopover, Ann took Barry to see the giant bronze Amida Buddha in Kamakura, thirty miles southwest of Tokyo. Then they boarded another plane, headed for Jakarta via Sydney.<sup>18</sup>

In Honolulu, Barry had begun first grade at Noelani Elementary School, and upon arrival in Jakarta, Ann initially followed through on her promise to homeschool her son. Home was 16 Haji Ramli Street, a small, concrete house with a flat, red-tiled roof and unreliable electricity on an unpaved lane in the newly settled, far from well-to-do Menteng Dalam neighborhood. Jakarta was a sprawling metropolis, but one where bicycle cabs—becak, in Indonesian—and small motorbikes far outnumbered automobiles.

Outside of the privileged expatriate community, where young children attended the costly international school, "Jakarta was a very hard city to live in," said another American woman—later a close friend of Ann's—who lived there in 1967–68. One had to deal with nonflushing toilets, open sewers, a lack of potable water, unreliable medical care, unpaved streets, and spotty electricity. When Ann and Barry arrived, Lolo was indeed working for the Indonesian army's mapping agency, though now, unlike four months earlier, he was based on the other side of Jakarta, not hundreds of miles away in far-eastern Java.

Barry would later say that "for me, as a young boy," Jakarta was "a magical place." Revisiting the city more than forty years later, he recounted how "we had a mango tree out front" and "my Indonesian friends and I used to run in the fields with water buffalo and goats" while "flying kites" and "catching dragonflies." But during the long rainy season, Jakarta was no wonderland: Barry, like others, would have to wear plastic bags over his footwear, and on one mud-sliding jaunt, he badly cut his forearm on barbed wire, a wound that required twenty stitches and left him with what he later called “an ugly scar.”

In January 1968, Ann enrolled Barry, using the surname Soetoro, in a newly built Roman Catholic school three blocks from their home—“she didn’t have the money to send me to the fancy international school where all the American kids went,” Barry later recounted. That allowed Ann to take a paid job as assistant to the director of a U.S. embassy-sponsored program offering English language classes to interested Indonesians. Barry’s school, St. Francis Assisi, as its name would be rendered in English, was avowedly Catholic: “you would start every day with a prayer,” Barry later explained, but classes met for only two and a half hours on weekday mornings. His first-grade teacher there, Israella Darmawan, decades later told credulous reporters, “He wrote an essay titled, ‘I Want to Become President’” during that spring of 1968, prior to his seventh birthday. She also told journalists that Barry struggled greatly to learn Indonesian; in contrast, Obama later boasted that “it had taken me less than six months to learn Indonesia’s language, its customs, and its legends.”

Barry’s second-grade teacher, Cecilia Sugini, spoke no English, but Barry received more exposure to the Indonesian language during family visits to Lolo’s relatives in Yogyakarta, in central Java. Yet even his third-grade teacher, Fermina Katarina Sinaga, later stated that eight-year-old Barry was not fluent in Indonesian. And she would also tell wide-eyed reporters that Barry, during the fall of 1969, declared in a paper, written in Indonesian, that “Someday I want to be President.” One journalist, embracing Sinaga’s direct quotation forty years later, would insist that Sinaga’s “memory is precise and there is no reason not to trust it.”

By the end of 1969, Lolo, thanks to his nephew “Sonny” Trisulo, switched to a much better job with Union Oil Company of California. Soon thereafter, he, Barry, and newly pregnant Ann moved to a far nicer home at 22 Taman Amir Hamzah Street in the better neighborhood of Matraman. Around the same time, Ann left the English teaching post, which she had come to loathe, for more rewarding work, primarily in the evenings, at a nonprofit management training school headed by a Dutch Jesuit priest.

Moving houses also meant that Barry would attend the Besuki elementary school, which traced its roots back thirty years to Indonesia’s Dutch colonial government. Classes met for five hours each weekday, double what St. Francis Assisi offered. Ann’s new work schedule gave her time to intensify her efforts to homeschool Barry in English using workbooks from the U.S. At Besuki, his all-Indonesian classmates found Barry—or “Berry,” as they pronounced it—unique not only because of his darker complexion and chubby build but also because he was the only left-hander.

Before the spring of 1970 was out, and with a second child on the way, Ann hired an openly gay twenty-four-year-old, sometimes-cross-dressing man—Turdi by day, Evie by night—to be both cook and nanny. Neighbors thought little of it. “She was a nice person and always patient and caring in keeping young Barry,” one later recalled. Turdi often accompanied Barry to and from school. Later, Turdi, at age sixty-six, told the Associated Press: “I never let him see me wearing women’s clothes. But he did see me trying on his mother’s lipstick sometimes. That used to really crack him up.”<sup>19</sup>

Sometime apparently also during that spring, Barry saw something that, in his later tellings, had a vastly more powerful impact upon his young mind. A quarter century passed between the moment and Obama’s first telling of it, but in his 1995 version, the memory was of paging through a pile of Life magazines in an American library in Jakarta and finding an article with photographs of a man of color who had paid for chemical treatments in a horribly unsuccessful attempt to make himself appear white. In Obama's 1995 account, "thousands of people like him, black men and women back in America," had "undergone the same treatment in response to advertisements that promised happiness as a white person." To him, "seeing that article was violent for me, an ambush attack," leaving his image of his own skin color "permanently altered."

In a conversation soon after writing that, Obama recounted how "after reading that story, I knew there had to be something wrong with being black." Earlier, while "growing up in Hawaii, all of the kids were kind of brown," so "I didn't stand out" and "I was too busy running around being a kid" to appreciate racial differences. At his two Jakarta schools, he experienced some normal teasing by other children, but to no obvious or remembered ill effect. "He was a plump kid with big ears and very outgoing and friendly," one of Ann's closest Jakarta friends later recalled.

Nine years later, Obama described the memory again. "I became aware of the cesspool of stereotypes when I was eight or nine. I saw a story in Life magazine about people who were using skin bleach to make themselves white. I was really disturbed by that. Why would somebody want to do that?" A few weeks later, Obama again recounted seeing a Life magazine picture of "a black guy who had bleached his skin with these skin-lightening products." That was "the first time I remember thinking about race" and worrying that having darker skin was "not a good thing."

In 2007, a reporter told Obama that no issue of Life magazine ever contained such an article or such photographs; this was confirmed by Life. "It might have been an Ebony or it might have been . . . who knows what it was?" a flustered Obama responded. But then Ebony too examined its archive of past issues and found no such story. Indeed, the other two major picture magazines of that era, Look and the Saturday Evening Post, published no such story either. Yet Obama understandably stood by his recollection: "I remember the story was very specific about a person who had gone through it and regretted it."

But Ebony had published a somewhat similar story, in its December 1968 issue, titled "I Wish I Were Black—Again." It was a profile of Juana Burke, a young African American art teacher who at age sixteen had begun to suffer from vitiligo, a disease which turned portions of her dark brown skin white as it killed off pigmentation cells. The article included photographs of her forearm and legs. Dermatologists' efforts to counteract the spread of the affliction through skin chemicals and even prolonged sunbathing failed completely, and Ms. Burke reluctantly accepted her pale new appearance.

The four-page Ebony spread stressed that she "retains her old sense of black pride and identifies with her people," and she continued to teach at a predominantly black school. However, becoming white had left her "very pessimistic about the future of race relations in this country." A black boyfriend had ditched her, and she was dismayed to repeatedly experience a "more courteous attitude" from white strangers than she had when she had been visibly black.

Had eight-year-old Barry actually seen that issue of Ebony? Who knows. But many teenagers growing up in the 1960s heard about a journalist named John Howard Griffin, a white Texan who, in the late 1950s, had undergone chemical treatments so he could pass as black and write about the experience—the obverse of Ms. Burke's deflating color change. Griffin's resulting book, Black Like Me, first published in 1961, was a nationwide best seller and was made into a major motion picture.

Irrespective of what magazine pictures young Barry did or did not see, the overarching question of how and why anyone would seek to alter their visible racial identity had become a staple of U.S. popular culture in the late 1960s, even if the notion of any African American becoming white was starkly out-of-date in the new era of “I’m Black and I’m Beautiful.” Obama’s encounter with the pictures had seemingly been a “turning point,” “a transformation in the life story that marks a considerable shift in self-understanding” and in “his racial identity development.” The Obama of 1995, 2004, and 2007–08 certainly agreed—“Growing up, I wasn’t always sure who I was”—regardless of whether at age ten, at age eighteen, or even at age twenty-seven he actually pondered the memory of those images.<sup>20</sup>

Sometime in the late spring of 1970 Ann Dunham, in concert with her father and no doubt her mother, decided that within a year’s time, when Barry would begin fifth grade, he should continue his future schooling in Honolulu rather than Jakarta. Stan Dunham’s twenty-year career as a furniture salesman had ended sometime in 1968, following changes in Bob Pratt’s enterprises, and by 1969, he was one of about twenty-five agents at John S. Williamson’s John Hancock Mutual Insurance agency in downtown Honolulu. Perhaps because of a decrease in income from that shift, Stan and Madelyn had left the rental home at 2234 University Avenue and relocated to unit 1206 in the Punahou Circle Apartments at 1617 South Beretania Street, just a few blocks south of Punahou School.

Ann had been aware of Punahou, and its unequaled-in-Hawaii educational reputation, since her earliest months in Honolulu. Her son was even conceived just across Punahou Street from its spacious campus. Founded in 1841 by Christian missionaries, Punahou had a student body that was still predominantly white—haole, in local parlance—and its alumni included many of Oahu’s civic elite. Fifth grade was one of the two best opportunities—ninth was the other—for youngsters who had not started elementary school there to gain admission, as class sizes increased at the middle and then high school levels.

It is unknown when Ann first thought of sending Barry there, but Stanley had become good friends with Alec Williamson, who also worked at his father’s insurance agency. Alec’s dad had graduated from Punahou in 1937, and both of his sisters had gone there as well, although he had not. Punahou administered admissions tests and required personal interviews. It was “the quintessential local school,” Alec’s sister Susan later explained, and the Dunhams were mainlanders, but John Williamson was more than willing to recommend Stanley’s bright grandson to his alma mater: “My dad wrote the letter,” Alec recounted forty years later.

Sometime in the summer of 1970, eight-year-old Barry, apparently unaccompanied, flew back to Honolulu to live for some weeks with his grandparents—and, more important, to interview with Punahou’s admissions office and take the necessary tests. In his own later telling, those were glorious weeks—lots of ice cream and days at the beach, a radical upgrade from daily life and school in Jakarta. Then, one late July or early August afternoon, after an appointment at Punahou, and with Barry still dressed to impress, Stan took his hapa-haole—half-white—grandson to meet one of his best friends, a sixty-four-year-old black man who had fathered five hapa-haole Hawaiian children of his own.<sup>21</sup>

During their first ten years in Honolulu, Stan and Madelyn’s favorite shared pastime had become contract bridge. Madelyn’s brother Charles Payne later said they played “with almost a fanaticism” and “they were really, really into it” and “worked well together.” Through that hobby, they had met another bridge-playing couple: Helen Canfield Davis, a once-wealthy white woman in her early forties, and her almost-two-decades-older African American husband, Frank Marshall Davis.

By 1970, Frank Davis's publications, involvements, and activities—some self-cataloged, others invasively and meticulously collected by the Federal Bureau of Investigation from 1944 until 1963—were extensive enough to suggest that Davis had led three lives. And indeed he had: almost twenty years as a widely published, often-discussed African American poet and journalist, close to a decade as a dues-paying member of the Communist Party USA, and an entire adult life as an unbounded sexual adventurer.

Born the last day of 1905 in Arkansas City, Kansas—just sixty miles south of Wichita and the neighboring small towns where Stan and Madelyn Dunham would grow up some fifteen years later—Frank's parents divorced while he was a child. He was raised by his mother, stepfather, and grandparents; he graduated from high school, spent a year working in Wichita, and then attended Kansas State Agricultural College. Already interested in poetry and journalism, he left school in 1927 to move to Chicago and found work with a succession of black newspapers there and in nearby Gary, Indiana. In 1931 Frank moved to Atlanta for a better newspaper job, and while there, he met and married Thelma Boyd. He returned to Chicago in 1934, drawn back primarily because of an intense affair with a married white woman who encouraged him to pursue poetry more seriously. His first volume of poems, Black Man's Verse, appeared in mid-1935, followed by two more volumes in 1937 and 1938. By the early 1940s Davis had a reputation as an African American writer of significant power and great promise, a leading voice in what would be called the Chicago Black Renaissance.

Decades later, one scholar of mid-twentieth-century black literature would say that Davis was “among the best critical voices of his generation,” but his most thorough biographer would acknowledge that “Davis's poetry did not survive the era in which it was written,” in significant part because much of it was so polemically political. Another commentator observed that “even at the moments of narratorial identification with the folk, a certain distance is formally maintained.” Similarly, asked years later about an oft-cited poem titled “Mojo Mike's Beer Garden,” Frank readily acknowledged that his portrayal “was sort of a composite.”

Starting in 1943–44, Frank also began teaching classes on the history of jazz at Chicago's Abraham Lincoln School, a Communist-allied institution aimed especially at African Americans. Frank would later complain that “only two black students” took the course in four years, but among the whites who enrolled was a twenty-one-year-old, newly married woman with a wealthy stepfather named Helen Canfield Peck. Within little more than a year, she and Frank had secured divorces and were married in May 1946.

In or around April 1943, Frank had become a dues-paying member of the Communist Party USA, according to FBI informants within the party. From mid-1946 until fall 1947, Frank wrote a weekly column for a newly founded, almost openly Communist newspaper, the Chicago Star; in 1948 he published 47th Street: Poems, which scholars later said was his best book of verse.

During the summer of that year, Helen Canfield Davis, who had also joined the party, read a magazine article about life in Hawaii. Not long after that, Frank spoke about the islands with Paul Robeson, the well-known singer who shared his pro-Communist views. Robeson had visited Hawaii in March 1948 on a concert tour sponsored by the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) to boost the left-wing Progressive Party. Frank also heard about life in the islands from ILWU president Harry Bridges. Then that fall, Helen received an inheritance of securities worth tens of thousands of dollars from her wealthy stepfather, investment banker Gerald W. Peck. With that windfall, Frank and Helen decided to see for themselves what Hawaii was like for an interracial couple; they packed with an eye toward making this a permanent move and arrived in Honolulu on December 8, 1948.

From their hotel in Waikiki, Frank called ILWU director Jack Hall at Bridges's suggestion. The FBI had a tap on Hall's phone, and this prompted them to watch Frank as well; according to Bureau files, Frank and Helen met Hall in person on December 11. Far more important, though, Frank and Helen thought Hawaii was simply "an amazing place," and that ironically racial prejudice "was directed primarily toward male whites, known as 'haoles.'" As Frank later recounted, "Virtually from the start I had a sense of human dignity. I felt that somehow I had been suddenly freed from the chains of white oppression," and "within a week" he and Helen agreed they wanted to remain in Hawaii permanently, "although I knew it would mean giving up what prestige I had acquired back in Chicago."

By May 1949, Frank began writing an unpaid regular column for the Honolulu Record, a weekly paper that matched his political views. In July the FBI placed his name on the Security Index, a register of the nation's most dangerous supposed subversives, and four months on he was added to DETCOM, the political equivalent of the Bureau's "most wanted" list of top Communists marked for immediate detention in the event of a national emergency.

Frank had realized almost immediately that he would not be able to make a living as a writer in Hawaii, and in January 1950, he started Oahu Paper Company. That same month he and Helen purchased a home in the village of Hauula, thirty miles from Honolulu in northeastern Oahu, for their quickly growing family that included daughter Lynn, who was approaching her first birthday, and son Mark, who would be born ten months later.

The FBI began constant surveillance of the Davises' mail in mid-1950, and in March 1951, a fire at Oahu Paper destroyed thousands of dollars' worth of stock. The Bureau's agents reported that Frank was fully insured, and in June 1952 an informant who had quit Hawaii's Communist Party told agents he had personally collected Frank and Helen's monthly party dues for the last two years. In early 1953 Frank became president of the small Hawaii Civil Rights Congress (HCRC), but within two years the group was "almost inactive." The FBI also noted that on Christmas Day 1955 the Communist Party's national newspaper, the Daily Worker, included an article by Frank on jazz.

By that time, Frank and Helen had a third child, but in April 1956, he closed Oahu Paper, filed for personal bankruptcy, and took a job as a salesman. That summer the family moved from Hauula to Kahaluu. Several months later, Eugene Dennis, general secretary of CPUSA, writing in a national newspaper, and then Frank in his weekly Honolulu Record column, said "there is no longer a Communist Party in Hawaii." Even so, Mississippi senator James O. Eastland, chairman of the U.S. Senate's Internal Security Subcommittee, scheduled a December hearing in Honolulu to probe Soviet activity in the balmy islands. Fearing how Davis might dress down the notoriously racist Eastland in a public hearing, the subcommittee instead subpoenaed Davis to appear at a private executive session, where he took the Fifth Amendment three times when questioned about his CPUSA ties. Just two weeks later, in another Record column, Frank forcefully attacked the Soviet Union for its military invasion of Hungary, calling the move "a tragic mistake from which Moscow will not soon recover."

But Honolulu FBI agents, and their informants, kept their focus on Frank. In mid-1957 he told one supposed friend that Helen had taken up with a visiting musician who was performing in Waikiki. The Bureau quickly took note of Frank's move to the Central YMCA for a month before he and Helen reconciled and the family moved to a house up in Honolulu's Kalihi Valley neighborhood. In February 1958 Helen gave birth to twin daughters, and a year later Frank started a new company, Paradise Papers.

Two years later, agents learned that Helen was working for Avon Products and "works mostly in the evenings making house calls. As a result, subject is now forced to spend most of his evenings babysitting and has little opportunity to contact his former friends outside working hours." That led Honolulu agents to request that Frank be demoted from the top-risk Security Index, but FBI headquarters refused until early 1963, when it ordered Honolulu to interview Frank about his past affiliations, and Frank met with two agents in Kapiolani Park on August 26, 1963. Asked to confirm his CPUSA membership, Frank said the party had not existed in Hawaii for at least seven years and that it would do him no good to acknowledge his past membership. But, Frank added, he would "consort with the devil" in order to advance racial equality. With that the FBI finally closed its file on fifty-seven-year-old Frank Marshall Davis.

Frank busied himself with Paradise Papers, but it, and Helen's work, hardly provided enough money to raise a family. By June 1968, Frank's two eldest children had graduated high school, and that summer Frank earned a modest sum of money by publishing a self-proclaimed sexual autobiography, Sex Rebel: Black—Memoirs of a Gash Gourmet, under the pseudonym "Bob Greene." It began with an introduction, supposedly authored by "Dale Gordon, Ph.D.," which observed that the author may have "strong homosexual tendencies." "Bob Greene" then acknowledged that "under certain circumstances I am bisexual" and stated that "all incidents I have described have been taken from actual experiences" and were not fictionalized. "Bob's" dominant preference was threesomes, and he recounted the intense emotional trauma he experienced years earlier when he learned that a white Chicago couple with whom he had repeatedly enjoyed such experiences were killed in a violent highway accident.

"Bob," or Frank, championed recreational sex, arguing that "this whole concept of sex-for-reproduction-only carries with it contempt for women. It implies that women were created solely to bear children." And Frank did little to hide behind the "Bob Greene" pseudonym with close friends. Four months after the 323-page, $1.75 paperback first appeared, Frank wrote to his old Chicago friend Margaret Burroughs to let her know about the availability of "my thoroughly erotic autobiography." Since it was "what some people call pornography (I call it erotic realism)," it would not be in Chicago bookstores. "You are 'Flo,'" and "you will find out things about me sexually that you probably never suspected—but in this period of wider acceptance of sexual attitudes, I can be more frank than was possible 20 years ago." He closed by telling Burroughs, "I'm still swinging."

In June 1969, Frank moved from his family's home to a small cottage just off Kuhio Avenue in the cramped, three-square-block section of Waikiki known as the Koa Cottages or simply the Jungle. He and Helen divorced the next year, and, as his son Mark would later write, Frank "entered his golden years with glee," given what life in the Jungle offered. As Frank described it, his little studio had a tiny front porch "only two feet from the sidewalk" and "my pad is sort of a meeting area, kind of a town hall to an extent." The Jungle was "a place known for both sex and dope," and was really "a ghetto surrounded by high-rise buildings," but it was without a doubt "the most interesting place I have ever lived." Soon after moving there, Frank became known as the "Keeper of the Dolls," and he later recounted how he had written "a series of short portraits called 'Horizontal Cameos' about women who make their living on their backs."

Two of Frank's closest acquaintances from the early and mid-1970s readily and independently confirm that Stan Dunham was one of Frank's best friends during the years he lived in the Jungle. Dawna Weatherly-Williams, a twenty-two-year-old white woman with a black husband and an interracial son, was by 1970 effectively Frank's adopted daughter and called him "Daddy." She later described Stan as "a wonderful guy." She said he and Frank "had good fun together. They knew each other quite a while before I knew them—several years. They were really good buddies. They did a lot of adventures together that they were very proud of." As of 1970 Stan "came a couple of times a week to visit Daddy," and the two men particularly enjoyed crafting "a lot of limericks that were slightly off-color, and they took great fun in those" and in other discussions of sex, which Dawna would avoid.

Despite what was readily available in the neighborhood, "Frank never really did drugs, though he and Stan would smoke pot together," Dawna remembered. Stan had told Frank about his exceptionally bright interracial grandson well before August 1970. According to Dawna, "Stan had been promising to bring Barry by because we all had that in common—Frank's kids were half-white, Stan's grandson was half-black, and my son was half-black." Decades later she could still picture the afternoon when Stan brought young Barry along to first meet Frank: "Hey, Stan! Oh, is this him?" She remembers that over the next nine or ten years, Stan brought his grandson with him again and again when he went to visit Frank, and as Barry got older, Stan encouraged him to talk with Davis on his own. Obama would remember, "I was intrigued by old Frank," and years later his younger half sister, Maya Cassandra Soetoro, who was born on August 15, 1970, during her brother's visit with their grandparents in Hawaii, described Stanley telling her that Davis "was a point of connection, a bridge if you will, to the larger African American experience for my brother." Once Obama entered politics, Davis's Communist background plus his kinky exploits made him politically radioactive, and Obama would grudgingly admit only to having visited Davis maybe "ten to fifteen times."<sup>22</sup>

Soon after Ann Dunham Soetoro's second child was born, Madelyn Dunham, along with her grandson, flew to Jakarta to see her new granddaughter and to meet Lolo's mother and family. Within weeks nine-year-old Barry was back at Besuki school to start fourth grade. The boy who sat next to him, Widiyanto Hendro, later "said Obama sometimes struggled to make himself understood in Indonesian and at times used hand signals to communicate." The summer in Honolulu had not improved his limited grasp of the Indonesian language, and Lolo's relatives who saw Barry during his fourth-grade school year noted how much chubbier he had become during his now three-plus years in Indonesia.

For more than a year in Honolulu, Lolo Soetoro had served as Barry's off-site stepfather, often roughhousing with him and also playing chess with Stanley at the Dunhams' home. Then, in Jakarta, Barry lived with Lolo on a daily basis for just more than three years, and throughout that time the young boy was impressed with Lolo's knowledge and self-control, especially the latter. "His knowledge of the world seemed inexhaustible," particularly with "elusive things," such as "managing the emotions I felt," Obama would later write. Lolo's own temperament was "imperturbable," and Barry "never heard him talk about what he was feeling. I had never seen him really angry or sad. He seemed to inhabit a world of hard surfaces and well-defined thoughts."

Three decades later, after Obama's memoir Dreams From My Father was published, he would select the brief portrait of Lolo he had written when asked to give a short reading from his book. In that scene, young Barry asks his stepfather if he has ever seen someone killed, and when Lolo reluctantly says yes, Barry asks why. "Because he was weak," Lolo answers. Barry was puzzled. Strong men "take advantage of weakness in other men,” Lolo responds, and asks Barry, “Which would you rather be?” Lolo declares, “Better to be strong. If you can’t be strong, be clever and make peace with someone who’s strong. But always better to be strong yourself. Always.”

In subsequent years, Obama would believe that by 1970–71, Lolo’s acclimation to his new job with Union Oil led Ann to become increasingly disillusioned with her second husband’s evolution into an American-style business executive. Obama admired Lolo’s “natural reserve” if not his “remoteness,” and believed his mother’s growing disappointment with Lolo led her to use an image of his absent father to persuade her son to pursue a life of idealism over comfort. “She paints him as this Nelson Mandela/Harry Belafonte figure, which turns out to be a wonderful thing for me in the sense that I end up having a very positive image” of my father, Obama would later recount. “I had a whole mythology about who he was,” a “mythology that my mother fed me.” But his memories of Lolo from 1970–71 would become dismissive. “His big thing was Johnnie Walker Black, Andy Williams records,” Obama recalled. “I still remember ‘Moon River.’ He’d be playing it, sipping, and playing tennis at the country club. That was his whole thing. I think their expectations diverged fairly rapidly” after 1970.

Some scholars would later credit “the Javanese art of restraint, of not displaying emotions, of never raising your voice,” all of which young Barry witnessed in Lolo, with deeply influencing Obama. Lolo “was as close to a father figure as Obama ever had,” albeit briefly, and “the lessons Obama learned from Jakarta and Lolo,” particularly not “disclosing too much about how one feels,” supplied the human template for Obama’s own practice and appreciation of the “benefit of managing emotions,” a second commentator would conclude.

In subsequent years, when asked about the impact on him of his three-plus years in Indonesia, Obama more often cited an external perception—“I lived in a country where I saw extreme poverty at a very early age”—than any internal conclusions or emotional lessons. “It left a very strong mark on me living there because you got a real sense of just how poor folks can get,” he told one questioner twenty years later. “I was educated in the potential oppressiveness of power and the inequality of wealth,” he told another. “I witnessed firsthand the huge gulf between rich and poor” and “I think it had a tremendous impact on me,” he explained more than once. Such an insistent theme would lead one smart journalist to assert years later that for Obama, “Indonesia was the formative experience.”<sup>23</sup>

Sometime soon after his tenth birthday, in early August 1971, Barry again flew from Jakarta to Honolulu. As he had the previous summer, he would live with his grandparents, and in September he began fifth-grade classes at Punahou School, just a four-block walk up Punahou Street. Families of fifth (and sixth) graders received a “narrative conference report form three times during the school year. No letter grades are given. At the initial conference during the fall, achievement test scores, the class standing and a detailed written evaluation of progress in each subject area will be discussed.” Four major subject areas—Language Arts, Social Studies, Mathematics, and Science—were supplemented by a weekly arts class, a music class, and four sessions of physical education. A year’s tuition was $1,165. With two well-employed parents, plus his grandparents—Madelyn nine months earlier had been named one of Bank of Hawaii’s first two women vice presidents—Obama did not receive any form of financial aid.

For Mathematics and Science, Barry was taught by twenty-five-year-old Hastings Judd Kauwela “Pal” Eldredge, who had graduated from Punahou seven years earlier and earned his undergraduate degree at Brigham Young University. For Language Arts and Social Studies, in 307 Castle Hall, Barry had his homeroom teacher, fifty-six-year-old Mrs. Mabel Hefty, a 1935 graduate of San Francisco State College who had taught at Punahou since 1947 and had spent a recent sabbatical year teaching in Kenya. At Punahou, fifth graders had homework, and after a brief period of Barry tackling it at the Dunhams' dining room table, Stan asked Alec Williamson, his insurance agency friend, to build a desk to go in Barry's small bedroom. In return, Barry offered Williamson a guitar he had lost interest in. (Williamson still had it more than forty years later.)

As an adult, Obama would praise Hefty for making him feel entirely welcome and fully at home among classmates, most of whom had been together since kindergarten or first grade. Hefty split her class into groups of four at shared desks; Barry was with Ronald Loui, Malcolm Waugh, and Mark "Hebs" Hebing, his best friend that year. "Mrs. Hefty was a great teacher," Hebing recalled. "One of the first things we had to do" was "memorize the Gettysburg Address"—"the whole thing." In Hebing's memory forty years later, Barry was the first student to succeed.

There was one other African American student, Joella Edwards, in Barry's fifth-grade class, and she was "shocked" by the arrival of her new classmate. She would remember Barry as "soft-spoken, quiet, and reserved," but he hung back from befriending her in any way. Ronald Loui, like Joella, would recall other classmates teasing both her and Barry with common grade-school rhymes. "There were many times that I looked to Barry for a word, a sign, or signal that we were in this together," Joella later wrote, but none ever came. For the next three years too—grades six, seven, and eight—they would be the only two black students in Punahou's middle school, but no bond ever formed before Joella left Punahou come tenth grade.<sup>24</sup>

In late October 1971, Ann Dunham returned to Honolulu from Jakarta. It is unclear who suggested what to whom, but the timing of her trip was not happenstance because five weeks or so after her arrival in Honolulu, Barack H. Obama Sr. arrived there as well, from Nairobi.

The seven years since Obama Sr. had been forced to leave the United States in July 1964 had been eventful and often painful. Not even a week after his departure, an agitated woman from Newton, Massachusetts, Ida Baker, twice telephoned the Boston INS office to report that her twenty-seven-year-old daughter, Ruth, was so romantically infatuated with Obama she was planning to follow him to Kenya and get married. In late August, Mrs. Baker called again to say that Ruth had flown to Nairobi on August 16. An INS agent checked in with Unitarian reverend Dana Klotzle, as well as an official at Harvard, both of whom reported that Obama already had two wives, plus a child in Honolulu. Mrs. Baker acknowledged that Ruth knew of at least the wife in Kenya, but pursued Obama anyway. The agent concluded the report with: "Suggest we discourage her from further inquiries," because it was "time consuming and to no point where her daughter, an adult and apparently fully competent, is in possession of the information re Obama's marriages."

Ruth Beatrice Baker, a 1958 graduate of Simmons College, had become involved with Obama in April 1964 after meeting him at a party. "He had a flat in Cambridge with some other African students, and I was there almost every day from then on. I felt I loved him very much—he was very charming and there never was a dull moment—but he was not faithful to me, although he told me he loved me too." In June, Obama told her he had to return to Kenya, but said she "should come there, and if I liked the country we could marry. I took him at his word" and bought a one-way plane ticket despite how "devastated" her parents were. But Obama was not at the Nairobi airport to meet her, and a helpful airport employee who knew Obama took her home, made some phone calls, and Obama soon appeared. “We went off and started living together” in a home at 16 Rosslyn Close, but “right from the very start he was drinking heavily, staying out to all hours of the night” and “sometimes hitting me and often verbally insulting me,” Ruth later recounted. “But I was in love and very, very insecure so somehow I hung on.”

On December 24, 1964, she and Obama were formally married; by then his two oldest children, Roy and Rita, were living with him and Ruth in Nairobi. As Barack’s younger sister Zeituni described the highly uncomfortable situation: “the children did not know their father, and this white mother did not speak Luo.” Zeituni moved in with them to try to ease the tensions, but Obama’s deepening alcoholism—Johnnie Walker Black Label was his drink of choice—and abusive behavior made for an unceasingly volatile situation.

Following his return from the U.S., Obama had a job with Shell Oil Company, but five months after Tom Mboya became Kenya’s minister of economic planning and development in December 1964, Obama became a senior economist in that ministry. That involved a move to a house at 101 Hurlingham Road, and within three weeks of Obama’s joining Mboya’s team, the ministry issued a landmark fifty-two-page sessional paper titled “African Socialism and Its Application to Planning in Kenya.” In it, President Jomo Kenyatta declared that under his KANU (Kenya African National Union) Party, Kenya “would develop on the basis of the concepts and philosophy of Democratic African Socialism” and had “rejected both Western Capitalism and Eastern Communism” as models for economic development. Kenyatta said that publication of the paper “should bring to an end all the conflicting, theoretical and academic arguments that have been going on,” for political stability and confidence could not be established “if we continue with debates on theories and doubts about the aims of our society.”

The paper was understood to be primarily Mboya’s own handiwork, and knowledgeable commentators praised it as “a middle-of-the-road approach” aimed at tamping down strong ideological differences within KANU. When students at a left-wing institute voiced critical objections, parliament authorized an immediate takeover of the school, with Mboya seconding the motion to do so. But less than eight weeks later, the East Africa Journal published an eight-page critique of the paper written by Barack H. Obama.

There was no mistaking Obama’s political views. “The question is how are we going to remove the disparities in our country,” and “we may find it necessary to force people to do things which they would not do otherwise.” In addition, “we also need to eliminate power structures that have been built through excessive accumulation so that not only a few individuals shall control a vast magnitude of resources as is the case now.” Obama argued that the sessional paper was too tolerant of such “economic power concentrations” and what was “more important is to find means by which we can redistribute our economic gains to the benefit of all.” Not only should government “tax the rich more” and pursue nationalization; it should do so in an explicitly racial way. “We have to give the African his place in his own country,” he asserted, “and we have to give him this economic power if he is going to develop.” Obama ended with a political call to arms. “Is it the African who owns this country? If he does, then why should he not control the economic means of growth in this country? . . . The government must do something about this and soon.”

Obama’s essay also featured some thinly veiled special pleading, observing that “we do not have many people qualified to take up managerial positions” or “who could participate intelligently in policy-making functions.” What’s more, “the few who are available are not utilized fully.” Obama almost certainly believed he deserved a more senior job in the government. Not surprisingly, his employment at the ministry came to an end within months after his searing article was published. With that came another household move, this time to city council housing at 16A Woodley Estate.

Sometime soon after that, a drunken Obama insisted on taking the wheel of his friend Adede Abiero’s new car and promptly wrecked it. Abiero died in the crash. Obama suffered only minor injuries, but his longtime friend Leo Odera Omolo later said, “Barack never really recovered from that. It had a strong impact.” Even so, it did not lead to any increased self-discipline or sobriety. In November 1965 Obama contacted Harvard, seeking the university’s support for a return to the U.S. so he could present his Ph.D. dissertation. But the registrar’s office rebuffed his request, saying he had failed to register its title with Harvard’s Economics Department. Ruth later recalled Obama telling her that his dissertation materials had disappeared following a burglary in which their television was stolen, but in any event Obama failed to pursue the matter further with Harvard, although in Kenya he would often declare himself to be Dr. Obama.

On November 28, 1965, Ruth and Obama’s first child, Mark Okoth Obama, was born, but their home life remained fraught with drunken abuse. In 1966 there was increased tension in Kenya’s domestic politics, beginning when left-wing Luo vice president Oginga Odinga broke from KANU and formed a new opposition party, the Kenya People’s Union (KPU). That was seen as a “direct challenge to Kenyatta,” and days later KANU pushed through two constitutional amendments, one mandating new parliamentary elections and another enlarging the president’s national security powers to allow for detention without trial.

Kenyatta’s security services turned an increasingly hostile eye toward foreigners, and particularly Americans, who were in Odinga’s political orbit. The American-born wife of the first Kenyan to attain a Ph.D., Julius Gikonyo Kiano, was charged with disloyalty and expelled; some months later the focus was on a young white American woman from southern Illinois, Sandra Hansen, who had come to Nairobi as a Northwestern University undergraduate interested in African literature. While taking classes at what by then was University College Nairobi, she met a Luo student who invited her to a party at which “the center of attention,” as she recounted years later, was a somewhat older Luo man, Barack Obama. Sandy found him “funny, charming,” and “extremely charismatic,” and they “became fast friends and spent a lot of time together” during 1966 and 1967, by which time Hansen was teaching at a boys’ school. “His drinking started to be more of a problem,” she recollected, but he “loved music, dancing and dressing well.”

Obama was the first person Hansen turned to when Kenyan security officers told her she had seventy-two hours to leave the country or be arrested. Obama accompanied her to see some official in the security ministry, who displayed an extensive file they had collected on her. “I think, Sandy, you’ve got to go,” Obama told her. When her day of departure arrived, Obama drove her to the airport and walked her to the boarding area. Almost fifty years later, Hansen’s memories of what Mark Obama would later call “my father’s warm and gracious side” are a partial counterpoint to the alcoholic rages that Ruth and his African children endured. But that side was memorialized in an indelible way too, even if for half a century only the tiniest number of people knew the story. Upon leaving Nairobi, Hansen stopped in London, where she saw her Luo boyfriend, Godfrey Kassim Owango, like Obama an economist and later chairman of Kenya's Chambers of Commerce. Back in Illinois, nine months later, Hansen gave birth to a son. She named him not for his father, but for the Kenyan man she most admired and remembered, Barack Obama.<sup>25</sup>

Few other people's experiences with Obama mirrored Sandy Hansen's. In September 1966, Obama had found new employment, with the Central Bank of Kenya, but he was terminated nine months later. Then Ruth, fed up with his violence, fled with one-year-old Mark to the United States. Obama flew across the Atlantic and persuaded her to return to Kenya. "He was a man I had a very strong passion for," Ruth told Sally Jacobs years later. "I loved him despite everything," but Obama's behavior hardly changed for the better. In September 1967, he secured a new job as a senior officer at the Kenya Tourist Development Corporation (KTDC), but within six weeks there were reports that he had drunkenly driven his vehicle into a milk cart one day at 4:00 A.M. By the new year, Ruth was pregnant with their second child; David Opiyo Obama was born on September 11, 1968, at Nairobi Hospital.

Sometime in late 1968 Neil Abercrombie and Andy "Pake" Zane, two of Obama's best buddies from the University of Hawaii, came through Nairobi as part of a months-long tour through Europe, the Middle East, and East Africa. "He showed us around, we stayed at his house, partied, had a good time," and met Ruth, Roy, Rita, and young Mark, Zane recalled more than forty years later, with dozens of photographs from that visit spread out before him. Abercrombie thought "he seemed very frustrated . . . that he was being underutilized" at KTDC. As Zane recalled to Sally Jacobs, "The one thing Barack wanted was to do something for his country, but he felt he could not" accomplish anything significant at KTDC. "He was angry, but it was contained." Yet Abercrombie recalled that "he was drinking constantly. It was as though the drinking was now part of his existence." But in retrospect, one other thing stood out in both friends' memories: Obama never asked about his American son or his ex-wife Ann.

At about 1:00 P.M. on Saturday, July 5, 1969, Tom Mboya was shot and killed at close range outside Chhani's Pharmacy on Nairobi's Government Road. Just moments earlier, Barack Obama had seen Mboya's car parked on a yellow line in the street and had stopped to talk and joke with his friend for four or five minutes. "You will get a ticket," he had warned.

A gunman was arrested, though it was commonly believed that Mboya's assassination was ordered by someone at or near the peak of Kenya's government. On September 8, Obama was the prosecution's final witness at the gunman's trial, testifying about Mboya's final sidewalk chat. The defendant was convicted and soon hanged, but that resolved nothing. Far more than one man had died on Government Road, for Kenya's future as a nonviolent, multiethnic, multiparty democracy died with Tom Mboya.

In June 1970, Obama was fired by the KTDC because of serial dishonesty in matters large and small. Some months later, he had another drunken car crash, and this time he suffered at least one badly injured leg that required prolonged hospitalization. Still, by the early fall of 1971, he was planning a trip to the U.S., perhaps in part because he expected that Ruth would flee from him again, this time permanently.

Rita Auma Obama, who was eleven years old by the time of her father's 1971 departure, recalled him speaking of her American brother and how Ann "would send his school reports to my father." Her older brother Roy, later Abon'go Malik, would later remember seeing "an old briefcase" that contained "the divorce letters, and Ann Dunham's letters." Even Ruth told Sally Jacobs how "very proud" Obama was of his American son. "He had a little picture of him on his tricycle with a hat on his head. And he kept that picture in every house that we lived in. He loved his son.”<sup>26</sup>

Barack Obama Sr. arrived back in Honolulu almost ten years after he had left there with glowing credentials to earn a Harvard Ph.D. and then help guide Kenya’s economic future. Now he had no doctoral degree, no job, and a visible limp. How he financed the trip remains a mystery. He planned to stay for a month, and the Dunhams had sublet an apartment downstairs from theirs where Obama could sleep.

Madelyn’s younger sister Arlene Payne, who also was in Hawaii at that time along with her lifelong companion, Margery Duffey, later told Janny Scott, “I had the sense then, as I had earlier, that both Madelyn and Stanley were impressed with him in some way. They were very respectful to him” and “they liked to listen to what he had to say.”

How Ann viewed Obama’s visit, and whether he did suggest to his married ex-spouse that he would welcome her and their son joining him in Kenya, is unknown. Obama still referred to her as Anna, and he brought along for his ten-year-old son a trio of Kenyan trinkets: “three wooden figurines—a lion, an elephant, and an ebony man in tribal dress beating a drum.” Ann, Stan, and Madelyn had prepared Barry for the visit with intensified renditions of the upbeat themes Ann had insistently sounded during Barry’s earlier years. “My father was this very imposing, almost mythic figure,” he recounted years later. “In my mind he was the smartest, most sophisticated person that my maternal grandparents had ever met.” Then, when they first met, his father entirely lived up to his advance billing, at least in the son’s subsequent retelling of it. “He was imposing and he was impressive, and he did change the space around him when he walked into a room,” Barry recalled. “His capacity to establish an image for himself of being in command was in full force, and it had an impressive effect on a ten-year-old boy.”

“He was an intimidating character,” the son told a subsequent interviewer. “He had this big, deep, booming voice and always felt like he was right about everything.” All told, it “was a very powerful moment for me,” but he also confessed later that his father’s visit was deeply unsettling. “If you’ve got this person who suddenly shows up and says, ‘I’m your father, and I’m going to tell you what to do,’ and you don’t have any sense of who this person is, and you don’t necessarily have a deep bond of trust with him, I don’t think your reaction is, ‘How do I get him to stay?’ I think the reaction may be ‘What’s this guy doing here and who does he think he is?’”

One day during the first two weeks, Ann told her son that Mabel Hefty had invited his father to speak to her and Pal Eldredge’s fifth-grade classes about Kenya. That news made Barry nervous, but Obama Sr. carried off the appearance in fine form, and Barry was enormously relieved. Years later, Eldredge could still picture the scene: “He seemed to be real proud, right at his side, kind of holding on to his dad’s arm.” Barry’s classmate Dean Ando recalled it similarly: “All I remember is Barry was just so happy that day it was incredible . . . the dad and Barry had the same smile.” Young Obama remembered Eldredge telling him, “You’ve got a pretty impressive father,” and a classmate saying, “Your dad is pretty cool.”

A few days after Obama’s appearance at Punahou, he took his son to a Honolulu Symphony concert featuring the famous jazz pianist Dave Brubeck, who was joined by his sixteen- and nineteen-year-old sons, Daniel and Christopher, on bass and drums. It was a grand event. The Honolulu Chorale joined the symphony and the family trio to perform Brubeck’s new oratorio, The Light in the Wilderness. Hawaii’s junior U.S. senator, Daniel K. Inouye, served as narrator for the piece.

For Christmas, Obama gave Barry his first basketball. But the end of the month was fast approaching.

Obama failed to look up his old Honolulu friends Neil Abercrombie and Andy “Pake” Zane, and when he was with his son, “he never pushed me to speak,” Barry later recounted. “It was only during the course of that month—by the end of that month—that I think I started to open myself up to understanding who he was. But then he was gone, and I never saw him again.”<sup>27</sup>

Right after New Year’s, Ann applied for a new U.S. passport in order to “return home” to Jakarta on January 14, 1972. She listed her stay there as “indefinite,” but within a month she made the first of three requests that spring 1972 for UDub to send copies of her old 1961–62 transcript to University of Hawaii’s graduate school. In Honolulu, Barry immediately started putting his favorite Christmas present to good use, playing basketball with his good friend Mark Hebing, among others, sometimes at several courts on King Street only a block or so south of his grandparents’ apartment building.

His math and science teacher, Pal Eldredge, would remember fifth-grade Barry as “a happy kid. He had a good sense of humor and was smiling all the time,” as virtually every photo of young Obama from that time confirms. “He was a rascal too—he had a little spunk to him,” Eldredge adds, but “he was always smiling” and was “a good student—he related well with everybody.” Obama Sr.’s old buddy Neil Abercrombie, now at work on a Ph.D. dissertation and holding down a variety of odd jobs, would run into Stan Dunham and Stan’s grandson several times that spring. “When I would see them, Stanley would offer how bright Barry was and how well he was doing in school. He had ambitions for little Barry,” Abercrombie remembered. “It was obvious to everybody and certainly must have been obvious to little Barry that his grandfather not only loved him but, more importantly, liked him and liked having him around and liked him as a pal.”

By September 1972, when Barry began sixth grade, Ann and now-two-year-old Maya had returned to Honolulu from Jakarta so that Ann could begin graduate study in anthropology that fall at UH, thanks to a grant from the Asia Foundation. Ann and both of her children lived in apartment #3 at 1839 Poki Street, only one short block west of Punahou. A classmate who sat beside Barry remembered a “chubby-cheeked boy” who was “articulate, bright, funny, and kind.” Sixth-grade coursework added “oceanography, electricity and atomic structure” to the science class and also introduced students to “the use and abuse of drugs.” In addition, one week at Camp Timberline gave the class an opportunity to try archery and horseback riding; four decades later homeroom teacher Betty Morioka still had a photograph showing a pensive Barry in an oversized gray T-shirt, a rare instance of a picture in which he was not smiling broadly. Young Obama’s clearest memory was of a Jewish camp counselor who described the time he had spent in Israel.

Not long after the end of that sixth-grade year, Ann, Madelyn, Barry, and Maya set off on a long tour of the American West. They first flew to Seattle—Ann’s first time back there, or anywhere else on the mainland, since her return to Hawaii eleven years earlier—and then headed south down the West Coast. From Disneyland, in Southern California, they headed east to the Grand Canyon, then to Kansas City, where Madelyn’s sister Arlene was teaching at the University of Missouri. From there it was north to Chicago, then back westward to Yellowstone National Park and San Francisco before returning to Honolulu. Ann told a friend the trek was “pretty exhausting” since “we traveled by bus most of the way.” Her son remembered chasing bison at Yellowstone, but also the “shrunk heads—real shrunk heads” at Chicago’s Field Museum. “That was actually the highlight. That was almost as good as Disneyland.”

As summer ended, Ann wrote to an old friend in Seattle to say that “I do hope to spend most of my time for the next few years in the islands, since my son Barry is doing very well in school here, and I hate to take him abroad again till he graduates, which won't be for another 6 years." In seventh grade Barry began foreign language (French) instruction, and his other classes would also now be taught by departmental specialists. Barry's homeroom was in 102 Bishop Hall with Joyce Kang; a yearbook photo of the group labeled "Mixed Races of America" declared, "Whether you're a [Sarah] Tmora, a [Pam] Ching, or an Obama, we share the same world." A girl who had pre-algebra and other seventh- and eighth-grade classes with Barry remembered him as "boisterously funny and a big, good-hearted tease" who had "a variety of friends and activities," one of which was now tennis. Throughout these years, Barry spent a good deal of time at Punahou's tennis courts, and one classmate, Kristen B. Caldwell, later wrote and spoke about one incident that remained painfully clear in her memory.

A chart of who would play whom in some tournament had just been posted by Tom Mauch, Punahou's tennis pro. Mauch, then in his early forties, had come to Punahou in 1967 from Northern California's East Bay. Barry and other students were running their fingers along the chart when Mauch told him, "Don't touch that, you'll get it dirty!" In Caldwell's memory, "he singled him out, and the implication was absolutely clear: Barry's hands weren't grubby; the message was that his darker skin would somehow soil" the diagram. "I could tell it upset Barry," she recalled, but "he said, 'What do you mean by that?' with just a perfect amount of iciness to get his point across." Mauch fumbled for a response. "Nothing—I was making a joke."

Only once, in 1995, would Obama himself expressly refer to the incident with the tennis pro. In subsequent years, aside from one unspecific allusion, Obama never mentioned the exchange to any interviewers. Contacted forty years later and asked for the very first time if he remembered Obama, Tom Mauch refused to talk about his years at Punahou.

Barry's eighth-grade year featured one semester of Government and Living in a World of Change and one of Christian Ethics instead of social studies. "Biblical faith is placed in the context of the world in which we live" while examining "the relationship between faith and the everyday experiences of life," Punahou's catalog explained. For French, Barry had his former homeroom teacher, now Joyce Kang Torrey.

In the fall, a still-chubby Barry played defensive end on the intermediate football team coached by Pal Eldredge, his fifth-grade teacher. According to Punahou's catalog, the yearlong science class stressed "human physiology and health . . . drug and sex education are part of the curriculum as the need and interest are manifested." Toward the end of the school year, on April 30, an evening open house called "Science '75" featured eighth graders' second-semester science projects. Barry's was titled "Effects of Music on Plants," though his friend Mark Bendix's "The Effect of Aerosol Spray on Plants" was probably easier to execute.<sup>28</sup>

During Barry's eighth-grade year, Ann finished her graduate coursework, passed her Ph.D. qualifying exams, and gave up the Poki Street apartment to return to Indonesia with four-year-old Maya. She and Lolo had informally separated in mid-1974, and Ann would later record that Lolo did not contribute to her or Maya's support after that time, though her relationship with both him and his parents remained caring and cordial. With her departure from Honolulu, Barry moved back in with his grandparents, who in 1973 had moved from their twelfth-floor apartment to unit 1008 in the same building. Barry spent the summer of 1975 in Indonesia with Ann and Maya before returning to Honolulu in August before his ninth-grade year.

Punahou spoke of its four high school years as “the Academy,” and many new students entered for ninth grade, bringing each annual class to 400 to 425 students, or twenty homerooms of twenty students apiece. Barry’s new homeroom teacher was Eric Kusunoki, a 1967 Punahou graduate who remembered calling the official roll the very first day and having Obama respond, “Just call me Barry.” The biggest change from prior grades was the Academy’s unusual six-day variable modular schedule that principal Win Healy had instituted four years earlier: days were A-B-C-D-E-F, not Monday through Friday. That arrangement left students with considerable free time between classes on some days, and Barry usually devoted as much of that time as possible to pickup basketball.

“He always had a basketball in his hands and was always looking for a pickup game,” classmate Larry Tavares remembered. Barry later recalled having his worst grade ever—a D in French—that year, and his other classes ranged from speech to boys’ chorus to one on Europe. Classmate Whitey Kahooohanohano recounts that “Barry was happy-go-lucky. A prankster. A tease. He liked to have fun. I remember him giggling a lot. He was real pleasant” and “smart.” Another, Sharon Yanagi, indicates that Barry’s basic persona had not changed at all from previous years: “he was always smiling.”

During his ninth-grade year, Barry began a serious friendship with two older African American students, senior Tony Peterson and junior Rik Smith. Tony was only in his second year at Punahou, but as one younger student stressed, “people looked up to Tony. He was a real smart guy.” One day a week, Tony, Rik, and Barry would meet up on the steps of Cooke Hall, right outside the attendance office. Tony later said that much of their interaction involved “standing around trying to impress each other with how smart we are.”

Although biracial, Rik already firmly identified as black and felt that racism most definitely existed in Hawaii. “Punahou was an amazing school,” he said years later, “but it could be a lonely place.” In his mind, “those of us who were black did feel isolated.” Tony did not entirely share Rik’s attitude. “For black people, there was not a lot of discrimination against us.” The three of them “talked about race but not, I thought, out of a deep sense of pain,” he explained.

One spring morning, to help with an English assignment, Tony recorded some of the trio’s conversation. Rik asked “What is time?” and fourteen-year-old Barry responded that “time is just a collection of human experiences combined so that they make a long, flowing stream of thought.” At the end of that school year, Barry wrote in Tony’s 1976 Oahuan yearbook: “Tony, man, I am sure glad I got to know you before you left. All those Ethnic Corner trips to the snack bar and playing ball made the year a lot more enjoyable, even though the snack bar trips cost me a fortune.” Playing off of some prior conversation, Barry also told Tony to “get that law degree. Some day when I am a pro basketballer, and I want to sue my team for more money, I’ll call on you.”<sup>29</sup>

Ann had intended for Barry to once again come to Indonesia for the summer. She and Maya had been living with Lolo’s mother in Jogjakarta rather than the capital so she could pursue her doctoral research. “What an enjoyable city it is, especially as compared with Jakarta!” she wrote her University of Hawaii dissertation adviser, Alice Dewey. But in May, she had changed their plans, and in mid-June she and Maya flew to Honolulu, staying at Dewey’s home while Barry continued to live with his grandparents. Stanley was still working at the insurance agency, but his two best friends there, Alec Williamson and Rolf Nordahl, could tell how unfulfilling and oftentimes unpleasant he found the work. “During the day, there wasn't a whole lot of business" with potential customers not at home, Nordahl recalled, and he and Stan would chat and often at lunchtime go make sandwiches at the Dunhams' apartment. More than once, Rolf heard Stan mention the Spencer Tracy–Katharine Hepburn film Guess Who's Coming to Dinner. Released in December 1967, it starred the black Bahamian American actor Sidney Poitier as Dr. John Wade Prentice of Hawaii, whose white fiancée brings him home to meet her parents. "Well, I lived it," Stan would explain.

On evenings when the two men were finished with customer calls, they often went to Bob's Soul Food Place or the Family Inn bar on Honolulu's Smith Street, in the city's well-known red-light district. "Stanley did not have a great deal of success" selling life insurance, mainly because of his "call reluctance," Nordahl explained. "There's nothing worse than calling somebody and wanting to talk to them about life insurance . . . it's the last thing anybody wants to talk about." But Stanley was committed to sticking with the job and wanted to "come up to snuff with Madelyn . . . I know that bothered him." To Nordahl, "he spoke very fondly of her" and gave no sign that his job difficulties altered his personality. "He always had a joke" and seemed like "a very, very happy man—always a big smile. I wouldn't say that I saw any unhappiness at all."

Stanley also "wanted to learn more about black people," Rolf knew, and that influenced his and his grandson's ongoing visits with Frank Marshall Davis. Barry later described Frank's "big dewlapped face and an ill-kempt gray Afro that made him look like an old, shaggy-maned lion. He would read us his poetry whenever we stopped by his house, sharing whiskey with Gramps out of an emptied jelly jar." Stan's close relationship with Frank also generated his own interest in writing poetry, something he regularly talked about with Alec Williamson.

"He loved science fiction," Williamson recalled, and "we talked a lot of politics." Stan "did not like Nixon," would "argue the liberal side," and often brought his grandson by the office during his late middle school years. Barry "was a good kid . . . well-educated . . . I liked him." Stan was indeed "something of a poet," and more than thirty-five years later Williamson still had copies of, and indeed could recite, two deeply poignant ones:

Life

*Oh, where have they gone
Those days of our youth
With those wonderful dreams
Of worlds to be won
When life was a search
For the ultimate truth
Full of adventure
And, Oh, so much fun
Win all our battles
We just couldn't fail
For then right was right
It just had to prevail
Then came life's middle years*

*Impending old age with all of its fears
The many missed chances
The oft shed tears
Till hope at last dwindles
And disappears
Then comes rebirth
For 'tis Nature's way
The circle's full round
Life's dawned a new day
Erase life's slate clean
But sell not your shares
For hope still survives
In our children, and in theirs
And if not, SO WHAT!*

—STANLEY A. DUNHAM

The second, brief, untitled one spoke to home:

*Man can span the oceans of space
Split the atom. Win the race
But all is for naught when against his wishes
He has to help with the dinner dishes.*

—STANLEY A. DUNHAM

Williamson and Nordahl agreed that “Stan was a great guy,” and “we had a lot of good times together.” Pal Eldredge at Punahou had exactly the same impression. Both Stan and Madelyn came to “most of the activities” and “any kind of performances we had.” Stan “was a fun guy” and “they were always here with” Barry, Eldredge remembered. “It was always good to be around him because he was always joking with people.” Ann’s mentor Alice Dewey felt similarly: Stanley was a “very charming and fun person, and very affectionate.”

Madelyn, particularly at work, was far less outgoing and seemingly far less happy, though her professional success far eclipsed her husband’s. One young management trainee from the 1970s, who later became Bank of Hawaii’s vice chairman, bluntly acknowledged, “I was afraid of her. She definitely intimidated me. If you were new and still learning, she was like a drill sergeant.” Another young man remembered similarly: “We were afraid of her because she was so gruff.” Two women had comparable experiences. To Naomi Komenaka, Madelyn was “demanding, sharp and feisty”; to Myrtle Choan, one of Madelyn’s direct deputies, “she was a tough lady. Tough, tough lady . . . I was so afraid of her. I called her Mrs. Dunham, never by her first name.”

At home, though, Madelyn was as devoted to Barry as Stan was; Barry called her “Tut,” with a long “oo” sound, after a common Hawaiian term for grandmother, tutu. Her brother Charles recalled her telling him well before Barry’s high school years that he was a genius; on one of the few occasions she ever spoke publicly about her grandson, she remembered him as “just a basketball-happy little boy. . . . I think his ambition when he was young was to be a pro basketball player, but he didn’t grow tall enough.”

In their modest apartment, Barry’s tiny bedroom was hardly six feet by eight feet, according to Stan’s brother Ralph, who visited them in Hawaii at that time. “It was about the size of a jail cell.” Stan took Ralph along to his regular chess and checkers club, and also took him to meet Frank Marshall Davis. Along with Stan and young Barry, “we had a terrific time,” Ralph recounted years later. Even close family members did not understand why Stan and Madelyn remained in the small apartment at 1617 South Beretania. Madelyn’s brother Charles believed Stan thought it was perfectly fine, but that his sister did not like it. It was a “pretty depressing” building and “not where a bank vice president would live.”<sup>30</sup>

For Barry’s tenth-grade year, Literature & Writing used the traditional Warriner’s English Grammar and Composition. A full year of science was required, as was at least one semester of a course on Asia. Tony Peterson had graduated, and seemingly taking his place for Barry was Keith Kakugawa, now a senior, with whom Obama had been acquainted since Keith first arrived at Punahou three years earlier. With a half-Japanese, half-native Hawaiian father who worked as an exterminator, and a half-black and half-Native American mother, Kakugawa personified the islands’ rich mix of ethnicities. Bright, an excellent athlete, particularly in track, and blessed with an excellent memory, Kakugawa lived well west of Honolulu in working-class Pearl City, just north of the famous Pearl Harbor navy base.

Obama later wrote that Keith possessed “a warmth and brash humor” that led to “an easy friendship,” but around Punahou, opinions on Kakugawa varied widely. Tony Peterson thought “his social skills weren’t the best,” and Pal Eldredge felt “he had a chip on his shoulder.” Keith’s longtime friend David Craven later commented that “Barry was the nice guy he hung around with,” but Keith’s best friend at Punahou, Marc Haine, remembered him as “a popular athlete, a popular figure.”

To Kakugawa, fifteen-year-old Barry was “very, very quiet” and “very, very shy . . . I wouldn’t say introverted, but he was just a very shy, cautious kid.” Keith took a great liking to Stan Dunham. “Gramps was so great to all of us,” he recounted years later. “He was everyone’s grandfather.”

Tenth grade was also the first time Barry played on an actual basketball team. Punahou’s junior varsity one was coached by 1961 Punahou graduate Norbie Mendez and played five preseason and fourteen regular season games between December 1976 and February 1977. Barry’s friends Mark Bendix, Greg Orme, Tom Topolinski, Joe Hansen, and Mark Heflin were also on the team. Obama never cracked the starting lineup, but he ended up as the third leading scorer as the team won nine of its fourteen official games.

Yearbook photos that year show Barry with a bushy Afro and sometimes more than a little extra weight. A classroom picture captures a decidedly chubby Obama, whereas the ones for JV basketball and concert choir, perhaps taken later, show a visibly more mature fifteen-year-old. Sometime midyear Barry also spent significant time reading The Autobiography of Malcolm X. Keith Kakugawa remembers Obama pointing out the book in Punahou’s library, and Mark Hebing recalls Barry recommending it to him. Barry would later acknowledge absorbing the book that year, saying that Malcolm’s “repeated acts of self-creation spoke to me . . . forged through sheer force of will.”

One Saturday evening sometime in the late spring of 1977, Kakugawa, Mike Ramos, a junior athlete on Punahou’s varsity basketball team, Obama, and fellow sophomore Greg Orme headed to a party at Schofield Barracks, a large U.S. Army base almost twenty-five miles northwest of Punahou. Most of Oahu's African Americans were from military families, and the people at this party were predominantly black men and women several years older than the teenage Punahou quartet. Barry didn't yet drink, but the group stopped to buy a case of Heineken on the way. Once there, the Punahou youngsters were not welcomed with open arms by everyone present.

"The place was packed" and "it was dark," Ramos remembered. He was more than a year older than Obama, and he was from a Filipino family of modest means; he had first met Barry a year earlier at a party where they discovered they were both fans of jazz saxophonist Grover Washington Jr. Orme was white, and he had known Obama since their seventh-grade year. Barry had passed along his interest in jazz to several friends that year. But at the Schofield party "everyone else, except the four of us, was dressed for a night at Studio 54, and we were dressed for a luau at the beach," Kakugawa later said.

Especially if they were haoles, Punahou students were looked upon "as the snobs, the rich kids" in many circles on Oahu. "Everyone on the island treated you differently once they knew you were from Punahou," Keith said. Ramos remembers that Kakugawa, who was known to some of the people at the party, took offense whenever a verbal putdown of Punahou was uttered, and Ramos also remembered Keith "doing a bunch of trash talking" that night in response. Kakugawa admitted "we got in an argument because we were from Punahou," and the four of them were headed for the door in less than an hour.

Ramos was confused. "I was having a pretty good time"—"Why are we leaving?" For Orme, it was the first time he had been one of the few white people in a mostly black setting, and during the car ride back, he mentioned that to Barry. "One of us said that being the different guys in the room had awakened a little bit of empathy to what he must feel all the time at school," Orme later recalled. Ramos agreed. "For the haole guys in our group, it was a kind of eye-opening experience for them." But for whatever reason, Obama was upset by Orme's comment—"he clearly didn't appreciate that," Greg remembered. Kakugawa thought Barry was bothered that one or more girls at the party had refused to dance with him, but Barry had been the youngest person there. Years later, he would describe the evening as a racial coming-of-age moment for him, but Ramos and especially Orme, who would become Obama's closest friend during their two remaining years at Punahou, never heard or saw anything of the sort. Barry "would bring up worldly topics far beyond his years. But we never talked race."

In late April or early May 1977, not long after the party, Ann and Maya returned to Indonesia so that Ann could resume her dissertation fieldwork. Keith Kakugawa starkly remembers the day they departed. Ann told her son she was headed "home," and "Barry was disgusted" after Ann and Maya were dropped off at the airport. "You know what, man? I'm really tired of this," Obama complained. Kakugawa told his friend that Ann was just doing her job, but Barry almost spat out his response: "Well, then, let her stay there and do it." Keith's buddy Jack McAdoo said he remembers that day too and recalls that "there was a lot of pain there" for Obama. Kakugawa knew that Barry "was going through a tough time" that spring and was experiencing a lot of "inner turmoil," but "it wasn't a race thing . . . Barry's biggest struggles then were missing his parents. His biggest struggles were his feelings of abandonment. The idea that his biggest struggle was race is bullshit." The crux of what his friend was wrestling with was "the hurt he felt about being abandoned by his mother" on top of his long-absent father.

In later years, Obama would almost always suppress his past feelings about his by-then-deceased mother, but occasionally a highly revealing comment could slip out. "When I was a kid, I don't remember having, I think, one birthday party the whole time I was growing up," and he admitted, "I spent a childhood adrift.” But most of Barry’s classmates that spring were not aware of what Orme, Ramos, and especially Kakugawa could sense. “I was probably the only one who didn’t always see him smiling,” Keith recounted. To Kelli Furushima, an attractive Asian classmate whom Obama sought out at the once-per-class-cycle chapel sessions, Barry seemed “a happy guy, comfortable in his skin.” She enjoyed his “casually flirting” with her; “he was very friendly, very warm and had a great sense of humor.” When the school year was ending and everyone was signing each other’s 1977 yearbooks, Obama’s note on Kelli’s copy likewise reflected no angst: “Our relationship is still young so I am looking forward to picking it up where it left off next year. Your [sic] a small but dynamic person. Have a beautiful summer and see you next year. Love, Barry.”<sup>31</sup>

Obama would not turn sixteen years old until August 4, 1977, so getting a summer job was a challenge, though years later he would say he had worked bagging groceries. But that birthday brought with it a driver’s license, and he began driving Stan’s reddish-brown Ford Granada, a car he would look back on with no fondness. One day that summer Keith Kakugawa and Marc Haine took Barry out paddling—Hawaiian for canoeing—and after they were back on dry land, beer was at hand. “I distinctly remember cajoling Barry into getting drunk with us.” He said, “I don’t drink,” but Keith corrected him: “You’re gonna drink.” Kakugawa boasted, “I was the one responsible for making Barry take his first drink, but Marc Haine was the one that handed it to him.”

When Barry’s junior year began, a full-year course in American history was mandatory. Barry had the regular class, not the advanced placement version, taught by his classmate Kent Torrey’s father Bob, who knew Barry pretty well but remembers him as “a totally average” student. Another full year of English was required, but in addition to American Literature, the students chose from Punahou’s almost collegelike breadth of electives. With the standardized college-entry SAT exam scheduled for November, the fall kicked off with eight weeks or so of Saturday-morning preparation classes; instructor Bill Messer recalled Obama as “affable and pleasant” but “oddly quiet in class.” Barry later claimed that “art history was one of my favorite subjects in high school,” but he also took drama. He and four classmates produced a short film they titled The Narc Squad, a parody of The Mod Squad. Linne Nickelsen, who had “long, straight blond hair and a closet full of miniskirts,” played the Peggy Lipton character, and Barry imitated the African American actor Clarence Williams III. Plenty of surfing footage was included, and Barry added a dashiki to his bushy Afro. Nickelsen later took credit for luring “Barry out of his dashiki for the pool party scene. . . . I must admit to being disappointed at not having received even passing credit for instigating that disrobing.” No screenings of the film have been reported for decades.

Basketball season began in December. Barry and his closest buddies had been playing ball whenever and wherever possible, including evenings and weekends, sometimes going up against adult men and occasionally heading up to UH’s Manoa campus to play there. Outside of basketball season, Punahou’s mandatory after-school phys ed class was another venue for practicing “hack league” skills. Classmates and teachers all unanimously agreed that basketball was Barry’s real passion during all of his high school years, but that December Obama was relegated to the number-two, A-level varsity squad rather than making the cut for the top AA team. Greg Orme and Mark Bendix were also on the A team, but second-class status meant their practices were held every morning from 6:30 A.M. to 8:00 A.M. Once games got under way, the A ballers stumbled to an unmemorable record of seven wins and ten losses. A story in the student newspaper Ka Punahou asserted that the players were “having a good time” nonetheless. Coach Jim Iams insisted the season was “successful,” but decades later, Iams had no recollection of Obama being on his team.

By the fall of his junior year, Barry was a more memorable member of another Punahou assemblage, known as the Choom Gang. It’s not clear when Obama first started to smoke cigarettes, but his friend Mark Hebing can picture Barry coming out of his grandparents’ apartment building on their way to go bodysurfing at Sandy Beach, east of Honolulu, carrying only a towel and a carton of cigarettes. Stan Dunham smoked three packs a day—“always Philip Morris,” his brother Ralph recalled—and Madelyn smoked even more. But the Choom Gang didn’t choom tobacco, they choomed pakalolo, the Hawaiian word for marijuana.

Barry’s friend Mark Bendix was seen as “the ringleader” of the group. Tom “Topo” Topolinski, who was half-Polish, half-Chinese, explained that “everything centered around him. He always had the idea first, or he had a stronger opinion, or he wanted to do something rowdier. That was Bendix.” The other core members—Russ Cunningham, Joe Hansen, Kenji Salz, Mark “Hebs” Hebing, Greg Orme, Mike Ramos, and eventually Wayne Weightman and Rob Rask—enjoyed drinking beer, playing basketball, bodysurfing when the waves were up, and getting high whenever they had enough money. When they did, Bendix, Topo, and/or Barry would head over to Puck’s Alley on the east side of University Avenue where Ray Boyer, their go-to drug dealer, worked at Mama Mia’s pizzeria.

Boyer was haole, but just as visibly, he was gay. “Let’s just say if he was closeted, he wasn’t fooling anybody,” Hebs said later. The Choom Gang called him “Gay Ray.” He was twenty-nine years old, and he lived in an abandoned bus inside a deserted warehouse in Kakaako, a then-desolate neighborhood west of Waikiki. Topo remembered that the scene there “was very scary. . . . No one in their right mind would live there.” Ray also had another main interest: porn. “I think he was looking to convert some people,” Topo said years later. “He would bring them back to his bus and stone ’em, with porn movies on—they were heterosexual porn movies, but it was still really creepy.” But Ray always had good-quality pakalolo on hand, so the connection was important. “Ray freaked me out. I was afraid of the guy,” Topolinski said. “But he did befriend us, and he was our connection . . . there were times where he would take us to a drive-in movie. . . . He partied with us, but there was something about him that never made me feel comfortable.”

“We were potheads. We loved our beer,” Topo said, but the Choom Gang was not entirely about getting drunk or high. “We loved basketball so much that we couldn’t get enough of it,” and that was especially true of Barry. “For us, it was just all fun and games and basketball and hanging out, listening to music and going to the beach,” Topo emphasized. Bendix’s mother taught at Punahou, and they would quietly borrow her car on days when they had a break in their Academy schedules or when they simply decided to cut class. “We could have been easily terminated for what we did,” Topo said. “We did it all the time” since the lure of the beach oftentimes was too great. For most Choom Gangers, parental supervision was lax at best; when Topo’s parents discovered sand in his shorts one weekday and angrily confronted him about how their tuition payments were being wasted, his lesson was obvious: “I just learned to rinse my shorts out better.”

Even for Topo, who had two parents at home, “the Choom Gang became more of a family to me than my own family.” For Barry, whose grandmother left for the bank each weekday morning at 6:30 and whose grandfather often was trying to sell life insurance in the evenings, his buddies and especially their devotion to basketball became the centerpiece of his daily life. His friend Bobby Titcomb, a year younger and not a Choom Ganger but whom one upperclassman called “a bit of a badass,” has vivid memories of “Obama dribbling his ball, running down the sidewalk on Punahou Street to his apartment, passing the ball between his legs. . . . He was into it.” Topo saw the exact same thing, with Barry “dribbling his basketball to class every day. He was married to that thing.”

Mike Ramos’s younger brother Greg, who was a year behind Barry, and Greg’s best friend Keith Peterson shared the gang’s love of basketball and thought Obama was a visibly much happier teenager than most of his friends, including Mike, Greg Orme, Mark Bendix, and Joe Hansen. Keith was Tony Peterson’s younger brother, and by 1977–78 Keith and Barry were the only two black males in the Academy’s sixteen-hundred-plus student body. To Keith, Mike Ramos was “brooding, unpleasant . . . just mean.” From both Mike and Orme, Greg Ramos and Keith “got the full big brother to little brother treatment.” Orme was usually just “a jerk. Greg would challenge us to basketball games just for the pleasure of beating us to death.”

Barry and Mike “were very close,” but Obama took part in none of the taunting the younger boys suffered from the older ones. Instead Barry manifested “a level of kindness and genuine caring” which “was pretty unusual, in particular with that group.” Hebs’s entire family felt the same way about how Obama treated Hebs’s younger brother Brad. Both Keith and Greg Ramos also felt that Topo and Bobby Titcomb were each “a great guy,” but they thought Obama “was always a happy guy.” Indeed, as Keith Peterson puts it, Barry “stands out in my mind as being the happiest of that group.”

The Choom Gang had several regular off-campus hangouts—no one dared to choom at school. Each year’s catalog emphasized that Punahou “will not condone” drugs or alcohol and expressly prohibited even tobacco smoking “on or in the vicinity of” campus. Everyone understood that they would get expelled from school if they were caught. “We always gravitated to areas that were secluded,” Topo explained, and one of their favorite spots was a glade named the Makiki Pumping Station, near the Round Top Drive loop road that circles Mount Tantalus, just a bit northwest of Punahou. “It was a very tucked away, beautiful place,” Topo recalled. “It was kind of like our safe haven.”

One evening the group headed up there in Mark Bendix’s Volkswagen van and Russ Cunningham’s Toyota. “We pulled over at the beginning of the hill and we puffed away,” Topo remembered. Then Mark and Russ decided their two vehicles should race. Barry and Kenji Salz were with Cunningham, Topo and Joe Hansen with Bendix. “‘On your mark, get set, go,’ so we took off, and we pulled ahead, and we made a turn, and then nothing happened. We’re up there, and we parked, rolled another fatty, and another one,” Topolinski said. “We’re not that much faster than them. Where the hell did they go?” So “we stayed up there for about twenty minutes and then we decided to go back down just to see what’s going on, and we’re about halfway down, and we see Barry running up the road, halfway in hysterics. ‘What the hell’s going on? Barry, where is everybody?’” Obama’s answer was startling: “‘Kooks rolled the car.’ ‘What do you mean he rolled the car?’ ‘It’s upside down in the middle of the road.’ ‘What?’ And he’s laughing. ‘Okay, well we need to go down there.’ So Barry got in the van, and we drove to the accident site and sure enough his little Toyota was on its roof in the middle of the road.”

Cunningham had a bloody nose, but Kenji, like Barry, was fine. “We didn’t want to get in any more trouble so the rest of us left Russell there by himself,” Topo recalled, “and we piled in the van to go buy more beer.” After downing some, they decided, “Let’s go back up and see what’s up.” At the accident scene, “there’s fire trucks, flares,” even an ambulance. “We wanted no part of that,” so Bendix made a quick U-turn, and the Choom Gang headed for home.<sup>32</sup>

Given the Choom Gang’s intake of both beer and pakololo, it was fortunate that nothing worse than a bloody nose and a totaled Toyota resulted from their many outings. In the middle of the 1977–78 school year, Ann Dunham and Maya returned to Honolulu, once again living at Alice Dewey’s home, so that Ann could take her doctoral candidacy exams in May. Lolo had been stricken with a serious liver disease, and Ann had taken the lead in forcing Union Oil to send him to Los Angeles for treatment before he then joined Ann and Maya at Dewey’s home to recuperate. It is unclear how much Ann saw of her son those months while he continued to live in his grandparents’ tiny apartment. Alice Dewey remembers Barry coming by one Sunday to take his mother, sister, and stepfather out for lunch. In late May, the three of them left to return to Indonesia, but no one recalls any intense bitterness like what Keith Kakugawa had witnessed when Ann left a year earlier.

As school ended, Barry wrote another flirtatious message in Kelli Furushima’s 1978 yearbook. Tom Topolinski wistfully recalled that Kelli was so popular “there was a line for her” and that Barry “wasn’t very forward” with girls. But to Kelli there had been no change in Barry’s demeanor. “He was very funny. He was really warm, friendly,” she recalled. “He just seemed happy all the time, smiling all the time.”

Over the summer, Barry worked at a newly opened Baskin-Robbins at 1618 South King Street, less than two blocks from his grandparents’ apartment. Owners Clyde and Teri Higa remember him clearly as “a very good-natured young man, quick with a smile.” He worked alongside Punahou classmate Kent Torrey, whose dad had just taught Obama’s junior-year U.S. history course; rising junior Annette Yee worked there as well. Clyde Higa said Barry was “the tallest employee we ever had” and thus “seemed to have great difficulty bending over and reaching into the ice cream cabinets to scoop the ice cream.” Obama also remembered it was “tough work” behind the counter, and he did not like the mandatory uniform and the accompanying paper cap. He did have an easier time than tiny Annette Yee, who never forgot falling “head first into the near tub” and how Barry “hauled me out.” Teri Higa remembered seeing Barry “gazing out the front store window at times” as if “wishing he was at the beach instead of working.” One customer who recognized Barry behind the counter was Frank Marshall Davis’s dear friend Dawna Weatherly-Williams. “He was a wonderful kid” and even behind the counter, he always “had this beautiful grin on his face.”

By the beginning of Barry’s senior year, Punahou’s tuition and fees stood at $2,050. For a senior, one semester of economics was required; Barry and Mark “Hebs” Hebing both had it with instructor Stuart Gross. But Barry also enrolled in Punahou’s most demanding senior year elective, Law and Society, which was taught by Honolulu attorney Ian Mattoch at 7:15 A.M., three mornings a week. Punahou’s catalog said the course would “enable students to conceptualize the legal framework of his society, to analyze the terms of the social contract between the individual and the society. Emphasis on the study of the various rights afforded the individual in the Bill of Rights and Constitution and consideration of the bases and characteristics of the executive, judicial, and legislative processes.” Mattoch, a member of Punahou’s class of 1961, had graduated from Occidental College in Los Angeles in 1965 and Northwestern University’s law school in 1968. He had begun offering the course in 1970, and as its syllabus readily revealed, the content was “about a sophomore in college level because Punahou students are eminently capable of doing work at that level,” Mattoch explained years later. A 1976 article in Punahou’s student newspaper had noted that there were also “optional ‘law labs’ held on Saturday mornings at Mr. Mattoch’s law office” in addition to field trips to courtroom trials. Mattoch said his goal was for students “to understand that law is a product of men and institutions.”

Punahou alumni who went on to successful careers in the law testified that Mattoch’s class had been directly helpful to them during law school. Mattoch began by asking “What is law?” with readings ranging from Roscoe Pound to Sigmund Freud. Then he moved to “the organizational basis of the legal system,” with students expected to master the first hundred-plus pages of a text by a well-known University of Wisconsin law professor. A midterm exam might have as many as seven questions; optional “extra reading reports” on books such as Benjamin Cardozo’s The Nature of the Judicial Process could earn students additional credit. “How a bill becomes a law” and “basic techniques of legal research” were followed by a study of notable Supreme Court constitutional decisions ranging from Griswold v. Connecticut’s 1965 recognition of a right to privacy to criminal procedure rulings. Students then submitted reports comparing the Warren Court of the 1960s to the Burger Court of the 1970s. The final exam lasted ninety minutes and featured more than two dozen questions.

Mattoch remembered Obama as “relatively shy and nonassertive” in class, but he showed up early each morning and did first-rate work. His Punahou transcript indicates an A- in Law and Society, perhaps the single best grade he earned during his high school years. Barry also took a creative writing class that included poetry that fall of his senior year, and in mid-December, the student newspaper published a poem he had written entitled “The Old Man”:

*I saw an old, forgotten man
On an old, forgotten road Staggering and numb under the glare of the Spotlight. His eyes, so dull and grey,
Slide from right, to left, to right
Looking for his life, misplaced in a Shallow, muddy gutter long ago
I am found instead.
Seeking a hiding place, the night seals us together.
A transient spark lights his face, and in my honor,
He pulls out forgotten dignity from under his flaking coat,
And walks a straight line along the crooked world.*

While it is hard to imagine seventeen-year-old Barry being inspired to take up poetry by the example of grandfather Stan, his regular visits to see Frank Marshall Davis, a well-published poet of considerable repute, and by 1978 a man of seventy-two, are a more plausible inspiration, even if Davis’s personal history would prevent his role from ever being fully acknowledged.<sup>33</sup>

In December 1978, Barry finally played his way onto the twelve-man roster of Punahou’s top AA varsity basketball team. The coach was thirty-two-year-old Chris McLachlin, a 1964 Punahou graduate with a master’s degree from Stanford who was a devout student of the highly structured style of play that had been successfully pioneered by UNC Chapel Hill's Dean Smith and especially UCLA's John Wooden, with whom McLachlin had personally conferred several years earlier. McLachlin's 1975 team had won the Hawaii state championship in his first year as head coach, and Punahou's student newspaper commended the "high quality, hustle-oriented basketball which has become a McLachlin and Punahou trademark." The 1979 team featured seven returning seniors, including starting guards Larry Tavares and Darryl Gabriel and forward Boy Eldredge (Pal's nephew), plus star junior forward John Kamana and six-foot-five-inch sophomore Dan Hale at center. Tom Topolinski was often the first man off the bench. The four new members also included Barry's best friend Greg Orme and junior guard Alan Lum.

Mike Ramos had left for college on the mainland, but his younger brother Greg was an AA team manager. Mike's departure led to both Greg and his best friend Keith Peterson spending more time with Barry, and Greg immediately saw that just because Barry was taking a class like Ian Mattoch's, it did not mean the Choom Gang had gone on hiatus or lost its connection to Gay Ray. "When Mike went to college, the first thing Barack did was take me up to the mountains to try to get me stoned, because Mike protected me," Greg confessed years later. But from December through mid-March, basketball dominated their lives on a daily basis.

A Punahou student newspaper profile of "Coach Mac" said that McLachlin possessed a "great ability to get along with students" and quoted him as explaining that "my obligation is not only to teach the skills and strategy, but also to build character and to develop a sense of team and individual pride." Practices were six days a week, two hours each time, but, unlike the A team's, they took place in the late afternoon rather than at dawn. Games ran just thirty-two minutes: four eight-minute quarters. The veteran players understood and respected McLachlin. He was "a very tough coach who knew a lot about the game and made sure that we knew about it as well," Topo explained. McLachlin told the student newspaper: "I'd like to think of myself as a teacher first and a coach second. A ball team is like class after school. I try to teach things like punctuality, industriousness and honesty," as well as relaxation techniques, "since relaxation is very important in situations when the pressure's on, like at the free throw line."

As Topo put it, Punahou's 1979 team was "just loaded with talent," and while McLachlin acknowledged that Punahou's reserves "could have started for any other team in the state," he also "did not have an everybody plays approach," Dan Hale remembered. Like so many others, McLachlin had seen Barry dribbling his basketball and shooting baskets whenever possible, and he respected Obama's "real love and passion for the game." Ironically, though, Obama's many hours of pickup game experience on local courts worked against him with McLachlin. As Alan Lum described it, Barry was "a very creative player," but "his game didn't really fit our system. . . . We ran a structured offense. We were very disciplined." Obama would later assert, "I had an overtly black game," but that misstated the core of basketball's deep appeal to him, which he expressed far better when he compared his favorite sport to his favorite music, jazz. "There's an aspect of improvisation within a discipline that I find very, very powerful."

Team play got under way with an invitational tournament victory on Maui followed by five straight regular-season wins on Oahu before a one-point loss to University High School. Two victories preceded a defeat by rival Iolani School, then two more wins were followed by a second one-point loss to University High.

Throughout that schedule of games, Barry Obama got little playing time; some days only seven of McLachlin's twelve players saw game action. At one point during those weeks, Obama, along with Alan Lum and Darin Maurer, made an appointment with McLachlin to request that they receive more playing time. McLachlin remembers the meeting as "nonconfrontational and respectful." Barry "basically represented the group" and "spoke for them. . . . It was 'Coach, what can we do to garner more playing time?'" Years later, though, Obama recounted a far angrier scene. "I got into a fight with the guy, and he benched me for three or four games. Just wouldn't play me. And I was furious." Lum had been surprised at how direct Barry was with Coach Mac, and McLachlin acknowledged that Barry was clearly "disgruntled." But Obama was convinced the coach was treating him unfairly. "The truth was, on the playground, I could beat a lot of the guys who were starters," he later claimed. To team manager Greg Ramos, that was just a "total rationalization. . . . My perception at the time was that people were where they should have been, and Barack always thought he should have played more than he did." Even with that tension, Barry's teammates all remember his usual sunny self. "Very happy, very outgoing," "a very, very pleasant person to be around," and "always" with "that smile on his face."

Punahou was in second place in the AA standings prior to an early March league playoff in which the team defeated University High by one point in overtime before a crowd of more than twenty-two hundred. The student newspaper reported that Obama "gave the team a lift as a second half sub, scoring six points on offense and hustling on defense," but the box score in the Honolulu Advertiser had Barry missing three free throws. That win gave Punahou top seed in the upcoming three-round Hawaii state tournament. A blowout 77–29 win in their first game included three points by Obama; he played briefly in the second and did not score, but the game still ended in victory for Punahou. The ultimate championship game, against Moanalua on Saturday evening, March 10, 1979, was preceded by a midday team meal at Dan Hale's home. McLachlin's wife Beth made "super burgers" that supposedly aided players' ability to jump.

At Blaisdell Arena in downtown Honolulu, an astonishing crowd of more than sixty-four hundred awaited the contest. "The players majestically strode into the arena as their little admirers flocked around them as if they were blue-clad gods," Punahou's student newspaper claimed in its next issue. "They willingly signed autographs and received handshakes from parents and well-wishers," including of course Stan Dunham. Punahou jumped out to an early lead of 18–4, then ran the score to 32–7. As Alan Lum remembered, "the game was over in the first half" and Coach Mac began substituting liberally. Barry Obama sank one field goal, missed his sole free throw, and finished with two points, but was ecstatic at the 60–28 victory.

"These are the best bunch of guys. We made so many sacrifices to get here," he told Punahou's student reporter. McLachlin was equally happy, telling the Advertiser that "we played as near-perfect a game as ever," including how "the subs came in and played as great a team defense as the regulars." Within the world of Punahou, winning the state AA championship was just "huge," as Topo remembered. On the bus ride back to the school, Coach Mac told his team that they had just played "as good a game as I've ever seen a high school basketball team play. You played a perfect game, and that included everyone who stepped on that court. This is the finest effort by twelve young men that I have ever seen."

To Barry Obama, the team's championship was such an enormous achievement he wrote a tribute to their season for Punahou's 1979 yearbook, a brief essay that somehow remained utterly undiscovered even a decade after dozens of journalists had traipsed their ways through all manner of various real and imagined details of Obama's early life. Titled "Winner," the piece is in no way remarkable, but it most certainly captures how central that team experience was for seventeen-year-old Barry:

A lot of words are thrown around in basketball: unity, character, determination, and sportsmanship. Well, this is a team that lived up to these clichés, both on and off the court. When the season started, we all felt the electricity of something special; through sacrifice, trust, hard work, and a lot of help from coaches and managers, a group of diverse individuals joined together to truly become a team. At times we've had problems playing together, but we've never had any difficulty getting along; I have never seen a closer bunch of guys. Each player carried his weight and supported the others when they were down; if Gabe wasn't hot, then John would do it; if Danny's dunks didn't beat you, E's defense would. Some people think that it's the win/loss record that is important; others think that it's how you play the game that is important; no matter how you think of it, though, this team was a winner in every sense of the word.

Obama's memory of his role in the team's season would grow rosy with age. "My senior year, when we won the state championship, there were a couple games where I think I was a difference maker." He said his grandfather would recount how impressive a broadcaster had made Barry's one successful jump shot in that final game sound, but he also acknowledged how those four months had taught him "a lot about discipline, about handling disappointment, being team oriented, and realizing not everything is about you."<sup>34</sup>

The overall picture Obama would usually paint of his final year at Punahou bore no resemblance to that long-undiscovered essay in his senior yearbook or to the A- he earned in Ian Mattoch's exceptionally demanding early-morning Law and Society class. "I'm playing basketball, I'm getting high, and I'm not taking my work seriously at all," he recalled on one occasion. "We'd have basketball practice get over about six, maybe six-thirty, and we'd go get a six-pack . . . and go out to the park and just screw around. . . . Then you'd be waking up in the morning and you hadn't done the reading." In some tellings, Obama admitted to taking his schoolwork more seriously his senior year—"Man, I should try to go to college, so let me focus a bit more"—but then his senior year was the only one with afternoon basketball practice every day. In another version, he has his mother, ostensibly back in Honolulu early in his senior year, upbraiding him about his grades and his disinterest in applying to colleges, calling him a loafer and voicing her disappointment in him. Presented with that account, one interviewer responded that it made Barry sound like a hood, a hoodlum, to which Obama responded, "That's basically it. In fact I think my mother referred to me as such at one point." On another occasion, Obama went even further, claiming, "I think I was a thug for a big part of my growing up."

The notion that anyone at Punahou or among his friends and other acquaintances ever thought of Barry Obama as a "thug" or hoodlum could not be further from the way he is remembered. Scores of them did see him as "a pretty good jock," as Obama also called himself; tiny Annette Yee from their summer at Baskin-Robbins thought of him as "a basketball jock"; their mutual friend and ice cream coworker Kent Torrey likewise recalled Barry as "one of the biggest jocks on campus." But his intense love of basketball, as his yearbook tribute vividly captured, carried no negativity, and anyone who experienced teenage bullying from one or more of Barry's closest friends without exception recalls Obama as never manifesting any bad attitudes.

By the onset of Barry's senior year, Greg Orme was unquestionably his closest friend. Many days after basketball practice, they did not "get a six-pack . . . and go out to the park and just screw around," but instead walked down to 1617 South Beretania. "It was Tut and Gramps in this small apartment and us two six-footers," Orme recalled. "We'd raid the refrigerator and then go to his room. He'd put on his earphones. He liked to listen to Stevie Wonder and jazz, like Grover Washington. So he'd have the earphones on and read his books." Tom Topo came over "once or twice a month." He remembered that visitors could barely "set foot in his room—he lived off the floor—everything was on the floor. . . . He always had a Stevie Wonder record on the phonograph," like Songs in the Key of Life, and sometimes "like a week-old pizza under his bed . . . he was a messy person."

But the Choom Gang was no less active than the year before. Indeed, come January 1979, Punahou's student newspaper, in a humorous survey of different student "species," profiled one it called "Cravius Cannabis." Recognizable from "their bloodshot eyes . . . Cannabi migrate in vans to 'country,' where they indulge in enlightening tribal rituals. They have developed specialized language to deal with their common interests: agriculture and commerce." Years later, on the one occasion when anyone was able to ask Madelyn Dunham about Barry's high school drug use, she admitted, "I had a few hints, and I think I talked to him a little about it. But it didn't seem overwhelming or prolonged." Obama would later make light of chooming, readily admitting, "I smoked pot as a kid, and I view it as a bad habit and a vice, not very different from the cigarettes I smoked" all through those years.

Once Obama seemingly copped to something more than just pakalolo during his Punahou years, referencing "maybe a little blow when you could afford it" while relating how a food service worker supposedly had offered Barry "smack" (heroin) as well. The Choomers' relationship with Gay Ray went well beyond just "commerce," and some of them spent significant social time with him, as Topo readily acknowledged. "The guy was a maniac on the road. He tailgated everybody. I was afraid for my life every time I rode with him." Yet cocaine had zero presence among the Choom Gang, and multiple friends firmly say they never set eyes on it up through 1979. But at least one Choomer knew for sure that "Barry started to experiment with cocaine." While Topo recalled that "the police were really, really, really relaxed" regarding pakololo, that was not the case with harder drugs, and in Obama's own later telling, his mother asks him about his friend "Pablo," who "was just arrested for drug possession" involving cocaine.

By Barry's senior year his second-closest friend, after Orme, was Bobby Titcomb, who was one year behind before leaving Punahou without graduating. Titcomb came from a distinguished local family. An ancestor had "married into Hawaiian royalty," according to the Honolulu Advertiser, and his father was a longtime local judge who had won two Bronze Stars during World War II and lost a congressional race against future U.S. senator Daniel Inouye. Perhaps most notably, the elder Titcomb also frequently appeared on the locally filmed CBS television show Hawaii Five-0, which had begun airing nationally in 1968. Bobby Titcomb had first met Barry back in the fifth grade, and the two young men would hike Rocky Hill, just above Punahou's campus, before extending their reach to Peacock Flats, on the west side of Oahu. Obama's private, extremely close friendship with Bobby would remain a constant in his life for many years after 1978–79.<sup>35</sup>

In his most starkly dramatized account of his supposedly angry and antisocial high school years,

Obama wrote about “the intimation of danger that would come upon me whenever I split another boy’s lip or raced down a highway with gin clouding my head.” Not one of Barry’s friends and acquaintances can recall any angry exchanges, never mind any busted lips, and no one remembers him having a taste for gin. In that same passage, Obama also recounted “the swagger that carried me into a classroom drunk or high, knowing that my teachers will smell beer or reefer on my breath, just daring them to say something.”

Paula Miyashiro, Punahou’s 1979 class dean since their freshman year, never knew Barry to have any disciplinary issues and remembers “his infectious, genuine smile” and his “happy,” indeed “jovial,” demeanor. She met with him at least annually to discuss his upcoming year’s classes, and then more frequently as college applications approached. “I remember talking to him about the particular schools he was interested in.” But above all, Miyashiro—now Paula Kurashige—stresses that the one person who saw the most of Barry during high school at Punahou was his homeroom teacher, Eric Kusunoki: “for four years, he saw Barry every single day.”

Even during his junior year’s early-morning basketball practices, or his fall senior year’s three-times-a-cycle early-bird Law and Society classes, Barry was in Kusunoki’s homeroom every morning. Kusunoki was no innocent. “To say there was a lot of drugs going on back then is a fair statement, maybe an understatement,” he frankly acknowledges. But “it wasn’t like guys were smoking dope on campus and coming to school high,” he added. “If they did, it would have been pretty obvious.” Barry without fail would greet “Mr. Kus” with “Good morning,” always “very positive, very pleasant,” and sporting a “big smile.” Barry was “very personable, very respectful,” a “bright presence in the classroom,” and “never got in trouble.” Classmates all continued to have an identical view. To senior-year homeroom colleague Bart Burford, “Barry was one of the more buoyant personalities on campus”; to longtime friend Kelli Furushima, Barry still “just seemed happy all the time. Smiling all the time.”

Decades later, as scores of journalists plumbed the question of Obama’s racial consciousness during his high school years, no more than two would take the trouble to even telephone, never mind visit, the only other black male student in the Academy during both of Obama’s last two years, his friend Keith Peterson. And not a single one would even call the lone black female student, Kim Jones—like Keith, one year behind Barry—who was in the Academy those two years.

Keith Peterson puts it simply. “There was no blackness at Punahou,” only three black students among more than sixteen hundred total there. Across the full range of Barry’s friends and acquaintances, Keith’s perception wins unanimous concurrence. To Bobby Titcomb, Obama “was just another color in the rainbow.” Mark Hebing explains, “We didn’t think about his blackness.” Mike Ramos’s younger sister Connie, who was in the class of ’79, recalls, “I never once thought of Barry as ‘black.’” Barry’s friend John Kolivas, who was half Korean and half Greek, says “we didn’t think of each other in terms of race.”

To Keith Peterson, Barry’s “parental piece was a total and complete mystery,” and one Barry never spoke of. “I knew nothing about his father” and “I can’t say that I knew he had a mother at all.” Barry “lived with this older white couple” and “both of his parents so to speak were white.” Indeed “I thought that he was actually adopted by a white family,” that this “older couple had adopted him.” And, in reality, Keith’s impression was not at all wrong. As Madelyn’s younger brother Charles put it, Barack Obama “was raised in a white family.” Bobby Titcomb knew that Stan and Madelyn were Barry’s grandparents, but he understood that actually they were more than that. “You call them grandparents, but they were his parents growing up.”

Yet no one speaks more powerfully, more movingly, about what it was like to be black at Punahou in the late 1970s than Kim Jones Nelson. “It is different being black growing up in Hawaii” than anywhere on the U.S. mainland, she explains. Even more significantly, “It’s an enormous privilege to be a black person in America and grow up in Hawaii. There is no other place in the entire U.S. that provides you with that experience where the color of your skin, the darker your skin is, is not a bad thing.” Just as Frank Marshall Davis had realized thirty years earlier, “the whole race dynamic is turned on its head in Hawaii,” for “in 1970s Honolulu,” as one veteran Asian American journalist would recount, “white people were routinely the target of discrimination,” not African Americans.

Kim Jones had arrived at Punahou in 1976 for ninth grade, and it was “such a multicultural world” that “I never thought about” being the only black female among sixteen hundred students. Hawaii has “just a different worldview,” and “Punahou’s a reflection of the island culture, which is an extremely inclusive culture” of so many countless mixed ethnicities that “I would have had no idea what somebody was.” Across four years at Punahou, Kim had no experience of discrimination. “Not ever. Never, ever, ever. Certainly nothing associated with race.” What instead stood out was “the quality of the teaching” and the richness of the curriculum: the Novel and Film, art history, creative writing. “I loved Punahou.” She barely knew Barry. “He was part of that jock group,” and “I can’t recall any personal interactions with him.”<sup>36</sup>

On at least one occasion twenty years later, Obama acknowledged “the carefree childhood I experienced in Hawaii” and “how truly lucky I was to have been raised” there. He would give thanks as well for “the wonderful education I received at Punahou” and how “Punahou gave me a great foundation,” especially in terms of “values and ethics,” whose “long-term impact on the trajectory of my life” he would appreciate only a decade later. As a prominent African American, Chicago-based theologian who worshiped in the same church later emphasized, above all else, including color, complexion, and race, first and foremost Barack “Obama is Hawaiian.”<sup>37</sup>

Eight or ten weeks in advance of Punahou’s June 2, 1979, graduation ceremony, seniors had to submit whatever they wanted published on the one-quarter page they would each have in the 1979 Oahuan. Mark Bendix’s would contain sketches of his VW bus, the “choom van,” and the Koolaus mountain range above Pearl City, plus a “thanks for everything” to classmates whose initials readily translate into their full names: Barry Obama, Kenji Salz, Joe Hansen, Greg Orme, Russ Cunningham, Tom Topolinski, Wayne Weightman, Mark Hebing, and others. Russ Cunningham’s page featured a trio of small photos of Barry, Kenji, and Greg, and “Special Thanks to Friends, Family, Choom Gang.” Both Hebs’s and Topo’s were free of any such allusions, but Orme’s read, “Many thanks to all my friends. Especially the Choom Gang,” with initials for Bendix, Barry, Hansen—who had left school—Kenji, and Cunningham. Kenji’s featured a photo that included Barry and captioned “Ooooochoom Gangooooooo”; his acknowledgments included Bendix, Orme, Barry, Hansen, Cunningham, Hebs, and Weightman. Wayne’s featured the slogan “Fellow students: it’s time to choom!” and a reference to “Pumping station blues.”

Barry Obama’s quarter-page was by far the most striking of all.

Its upper-right corner featured a handsome photo of Barry in a jacket and wide-collared shirt that could have been borrowed from the 1977 dance film Saturday Night Fever. At upper left was a picture of a happy, smiling Obama on a basketball court, captioned “we go play hoop.” At the bottom was a photograph labeled “still life” that included a beer bottle, a record turntable, a telephone, and rolling papers. In the middle was Barry's chosen message: "Thanks Tut, Gramps, Choom Gang, and Ray for all the good times."

Decades later, that sentence would receive far less public attention and discussion than it should have. Barry, alone of all the Choom Gang, had singled out their weird, gay, porn-showing drug dealer by name and thanked him "for all the good times." As Tom Topo most frankly acknowledged, the Choom Gangers had spent plenty of time with Gay Ray over the previous two years, but a public—and permanent—thank-you to their drug connection was something that all the others, even Mark Bendix, did not go so far as to put into print.

Although decades would pass before Obama would learn of his fate, on New Year's Day 1986, a sleeping thirty-seven-year-old Ray Boyer was bludgeoned to death with a hammer by an angry twenty-year-old male prostitute in an apartment less than two blocks south of 1617 South Beretania Street.<sup>38</sup>

Several days in advance of the graduation ceremony, Ann Dunham returned to Honolulu from Indonesia for the first time in a year. In late 1978, she had completed her fieldwork for her dissertation but, low on funds, had taken a well-paying job with a USAID contractor, Development Alternatives Inc. Based in the Central Java city of Semarang, the job came with a house, servants, and a driver. She and Lolo were on the verge of formally divorcing, and, staying once again at Alice Dewey's home, she soon would adopt Dewey's suggestion that she keep Soetoro as her surname rather than revert to Dunham. But she also made a change from Lolo's colonial Dutch spelling to the Indonesian "Sutoro."

Preparations for the Saturday-night commencement required extensive choral rehearsals on the part of the entire graduating class. Punahou's senior prom took place the night before, Friday, June 1. Greg Orme and his steady girlfriend, red-headed Kelli McCormack, hosted Barry and his date, Megan Hughes, a student at La Pietra School for Girls near Diamond Head, for champagne at her family's home before the two couples headed to the dance and then an after-party. Decades later Kelli would describe Barry and Greg as "like brothers" and described Barry as "very intelligent and witty." Megan's presence that evening was the first time Kelli had seen Barry with a date, but in Kelli's memory, Megan was "gorgeous. . . . She had the face of an angel and the body of a goddess." But Barry's relationship with her was short-lived. In 1983 Megan would have a brief appearance in one episode of the television series Magnum, P.I., which was filmed on Oahu. A decade later Hughes would appear as Terence Stamp's girlfriend in a movie called The Real McCoy, starring Kim Basinger. Two years later Megan had her own starring role in an R-rated "erotic adventure" film titled Smooth Operator, but her topless appearance failed to make the movie a popular or commercial success.

Yet in 1979, with Orme already scheduled to be away from Hawaii that summer, Barry betrayed more than a hint of desire for his best friend's girl in the message he wrote in Kelli's yearbook. "It has been so nice getting to know you this year. You are extremely sweet and foxy. I don't know why Greg would want to spend any time with me at all! You really deserve better than clowns like us; you even laugh at my jokes! I hope we can keep in touch this summer, even though Greg will be away." Inscribing his grandparents' phone number, Barry encouraged Kelli to "Call me up and I'll buy you lunch . . . good luck in everything you do, and stay happy. Your friend, Love, Barry Obama." McCormack soon broke up with Orme, and she did like Barry. "He and I really clicked. We had great vibes between us," she recounted years later. But she never called him that summer.<sup>39</sup>

On Saturday evening, June 2, Punahou's 412 graduating seniors, all dressed in matching blazers for the men and long dresses for the women, filed into Honolulu's Blaisdell Arena, where three months earlier Barry's AA basketball team had won their championship. A prayer opened the ceremony, followed by the entire class singing a school song. Three seniors—Byron Leong, Annabelle Okada, and class president Dennis Bader—had major speaking roles, interspersed among four more choral selections. Bader's impressive remarks, in which he told his classmates to follow “your pilot light,” drew prolonged applause from the families and friends seated on the arena's main floor. Class dean Paula Miyashiro welcomed the graduates, and Academy principal Win Healy invoked his personal tradition of choosing one adjective to describe each year's class. Commending the 1979 graduates for making 1978–79 “the smoothest and best year of the 1970s” at Punahou, he said the best word to describe them was “harmonic.” President Rod McPhee commended Paula Miyashiro on her “great job” with the class, and then presented each of the graduates with their diploma. As the ceremony was ending, Barry ran into his former Baskin-Robbins coworker Kent Torrey. “Kent, I've got to tell you, your dad was one major S.O.B. of a teacher, but at least I learned something from him” in junior-year U.S. history. “What a cool, backhanded compliment from one of the bigger jocks on campus,” Kent thought.

Several of Barry's friends remember a cohosted graduation party at Kenji Salz's family's home with Stan Dunham serving as greeter. “Gramps” was “a great guy” who would always “make sure everybody's being included,” Greg Ramos remembered. None of Barry's friends have any clear recollections of Ann Dunham from that weekend. Some, like Mike Ramos and Dan Hale, believe they met her then or at some other time, but as Mike put it, “she lived in Indonesia” and “was just in and out” when visiting Honolulu. Mike's brother Greg knows he never met her. “She was not a part of his life” during those final years at Punahou. “His grandparents raised him.”

Ann remained in Honolulu for five weeks before returning to Indonesia. Early that summer, Barry hoped to get a job at a pizza parlor—not Mama Mia's with Gay Ray—and Mark Hebing gave him a ride to the interview. But Barry quickly came back out. The place served beer, and Barry was still two months shy of being eighteen—too young to serve beer if not to drink it. Barry sent eighteen-year-old Hebs in, and he was hired. Barry later recalled making $4 an hour painting instead and also working as a waiter at an assisted-living facility.

By the time of his Punahou graduation, Barry knew that in the fall he would be attending Occidental College in Los Angeles—more precisely, in a far northeastern neighborhood called Eagle Rock, close to the small city of Pasadena. Obama later once half-claimed he chose “Oxy” because he had met some girl on vacation in Honolulu who was from Brentwood—far on the opposite side of sprawling Los Angeles—but the choice may also have been influenced by the hope that he was good enough to play college basketball. Punahou teammate Dan Hale remembers that Barry “really wanted to play college basketball” and as of spring 1979, he believed he “had an opportunity to play there” on an NCAA Division III team.

Occidental recruiter Kraig King, a 1977 Oxy graduate who had combined a stellar academic record with four years of standout play as a starter on Oxy's varsity basketball team, had visited Punahou back in mid-November 1978, at the same time that Barry was doing so well in Occidental graduate Ian Mattoch's Law and Society class. Obama later publicly thanked Paula Miyashiro Kurashige as “my dean who got me into college,” and Greg Ramos has a clear memory of Barry being disappointed at how his college applications had turned out. Oxy “was clearly a second choice for him,” especially with another basketball teammate, Darin Maurer, headed to Stanford. Years later Obama said that Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania also rejected him. Oxy required two letters of recommendation; might one from an alumnus who could testify that Barry's A- in Law and Society was a better predictor of his academic potential than the rest of his Punahou transcript have been decisive? If so, no copy survives.

One afternoon in early September 1979, just a few days before Obama was leaving for Occidental, he paid another visit to grandfatherly Frank Marshall Davis. Frank asked him what he expected to get out of college, and Barry, at least as he later recounted their conversation, replied that he didn't know.

"That's the problem, isn't it? You don't know. . . . All you know is that college is the next thing you're supposed to do." But Frank had a warning. "Understand something, boy. You're not going to college to get educated. You're going there to get trained. They'll train you to want what you don't need. They'll train you to manipulate words so they don't mean anything anymore. They'll train you to forget what you already know. They'll train you so good, you'll start believing what they tell you about equal opportunity and the American way and all that shit. They'll give you a corner office and invite you to fancy dinners, and tell you you're a credit to your race. Until you want to actually start running things, and then they'll yank on your chain and let you know that you may well be a well-trained, well-paid nigger, but you're a nigger just the same."

Barry was confused. Was Frank saying he shouldn't be going to college? Frank sighed. "No. I didn't say that. You've got to go. I'm just telling you to keep your eyes open. Stay awake." With those words of paternal advice, the only African American adult eighteen-year-old Barry Obama had ever known bid him farewell for the West Coast mainland.<sup>40</sup>

EAGLE ROCK, MANHATTAN, BROOKLYN, AND HERMITAGE, PA

SEPTEMBER 1979–JULY 1985

Eighteen-year-old Barry Obama arrived on Occidental College's campus in Los Angeles's far northeastern Eagle Rock neighborhood on Sunday, September 16, 1979. Upon arrival, he learned that his dormitory assignment was Haines Hall Annex, room A104, a small, three-man "triple." Oxy, as everyone called it, had expected 425 entering freshmen but, on the day before Obama arrived, the number hit 434 before growing to 458. Of them, 243 were men and 215 were women. The students noted the unexpectedly tight quarters, but college officials were overjoyed, because for several years Oxy had been having a hard time both attracting and retaining academically qualified undergraduates.

Eighteen months earlier, college president Richard C. Gilman had told the faculty that the freshman class target was being reduced from 450 to 425 because for the last three or four years "admission had been offered to every qualified applicant," Oxy's student newspaper reported. Gilman confessed that some who were admitted "may not have been fully qualified." Out of 1,124 applicants for the class of 1980, only 179 had been refused admission. To raise Oxy's standards, a new dean of admissions and new staff were hired in mid-1977, but as of 1978 only 54.2 percent of students admitted to the previous four graduating classes had graduated in the normal four years. The class of 1980 was distinguished by the number of dropouts and students transferring to larger institutions. Oxy's student newspaper interviewed sophomores about their plans, and in a front-page story reported that "it seems that at least half of them are not planning to return next year." The "primary complaint is that the college is too small and limited" academically; other issues were "the limited social atmosphere, the immaturity of the student body and the lack of privacy on campus."

Privacy didn't get any easier with the advent of three-person triples, and Haines Annex and a second dorm each had three of these freshman rooms interspersed on hallways otherwise housing upperclassmen. Barry's two roommates had arrived before him: Paul Carpenter had grown up in nearby Diamond Bar, California, and graduated from Ganesha High School in Pomona. Imad Husain was originally from Karachi, Pakistan, and he and his family now lived in Dubai; he had graduated from the Bedford School in England. Imad was one of many international students at Oxy; in contrast, this freshman class of 1983 included only twenty-plus African American students, mostly from heavily black neighborhoods in nearby South Central Los Angeles. Oxy's tuition for the 1979–80 year was $4,752, with room and board adding another $2,100, for a total of just under $7,000.

Barry's mother Ann Sutoro was earning a respectable salary from DAI in Indonesia—and, as the IRS would charge six years later, was failing to pay her U.S. taxes on it—and Madelyn Dunham still worked as a vice president at Bank of Hawaii. Decades later, an article in an Occidental publication would print Obama's statement that he had received "a full scholarship" that he recalled totaling $7,700, and journalists would repeat that pronouncement as an unquestioned fact. But Occidental awarded financial aid only on the basis of financial need and, like Punahou, made work-study employment a part of any recipient's financial aid package. There is no evidence in Oxy's surviving records that support Obama's statement about financial aid, and none of his Oxy classmates remember him working any on-campus job.

Classes began on September 20. Occidental operated on a quarter, or more accurately, trimester system—fall, winter, and spring. Most freshmen followed Oxy's Core Program. A freshman seminar covered the basics of how to use the library and write a paper, easy indeed for anyone from Punahou. Distribution requirements mandated a sampling of American, European, and "World" culture courses across freshman and sophomore years, plus a foreign language—Spanish in Obama's case, after his unfortunate early encounter with French at Punahou—but within that framework students had a great deal of choice. That fall Obama selected Political Science 90, American Political Ideas and Institutions, a lecture class of about 120 students taught in two five-week segments. The first, covering American political thought from Madison and Jefferson through Lincoln, the Progressives, the New Deal, and the mid-twentieth-century debate over pluralism versus elitism, was handled by Roger Boesche, a young assistant professor who had received his Ph.D. from Stanford in 1976. The second, covering the structure and powers of the federal legislative, executive, and judicial branches, was taught by Richard F. Reath, a soon-to-retire senior professor. Boesche in particular impressed Obama. One of his other enduring memories from freshman year was reading Toni Morrison's Song of Solomon, published just two years earlier, in an introductory literature course.

One hope Barry brought with him to Oxy was quickly diminished, namely any future as a collegiate basketball player, even at a small Division III school. Midday pickup games at Rush Gymnasium well in advance of preseason team practice—"noon ball" in the school's parlance—quickly demonstrated that Oxy had plenty of players with talent well beyond what Obama had seen in Hawaiian high school AA games. Barry was still not a good outside shooter, and he was so left-handed he always drove leftward and could not cross over. His love of basketball would remain, but his final official team game had taken place in Honolulu six months earlier.

Instead Obama's freshman year revolved around Haines Annex, with its mix of students crammed into tiny rooms on a narrow hallway with one alcove that offered an old couch of uncertain color. In addition to Barry, Paul, and Imad, a second freshman triple included Phil Boerner, a graduate of Walt Whitman High School in Bethesda, Maryland, whose father was a foreign service officer stationed at the U.S. embassy in London. Another triple just around the corner housed Paul Anderson from Minneapolis, a track-and-field athlete. A sophomore triple right across the hall had two Southern Californians, Ken Sulzer and John Boyer. A second next door included Sim Heninger, a North Carolina native who had grown up in Bremerton, Washington; a third had Adam Sherman, from Rockville, Maryland. Tight quarters made for open doors and quick, close friendships. One night early on Barry, Paul Carpenter, Phil Boerner, John Boyer, and others drove to Hollywood to see the movie Apocalypse Now, which had opened just a few weeks earlier. There was a long line; right in front of the Oxy crew was the well-known musician Tom Waits, who Phil remembered was "quite wasted."

Getting wasted happened at Oxy too, and perhaps more in Haines Annex than in any other dorm. Loud music helped set the tone, and as Ken Sulzer drily recalled, "if there was an alcohol restriction in the dorms, I wasn't aware of it." But drinking wasn't the half of it. "Choom" and "pakalolo" weren't part of mainland vocabulary, but partaking was even more common in Haines Annex that 1979–80 school year than Barry's trips up to Pumping Station had been a year earlier. Adam Sherman, who was an enthusiastic participant in what he later would acknowledge was a "very wild year," wrote a short story describing the group of regulars who gathered at least four or five nights a week in the hallway alcove that Sim Heninger termed "a male sanctum." The "threadbare couch" sat on a "cigarette-scarred" "aquamarine carpet which is littered with broken, stale potato chips" and "a few mangled and crushed beer cans." Drawing from a ceramic "crimson bong," "the dope" is passed from Paul Carpenter, whose blue eyes are "glazed over in pink, dilated inebriation," to Imad and then to Sim Heninger. The early-morning scene ends with Paul waking Adam from a sound sleep on the hallway floor. Other nights proceeded more energetically, with Phil Boerner ruefully recalling how the regulars would "repeatedly break the fire extinguisher glass during late-night wrestling matches."

Barry Obama was a nightly participant in the hallway gatherings. John Boyer, who kept an irregular journal over the course of the year, recorded how Adam was upset after one holiday break when Obama failed to bring something back for the group from the lush environs of Oahu. Carpenter remembered Obama as someone who "listened carefully" during hallway discussions; Michael Schwartz, a good friend of Carpenter's and Anderson's, remembered Barry as "reserved" and can picture him drinking beer out of a paper cup. Samuel Yaw "Kofi" Manu, a Ghanaian student who met Obama in the introductory political science class, recalls how "extremely friendly" Obama was; sophomore Mark Parsons, a fellow heavy smoker, remembers Barry telling him, "I smoke like this because I want to keep my weight down." John Boyer still has an image of Barry and Adam having long, late-night conversations on the decrepit couch. Obama was "personable" and "quick to laugh," with "a great sense of humor." But Boyer notes that Barry was "always vague" about his family, and even during those late-night discussions, with beer and marijuana relaxing most everyone's demeanors, "there was always kind of a wall" on Barry's part. It was "not really aloofness," Boyer explained, but something self-protective; Obama was more an observer than a spontaneous participant. "'Remove' is a good word," Boyer concluded.

One Friday night in mid-October Barry, Sim, and a sophomore woman were sitting in Haines Hall proper, all under the influence of mood enhancers. In Barry's case those included psychedelic mushrooms, and as a result, Obama "just came unglued. He was a mess." Sim believed that Barry had been adopted and raised by an older white couple whose photo he once displayed, but this night, as Obama babbled about identity and nudity and not wanting to experience rejection, it seemed as if he "was pretty troubled" and was experiencing a "big crisis." At bottom Barry seemed "uncomfortable and frightened," as well as "hysterical and angry," Heninger remembered. "There was no barrier between us in this moment," but for Sim "it was difficult and uncomfortable" in the extreme. Eventually Barry "scraped himself together." Given everything that had been consumed, Sim later mused that neither Obama nor the young woman probably remembered the experience at all, even though in Heninger's eyes it was "a big deal. We called it a day and it blew over," and "I never talked to him about it" again.<sup>1</sup>

For Thanksgiving 1979, just like on weekends "if there was wash to be done, or refrigerators to be raided," Barry joined Paul Carpenter at Paul's family home about thirty miles away. Mike Ramos, in college in Washington State, remembers some holiday in late 1979 when he picked up Greg Orme in Oregon and then rendezvoused with Barry and some others at Mike's younger sister's apartment in Berkeley, just east of San Francisco. Oxy had an almost four-week break after fall exams ended on December 6 and before winter term classes began on January 3, 1980, so Barry probably returned to Honolulu for a good chunk of that time, when Oxy's dorms were closed.

When winter term commenced, Obama took the second course in the political science introductory sequence, Comparative Politics, which that year was taught by the campus's most easily recognized and outspoken young faculty member, openly gay assistant professor Lawrence Goldyn. A 1973 graduate of Reed College in Oregon who had earned his Ph.D. from Stanford just months earlier, Goldyn was an unmistakable figure on Oxy's campus. To say that Goldyn was out "would be an understatement," political science major Ken Sulzer recalled. Goldyn was "funny, engaging," and wore "these really tight bright yellow pants and open-toed sandals." Gay liberation was not part of the Comparative Politics course, but Goldyn drew "a good-sized crowd" one evening during that term when he spoke on gay activism, and a column he wrote for the student newspaper ended by declaring that "the point of liberation, sexual or otherwise, is to rewrite the rules."

Goldyn made a huge impact on Barry Obama. Almost a quarter century later, asked about his understanding of gay issues, Obama enthusiastically said, "my favorite professor my first year in college was one of the first openly gay people that I knew . . . He was a terrific guy" with whom Obama developed a "friendship" beyond the classroom. Four years later, in a similar interview, Obama again brought up Goldyn. "He was the first . . . openly gay person of authority that I had come in contact with. And he was just a terrific guy," displaying "comfort in his own skin," and the "strong friendship" that "we developed helped to educate me" about gayness.

Goldyn years later would remember that Obama "was not fearful of being associated with me" in terms of "talking socially" and "learning from me" after as well as in class. Three years later, Obama wrote somewhat elusively to his first intimate girlfriend that he had thought about and considered gayness, but ultimately had decided that a same-sex relationship would be less challenging and demanding than developing one with the opposite sex. But there is no doubting that Goldyn gave eighteen-year-old Barry a vastly more positive and uplifting image of gay identity and self-confidence than he had known in Honolulu.<sup>2</sup>

Gayness was not one of the subjects discussed every night in Haines Annex's grungy alcove in early 1980. But the residents did talk about the Soviet Union's recent invasion of Afghanistan. Then, on January 23, President Jimmy Carter in his State of the Union speech announced that he would ask Congress to register young men in preparation for possibly reinstating a military draft to augment the U.S.'s all-volunteer forces. That news gave Oxy's small band of politically conscious students a new issue to use to regenerate significant student activism.

Two years earlier, a trio of Oxy students—Andy Roth, Gary Chapman, and Doyle Van Fossen—had responded to a challenge posed by the well-known political activist Ralph Nader during an early 1978 campus speech. Occidental, Nader noted, had some $3 million of its endowment invested in more than a dozen corporations such as IBM, Ford, General Motors, and Bank of America that did business in South Africa, which was known for its harshly racist system of apartheid. In reaction, the undergraduate Democratic Socialist Fellowship formed a Student Coalition Against Apartheid (SCAA) to demand that Oxy divest its stock holdings in companies that continued to operate there.

SCAA quickly gathered more than eight hundred student signatures on a petition calling for divestment, but in early April 1978, Oxy president Gilman rebuffed the students' request. A week later a protest rally of more than three hundred, including Oxy's only African American faculty member, Mary Jane Hewitt, greeted a board of trustees' meeting that affirmed Gilman's refusal. Several weeks later Hewitt resigned from Oxy after she was denied promotion to a higher rank, and the trio of student leaders submitted an angry letter to Oxy's weekly newspaper saying that in light of those two outcomes "we are forced to conclude that a racial bias permeates this institution."

By the 1978–79 academic year, the trustees' finance committee chairman, Harry Colmery, debated Gary Chapman, head of the newly renamed Democratic Socialist Alliance (DSA) at a campus forum, but then the board announced it had ceded investment decisions to a mutual fund, thus ostensibly rendering the entire issue moot. Oxy's faculty responded in May 1979 by adopting a resolution condemning the board's action, but in June the trustees again reaffirmed their refusal to divest.

In early 1980, the Los Angeles Times ran two stories about Oxy and its students that highlighted how significant increases in tuition and room and board fees would raise an undergraduate's annual tab to $8,200 the next fall. Oxy's student body was called "introspective" by one senior, and the reporter stated that "student life today" in Eagle Rock "seems placid, serene, contemplative." Given that portrait, a turnout of more than five hundred students at an afternoon protest rally just a week after Carter's nationally televised speech was a dramatic triumph for Oxy's DSA. But a second meeting drew only 150 students, and a teach-in two weeks later attracted just sixty. As winter term ended in mid-March, a student newspaper headline signaled the short-lived movement's demise: "Anti-Draft Activism Fades with Finals."<sup>3</sup>

Oxy's small black student population, about seventy in 1979–80, represented a marked decline from more than 120 just three years earlier. Academic attrition was high, the student paper reported, and after Mary Jane Hewitt's resignation, two brand-new assistant professors, one in French, the other in American Studies, represented Oxy's entire black faculty. A young black graduate of Vassar College was a newly hired assistant dean, but by spring she had submitted her resignation before a student petition effort led Oxy to successfully request that she withdraw it. Two black male sophomores, Earl Chew and Neil Moody, petitioned to establish a chapter of the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity, citing "a serious social and cultural problem on campus" for minority students. Chew, a St. Louis native, had graduated from tony Phillips Exeter Academy in New Hampshire and weeks earlier had taken the lead in creating an Oxy lacrosse team. But blacks at Oxy, Chew and Moody said, suffered from "a lack of cohesiveness, a generally present personal sense of being members of an ethnic minority group which cannot engage in collective achievement." Indeed, when Oxy's yearbook, La Encina, scheduled its 1979–80 photo of Ujima, the African American undergraduate group, only fourteen students showed up to appear in the picture. Barry Obama was not one of them.

Haines Annex's short hallway was home to three other black male undergraduates besides Barry, sophomores Neil Moody and Ricky Johnson and freshman Willard Hankins Jr., but Obama did not develop relationships with any of them like he did with the crew of late-night alcove regulars. Most Oxy black students, particularly those from greater Los Angeles, stuck pretty much together. "There is a certain amount of minority segregation in the dining hall and in the quad," the student paper observed. Black students who did not follow that pattern stood out.

Judith Pinn Carlisle's African American mother had graduated from Howard University, her white father from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. She and her two siblings all attended junior high schools in Greenwich, Connecticut, but a family financial setback during Judith's high school years had her living in South Central Los Angeles while she attended Oxy. Shy and quiet, “I kept to myself,” she said, and as a result, “I was challenged by many people on that campus as to my black legitimacy,” notwithstanding how “I’m living at Crenshaw and Adams” in the heart of black L.A. Earl Chew was a particular antagonist, treating Judith as if she was “a sellout,” she recalled. Chew “did not like me” and the hostility “was very disturbing.”

Sophomore Eric Moore’s mother had also graduated from Howard, and Eric grew up in mostly white, upper-middle-class Boulder, Colorado. “There weren’t that many black students on campus and there weren’t that many that went outside of the black clique,” he recounted. Eric had a diverse set of friends, including a junior from Karachi, Pakistan, Hasan Chandoo, who had grown up largely in Singapore and transferred to Oxy after a freshman year at Windham College in Vermont. Also from Karachi was sophomore Wahid Hamid, who roomed with French-born sophomore Laurent Delanney. Both Hamid and Chandoo had long known Imad Husain, Barry Obama’s roommate. By the spring of 1980 Chandoo was living off-campus with Vinai Thummalapally, an Indian graduate student who along with Hasan’s cousin Ahmed Chandoo was attending California State University and whose girlfriend, Barbara Nichols-Roy, who had also grown up in India, was an Oxy junior. As Eric Moore later said, they had “our own little UN there.”

Eric remembers Obama as always having “that big beaming smile,” and says he was “always in a Hawaiian shirt and some OP shorts and flip-flops.” Indeed, he says, Barry seemed “more Hawaiian and Asian and international in his acculturation than certainly he was African American.” Obama “hadn’t had an urban African American experience at all,” and at Oxy “many of the local Los Angeles African Americans were not as receptive to the cultural diversity” on campus as Eric was. Barry was “a little isolated from that group,” and just as Judith experienced, “there was some pushback from certain individuals.”

Earl Chew was the most widely visible African American student on campus, and while some found him hostile, Hasan Chandoo considered him a “really wonderful friend.” African American freshman Kim Kimbrew, later Amiekoleh Usafi, remembers Earl as “a bright and shining person” who was “just completely committed” to black advancement. Like Eric, she viewed Barry as “a really relaxed boy from Hawaii who wore flip-flops and shorts.” Obama once asked her to “come over here and talk to me,” Kim recalled. “I don’t know if he’d ever really been around black women at that point” and in terms of pursuing women, “he seemed to keep himself away from all of that.”<sup>4</sup>

Spring term began the last week of March and lasted until early June. Barry, along with Paul Carpenter, was in a third core political science course, this one on international relations and cotaught by professors Larry Caldwell and Carlos Alan Egan. Junior Susan Keselenko found Egan “a very romantic figure,” but the course itself was “really tedious.” A significant portion of it involved pairs of nine-student teams contending with each other in a multistage group paper exercise that Keselenko would remember as “very kind of mechanical.” Susan and a fellow junior, Caroline Boss, ended up in “Group Y” along with Barry; Paul Carpenter was in the opposing “Group A.” Boss, a political science major and active DSA member who as a freshman had run on the progressive slate for Oxy’s student government offices, served as the group’s informal leader. In mid-May Caroline and Susan orally presented Group Y’s six-page paper, “The MX Missile: Bigger Is Not Better.”

In the January State of the Union speech that had generated Oxy’s draft registration protests, President Carter also had proposed spending as much as $70 billion to build two hundred mobile, ten-warhead-apiece MX missiles that would be deployed all across the U.S. Southwest. Attacking Carter's proposal as "an unnecessary, economically and environmentally devastating venture," Group Y said that if implemented, the MX project "will destabilize the international balance, accelerate the arms race, and increase the likelihood of nuclear war"—the same themes that one group member's father had publicly articulated exactly eighteen years earlier!

Whichever instructor gave it a C was not impressed. The paper had "a certain superficial fluency or glibness," he wrote, but "it demonstrates a very great disregard for careful thought, little concept of how one analyzes an issue, and fails to make a persuasive argument." Ouch. Carpenter's Group A was hardly kinder in their critique, asserting that "Group Y's paper as a whole lacked original analysis" and that "vital contradictions . . . undermined their thesis considerably." Y then penned a rebuttal as well as their critique of Group A's own paper, which addressed the 1978 Camp David Accords. The critique received an A even though it contained multiple obvious spelling errors, including "Palestenians," and creation of the verb "abilitated." Obama appears to have orally presented Group Y's critique, for in the margin alongside their paper's statement that "A settlement amenable to the oil producing Arab states does not insure an improved position for the U.S. in regard to oil," one of his fellow students penned "Barry > abandon Israel will not protect U.S. oil access."

Outside of class, regular activities from earlier in the academic year continued apace. Humorous event listings in the somewhat tardy April Fools' issue of the student newspaper included one announcing that "Haines Annex will host a religious revival this Wednesday at 8:00. Participants will be asked to let their hair down for one night in an effort to communicate with extra-terrestrial Gods utilizing the means of herbal stimuli." Just as at Punahou a year earlier, there was hardly anything secretive about some students' recreational preferences.

One Saturday Barry, Eric Moore, and seniors Mark Anderson and Romeo Garcia went to a music festival in nearby Pasadena Central Park. Eric remembered that "we were culture and music hounds," but with Oxy being an "island in the barrio" of surrounding Eagle Rock, Obama would join him on drives to South Central Los Angeles to get their hair cut. Sometimes the police pulled over Eric and Barry. "It was par for the course," Moore explained years later.

The April 4, 1979, execution of former Pakistani president Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, who had been deposed two years earlier in a military coup led by General Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq, had greatly intensified Pakistan's political turmoil and also caught the attention of several Oxy students. Hasan Chandoo had grown up in a politically aware family, and his mother was a distant relation of Pakistan's revered founder, Muhammad Ali Jinnah. Chandoo's girlfriend Margot Mifflin, a sophomore who had started an Oxy field hockey team that Hasan volunteered to coach because he found its star player so attractive, knew best how "passionate" Chandoo's hatred was for the military dictatorship. "I think I recall Hasan spray painting 'Death to Zia' somewhere on campus," she later recounted. Pakistan was a regular topic of discussion in the Haines Annex alcove and even more so in the Freeman student union snack bar that everyone called the Cooler. Open during the day and then again from 8:00 P.M. to 11:30 P.M., the Cooler was the favorite hangout for Oxy's most politically conscious students, like Caroline Boss, as well as for self-identified literati like Chuck Jensvold, a junior transfer from a community college who was five years older than his classmates.

By spring term 1980, Barry was an evening regular there too. “Obama always seemed to be in there,” smoking and drinking coffee, “just jousting back and forth with whoever would come,” Eric Moore remembered. One day when Barry walked into the Cooler, Caroline Boss from his political science class introduced him to Susan Keselenko’s roommate, junior Lisa Jack, an aspiring portrait photographer. Lisa already had been told that Barry was this “hot” guy, and seeing that he indeed was “really cute,” she asked if she could take a roll of photos of him. Barry readily agreed, and a few days later he walked over to Lisa and Susan’s nearby apartment. Wearing jeans, a dress shirt, and a leather bomber jacket with a fur collar, Barry also wore a ring on his left index finger, a digital watch on his left wrist, and a bushy Afro that was in need of a drive to South Central. Jack’s first fifteen photos captured Obama smiling and smoking while sitting on a simple couch. Then Obama doffed the jacket, rolled up his shirtsleeves, and put on a colorful Panama hat he had brought along. Jack shot eighteen pictures of Obama wearing the hat, then a final three of him bareheaded. Throughout them all, Obama looked without question happy, carefree, and very young for eighteen years of age.

Over a quarter century later, when Jack discovered her old negatives and sold publication rights for some of them to Time magazine, former Oxy classmates who had clear memories of Obama’s daily appearance during those years said the guy in the photos bore little resemblance to how they remembered him. “That’s not how he looked or dressed,” Eric Moore commented. John Boyer was even more succinct: “That’s not him.”<sup>5</sup>

After spring term exams, Barry spent some of the summer living with Vinai Thummalapally in the apartment Vinai and Hasan Chandoo had shared. Barry returned to Hawaii for at least part of the summer, and on July 29 he registered for the reinstated military draft at a Honolulu post office. His almost ten-year-old sister Maya had landed in Hawaii twelve days earlier; their mother, Ann, apparently had arrived some weeks previously, because on June 15, a local attorney had filed her signed divorce complaint against Lolo in the same court where sixteen years earlier Ann had divorced Barry’s biological father. Ann’s filing said that “the marriage is irretrievably broken”; in a supporting document she stated that “husband has not contributed to support of wife and children since 1974,” was “living with another woman” and “wishes to remarry.” Ann reported that she was living “in 4-bedroom house provided by” DAI, her employer, and that she had “2 full-time live-in domestics.” The decree she and Lolo signed stated that Lolo “shall not be required to provide for the support, maintenance, and education” of Maya.

Ann and Maya were again staying with Alice Dewey, but Barry was back with his grandparents in their apartment near Punahou. As Obama later told it, one morning Stan and Madelyn argued over her wanting him to drive her to the Bank of Hawaii instead of her continuing her years-long pattern of taking a bus. Madelyn said that on the previous morning an aggressive panhandler had continued to confront her even after she gave him a dollar. Barry offered to drive her downtown, but Stanley objected. He said Madelyn had experienced this before and had been able to shrug it off, but now her fear was greater simply because this panhandler was black. That angered Stan, who refused to take her.

In Obama’s later telling, Stan’s use of the word “black” was “like a fist in my stomach, and I wobbled to regain my composure.” Stan apologized for telling Barry, and said he would drive Madelyn downtown. Then they left. Stanley’s obvious comfort with people of color, as well as his liberal political leanings, may not have been fully shared by now fifty-seven-year-old Madelyn, and in Obama’s recounting years later he added that never had either grandparent “given me reason to doubt their love.” Yet he was struck by the realization that men “who might easily have been my brothers” could spur Madelyn’s “rawest fears,” at least when they aggressively approached her at close quarters.

Obama says he went that evening to see Frank Marshall Davis, who was now approaching his seventy-fifth birthday. Frank’s poetry from the years before his 1948 move to Hawaii was now being rediscovered and studied by a younger generation of African American literature scholars, several of whom had interviewed Frank about his long and fascinating life. Barry recounted his grandparents’ argument, and Frank asked if Barry knew that he and Barry’s grandparents had grown up hardly fifty miles apart in south central Kansas at a time when young black men were expected to step off the sidewalk if a white pedestrian approached. Barry hadn’t. Frank remembered Stan telling him that when Ann was young, he and Madelyn had hired a young black woman as a babysitter and that she had become “a regular part of the family.” Frank scoffed at that patronizing, but told Barry that Stanley was a good man even if he could never understand what it felt like to be black and how those feelings could affect black people.

“What I’m trying to tell you is, your grandma’s right to be scared. She’s at least as right as Stanley is. She understands that black people have a reason to hate. That’s just how it is. For your sake, I wish it was otherwise. But it’s not. So you might as well get used to it.” In Obama’s telling, Frank then fell asleep in his chair, and Barry left. Walking to the car, “the earth shook under my feet, ready to crack open at any moment. I stopped, trying to steady myself, and knew for the first time that I was utterly alone.”

That night was apparently the last time Obama saw Frank Marshall Davis. But no matter how overdramatized Obama’s later account may have been, his previous nine months at Oxy had exposed him for the very first time to mainland African Americans who had a racial consciousness that a Hawaiian who had hardly ever experienced even minor racial mistreatment could not grasp any more than his sixty-two-year-old white grandfather could understand what four decades of being a black man in mainland America had taught his friend Frank. And black Oxy students from South Central L.A. or St. Louis had more trouble feeling at ease in a 90 percent white institution than someone from Punahou could. Barry Obama’s Oxy classmates were not being racially obtuse when they saw their happy, relaxed, and reserved friend as a multiethnic Hawaiian rather than a black American.<sup>6</sup>

Oxy’s fall term classes began at the end of September 1980. By then, Barry had accepted Hasan Chandoo’s invitation to share a two-bedroom ground-floor apartment in a small two-story, multiunit building at 253 East Glenarm Street in South Pasadena, a fifteen-minute drive from Oxy. Before the dorms opened, Hasan’s younger friend Asad Jumabhoy, an Indian-origin Muslim also from Singapore who was an entering freshman, crashed on their living room couch. Hasan had a yellow Fiat 128S, and Barry soon acquired a beat-up red Fiat coupe. Vinai Thummalapally and an Indian roommate lived upstairs, and Barry sometimes gave Vinai’s girlfriend Barbara a lift to or from Oxy.

Living off campus, Barry spent more time hanging out in the Cooler between and after classes. Cooler regular Caroline Boss cochaired Oxy’s Democratic Socialist Alliance, in which Hasan was active, and Hasan was also still coaching Margot Mifflin’s field hockey team. As Margot and Hasan got more involved, Margot and her roommate, Dina Silva, spent increasing time at Hasan and Barry’s apartment. “They had great social gatherings, parties, dinners,” Dina recalled, and Imad Husain and Paul Carpenter, still living in Haines Annex, plus Paul’s girlfriend Beth Kahn, were among the regulars. “They used to throw a great party there,” Paul agreed. “Food and dancing and a great mix of folks,” including Bill Snider and Sim Heninger from the old Haines Annex crowd plus Wahid Hamid, Eric Moore, and Laurent Delaney. Barry and Hasan went on outings with Wahid or Vinai and Barbara to places like Venice, where Margot took a photo of Barry, Wahid, Hasan, and Hasan's cousin Ahmed all wearing roller skates.

Whether in the Cooler or at Glenarm, Hasan's passionate interest in politics dominated many discussions. Hasan was "very outspoken about his political views, very aggressive, opinionated, extroverted," Margot remembers, and identified himself as a Marxist—at least "to the extent that any of us knew what we were talking about," as Susan Keselenko sheepishly puts it. Asad Jumabhoy concurs that "Hasan was very radical at the time" and "had very strong views and he could support his argument very well." To Chris Welton, who returned to Oxy that fall after a year abroad and soon became a close friend after meeting Hasan in one of Roger Boesche's classes, what everyone in Hasan's circle shared was "an outlook" that contemplated the wider world beyond "the borders of the United States." The crux of their orientation was "international, period," or what Caroline Boss called a "more globalized perspective" than undergraduates who had experienced only the mainland U.S. could envision.

Irrespective of the venue, Hasan was "a force to be reckoned with," Paul Carpenter recalls; Sim Heninger terms him "just a domineering personality." Compared to Hasan, who "cursed like a sailor" while smoking incessantly, everyone saw Barry as quiet, measured, and reserved. Chris Welton remembers him as "a keen observer," Caroline Boss would call him "mainly an observer." Dina Silva thought of Barry as "quiet," "thoughtful," and "contemplative" during conversations. Obama "was listening and absorbing everything much more than being demonstrative," Paul Anderson recalls. "He would watch people—that is what I remember," artist friend and junior Shelley Marks recollects. "I specifically remember him being quiet and watching and observing."

During the 1980–81 academic year, Barry and Hasan became the closest of friends. Hasan's girlfriend Margot describes it as "an affectionate relationship," one that "wasn't hampered by masculinity issues. They were open with each other, affectionate with each other," for Hasan was "an open, intimate, direct person." Often the two of them would sit and study in their kitchen; Chandoo can picture Obama reading Martin Luther King Jr.'s "Letter from a Birmingham Jail" at that kitchen table. Some nights Barry studied in a glass-enclosed area in the library's basement that everyone called the Fishbowl. Other nights Margot Mifflin and Dina Silva would join Hasan and Barry to study on East Glenarm. Marijuana was a regular though perhaps not nightly relaxant for Hasan and Barry. "I got stoned with him many times," Margot acknowledged when asked about that 1980–81 year. And, on a less regular basis, "we did occasionally snort cocaine" at Glenarm as well, although it was "not a routine part" of their lives at that time. Sim Heninger can remember nights of "uproar and hilarity" at Barry and Hasan's apartment, but also at least one scene that was "a little scary for me." Bill Snider, reflecting back on both Obama's freshman and sophomore years, deftly remarks that "his memory may be a little hazy" both from those nights at Haines Annex and from the subsequent regular parties on Glenarm.<sup>7</sup>

In mid-October 1980 Roger Boesche and faculty colleague Eric Newhall failed badly in an effort to persuade Oxy's faculty to adopt a resolution demanding that the college divest itself of stock holdings in companies still doing business in South Africa. Oxy's student newspaper immediately noted that two years earlier student activism had forced the issue to the top of Oxy's agenda. Just days later, Caroline Boss announced that she and friends were reviving the Student Coalition Against Apartheid (SCAA). Oxy president Richard Gilman dismissed divestment as "an altogether too simplistic solution" while nonetheless acknowledging "the racist conditions in South Africa," but a young sociology professor, Dario Longhi, who had studied in Zambia, took the lead in organizing a series of expert visiting speakers on South Africa for late in the fall term. Earl Chew took an active role while also complaining that Oxy lacked a “multicultural curriculum and social life” and needed far greater diversity.

Sometime late in the fall term, Eric Moore and Hasan Chandoo had conversations with Barry Obama about his name. Eric had spent part of the previous summer in Kenya as part of Crossroads Africa, a student educational program that dated from 1958 and in which Oxy was an active collegiate participant. “What kind of name is Barry Obama—for a brother?” Eric asked him one day. “Actually, my name’s Barack Obama,” came the answer. “I go by Barry so that I don’t have to explain my name all the time.” Moore was struck by Barack. “That’s a very strong name,” he told Obama, who then raised the issue with Hasan one day while they walked across campus. Chandoo agreed, and liked Barry’s middle name too. While most close friends like Paul Carpenter and Wahid Hamid had called him “Obama” instead of Barry and stuck with that usage, from that day forward Eric, joined only by Bill Snider, began addressing him as Barack while Hasan, being Hasan, would sometimes say “Barack Hussein,” as Asad Jumabhoy clearly remembers even thirty years later. Margot Mifflin too “can remember Hasan saying ‘He goes by Barack now,’ and I said, ‘Well, what is Barack?’ and he said ‘That’s his name.’” At the time, she recalls, “it was jarring.”

Over a quarter century later, Obama would say that he saw the change from Barry to Barack as “an assertion that I was coming of age, an assertion of being comfortable with the fact that I was different and that I didn’t need to try to fit in in a certain way.” With his Oxy friends “he would never correct you” if he was addressed as Barry, Asad explains, but when Obama returned to Honolulu for Christmas 1980, he told his mother and his sister that from now on he would no longer use his childhood nickname and instead would identify himself as Barack Obama. But to his family, just as with Hasan, Eric, and Bill, the name change signified no break in who they thought he was. As Snider explained, “I did not think of Barack as black. I did think of him as the Hawaiian surfer guy.”<sup>8</sup>

Long breaks between academic terms gave Barack and his best friends plenty of opportunities to travel. One week Barack and Wahid Hamid headed down to Mexico, then northward to Oregon, in Obama’s red Fiat. Two days before the end of fall term exams, Hasan and Barack showed up in the Oxy library with a surprise birthday cake for Caroline Boss, who was hard at work on her senior thesis and whom they spoke with almost every day in the Cooler. Caroline invited the duo to stop by her family home in Portola Valley, near Stanford, over the holidays when Hasan and Barack would be on the road in Hasan’s yellow Fiat. Either before or after a New Year’s Eve party in San Francisco at which Hasan introduced Barack to another Pakistani friend, Sohale Siddiqi, Hasan and Barack arrived at midday at Boss’s home.

Her boyfriend John Drew, a 1979 magna cum laude Oxy political science graduate, was also there; he was in his second year of graduate school at Cornell University. Boss had spent the summer of 1980 in Ithaca taking summer classes, and Drew knew Caroline as “a fun, scintillating, hyper-extroverted,” and “intellectually vibrant” young woman who, despite her adoptive parents’ significant wealth, worked cleaning an Oxy professor’s home. That winter day in San Mateo County, the four young people headed out to lunch with Caroline’s parents; Drew recalled much of their conversation focusing on Latin America and particularly El Salvador. Back at the Bosses’ home, as Drew remembered it, he and Obama got into a “high-intensity” argument about the relevance of Marxist analysis to contemporary politics. Drew’s “most vivid memory” was how strongly Obama “argued a rather simple-minded version of Marxist theory” and that “he was passionate about his point of view.”

Drew recalled Obama citing the work of the late French Caribbean decolonization scholar Frantz Fanon. At Oxy Drew had been active in the democratic socialist student group, but a course that past fall with Cornell’s Peter Katzenstein had significantly altered Drew’s views. “I made a strong argument that his Marxist ideas were not in line with contemporary reality—particularly the practical experience of Western Europe,” Drew would recount years later. In Drew’s memory, “Caroline was a little shocked that her old boyfriend was suddenly this reactionary conservative,” but Obama shifted to downplay their degree of disagreement, conceding that there was validity to some of Drew’s points. Drew briefly saw Barack three more times during the remaining six months of his relationship with Boss before finishing his Ph.D., teaching at Williams College, and evolving into an ardent Tea Party conservative.<sup>9</sup>

Oxy’s 1981 winter classes began on January 6. For the first two weeks of January, Hasan’s friend Sohale, who now lived in New York City, joined them in the Glenarm apartment as they hosted almost nightly parties. For Barack, though, this new term would be by far the most academically and politically engaging ten weeks of his collegiate career. One course he chose, Introduction to Literary Analysis, was taught by English professor Anne Howells, who had been at Oxy almost fifteen years. Utilizing the popular Norton Introduction to Literature, Howells had her fifteen students devote the first five weeks of the term to a “close reading of poetry—old-fashioned textual analysis” and then five weeks to reading short stories. There was “not very much reading, but a lot of writing”—five papers in the course of ten weeks. Barack “spoke well in class,” Howells would recall, and submitted well-written papers, but “he wasn’t a really committed student” and was late with assignments more than once.

Obama also enrolled in English 110, Creative Writing, which met Tuesday and Friday mornings 10:00 A.M. until 12:00 P.M., with David James, an Englishman who had graduated from Cambridge in 1967 and earned his Ph.D. at the University of Pennsylvania in 1971. After teaching for nine years at the University of California at Riverside, James had arrived at Oxy just four months earlier. He required interested students to submit a writing sample prior to registration, an indication of the seriousness he brought to his teaching. At least five of the dozen or so students in the small class were earnest aspiring writers: Jeff Wettleson, Mark Dery, Hasan’s girlfriend Margot Mifflin, and Bill Snider and Chuck Jensvold, the older transfer student, both of whom Barack had known since his freshman year.

David James was “a marvelous character,” Dery recalled, “a classic British Marxist film theory jock” who was “a very penetrating analyst of poetry.” James handed out copies of contemporary poems he believed students would find stimulating, including ones by Sylvia Plath, W. S. Merwin, and Charles Bukowski, but viewed the course as “essentially a workshop to facilitate the students’ own compositions.” Jensvold’s presence was especially generative, for writing “seemed to define his whole being,” James remembered. In particular, Jensvold had an acute “eye for concrete detail” and knew that “amassing an inventory of details” was invaluable to a creative writer. Dery also appreciated Jensvold’s presence in what became “a very invigorating class.” Chuck was “an exemplar of the serious writer,” and as an older student he was “almost our mentor.” Dery and another classmate each referred to Jensvold as “hard-boiled,” and that classmate warmly remembered Chuck as “the Bogart of Occidental.”

Dery also recalled James as “a strict disciplinarian” who “didn’t suffer fools gladly” and had “zero tolerance for undergraduate lackadaisicalism.” A growing problem as the term progressed was students

“straggling into class late.” One morning an angry James announced, “I am going to lock the door.” Soon a figure appeared outside the frosted glass door, unsuccessfully trying the handle. James did not react, nor to an ensuing tap or two on the classroom window. Finally Dery took the initiative to open the door, and in strolled Barack Obama. To Dery, Barack was “some species of GQ Marxist,” but an “almost painfully diffident” one whose “caginess,” even in the Cooler, made it hard to know “what he truly thought.”

A third course that winter was Political Science 133 III, the final trimester of Roger Boesche’s upper-level survey of political thought, this one covering from Nietzsche through Weber to Foucault. The fifteen or so students included Hasan as well as Barack’s former Haines Annex neighbor Ken Sulzer. Although memories three decades later would be hazy on the exact details, the results of two different assignments were notable in disparate ways. Sulzer and his friend John Boyer recalled seeing Obama heading into the library late one evening before an exam or paper was due. A day or so later, pleased with his own A-, Sulzer asked Barack what he had gotten, but Obama demurred. Sulzer grabbed Barack’s blue book and was astonished that Obama had gotten a higher A than he had.

Some weeks later, though, Boesche returned a paper on which he had given Obama a B. As both Barack and Boesche later recounted, within days, Obama encountered his young professor in the Cooler and asked, “Why did I get a B on this?” Boesche viewed Obama as “a student who gives incredibly good answers in class” but failed to consistently live up to his ability level on written assignments that required sustained preparation. In the Cooler, Boesche told Obama that he was smart, but “You didn’t apply yourself,” that he “wasn’t working hard enough.” Barack responded, in essence, “I’m working as hard as I can.” Boesche knew better than to believe that, but Obama would remain irritated about that B even a quarter century later, especially because Hasan Chandoo, not known for his academic diligence, received a higher grade for the term than did Barack: “I knew that even though I hadn’t studied that I knew this stuff much better than my classmates.” Obama believed Boesche was “grading me on a different curve, and I was pissed.”

Obama would allude to that experience a half-dozen times in later years, often not expressly mentioning Boesche but recounting how “I had some wonderful professors . . . who started giving me a hard time. . . . ‘Why don’t you try to apply yourself a little bit?’ And that made a big difference” in later years as Obama gradually came to appreciate that he was much smarter and far more analytically gifted than anyone who knew him at either Punahou or Occidental fully realized in those times and places.<sup>10</sup>

Early 1981 was just as significant politically for Obama as it was academically. A listless rally on the first day of classes resulted in an Oxy newspaper headline reporting “Students Lack Interest on Draft Issue.” Six days later, an evening appearance by Dick Gregory, the comedian and political activist, that Hasan played a lead role in engineering, attracted a huge crowd of 550. Greeted by the “thunderous applause,” Gregory then spoke for more than two hours, offering up a pastiche of loony assertions about election tampering and CIA and FBI involvement in the killings of both Kennedy brothers and Martin Luther King Jr., all somewhat leavened by countless humorous asides.

Two days later, a far more serious student forum explored all manner of prejudices at Oxy itself, with African American junior Earl Chew confessing, “Coming here was hard for me. A lot of things that I knew as a black student, that I knew as a black, period, weren’t accepted on this campus.” Three days later, in response to a flyer distributed on campus, Hasan and Barack drove to Beverly Hills to join 350 others in a silent candlelight vigil protesting the opening of a new South African consulate on Wilshire Boulevard.

Relocation of the office there, from San Francisco, had attracted hundreds of protesters three months earlier when the consulate first opened. The vigil was cosponsored by the Gathering, a two-year-old South Central clergy coalition led by Dr. King's closest L.A. friend, Rev. Thomas Kilgore, the L.A. chapter of King's old Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and the antinuclear Alliance for Survival.

Four days after that event, Thamsanqa "Tim" Ngubeni, a thirty-one-year-old South African member of the African National Congress living in exile in Los Angeles, addressed a lunchtime crowd of students on Oxy's outdoor Quad. Born on the outskirts of Johannesburg in 1949, Ngubeni had joined the South African Students' Organization in his early twenties and moved to Cape Town. A friend of prominent student leader Steve Biko, Ngubeni was arrested by South African authorities and imprisoned for several months before leaving South Africa and eventually making his way to L.A. in 1974, three years before Biko was killed while in South African police custody. A soccer scholarship enabled Ngubeni to attend UCLA, where he helped initiate the Afrikan Education Project and led demonstrations against the Bank of America's involvement in South Africa.

In his January 21 speech at Oxy, Ngubeni told the students that South African apartheid "causes human beings to be considered as second-class citizens within their own country, the place where they were born and raised." ANC's goal was for black South Africans to be "recognized as human beings" in a country that had "more prisons than schools." Ngubeni defended the ANC's own use of violence against the South African regime, emphasizing that "we've been negotiating with them all these years while they were shooting us down in the streets." He challenged Oxy's students to reconsider which banks they patronized given how Bank of America and Security Pacific, like IBM and General Motors, continued to do business in South Africa.

Ngubeni often preached that "if you live for yourself, you live in vain. If you live for others, you live forever," and his remarks that day certainly made an indelible impression on at least one of his young listeners. Barack Obama would tell two student interviewers a quarter century later that his meeting an ANC representative was the first time he thought about his "responsibilities to help shape the larger world." Hasan's intense politicization and their drive to Beverly Hills for the candlelight protest against South African apartheid were, like Roger Boesche's professorial reprimand, the beginnings of an evolution that would flower more fully in the years ahead.<sup>11</sup>

As winter term approached its midpoint, political events took place almost nightly. On Sunday evening, February 8, Hasan and Barack both attended a dinner held by Ujima as part of Black Awareness Month at Oxy. The next night Lawrence Goldyn delivered a scintillating talk, deftly titled "Why Homosexuals Are Revolting." On Tuesday evening, Phyllis Schlafly, the conservative Equal Rights Amendment opponent, spoke at Oxy and was met with heckling from a trio of young men: Hasan Chandoo, Chris Welton, and Barack Obama. But the activist students' primary focus was on the Student Coalition Against Apartheid's upcoming divestment rally on February 18, scheduled to coincide with the next meeting of Oxy's board of trustees. Oxy's paper urged all students to attend since it "has the potential to be the most effective display of student initiative in recent years."<sup>12</sup>

Three students took the lead in organizing the rally: Caroline Boss, Hasan Chandoo, and Chris Welton. Caroline and Hasan decided the roster of speakers, with Hasan recruiting Tim Ngubeni to return as their keynote speaker, while Chris and Hasan handled the logistics for the noontime gathering just outside Oxy's administration building, Coons Hall. No one can remember who first had the idea of opening the rally with a "bit of street theater," in which two supposed South African policemen dragoon a young black speaker who wants to quiet the crowd, but Hasan and Caroline were two of Barack Obama's closest friends. Obama later wrote that he prepared for what he expected would be two minutes of remarks prior to being dragged off.

Margot Mifflin and Chuck Jensvold videotaped the rally for a class project. A large banner calling for "Affirmative Action & Divestment NOW" hung in the background. Two folksingers played "The Harder They Come" and the crowd sang along before Barack, wearing a red T-shirt and white jeans, stepped up to the microphone. It was too low, forcing him to hunch over it. Barack asked "How are you doing this fine day?" before declaring that "We call this rally today to bring attention to Occidental's investment in South Africa and Occidental's lack of investment in multicultural education." The crowd cheered and clapped. Barack, with his right hand in his front pants pocket, nodded and resumed speaking. "At the front and center of higher learning, we find it appalling that Occidental has not addressed these pressing problems." The crowd cheered again, and Barack continued, "There is no—" before Chris Welton and another white student suddenly grabbed him from behind and wrestled him offstage, much sooner than Barack had expected.

"I really wanted to stay up there," Barack later wrote, "to hear my voice bouncing off the crowd and returning back to me in applause. I had so much left to say." In his own fictional retelling, he spoke much longer than actually was the case. "There's a struggle going on," he imagined having said. "I say, there's a struggle going on. It's happening an ocean away. But it's a struggle that touches each and every one of us. Whether we know it or not. Whether we want it or not. A struggle that demands we choose sides." In his recounting, Barack had gone on for another seven or more sentences, drawing cheers from the crowd and imagining that a "connection had been made." But as Margot Mifflin later wrote after watching the videotape she had long retained, Barack's version was "factually inaccurate" and "Obama's speech was not long enough to be galvanic, or really even to be called a speech." A detailed account of the rally in the next issue of Oxy's student paper did not mention the opening skit at all. "Led by chants of 'money out, freedom in,' and 'people united will never be defeated,'" the story said the ninety-minute rally attracted a crowd of more than three hundred, plus several local TV news crews.

As a few Oxy trustees and even President Gilman watched, Caroline Boss introduced Tim Ngubeni, who spoke briefly before giving way to senior Sarah-Etta Harris, a Cleveland native, Philips Exeter graduate, and Ujima leader with a glowing résumé that included a semester's study in Madrid and a summer fellowship in Washington, D.C. A photograph taken by sophomore Tom Grauman during Ngubeni's remarks captured a tall, regal Harris standing well apart from Caroline, Hasan, Obama, and other friends, including Wahid Hamid and Laurent Delanney.

Harris warned the crowd that by continuing to invest in companies that did business in South Africa, Oxy's trustees "are telling us that they support oppression over there and also over here." She then spoke directly about Oxy. "I can count the number of black faculty on two fingers, and black student enrollment has been going down steadily." Harris drew cheers from the audience when she said she found it "hard to believe that the trustees cannot redirect their investments to correct some of the problems we have right here on campus."

Many viewed freshman Becky Rivera as the day's star speaker. "We're upset," she announced, and they were “demanding answers and demanding action.” Margot Mifflin remembers several African American women jumping to their feet during Rivera’s speech and exclaiming, “Say it!” Rivera closed by declaring that “students are responsible for revolutions. Students have power. It starts on the campuses.”

The rally’s final speaker was Ujima president Earl Chew. Caroline Boss remembers him as “so angry and on fire” but also “a kind person.” Chew was a complicated figure because he “had this prep school background, but at the same time he was very street.” After almost three years at Oxy, he was “very disillusioned” with a college that was “so painfully white.” Chew denounced Oxy’s idea of a liberal arts education as “a farce,” and excoriated the college for “taking our tuition and investing it in the oppression of our ancestral people.” Divestment “may not change the apartheid regime, but it’s letting our brothers and sisters in South Africa know that we . . . know better than to oppress other humans for economic gain.” As the rally broke up, Rivera sought out Obama to congratulate him on his role. “He really had been on the fringes politically up until that point,” Rivera recalled. She told him, “I wish you would get more involved,” but rather than thanking Rivera, Obama was simply “noncommittal.”<sup>13</sup>

That evening Hasan and Barack hosted a party to celebrate everyone’s efforts. Caroline Boss remembers her exchanges with Obama that evening and, like Rebecca Rivera earlier, she was annoyed that he was openly moping rather than savoring his role. “I was really annoyed with him” when he started “yapping about how ‘I didn’t do a good job, and I could have said it better.’” As Boss recalled, “we all sort of went ‘Shut up! It was great. It was fine. You did what you were supposed to do. Move on.’” She was irritated that Barack viewed their group effort only in terms of himself. “The rally wasn’t about you developing your technique,” she spat out. “It was about South Africa, not you.”

Obama would recall a similar conversation with Sarah-Etta Harris, who had quietly befriended him a year earlier. Boss’s annoyance was grounded in the many discussions she had had with him in the Cooler, including ones about Obama adopting Barack in place of Barry. “A lot of the year’s conversations when they weren’t about politics was about identity, me talking about being adopted and him talking about sort of this weird experience of who’s his father and where’s his mother.” Caroline’s adoptive parents came from Switzerland, and were now wealthy, but Caroline’s maternal grandparents had been peasants who worked as a janitor and maid in an Interlaken bank. “I was very forthright about my own feelings about my adoptive state,” Boss remembers, and Barack was “absolutely” clear that he was wrestling with his own feelings about having been abandoned by both his birth parents. “That was something where he and I had a kind of a common understanding,” she explains, “of what it means to try to figure all that out.” Regarding his mother, Barack “was just very conflicted that she was absent so much,” yet given her resolute independence “he admired her enormously and of course found her irritating.”

Obama and Boss also discussed “class and race,” with Boss citing her grandmother’s story to argue the primacy of the former over the latter. Her grandmother had “a royal name,” Regina, despite her humble life circumstances, and Boss made Regina “a prominent part of some very intense conversations concerning the relationship between class and race.” She said Barack talked “about a lot of things that he’s seeing and feeling” with regard to race in the U.S. Boss said she would reply, “Yeah, but my grandmother in Switzerland—you have to see this internationally—my grandmother’s scrubbing those floors, and my mother and her brothers aren’t allowed to go into most of the town. The police will come and get them because they’re in the tourists’ place because they’re just these little local brats as far as the town council was concerned, so class is huge.”

Fifteen years later, Obama combined these reprimands into an account of how a woman named “Regina” upbraided him after he responds to her kudos about his skit with cynical sarcasm, saying that it was “a nice, cheap thrill” and nothing more. Regina replies that he had sounded sincere, and when Obama calls her naive, Regina counters that “If anybody’s naive, it’s you” and tells him his real problem: “You always think everything’s about you. . . . The rally is about you. The speech is about you. The hurt is always your hurt. Well, let me tell you something . . . It’s not just about you. It’s never just about you. It’s about people who need your help.”

In Obama’s telling, that night at the party another friend approaches and recalls the awful messes they had left in the Haines Annex hallway a year earlier for the poor Mexican cleaning ladies, to which Barack manages a weak smile. “Regina” angrily asks Obama why he thinks that’s funny. “That could have been my grandmother,” she said. “She had to clean up behind people for most of her life. I bet the people she worked for thought it was funny too.” In truth, it was not Harris but another African American woman, young American studies professor Arthé Anthony, who had objected when someone mentioned the dorm messes during a conversation in Barack and Hasan’s kitchen.

In future years, Obama would embrace the mantra of “It’s not about you” as a core life lesson and as a powerful antidote to what he described as “the constant, crippling fear that I didn’t belong somehow.” He would invoke the story of a cleaning lady “having to clean up after our mess” on subsequent occasions both obscure and prominent, and would cite a friend’s rebuke about her grandmother having cleaned up other people’s messes. With one interviewer, Obama would fuzz the details, saying, “I remember having a conversation with somebody and them saying to me that, you know, ‘It’s not about you, it’s about what you can do for other people.’ And something clicked in my head, and I got real serious after that.”

Obama would recite the moral of the story—“It’s not about you. Not everything’s about you”—without naming Harris, Boss, or Anthony. In one rendition, Obama said the rebuke had come from a female professor, but in his written account of that night, he gave Regina the biography of the tall, regal Sarah-Etta Harris. His physical description of Harris was distorted—only her “tinted, oversized glasses” match up to the Harris of 1981—and he says she was brought up in Chicago, not Cleveland, but the other history he attributes to “Regina” is drawn from Harris’s own undergraduate achievements. Most of Obama’s Oxy friends have difficulty remembering Harris, but “Regina” leaves Oxy “on her way to Andalusia to study Spanish Gypsies.” A 1981 Occidental promotional prospectus highlighted Harris’s receipt of a Watson Fellowship and said she “will travel to Hungary, France, Italy and Spain to study the socio-economic problems of sedentary gypsies of those countries.” Obama’s account accurately details the lifelong impact that Harris’s, Boss’s, and Anthony’s rebukes of his self-centeredness had on him, but the “Regina” story merges no fewer than three conversations into one.<sup>14</sup>

The same issue of the Oxy newspaper that covered the rally on its front page also featured “Rising Above Oxy Through Columbia.” Junior Karla Olson wrote that a year earlier she had been “stuck in a rut” at Oxy. Deciding that she needed to try another institution, “I tried to pick a college the polar opposite of Oxy” and “within a month I had applied and been accepted as a visiting student to Columbia University in New York City.” Upon arriving there, she had been presented with “Columbia’s catalogue of 2,000 or more available classes,” a stark contrast to tiny Occidental. Olson knew Columbia was “an Ivy League school,” but “I soon realized that I wouldn’t have to work nearly as hard as I do at Oxy.” Olson lived in Greenwich Village, where she had easy access to “museums, art galleries, Broadway, Fifth Avenue, Central Park, clubs, bars, restaurants, and a myriad of other diversions.” It seemed as if “95 percent of Columbia students live off-campus, and most go straight home from class . . . making it really hard to meet people,” but “my overall experience at Columbia was fantastic. . . . I learned a lot from my classes and benefited even more from the opportunities New York offered in my spare time.”

At Occidental, many if not most students thought about transferring to larger institutions. Eric Moore, who tried unsuccessfully to transfer to Stanford, believed “most people were trying to transfer from Oxy,” and Phil Boerner, Obama’s across-the-hall friend from Haines Annex, “wanted to attend a larger university” and one that was less “like Peyton Place” than Oxy, where “everybody knew who was dating who.”

Nineteen-year-old Barack Obama had never even passed through New York City, and he knew no one there aside from Hasan’s friend Sohale Siddiqi, but one day he asked Anne Howells, his literature professor, if she would write a letter of recommendation for him to Columbia University. “He wanted a bigger school and the experience of Manhattan,” Howells recalled years later. “I thought it was a good move for him.” Oxy assistant dean Romelle Rowe remembers Barack discussing a transfer to Columbia and saying he wanted “a bigger environment.” Years later Obama would say he transferred “more for what the city had to offer than for” Columbia, that “the idea of being in New York was very appealing.” Crucial too was how his closest friends were soon leaving Occidental. Hasan and Caroline were graduating in June and both were headed for London, Hasan to join his family’s shipping business and Caroline to study at the London School of Economics. Wahid Hamid, in a dual degree program, was about to shift to Cal Tech.

Caroline Boss, with whom Barack spoke most days, agrees that “he did have a lot of us who were graduating,” but “he definitely felt the need to transfer,” and not just because his closest friends were leaving. The biggest factor was Obama’s emerging belief that he ought to make more of himself than he felt able to do at Oxy. When Caroline and Barack discussed their families, he always said “that his father was a chief” of some sort among Kenya’s Luo people and that that lineage represented something he should be proud of, “something to live up to.” A quarter century later, Obama would reflect that if “you don’t have a sense of connection to ancestors . . . you start feeling adrift and . . . you start maybe devaluing yourself and internalizing” self-doubts. Pride in one’s roots can offer “a more powerful sense of direction going forward.” Obama’s conversations with Boss gave him his first-ever opportunity, far more so than with any friend from Punahou or even the voluble Hasan, to verbalize his developing thoughts about the kind of person he thought he should try to become.

Boss remembers “he basically said, ‘I’ve got to bail. I’ve got to get myself to where it’s cold. I have to be in the library’” and someplace where he would have ““access to a black cultural experience that I don’t actually know’” and that would ““make me an American and not just this cosmopolitan guy.”” As Boss remembers, they “talked about why it was important to be Barack. We talked about why it was important to be a man, and why that meant leaving Oxy because he was just going to hang around being a stupid little boy, smoking cigarettes and . . . never getting the A that he knows he’s perfectly capable of because you kind of slide.”

Obama also realized that the beer drinking, pot smoking, and cocaine snorting that Oxy, like Punahou, offered him, and that had cemented his reputation as “a hard-core party animal” to some friends, was incompatible with any self-transformation into a more serious student and person. Sim Heninger and Bill

Snider believed that Obama's decision to apply to Columbia sprang from a desire for greater self-discipline, and over a quarter century later Obama would remark, "I think part of the attraction of transferring was it's hard to remake yourself around people who have known you for a long time." He knew he was at a "dead end" at Oxy and needed a fresh start, that "I need to connect with something bigger than myself." So when Barack mailed his transfer application sometime just before Oxy's spring break began on March 20, at bottom he was making "a conscious decision: I want to grow up."<sup>15</sup>

For Oxy's spring term, Barack, along with scores of other students, enrolled in Lawrence Goldyn's PS 115, Sexual Politics, which met Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. His old Haines Annex friend Paul Anderson took it too and recalls "many times having to stand in the back because there weren't any chairs left."

A new regular for the daily conversations in the Cooler was sophomore Alex McNear, who had arrived at Oxy the previous fall as a transfer from Hunter College in New York City, where she lived. By the end of winter term, she and fellow sophomore Tom Grauman had decided to start a literary magazine at Oxy. They announced the launch of Feast in the Oxy newspaper and invited submissions of short stories and poems for spring term.

Obama had composed two poems in David James's winter term creative writing seminar, and he had presented each in class sometime late in the term. One, a twelve-line composition entitled "Underground," may be no more comprehensible now than it was in 1981:

*Under water grottos, caverns
Filled with apes
That eat figs.
Stepping on the figs
That the apes
Eat, they crunch.
The apes howl, bare
Their fangs, dance, Tumble in the Rushing water,
Musty, wet pelts
Glistening in the blue.*

The second, titled "Pop," made enough of an impression on his listeners in March 1981 that at least two of them still recalled that morning three decades later.

*Sitting in his seat, a seat broad and broken
In, sprinkled with ashes,
Pop switches channels, takes another
Shot of Seagrams, neat, and asks
What to do with me, a green young man Who fails to consider the*

*Flim and flam of the world, since
Things have been easy for me;
I stare hard at his face, a stare
That deflects off his brow;
I'm sure he's unaware of his Dark, watery eyes, that
Glance in different directions,
And his slow, unwelcome twitches,
Fail to pass.
I listen, nod,
Listen, open, till I cling to his pale,
Beige T-shirt, yelling,
Yelling in his ears, that hang
With heavy lobes, but he's still telling
His joke, so I ask why
He's so unhappy, to which he replies . . .
But I don't care anymore, 'cause
He took too damn long, and from Under my seat, I pull out the Mirror I've been saving; I'm laughing,
Laughing loud, the blood rushing from his face
To mine, as he grows small,
A spot in my brain, something
That may be squeezed out, like a Watermelon seed between Two fingers.
Pop takes another shot, neat,
Points out the same amber Stain on his shorts that I've got on mine, and Makes me smell his smell, coming
From me; he switches channels, recites an old poem
He wrote before his mother died,
Stands, shouts, and asks
For a hug, as I shrink, my Arms barely reaching around
His thick, oily neck, and his broad back; 'cause
I see my face, framed within Pop's black-framed glasses

David James can remember Obama “reading that or an early version of that,” and particularly the “amber stain” reference to urine, because of “how powerful an image it was.” But James thought the poem seemed “dispassionate” because it was “neither sentimental nor cruel.” Margot Mifflin, no doubt with “Underground” in mind, noted that Obama’s “previous poems had been more abstract and fanciful,” but “Pop” made a stronger impression because of its “honest ambivalence and because it was so unabashedly personal, especially coming from someone who tended to be reserved.” Mifflin was also impressed that “it wasn’t sentimental. It had an edge of darkness to it, and that made it genuine.”

Alex McNear and her colleagues accepted both of Barack’s poems for Feast’s inaugural issue. When the fifty-page magazine arrived on campus in May, a review in the student newspaper described it as a “most outstanding collegiate example of writing talent” and said copies “should be sent to other colleges.” McNear and her contributors appreciated that praise, and over a quarter century later, Feast would be discovered by a new generation of readers who sought to understand Obama’s poems. Given both the title and the reference to “black-framed glasses,” most commentators presumed that Obama had written about his grandfather, Stan Dunham, not Frank Marshall Davis. But hostile critics focused on how the subject “recites an old poem he wrote before his mother died” and noted that Stan’s mother had killed herself when he was eight years old, yet Barack would forcefully reject the Davis hypothesis. “This is about my grandfather.”<sup>16</sup>

Alex McNear was one of two Occidental women whom male students immediately remembered three decades later. The list of men who actively sought her attention included 1980 graduate Andy Roth, who was in Eagle Rock through February 1981; Phil Boerner, who invited Alex to brunch multiple times; and Feast cofounder Tom Grauman, who found her “a magnetic force” before shifting his gaze to Caroline Boss. But interest in Alex ranged far wider. One upperclassman imagined she was “the most beautiful lesbian I ever knew,” and Susan Keselenko recalled that “everybody had a crush on Alex.”

McNear was unaware of the full degree of interest in her, but she was curious about one fellow sophomore she got to know in the Cooler during spring 1981. To Alex, Barack was “intriguing and interesting and smart and attractive,” and they spoke regularly as the school year wound down. Some friends believed the interest was mutual. “I thought he was pursuing her,” recalled Margot Mifflin, Occidental’s other unforgettable woman. She and the dashing Hasan Chandoo had been a steady couple the entire year, but that did not lessen Margot’s own “magnetism,” Tom Grauman noted. “It’s hard to forget Margot,” said Paul Anderson. “She had a way about her that was captivating.” Chandoo too was a compelling presence. When one classmate compared Hasan to the singer Freddie Mercury, Margot coolly suggested the handsome actor Omar Sharif instead. But perhaps Tom Grauman’s most striking photograph from that spring captures an enchanting Margot addressing a slightly blurred Barack. In contrast, a survey publicized in the student newspaper reported that 32 percent of Oxy women and 17 percent of men admitted that they had never had sex.<sup>17</sup>

Oxy’s black students remained politically marginalized despite the almost nonstop efforts of Earl Chew, who by April was trying to get support for a Black Theme House dormitory. Only nine African American students turned out for Ujima’s annual photo, and when a five-page Black Student Directory was distributed during winter term, one perplexed undergraduate sent a letter to the student paper that asked, “Why does the Oxy black community need their own directory; don’t they know who they are?” Whoever compiled it did not know Obama well, because it spelled his given name as “Barrack.”

Oxy president Gilman announced there would be no further discussion of divestment, yet the controversy continued to percolate even years later. In May Earl Chew, along with Becky Rivera, ran successfully for top student government positions, but Chew's close girlfriend from that year later said she had no memory of Barack working with them at all.<sup>18</sup>

Instead Barack and Hasan channeled their energies into a newly created Oxy chapter of the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador. CISPES had been founded six months earlier to oppose U.S. aid to El Salvador's military government, whose violent death squads had assassinated Roman Catholic archbishop Oscar Romero while he was offering mass in March 1980. CISPES supported El Salvador's left-wing opposition, the Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN), whose ties to the Salvadoran Communist Party had led the FBI to investigate CISPES even before Barack and Hasan helped start Oxy's chapter in early March 1981.

One of Barack's favorite professors, Carlos Alan Egan, had prompted the student interest in El Salvador, and on Saturday, April 18, Barack, Hasan, and Paul Anderson drove to MacArthur Park in L.A.'s Westlake neighborhood for a CISPES event led by actors Ed Asner and Mike Farrell. The short march and ensuing rally attracted a crowd of three thousand as well as counterprotesters from Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church. "We were walking around and absorbing it all," Anderson remembers, and particular enjoyed "exchanging barbs" and "verbally going back and forth" with the hostile Moonies. Scores of banners and signs made for a colorful event. "Long Live the Revolutionary Democratic Front," an FMLN ally, read one; "U.S. Out of El Salvador" demanded another.

With Egan's assistance, Barack, Paul, and Hasan helped organize a mid-May symposium on El Salvador that drew seven prominent speakers to Oxy, including Sister Patricia Krommer, one of the most prominent U.S. supporters of the Salvadoran left. Several academics, a U.S. State Department officer, and a refugee doctor whom Paul would remember as "actually an El Salvadoran revolutionary" were also on the panel. The event drew a crowd of more than three hundred—a larger number than attended the February divestment rally—and the Oxy paper devoted a front-page photo and a lengthy story to the symposium. Paul recalls several right-wing hecklers showing up, and the student organizers "had to have them extracted." Multiple off-campus CISPES events took place during late May and early June, with flyers for all of them distributed on the Oxy campus by student CISPES supporters.<sup>19</sup>

Hasan also organized a Sunday forum featuring former Pakistani Supreme Court justice Ghulam Safdar Shah, who had opposed the military dictatorship's execution of former president Bhutto and been forced from office in late 1980, plus prominent politician Afzal Bangash, who had founded Pakistan's most militant Marxist party in 1968 but was living in exile following Zia-ul-Haq's 1979 military coup. This event too was a success, attracting an audience of more than two hundred, and Barack and Hasan's friend Chris Welton wrote a front-page account of it for Oxy's newspaper.

That same week, Oxy students were angered when they learned that the Political Science faculty had refused to reappoint Lawrence Goldyn, the department's most popular professor. Goldyn denounced the senior faculty's conduct as "completely unethical and certainly unprofessional," but he was also aware of the effect he had had on countless Oxy students. Speaking with Susan Keselenko for a long, two-page profile in the year's final issue of the newspaper, Goldyn said that "frankly I think I've probably had as much or more impact on straight people at this school than I have on gay people."

Goldyn believed he had had "a rather profound effect on a lot of people, but there's no way of measuring that or knowing that," at least not for years to come. Many students have "studied with me, gotten close to me, and really been supportive of and loyal to me. I can't tell you how much respect I have for people like this." Notwithstanding that realization, Goldyn would abandon political science after this and enter medical school, earning his M.D. from Tufts University in 1988 and becoming an internal medicine/HIV specialist in Northern California. Thirty-three years after his dismissal from Oxy, one former student would thank and laud him in one of Washington's most august settings.<sup>20</sup>

Obama's belief in his potential as a serious writer suffered a painful blow when Tom Grauman told him a short story about driving a car had been voted down for publication in Feast's second issue on the grounds that it needed more work. Obama was livid. Caroline Boss appreciated how Barack took pride in "his writing and he was trying to hone that as an actual craft," especially after taking David James's seminar. But to be told by Grauman that his story had been rejected was more than he could bear. "We had a fairly frank argument about it," indeed "a shouting match," Grauman recounted years later. "I just said it wasn't done," and "I didn't want to finish it for him." Obama "was peeved" and "you could see that his feelings were hurt," in part because Feast "was a social thing as well as a literary thing," and "he felt he deserved to be a part of this group."

But Obama had more important things to consider. Sometime before Oxy's spring term exams ended on June 9, he and Phil Boerner learned they had each been admitted to Columbia University. Boerner's Oxy GPA was a less than robust 3.25, or a high B, but Columbia College—the men's undergraduate portion of the larger university that also included all-female Barnard College—had received only 450 transfer applications that spring, and accepted sixty-seven. Columbia admissions officials were unhappy about the quality of those applicants as well as the quantity. Dean Arnold Collery believed they had not attracted stronger applicants because "we're not housing them," instead leaving them to fend for themselves in Manhattan's rental apartment market. Assistant Dean of Admissions Robert Boatti also cited the limited financial aid as well as Columbia's policy of requiring all transfers to take core courses that other students had completed as freshmen and sophomores. As a result, a majority of transfer students came from the New York area, many from community colleges. Those who had been accepted had GPAs of about 3.0 and combined SAT scores of 1,100, Boatti said, while entering freshmen averaged well over 1,200.

Boerner and Obama were excited by their acceptances. Eric Moore heard the news and tried unsuccessfully to persuade Barack to stay at Oxy. Sim Heninger, who had seen so much of "Barry" in Haines Annex almost two years earlier, spoke with him in the Cooler one day at the end of spring term and was struck by how "polished and funny" Barack now was. He had changed "very swiftly," Sim thought, from the emotionally fragile youngster who had almost come apart in front of Heninger in October 1979. "He was a different person by the time he left," Heninger said. Kent Goss, who had played basketball with Barry during fall 1979, saw the same thing. "He was different. He was more serious . . . there was a shift somewhere in those two years."

Alex McNear sensed something similar. "I think he had like a broader vision of something. . . . He thought there was going to be a different kind of opportunity" at Columbia. Caroline Boss would remember Obama saying "very directly . . . 'I don't know what it is, but I feel I have a destiny, and I feel I have a purpose. I feel I have something that is being asked of me to do; I just don't know what it is, and I need to . . . go someplace that challenges me, that forces me to focus and that gives me a sense of direction and personal identity, some kind of avenue to ask myself good questions,'" so that "I will be prepared

. . . I need to be prepared so that if the moment comes, I'm ready for it.'"<sup>21</sup>

When spring term exams ended on June 9, Hasan and Barack hosted a graduation party for all their friends and friends of friends before everyone left for the summer. Margot and her roommate Dina Silva, plus Dina's boyfriend Chuck Jensvold, were there. Caroline Boss brought her soon-to-be-ex-boyfriend John Drew, who was spending the summer in D.C. working at Gar Alperovitz's National Center for Economic Alternatives, just two years after its failure to win a reopening of Youngstown's Campbell Works. The next Saturday, Barack and Imad Husain went to Paul Carpenter's family home for his younger brother's birthday party, and Barack told friends he and Hasan were leaving L.A. the next Thursday, June 18.

After stopping in Honolulu to see Stan and Madelyn, they continued westward, with Barack heading to Jakarta to spend a good part of the summer with his mother and sister Maya before meeting up with both Hasan and Wahid Hamid in Karachi, Pakistan. From Pakistan, Obama would fly to France, and then to London, before arriving in New York City for Columbia's fall semester. Carpenter told Phil Boerner that "knowing O'Bama, he will reach the shores of the 'empire state' at the last possible moment if not later."

In Honolulu, Hasan was struck by how "very small" Barack's grandparents' apartment was. Madelyn Dunham was pleased to see her grandson and later told an interviewer "he seemed to have gotten some purpose in life during those two years at Occidental." Barack ran into Keith Kakugawa and his two young sons. Keith remembered that Barack "told me he was leaving Oxy and going to Columbia." From there, Barack headed to Indonesia.

Six months earlier, Ann had left USAID contractor Development Alternatives for a two-year stint as a program officer in the Ford Foundation's regional office in Jakarta. That job came with a comfortable Ford-owned home at Jalan Daksa I/14 in the lush South Jakarta neighborhood of Kebayoran Baru, a considerable step upward from the two houses Barry had lived in with her when she was married to Lolo. The Ford salary gave Ann enough to send ten-year-old Maya to the Jakarta International School, and Ford appears to have paid for Barack's summer 1981 plane fares after Ann requested that her educational travel for dependent children benefits be used for that purpose.

Ann knew her son needed a place to stay when he arrived in Manhattan in late August, and she heard from a fellow expatriate about an apartment for sublet at 142 West 109th Street, just a few blocks south of Columbia's campus. Barack spent most of July living with his mother and sister, and he later wrote that he "spent the summer brooding over a misspent youth." Then he flew to Karachi, where Hasan and Wahid met him at the airport. He stayed for a few days at the Chandoo family's Karachi home, then for a week or more at Hamid's before the trio and several relatives set out on a road trip that took them northeastward to Sindh province's second-largest city, Hyderabad, and then well north to Larkana in interior Sindh. They visited a high school friend of Wahid's whose famous family, the Talpurs, had played a major role in Sindh's earlier history and whose feudal lands were still worked by peasants. Barack met one such older man of African ancestry, and traditional hospitality also led to a partridge hunting outing for the visitors.

Obama then flew westward from Karachi. How much time he spent in either France or London is unrecorded, and in subsequent years, he did not write about his three weeks in Pakistan nor did he often mention the visit when recounting his life experiences. But no later than August 24, Barack Obama arrived in New York City for the first time, having just turned twenty years old—five years younger than his father had been when he first arrived there twenty-two Augusts earlier.<sup>22</sup>

Obama later wrote that he “spent my first night in Manhattan curled up in an alleyway” off Amsterdam Avenue after no one was present at 142 West 109th Street’s apartment 3E when he arrived a little after 10:00 P.M. He did not have enough money for a hotel room, and while he did have Hasan’s friend Sohale Siddiqi’s phone number, Sohale worked nights at a restaurant. After waiting futilely on the building’s front stoop for two hours, he “crawled through a fence” to an alleyway. “I found a dry spot, propped my luggage beneath me, and fell asleep. . . . In the morning, I woke up to find a white hen pecking at the garbage near my feet.”

In the morning, Barack called Sohale, who told him to take a cab to his building on the Upper East Side. Sohale remembered Obama arriving “totally disheveled,” and after breakfast at a nearby coffee shop, Obama crashed on Siddiqi’s couch. Within a day or two, Barack gained access to the two-bedroom apartment on 109th, and he immediately invited Phil Boerner, who was still searching for housing, to share it with him: $180 a month per person. Phil arrived on Saturday, August 29, two days before Columbia’s orientation, and his top priority was retrieving a bed from family friends. Phil and Emmett Bassett, a sixty-year-old African American medical school professor, got the bed to 109th Street on top of Bassett’s station wagon. Phil remembers “Barack and I huffing and puffing up the stairs to get half the bed” up to their third-floor apartment; in contrast, “Emmett just grabbed the mattress with one arm and hauled it up no problem.” The next weekend, Phil and Barack spent Labor Day weekend at the Bassetts’ country home in the Catskills. Phil said later that Emmett “was the most impressive person I’ve ever met,” but years later Bassett could not recall Obama at all.

That weekend was a welcome respite from both the sorry state of apartment 3E and the strictures Columbia imposed upon junior transfers. On 109th Street, the downstairs buzzer did not work, forcing visitors to shout their arrival from the sidewalk, as Phil had discovered when he first arrived. The apartment door featured at least five locks, perhaps not a bad idea, as the unit next door was vacant and burned out. The four-room apartment was a railway flat: the front door opened into the kitchen, which led first to Barack’s bedroom, then Phil’s, and lastly their living room. With no interior hallway, there was no privacy whatsoever. The bathroom had a tub, but no shower, and hot water was a rare treat. Hot showers could be taken at Columbia’s gym—phys ed was another requirement—and once the weather turned cold, keeping coats on indoors and taking refuge in sleeping bags could partially compensate for the usually stone cold radiators.

Barack had learned to cook one or two chicken dishes from Oxy’s Pakistanis, but in stark contrast to daily life back on Glenarm, Phil and Barack hosted parties only when someone from Oxy like Paul Carpenter and his girlfriend Beth Kahn visited them. Sometime in September, Earl Chew and a friend came to stay for several nights, but “spent most of their time at a porn theater,” Phil remembered. Chew would not complete his senior year at Oxy and next surfaced eleven years later when he was arrested on a charge of attempted murder outside a Santa Monica reggae club. Jailed for six months before being convicted, Chew pled guilty to misdemeanor assault after his initial conviction was overturned. He was last known to have disappeared from an L.A. halfway house in 2007, three decades after his graduation from Philips Exeter and his arrival at Oxy.<sup>23</sup>

Registration and the start of classes was not any more welcoming for Barack and Phil than their living conditions on 109th Street. Columbia required them to take a full year of both Humanities and Contemporary Civilization plus a semester apiece of art and music. Two semesters of physical education were reduced to one if you passed a swimming test. A foreign language was mandatory; Barack enrolled in an intermediate Spanish class. In all of those courses his classmates were almost entirely freshmen and sophomores. Additional requirements included two natural science courses plus whatever was necessary for a departmental major.

Columbia would accept up to sixty transfer credits from Oxy toward the 124 needed to graduate, and Phil and Barack each met with assistant dean Frank Ayala to determine which of their Oxy courses satisfied Columbia's many requirements. Tuition was $3,350 per semester, and with other fees, the cost of a full year was $8,620, independent of food, lodging, and books. Obama may have received some financial aid in the form of federal Pell Grant assistance, and he may have taken out a modest amount of student loans.

A series of headlines in the Columbia Spectator, the excellent student newspaper, told the story of life for the Columbia undergraduate: "Alienation Is Common for Minority Students," "Students Label CU Life Depressing," "Striking Tenants Demand Front-Door Locks." The second of those stories described "the crime and poverty surrounding the school and the immensity of the university bureaucracy." One classmate later said, "Columbia was a very isolating place," and another rued "a culture at the college and in the city that wasn't exactly nurturing." Several years later Obama wrote to Boerner, "I am still amazed when I think of what we put up with there" on 109th Street. Living in Manhattan and going to Columbia was nothing at all like that glowing account the Oxy student newspaper had offered up eight months earlier.<sup>24</sup>

Luckily there were interesting events to attend. One flyer advertised "A Forum on South Africa—Including the Film The Rising Tide," with speakers such as David Ndaba, the nom de guerre for Dr. Sam Gulabe, the African National Congress's representative to the United Nations. Boerner said he and Barack attended that forum, but not a mid-November speech by black Georgia state legislator Julian Bond. The two apartment mates often ate breakfast at Tom's Restaurant on Broadway at 112th Street, and they sometimes had dinner at nearby Empire Szechuan. Drugs were no part of the depressing scene at 142 W. 109th, but they would go drink beer at the venerable West End bar on Broadway or with Phil's cousin Peregrine "Pern" Beckman, a Columbia sophomore, at his nearby apartment. To Pern, Phil's friend seemed "diffident," a "shy kid who spoke when spoken to" while "nursing a beer."

Looming over their daily lives was how unlivable their dire apartment was, especially as winter closed in. They could let their sublease expire on December 7 and simply remain until fall exams concluded on December 23; given New York's arcane housing code, they could receive no punishment for that brief time. They began searching without success for a place to live in January. Phil had family friends in Brooklyn Heights where he could stay, but they still had no solution for both of them when Phil left to spend Christmas with his parents at their home in London.

Columbia's winter break extended from Christmas Eve until spring registration on January 20. Obama spent most of that time in Los Angeles, seeing Wahid Hamid and Paul Carpenter and encountering old friends like Alex McNear when he visited Occidental, whose winter term started two weeks before Columbia's spring semester. Obama returned to New York on January 15 and slept on the floor of a friend named Ron on the Upper East Side while he again searched for an apartment. At registration, Barack ran into Pern, who gave him Phil's number in Brooklyn, and when Barack called two nights later, he told Phil he had found only a $250-per-month one-person studio just south of 106th Street that he could soon move into as a sublet.

On Sunday afternoon, January 24, the day before Columbia's spring classes began, Barack and Ron went to visit Phil where he was staying, at 11 Cranberry Street in Brooklyn Heights. They drank beer and ate bagels while watching the San Francisco 49ers defeat the Cincinnati Bengals 26–21 in Super Bowl XVI. On Monday Barack was again saddled with Columbia's core courses and another semester of Spanish. That Friday night, Phil met up with Barack at Columbia; the two then headed downtown on the subway to rendezvous with Ron and his girlfriend at a Lower East Side bar before having dinner at the well-known Odessa restaurant on Avenue A, just across from Tompkins Square Park. Then Barack and Phil headed back to Morningside Heights, and Boerner spent the night on Obama's floor rather than take the subway back to Brooklyn after midnight. The next Friday Barack and Phil ate an early Chinese dinner before taking the subway to Phil's place and polishing off a bottle of wine while watching the New Jersey Nets play the Philadelphia 76ers. Barack still occasionally played pickup basketball in Columbia's Dodge gym; a female graduate student years later remembered him playing pickup soccer on the lawn in front of Columbia's imposing Butler Library.<sup>25</sup>

But Barack's life during those early months of 1982 was radically different from his daily routine one year earlier. At Oxy, living with Hasan was an almost nonstop party with a band of close friends. Rallies, protests, and political events occurred almost weekly, and the days were filled with energetic debates and conversations in the Cooler. Now, in dreary Morningside Heights, Obama faced a daily schedule of core classes and perhaps a once-a-week meet-up with Phil to have dinner, drink beer, or watch a game. A quarter century later, Obama remembered that time as just "an intense period of study. . . . I spent a lot of time in the library. I didn't socialize that much. I was like a monk." He started keeping a journal, less a diary than a descriptive collection of city scenes and characters that caught his eye. In retrospect, he believed it was an "extremely important" period "when I grew as much as I have ever grown intellectually. But it was a very internal growth," one that left him "painfully alone and really not focused on anything, except maybe thinking a lot." He had been "comfortable in my solitude, the safest place I knew."

"It was a pretty grim and humorless time that I went through," Obama remembered, an "ascetic" and "hermetic existence . . . I literally went to class, came home, read books, took long walks," and wrote in his journal. "It's hard to say what exactly prompted" such a stark change from his attitude toward life both at Oxy and back in Hawaii, Obama told the journalist David Remnick. Yet he gained "a seriousness of purpose that I had lacked before."

Spring exams ended by the middle of May, and sometime soon after that, Obama lost both his studio apartment and his security deposit when the actual leaseholder informed him that his sublet was invalid. Thus sometime in early or mid-summer 1982, Barack moved in with Sohale Siddiqi in a two-bedroom apartment at 339 East 94th Street, just west of First Avenue. Siddiqi managed to score the lease on the $450-a-month sixth-floor walk-up by exaggerating his own income, and though Barack was now living on Manhattan's Upper East Side, their immediate neighborhood was anything but fashionable. Sohale recalled that it was "a scary street," with a corner gas station "patrolled by this Doberman Pinscher with a beer bottle in his mouth." Their own building was "a hovel . . . the hallways were dingy. Everything was beat up and gray and dimly lit. The front door didn't lock completely." Up in 6A, "you would enter through a kitchen, which would lead into a living room on one side and a bathroom on the other.” The wooden floors “were all warped . . . with big gaps between the planks.” One bedroom “was really a closet with a window.” A friendly footrace was used to determine who got the decent bedroom, and Obama, now a regular runner, won. As on 109th Street, “there was never hot water when you wanted it,” but in contrast the heat was always on, “so we used to have our windows wide open, just to cool down.” Outside Barack’s bedroom window was a fire escape, which Sohale said served as “our balcony.” All in all, it was just “a horrid place.”

Siddiqi also witnessed a “transformation” from the “fun-loving . . . easygoing” Obama he had met eighteen months earlier in South Pasadena to someone who was now “very serious and less lighthearted.” Yet Barack had a stereo and “a huge record collection. Bob Marley was big, Stevie Wonder . . . also plenty of Bob Dylan, Van Morrison, Talking Heads, and this group who I had never heard of before . . . he had at least twelve of their albums,” the Ohio Players. But once Barack arrived on East 94th Street, “I don’t think he bought any more albums . . . or even played the stereo much.” He did have “to remind me a few times to call him Barack” rather than Barry.

Sometime soon after Barack moved in with Sohale, his mother Ann and almost twelve-year-old sister Maya arrived in New York from Jakarta, where Ann still worked for the Ford Foundation. They too were struck by the change in the young man they called “Bar.” Maya later recalled that “he seemed more serious. He seemed more pensive. He was reading a great deal.” She believed “he had started taking himself very seriously” and often appeared to have “wrapped himself in his own solitude.” Obama later wrote that he took a summer job “clearing a construction site on the Upper West Side,” and he also described, in a patronizing manner, his mother’s insistence that they see Black Orpheus, a film she had loved as a high school senior twenty years earlier that was playing at a revival theater. Obama told a subsequent interviewer that during that visit “my mother used to tease me and call me Gandhi” because of his newly ascetic life, but Barack did not deny that he had become “deadly serious during those late college years . . . People would invite me to parties, and I’d say, ‘What are you talking about? We’ve got a revolution that has to take place.’”

Andy Roth, who had lived in Oakland after leaving Eagle Rock, moved to Manhattan in the late spring of 1982 and got an apartment on East 95th Street, hardly two blocks from Barack and Sohale. Siddiqi was nowhere near as political as Chandoo, nor as intellectually curious as the new Obama, but when Andy went for dinner at their apartment with several other Pakistanis, he remembered seeing “a portrait of Bhutto on the wall.”

The most significant new acquaintance that year was Mir Mahboob Mahmood, known to friends like Sohale, Wahid, and Hasan as “Beenu.” A 1981 graduate of Princeton University, Beenu was working as a paralegal in Manhattan while preparing to attend law school. At Princeton, Beenu had written a one-hundred-plus-page senior thesis on Mohandas Gandhi, and he was hugely influenced by the teaching of political theorist Sheldon Wolin. As Beenu remembered it, he and Barack began an on-and-off program of reading and discussing a half a dozen or so significant books, interrupted partly by Beenu’s one year of graduate study in political science at Johns Hopkins University. Beenu reconstructed their reading list as beginning with John Locke’s Two Treatises of Government (1690), then Albert O. Hirschman’s The Passions and the Interests: Political Arguments for Capitalism Before Its Triumph (1977), followed by Barrington Moore Jr.’s famous The Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World (1966) and E. H. Carr's The Twenty Years' Crisis, 1919–1939: An Introduction to the Study of International Relations (1939).<sup>26</sup>

At Oxy in 1980–81, Andy Roth had been one of the many men interested in Alex McNear. When Alex returned to her mother's apartment at 21 East 90th Street in June 1982 to spend the summer taking a theater course at NYU and interning at a publishing company, they got in touch, and whether from Andy or another Oxy friend, Alex got Barack's phone number and called him. Sometime in midsummer, they had dinner at an Italian restaurant on Lexington Avenue, and although that evening remained chaste, according to Alex, they "started to see a lot of each other" that summer, becoming "really very close."

Alex's parents had divorced when she was four years old. Her father had remained in Chicago, and her mother, originally from Wisconsin, got a graduate degree from UW–Madison before moving to New York. Her comfortable apartment, with its library of "thousands of books" in a tall building just off Madison Avenue, was a world away from Barack and Sohale's dismal quarters only eight blocks to the northeast. Alex remembers that apartment as "sparsely decorated" with "very little furniture" and recalls "opening the refrigerator and seeing like virtually nothing in there."

Understandably Alex and Barack "didn't spend a lot of time there," and apart from one visit with Phil and a party that also included Andy, they socialized only with each other. After going out to dinner, a museum, or a Broadway play like Athol Fugard's Master Harold . . . and the Boys, about South African apartheid, "he'd come over, and we'd stay at my apartment." Barack "did not seem like someone who was at all experienced" or indeed "terribly driven," but his "shyness" and "lack of experience" matched the novelty of their intimacy for her too.<sup>27</sup>

Barack's senior-year classes at Columbia began on September 8. One entering freshman remembered Obama as a fellow student in his yearlong Contemporary Civilization core course, and a junior political science major recalled chatting with Barack a number of times in a hallway in the School of International and Public Affairs (SIPA) building before one or another political science class. Barack, Phil, and Phil's cousin Pern all enrolled in C3207, Modern Fiction, taught by Edward Said, a Palestinian American literary scholar whom Columbia's student newspaper months earlier had called a "bitter" critic of Israel at "a largely Jewish university." Said would "come in and ramble on for an hour about who knows what," Pern remembered. The reading list for the twice-a-week, one-hundred-student class included Joseph Conrad, Franz Kafka, and William Faulkner. Pern thought Said could be "brilliant," and "when he was focused, he was incredible." But preparing for class was clearly not one of Said's priorities, and Phil and Barack did not share Pern's opinion. "We did not think highly of Said," Phil recounted. "We thought his class was pretty worthless."

Having settled on political science as his major, Barack had to take a two-semester senior colloquium and seminar in one of the department's four subfields. Barack's course credits fit best with international relations, and he and seven fellow seniors ended up in W3811x and y, taught by Michael L. Baron. A young instructor who had completed his Columbia Ph.D. dissertation on U.S. policy toward China after World War II two years earlier, Baron was returning to Columbia after a year of teaching in Beijing. Baron's dissertation had argued that President Harry S. Truman "was an activist in foreign policy, basing decisions primarily on personal proclivities," and this course focused on U.S. foreign policy decision-making rather than a particular topical area.

The assigned readings during the fall semester analyzed how past important decisions had been made:

the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba, the fall 1962 Cuban missile crisis, and the escalation of the Vietnam War. Readings included works by Joseph Nye and Ernest May, as well as Irving Janis's famous 1972 Victims of Groupthink: A Psychological Study of Foreign-Policy Decisions and Fiascoes. Baron recalled that "we definitely focused on groupthink." Throughout the fall, their focus was historical and practical, not theoretical: "What do you need to do to make a good decision? Which presidents were making good decisions," first and foremost by "taking advice from people outside the inner circle?"

Baron as well as two other students in the small class recall Obama as a standout performer. "He was a very bright student," Baron said years later, "clearly one of the top one or two students in the class." One classmate remembered Barack as "a very, very active participant" in class discussions, and another who "didn't think the seminar was that great" nonetheless was "impressed with Barack. . . . There was a maturity about what he said and how he said it" that surpassed the comments offered by most if not all of his fellow seniors.

One way of satisfying half of Columbia's science requirement was Elementary Physics, C1001x, taught by Gerald Feinberg, a professor in his late forties who had taught at Columbia for more than twenty years. The catalog described the course as "an introduction to physics for students with no previous background in physics" and stated that "very little mathematics is used." Indeed, Feinberg's popular 1977 book, What Is the World Made Of? Atoms, Leptons, Quarks, and Other Tantalizing Particles, which Feinberg assigned that fall, declared, "I am convinced that a substantial comprehension of modern physics can be obtained without advanced mathematical training." That book, like Feinberg's syllabus, focused on "the study of atoms and of their subatomic constituents." It explained quantum theory, the special theory of relativity, and especially particle physics, "the main feature of the physics of the last twenty-five years." The course was essentially "a history of physics," Feinberg's son Jeremy recalled from personal experience, and his dad "called it physics for poets."<sup>28</sup>

In mid-September, Alex McNear left Manhattan to return to Oxy for the fall quarter, and on September 26, Barack sent her a long letter reporting on his first two weeks of classes after receiving a note from her. "I sit in the campus cafe drinking V-8 juice and listening to a badly scratched opera being broadcast. I am taking a break from studying a theoretical analysis of strategic deterrence in the international arena, muddling through concepts like first strike, mutual assured destruction, nuclear payload, and other such elaborated madness. So forgive the dryness and confusion that have undoubtedly rubbed off."

Describing himself as trying to stretch "across as many disciplines as possible," Obama sounded as if he had sat in on a number of courses while considering which ones to take. "My favorite so far is a physics course for non-mathematicians that I'm taking to fulfill the science requirement. We study electrons, neutrons, quarks, electromagnetic fields and other tantalizing phenomenon under the auspice of a Professor Fienberg [sic]. He embodies every stereotype of a science professor from the bow-tie to the sparse, balding hair combed back and monotonous Midwestern twang. Behind the thick glasses that pinch his nose, one can sense the passion he brings to the topic and the quiet, unobtrusive cockiness you find in scientists, certain that no one knows any more than they do."

Obama's descriptive sketch of Feinberg confirms the impression that Alex and Phil each had of Barack in 1982: that he wanted very much to become a writer. Presented with that depiction of his father years later, Jeremy Feinberg was impressed: "the physical description . . . is spot-on" and even Obama's characterization of his voice was accurate. In Barack's letter, he then cited what he called "the frustrations of studying men and their frequently dingy institutions” while adding that “the fact that of course the knowledge I absorb in the class facilitates nuclear war prevents a real clean break.”

Then he shifted gears. “A steady flow of visitors camped in our living room for two weeks or so, and I had a chance to catch up with friends and play host.” Hasan and his cousin Ahmed were among them, and Barack told Alex that “Hasan will be marrying” soon and taking over the family business. With “old friends receding into the structures pre-conscripted for them,” relationships became “more reserved” and “the idealistic chatter of college is diplomatically ignored.”

Barack had also heard from Greg Orme in Oregon, who had a new car, a television, and a hot tub. “I must admit large dollops of envy for both groups, my American friends consuming their life in the comfortable mainstream, foreign friends in the international business world. Caught without a class, a structure, or tradition to support me, in a sense the choice to take a different path is made for me. The only way to assuage my feelings of isolation are to absorb all the traditions, classes, make them mine, me theirs. Taken separately, they’re unacceptable and untenable.”

Obama’s statement that he felt isolated was unsurprising given his life over the previous twelve months, nor were his remarks about Hasan and Greg. He did not respond to what Alex had written to him about herself, “since I spent so much of my mental energy with you and now need to refuel” and return to Butler Library. “I trust you know that I miss you, that my concern for you is as wide as the air, my confidence in you as deep as the sea, my love rich and plentiful. Please comfort me with another letter when you get a chance. My regards to everyone. Love, Barack.”

A postscript said he was enclosing a New York Times book review from two weeks earlier of Becoming a Heroine by Rachel Brownstein, which he thought would interest her, as well as an excerpt from W. B. Yeats’s 1928 poem The Tower about “a woman won or lost.” He asked Alex, “Who is the ‘woman’ for you?”<sup>29</sup>

Back in Butler Library, Barack studied for Gerald Feinberg’s first physics exam on October 12. Students had to answer two out of three questions: “(1) Discuss the present atomic theory of the structure of ordinary matter . . . (2) Describe the photon theory of light . . . (3) Discuss how some of the estimates of the number of various subatomic particles . . . are obtained. Your discussion need not be precise on numbers. . . .”

In early November, Columbia’s Coalition for a Free South Africa hosted the prominent white anti-apartheid activist Donald Woods, and Obama may have been among the large crowd. Two weeks later Columbia’s student newspaper published another front-page article reporting how “this is not an easy place to go through as a minority student.” One black senior complained that white students presume the admissions standards for black undergraduates were lower and that “we can’t do the work”; another commented that Columbia’s core curriculum ignored African Americans and “doesn’t prepare you for the real world.”

Alex McNear wrote to Barack in mid-November, and he quickly replied. “You speak with force, Alex, calm and confident, and I’m frankly amazed, not by the brimming talent, not by the thoughts in themselves but by the sureness of the words.” Admitting that “mixed in with those feelings are bits and pieces of envy, uncertainty, some intimidation,” he confessed that “the prejudiced, frightened male makes its atavistic appearance.” Writing cryptically about what he termed “the habits and grooves of separate existence,” he declared that “we will talk long and deep, Alex, and see what we can make of all this.”

Rereading his letter a quarter century later, McNear noted Obama's "formalism," and wondered "were mine very formal" as well? "I just wonder where the tone came from." Barack also wrote, "I think you may have caught me being a fool in my last letter," and he referred to a conversation they had had outside the Metropolitan Museum of Art. "When we spoke in front of the Met, I insisted that I made choices, that I wasn't kind out of necessity, because it can certainly be argued that I'm compelled by my past to be that way, that no choice is involved . . . and my insistence arises from my fear of emasculation, that if I can't be cruel any longer, then I must not be a man." Citing "the past of my ancestors," Obama wrote, "I see that in a real sense my gravestone is already planted, the feeble eulogic etchings overgrown with moss, blurred and forgotten."

Barack went on that "this cordoning off of individuals into compartments is something I fight every day," and said that Virginia Woolf's 1925 novel Mrs. Dalloway expressed his point better than he could. After some musings about birth and death, Barack asserted that "the betrayal lies in separation," that "we feel betrayed by this act of separation," and that "because the initial act of separation has traditionally been from the mother, men's retaliation is indeed towards women."

Alex understood that "he's clearly enjoying writing: writing it out, toying it out, figuring it out." Barack continued that "some choose to escape the pain by limiting their interaction with the world. They abstract themselves . . . which is perhaps the most tolerable option." He quoted Friedrich Nietzsche's statement that "in all desire to know there is a drop of cruelty" before acknowledging that "I'm running out of steam and the thoughts are becoming blurred." Yet he had two points for subsequent discussion: one, "I see that I have been made a man, and physically, in life, I choose to accept that contingency." Second, "there is a reason why western man has been able to subjugate women and the dark races, Alex; the ideology they present is backed by a very real power. We will speak of this too."

Rereading that passage, McNear observed how "very professorial" Obama sounded. Barack then added, "I've never tried to put down so comprehensively my views. They come out muddled and incomplete, and I wish I could explain more fully." To that, Alex would wonder "maybe . . . that was as close as he could get to intimacy."

Finally Obama concluded by returning to the real world a month hence, after Columbia's exams ended. "I arrive in L.A. on December 23rd, and expect to be at Wahid's apartment that evening. I'll call you upon arrival . . . see you then. Love, Barack."<sup>30</sup>

Three or four days after Barack mailed that letter to Alex, Sohale answered their phone on East 94th Street and an unfamiliar, foreign-sounding woman asked for Barack. It was Kezia Obama's sister Silpa Obonyo, known throughout the family as Aunt Jane, a Nairobi telephone operator able to make international calls. She had just phoned Auma Obama, now a twenty-two-year-old student in Germany and no longer using "Rita," and her reason for calling Barack was the same as for dialing Heidelberg: Barack Obama Sr. was dead at age forty-eight.

He had died in the early-morning hours of Wednesday, November 24, when the vehicle he was driving had gone off Elgon Road and struck a large tree stump. Drunken driving had indeed finally killed him. "The body had to be wedged out of the car," the Nairobi Times reported. The crash site was in Upper Hill, the Nairobi neighborhood where Obama had been living with twenty-two-year-old Jael Atieno, who six months earlier had given birth to George Hussein Obama.

Barack later wrote, "I felt no pain, only the vague sense of an opportunity lost," and he called his mother in Jakarta, then his uncle Omar Onyango in Massachusetts. A year earlier Barack and his father had corresponded about his visiting Kenya to meet his relatives there once he graduated from Columbia, but now that idea was on hold.

The Nairobi paper said Obama Sr. “leaves four wives and several children,” and the eleven years that had passed since he last saw his second-eldest son in Honolulu in 1971 had been no happier than the seven that had preceded it. Soon after Obama returned to Nairobi in early 1972, Ruth divorced him, but she did not take her two sons and actually leave him until later that year after Obama put a knife to her neck and struck the youngest boy, David Opiyo. Unemployed and still drinking heavily, Obama was able to secure a job offer from the World Bank for a post in the Ivory Coast, but when his sister Zeituni took him to the Nairobi airport, government officials turned him away and canceled his passport. “He left the airport crying, angry, and frustrated,” Zeituni recalled. Some months later, in mid-1973, yet another drunken car crash left him with two badly broken legs and a shattered kneecap. Obama remained hospitalized for six months, sometimes “in real pain,” Zeituni remembered. His teenage daughter Auma was repeatedly “sent home from school” due to unpaid fees and bounced checks. She and her older brother Roy, alone without a mother or stepmother after Ruth left with Mark and David, relied upon Zeituni for their survival. She “regularly brought us something to eat,” Auma remembered.

Not long after Obama left the hospital, his old Honolulu friend Andy “Pake” Zane and his partner Jane visited Nairobi and were astonished at Obama’s condition. “He was a broken spirit,” just “a shell” of the man Zane and Neil Abercrombie had visited in 1968. “Why do you have a limp?” Zane asked. Obama replied, “They tried to kill me,” asserting that the conspirators behind Tom Mboya’s 1969 assassination tried to rub out a possible witness. “He was very depressed,” Zane remembered, and “he got very drunk and very angry” each night they saw him. By then he had been evicted from the council house at 16A Woodley Estate for nonpayment of rent and had a roof over his head only thanks to his friend Sebastian Peter Okoda, who allowed Obama to join him in his flat at Dolphin Court for more than a year.

On November 25, 1975, Obama’s father, Hussein Onyango Obama, died at age eighty. Barack Sr. attended the funeral accompanied by his then-girlfriend, Akinyi Nyaugenya. Sometime soon after, Obama’s old friend Mwai Kibaki, now Kenya’s minister of finance, hired him into a post there. His drinking was as heavy as ever, and colleagues often saw him headed to a bar before noontime. “I can’t stand it anymore. Let’s get a drink.” Once Obama received a large cash travel advance a day before his scheduled departure on a business trip, but before the night was out, he had spent the entire sum treating colleagues, including Okoda, to rounds of drinks at a fancy Nairobi bar.

One Kenyan academic who had first met Barack Sr. in the U.S. found his deterioration sad. “Before, he was everyone’s role model. With that big beautiful voice, we all wanted to be like him. Later, everybody was asking what happened.” A younger female government colleague knew that Obama was “disillusioned and discouraged and depressed” but mentioned to him her desire to get a Ph.D. She was astonished at his response: “It’s useless doing a Ph.D. What do you want a Ph.D. for? It’s just academic.” Obama “was very, very strong about that: ‘Don’t do a Ph.D.’”

By mid-1980, the forty-six-year-old Obama was living with Jael Atieno, a friend of his younger sister Marsat who was the same age as his daughter Auma. Obama had visited Auma in Europe two years before his death, but “I didn’t want to see him,” she recounted. He “appeared broken” and “seemed defeated.” Auma felt “betrayed by my father, blaming him for not holding the family together.” When Aunt

Jane telephoned her in November 1982, “I scarcely felt anything for him.”

Ruth Baker Obama Ndesandjo had remarried to a stable and reliable man, Simeon Ndesandjo, and in April 1980, she had opened a preschool, the Madari Kindergarten. She learned of Obama’s death from that November 30 newspaper story. “I was not surprised, because he had been heading that way for a long time,” Ruth said. She told her son Mark more than once that his father had been “a brilliant man, but a social failure.”

Zeituni Onyango, the person to whom Barack Obama Sr. was closest and who loved him most profoundly, understood more deeply than anyone the immense tragedy and lost promise of his life. Despite Barack’s remarkable intelligence, he had ended up living a “miserable life” that was “ruined by alcohol.” Yet even in his last days, one thing had never changed since his unwilling 1964 return to Nairobi without the Ph.D. from Harvard that had been his dream. Even though almost none of his friends ever heard him mention a son in the U.S., “Barack’s picture was always next to his bed,” according to Zeituni.<sup>31</sup>

In later years, the younger Barack’s comments about his father’s death would vary considerably. Sometimes he incorrectly said he began using the name Barack instead of Barry at that time, rather than almost two years earlier. On other occasions, he mused that he had been motivated by his father’s death. “I think it’s at that point where I got disciplined, and I got serious,” but the few people who knew Barack well during his first fifteen months in Manhattan—Phil, Sohale, and Alex—had all witnessed that transformation take hold many months earlier.

Obama also later wrote that “my fierce ambitions might have been fueled by my father . . . by my resentments and anger toward him,” but in 1982 those who knew him well did not see evidence of any fierce ambitions. Obama’s belief that in some ways he had raised himself would not be questioned by anyone from Punahou or Occidental who had noticed the absence of his birth parents in his life, but his most acute and accurate comments about the father he saw for only a few weeks when he was ten years old acknowledged how “I didn’t know him well enough to be angry at him as a father. Mostly I feel a certain sadness for him, and the way that his life ended up unfulfilled, despite his enormous talents.” In time he realized that “I was probably lucky not to have been living in his house as I was growing up.”<sup>32</sup>

After Aunt Jane’s telephone call, Barack said little about his father’s death. “I had no clue,” Sohale Siddiqi recalls. “Not a word from” Barack referenced it. “I never heard about his father from him. I would hear about” Stanley Dunham in particular. “He brought up his grandparents plenty,” and Sohale remembers an off-color note Stan had sent his grandson along with a jogger’s wristband, suggesting there were multiple appendages upon which he might wear it.

Sometime in early December, Keith Kakugawa was in New York for several days and managed to meet up with Barack for lunch near Columbia and then one night for dinner. Obama told Keith that “his dad had just died in a car wreck.” When Barack arrived in Los Angeles just before Christmas and began seeing Alex McNear almost daily, Alex too remembers him telling her about his father’s death, but, she says, “it was not an emotional telling.” In a letter to Phil Boerner, Obama described his three weeks of winter vacation in Los Angeles. Other than when he was with Alex, Barack stayed with Wahid. He told Phil that his days there were “standard fare—good relaxation with the Paki crowd, dinners with Alex, lunches with Jensvold, tennis with Imad, and pipe tokes with Carpenter. They all seem to be doing well enough and have themselves set up in big cushy apartments. The whole process was like a spiral back in time; nothing had changed except my perceptions, it seemed.” Barack’s close friend Mike Ramos had moved from Honolulu to Orange County six months earlier, and he remembers driving up to Pasadena and eating curry with Barack and the Pakistani trio of Wahid, Imad, and Asad.

Other than this unrevealing reference in his letter to Phil, the extent of Barack and Alex's relationship was kept entirely private, with all of their time together involving just the two of them and not any of Barack's other friends. "No one really knew that we were having a relationship," Alex later explained. Barack "seemed to be incapable of bringing a relationship into the rest of his world," and their quiet dinners often featured long conversations about Alex's immersion in French literary theory and especially its focus on the concept of difference. "I'm really much more interested in how people are similar," Alex remembers Barack saying in response to one such discussion. Alex recalls writing in her diary at that time, "I realized how much I loved him, and that he was like my closest friend," but she also expressed doubts that their relationship could blossom. Barack seemed "very controlling" and "so self-conscious." On January 17, they had a final dinner before Barack flew back to New York City for his final semester as an undergraduate.<sup>33</sup>

Barack was still taking Spanish, and the spring semester of his yearlong political science senior seminar would have fewer class meetings in lieu of students writing a paper due at the end of the term after multiple one-on-one consultations with Michael Baron. But in addition, Barack was able to choose three upper-level elective classes. One was a seminar taught by a young English professor whom Pern Beckman had recommended as a "really cool guy." Lennard "Len" Davis's first book, Factual Fictions: The Origins of the English Novel, a revision of his 1976 Columbia Ph.D. dissertation under Edward Said, was just being published by Columbia University Press. The Columbia catalog said Davis's seminar Ideology and the Novel would examine "the nature of ideology in Marxist and sociological thought." Theoretical readings included works by Raymond Williams and Louis Althusser as well as Karl Marx's Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844. Novels to be read started with Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe (1719) and moved on to Elizabeth Gaskell's North and South (1855) and Charles Dickens's Hard Times (1854). Only about twelve students enrolled in the seminar, and years later Davis readily volunteered that "it was definitely a Marxist course." His purpose, Davis explained, was to make students realize that while any individual novelist "felt free to improvise and create," nonetheless the surrounding "culture and its ideology would ultimately determine the novelist's innovations."

Davis devoted a chapter of his new book to analyzing Robinson Crusoe, and in teaching Defoe's novel, he asked students what "overt ideological statements" they could detect in Robinson Crusoe. An erudite and well-spoken teacher, Davis eventually answered his own question by saying "it's a philosophy of stasis . . . you reconcile yourself to the world as it is . . . in a giant way it is against change . . . it's essentially an ideology that reconciles you to middle-class life." That was one illustration of the overarching argument Davis offered in his book: in those eighteenth- and nineteenth-century English novels, "the novel's fictionality is a ploy to mask the genuine ideological, reportorial, commentative function of the novel." At bottom "the inherent confusion in any factual fiction" would give rise to "the later nineteenth-century assumption that literature is a more penetrating depiction of life than life." Four years later, in his second book, Resisting Novels: Ideology and Fiction, Davis singled out the "particularly wonderful" 1983 seminar on Ideology and the Novel in helping him advance and distill his analysis.<sup>34</sup>

A second course Obama took that spring was International Monetary Theory and Policy, taught by

Maurice Obstfeld, a young associate professor of economics who had received his Ph.D. at MIT four years earlier. Barack had already taken Intermediate Macroeconomics, and Obstfeld's class focused on "the evolution of the world monetary system since 1945" and "monetary problems in international trade." The third upper-level elective he chose was Sociology W3229y, State Socialist Societies, taught by Andrew G. Walder, a brand-new assistant professor in his first year of teaching who had earned his Ph.D. at the University of Michigan in 1981. Walder's syllabus explained that the course would be "an analysis of state socialism as a system. The primary focus will be on the central features of these societies that distinguish them from others," i.e., "the core features of state socialism," and "we will spend most of the term comparing China and the Soviet Union."

Walder recommended that students purchase seven books from which most of the required reading would be drawn, and recommended half a dozen others. The semester began with "The Origins of Russian and Chinese Communism," and students read Alex Nove's Stalinism and After, a survey of Soviet political history that focused on how deadly Soviet rule had proven for the regime's many victims, including the early Bolsheviks. The second major topic was "The Communist Party as an Organization," and over several weeks students read Elizabeth Pond's From the Yaroslavsky Station: Russia Perceived, a journalistic work structured around the author's rich and lengthy Trans-Siberian Railway journey.

Prior to Walder's seven-to-ten-page typed, take-home midterm exam, the class covered "The Communist Party as a Status Group" and "Organized Surveillance and Repression." Students read Hedrick Smith's well-known The Russians as well as Jonathan Unger's new Education Under Mao. Fox Butterfield's China: Alive in the Bitter Sea, Miklos Haraszti's A Worker in a Workers' State, and Roy Medvedev's Let History Judge were three other titles on the syllabus. The second half of the semester covered topics such as "Bureaucracy, Office-Holding, and Corruption" as well as "Social Stratification and Inequality." Everyone read David Lane's The End of Social Inequality? Class, Status and Power Under State Socialism, which argues that "inequality is a characteristic of state-socialist society as it is of the capitalist."

The final assigned reading prior to Walder's ten-to-twelve-page typed, take-home final exam was Milovan Djilas's 1957 classic The New Class. Smuggled out of Yugoslavia and published in the U.S. while the author languished in a political prison, the book's publication was "an immediate sensation," according to the New York Times. Djilas in the late 1940s had served as Yugoslavian ruler Josip Broz Tito's personal intermediary to Joseph Stalin, but he was expelled from Yugoslavia's Communist Party after expressing heretical thoughts. His best-selling book gave voice to those insights. Once a Communist Party "has consolidated its power, party membership means that one belongs to a privileged class. And at the core of the party are the all-powerful exploiters and masters." Experiencing that in Yugoslavia had transformed Djilas into a democratic socialist. "To the extent that one class, party, or leader stifles criticism completely, or holds absolute power, it or he inevitably falls into an unrealistic, egotistical, and pretentious judgment of reality."

The New Class was a powerful way to end a semester, or indeed to complete one's undergraduate education. As one student said with some understatement years later, "Walder was anything but a Marxist," and Walder himself drily observed that what his syllabus presented "was not a flattering portrayal of political and social life in these now-thankfully defunct systems." Only an extreme control freak would withhold his academic transcripts from public view simply so as to avoid any public discussion of what possible ideological influence either Walder's impressive reading list or Len Davis's teaching about the political uses of fiction might have had upon an intellectually hungry twenty-one-year-old mind.<sup>35</sup>

Several weeks into that spring semester, Obama wrote another lengthy letter to Alex McNear in Eagle Rock. "I run every other day up at the small indoor track" at Columbia, a bit of news that Barack then spun into a lengthy descriptive portrait of the act of running. "After getting clean, I go to the Greek coffee shop . . . and have the best bran muffin in New York City—dark and fibrous . . . and coffee and a glass of water. I light a cigarette, make some talk with the Ethiopian cashier with big murky eyes and the sly smile and a small tattoo on her right hand in foreign code."

Rereading this decades later, McNear wondered whether her letters to Barack "were just as pretentious . . . equally as convolutedly long and laborious." Barack wrote, "I enjoyed your letter. I like the way you use words," and then proceeded to a long disquisition on the concept of resistance against a "bankrupt" and "distorted system. . . . But people are busy keeping mouths fed and surroundings intact, and it is left to the obsessed ones like us to make the alternatives more tangible . . . so that resistance and destruction arrive in the form of creation." He then paused to say "excuse the sermons," but "I also have thought about us and conclude that I like what we have. . . . Perhaps what I've been after is a correspondence, a union, yes—but never exclusive, cocoon-like, ingrown. Rather something outwards, a point of extension."

With graduation approaching, he had more mundane issues to discuss. "I've been sending out letters to development and social services agencies, as well as a few publications, so I should find out in the next few months what I have to work with next year. Classes are the average fare. A class called Novel and Ideology has an interesting reading list covering several of the things we spoke of" when Barack was in Los Angeles. "Of what I've read so far I recommend Marxism and Literature by Raymond Williams. A lot of it is simplification, but it generally has a pretty good aim at some Marxist applications of cultural study. Anyway, it might be a good point of departure for further haranguing between us."

Obama then ends the letter, but the next day he added a long postscript that began by mentioning homeless panhandlers he often saw. "I play with words and work pretty patterns in my head, but the hole is dark and deep below, immeasurably deep. Know that it's always there, rats nibbling at the foundations, and it can set me to tremble." Then he thought to respond to something Alex had said about T. S. Eliot's 1922 poem The Waste Land and told her to read Eliot's 1919 essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent" as well as his Four Quartets. "Remember how I said there's a certain brand of conservatism I respect more than bourgeois liberalism." Barack finally concluded by saying, "I can't mobilize my thoughts right now, so . . . I leave you to piece together this jumble."<sup>36</sup>

The label "jumble" could also apply to an article Barack submitted to Sundial, a weekly Columbia student newsmagazine. Just prior to its publication, he wrote to Phil Boerner in Arkansas and mentioned he had "been sending out some letters of inquiry to some social service organizations and will also be making up a resume (no comment) soon. I've also written an article for the Sundial purely for calculated reasons of beefing up the thing. No keeping your hands clean, eh."

The article, titled "Breaking the War Mentality," began by asserting that "The more sensitive among us struggle to extrapolate experiences of war from our everyday experience, discussing the latest mortality statistics from Guatemala, sensitizing ourselves to our parents' wartime memories, or incorporating into our frameworks of reality as depicted by a Mailer or a Coppola. But the taste of war—the sounds and chill, the dead bodies, are remote and far removed. We know that wars have occurred, will occur, are occurring, but bringing such experiences down into our hearts, and taking continual, tangible steps to prevent war, becomes a difficult task.”

Following that introduction, Obama cited what he called “the growing threat of war” while profiling the first of two campus antinuclear groups, Arms Race Alternatives. “Generally, the narrow focus of the Freeze movement as well as academic discussions of first versus second strike capabilities, suit the military-industrial interests, as they continue adding to their billion dollar erector sets,” he opined. “One is forced to wonder whether disarmament or arms control issues, severed from economic and political issues, might be another instance of focusing on the symptoms of a problem instead of the disease itself.”

Obama also referenced a recently adopted federal law, set to take effect on July 1, that required every male recipient of federal student aid to demonstrate that he had registered for the draft. Some voices were calling for noncompliance, and Obama observed that “an estimated half-million non-registrants can definitely be a powerful signal” that could herald a “future mobilization against the relentless, often silent spread of militarism in the country.” He then described the second campus group, Students Against Militarism. Declaring that “perhaps the essential goodness of humanity is an arguable proposition,” Barack contended that “the most pervasive malady of the collegiate system specifically, and the American experience generally, is that elaborate patterns of knowledge and theory have been disembodied from individual choices and government policy.” He ended by commending both groups, saying that by trying to “enhance the possibility of a decent world, they may help deprive us of a spectacular experience—that of war.”

New Yorker editor David Remnick would later characterize Obama’s article as “muddled,” but when it returned to public view twenty-six years after it was first published, it generated astonishingly little discussion of what it said about the political views Obama had held on the cusp of his graduation from college. In his letter to Phil, Barack belittled how “school is just making the same motions, long stretches of numbness punctuated with the occasional insight.” Referencing their disappointing fall semester course, he complained that “Said still didn’t have the grades out for his class until a month into the term, and he cancelled his second term class, so we should feel justified in labelling him a flake.”

As he had in his earlier letter to Alex, Barack singled out Davis’s Ideology and the Novel as an “interesting” course, one “where I make cutting remarks to bourgeois English majors and can get away with it.” But overall, “nothing significant, Philip. Life rolls on, and I feel a growing competence and maturity.” After insulting what he called Phil’s “sojourn to Buttfuck, Arkansas,” Barack closed by saying, “Will get back to you when I know my location for next year.”<sup>37</sup>

In Boerner’s absence, Barack had been spending time with old Oxy friend Andy Roth, who was working at the John Wiley publishing house. On Friday, April 1, he and Andy attended the first day of the inaugural Socialist Scholars Conference, held at the famous Cooper Union. Roth remembered them both attending an “interesting” talk by sociologist Bogdan Denitch, one of the most committed leaders of Democratic Socialists of America. But rather than attend the conference’s second day, Barack wrote another long letter to Alex McNear. “There are moments of uncertainty in everything that I believe; it’s that very uncertainty that keeps my head alive,” Barack explained. “In pursuit of such hopes, I attended a socialist scholars conference yesterday with Andy. A generally collegiate affair with a lot of vague discourse and bombast. Still, I was pleasantly surprised at the large turnout, and the flashes of insight and seriousness amongst the participants. As I told Andy, one gets the feeling that the stage is being set, that conduits of word and spirit are being laid across diverse minds—feminists, black nationalists, romantics. What remains to be had is a script, a crystallization of events. Until that time a pervasive mood of unreality hangs over such events, a mood that you can see the people fighting against in their eyes, their tone.”

A decade later Obama wrote passingly but imprecisely about “the socialist conferences I sometimes attended at Cooper Union.” His erroneous use of the plural gave future critics fodder to imagine that the “impact of these conferences on Obama was immense” and that listening to Denitch and similar speakers had “turned out to be Obama’s life-defining experience,” a notion that his letter the very next day to Alex utterly rebuts.<sup>38</sup>

At the outset of that letter, Barack wrote of “churning out assignments” on “state communism” and “the international monetary system” before pausing to reflect on “the wilderness we call life” while smoking and drinking scotch. He reported that he had given his papers to “an elderly woman with a hair-lip and hoarse voice” for typing. This lady was Miss Diane Dee, who was a famous figure around Columbia for decades. A later New York Times profile said “her advertising flyers” are “indigenous to campus walls,” but that her “unkempt hair” and “tired face” made her seem “half-crazed.” One 1983 Columbia graduate believed “she was crazy,” and Gerald Feinberg’s son Jeremy recalled her as “a colorful character—someone I’d expect to appear in a conspiracy theory movie or a Michael Moore film, or both.”

Barack told Alex that Miss Dee was someone “upon whom my graduation depends,” and he was starting to panic because she “has missed two deadlines so far and now seems to have disappeared . . . no one has answered the phone at her apartment for four days.” He worried that “she’s a mad woman who lures unsuspecting undergraduate papers into her home and then burns them, or uses them to line the bottom of the goldfinch cage.” Following his description of the Socialist Scholars Conference, Barack told Alex that a “sense of unreality describes my position of late. I feel sunk in that long corridor between old values, actions, modes of thought, and those that I seek, that I work towards . . . this ambivalence is acted out in my non-decision as yet about next year” following graduation.<sup>39</sup>

Three days after Obama wrote that letter, Columbia’s Coalition for a Free South Africa, in tandem with Students for a Democratic Campus, held a divestment rally outside Low Library, Columbia’s administration building. Student leaders Danny Armstrong and Barbara Ransby had been pressing the issue for months, and the scheduling of a university board of trustees meeting on the fifteenth anniversary of Martin Luther King Jr.’s assassination offered an occasion for an afternoon protest. Barack convinced his largely apolitical apartment mate Sohale Siddiqi to attend the rally with him. But Siddiqi thought that compared to the black New Yorkers Siddiqi knew from the restaurant where he worked, “Barack didn’t seem like one of them.” Obama “was soft-spoken and gentle” and used “clean language.” Indeed, “I didn’t consider him American,” never mind African American. Siddiqi believed Barack “seemed like an international individual.”

Siddiqi recalls having witnessed an intensifying change in Barack over the preceding eight months. “He had kind of gone into a bit of a shell and wasn’t as talkative or outgoing as in his earlier days,” Sohale said. When Barack did speak, “he’d give me lectures” about “the plight of the poor” and downtrodden. “He seemed very troubled by it,” and “I would ask him why he was so serious.” Sohale’s interest in drinking, picking up women, and enjoying cocaine held little appeal for the newly abstemious Barack. “He took himself too seriously,” Sohale felt, and “I would find him ponderous and dull and lecturing.”

The April 4 rally drew a disappointing crowd of about a hundred, but afterward a core group of about fifteen student coalition members kept up a 9:00 A.M. to 5:00 P.M. weekday vigil to highlight Columbia’s refusal to divest. Barack was not among them, and few of Columbia and Barnard’s black undergraduates from 1981 to 1983 have any recollection of Barack Obama. Coalition leader Danny Armstrong said, “I recall seeing Obama on campus” but never interacted with him. Barbara Ransby, a graduate student who managed the coalition’s contact list and chaired most of its meetings, had “utterly no recollection of Obama.” Verna Bigger Myers, president of the Black Students’ Organization (BSO) in 1981–82, remembered that on a campus with so few minority undergraduates, “all the black people see the other black people” even if they did not really know them. Myers’s close friend Janis Hardiman, who a decade later would be Obama’s sister-in-law, remembered Barack as “sort of a phantom who just kind of walked into” BSO meetings but “did not have an active role” or participate in any the group’s activities.

Wayne Weddington, a junior in 1982–83, remembers seeing Obama at BSO meetings, and Darwin Malloy, a year ahead of Obama, recalled meeting him in the cafeteria in John Jay Hall but agrees that “most people would only remember him as a familiar face.” Malloy believed his friend Gerrard Bushell “probably had more interaction with him than anyone,” but Bushell said he “would see him periodically” and “remember him by face” but no more.

Obama would dramatically exaggerate his involvement in Columbia’s divestment activism on several occasions, telling one interviewer that “I was a leader on these issues both at Occidental and at Columbia.” Talking about his two years there to a second questioner, Obama asserted that “while I was on campus, I was very active in a number of student movements” and particularly “I was very active in the divestment movement on campus.” Several years later, on his first visit to South Africa, Obama declared that “I became deeply involved with the divestment movement” and “I remember meeting with a group of ANC leaders” or at least “ANC members one day in New York City.” There are no contemporary records or other participants’ memories that attest to any such encounter.

Columbia’s African American students were also acutely aware that the Faculty of Arts and Sciences included only four black professors. By far the most visible was the handsome, bow-tie-wearing Charles V. Hamilton, best known as the coauthor of Stokely Carmichael’s 1967 book, Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America. Hamilton had arrived at Columbia in 1969, was named to a chaired professorship two years later, and in 1982 was the recipient of the university’s award for excellence in undergraduate teaching. “Everyone knew who Hamilton was,” one 1983 political science major recalled. In addition, as one younger colleague said, “Hamilton was always approachable. The hallway outside his office at the southwest end of the SIPA building was often filled with students.”

But, thirty years later, when asked for the first time whether one particular 1983 African American poli sci major had ever taken one of his courses or sought his counsel, Hamilton said, “I didn’t know him at all.” Black history professor Hollis R. Lynch also has no recollection of Obama, nor does the entire roster of senior political science faculty. Even within Obama’s particular area of concentration, international relations, neither Warner Schilling, Roger Hilsman, Zbigniew Brzezinski, nor John G. Ruggie remembers him. “Never laid eyes on him,” Ruggie said. Indeed, apart from young Michael Baron,

“nobody really knew him,” one thirty-year veteran of the department reported. Obama would earn an A on the senior paper he wrote for Baron. It analyzed the decision-making during the arms-reductions negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. But Baron would discard the paper years before the world beyond Morningside Heights would yearn to read it.<sup>40</sup>

One week before the end of classes, Obama wrote another long letter to Alex McNear, who had taken leave from Oxy for spring term and was working in Pasadena. Citing “the method of negation” and “comparing what is to what might be,” Barack for a second time referred to something he had said in an earlier letter. Then he referenced their time in L.A. four months earlier: “a young black man” and “a young white woman” “that night in Wahid’s apartment in a timeless reddened room.” He also said his job prospect letters had not produced any firm leads, and that “I feel like forgetting the whole enterprise and taking you with me to Bali or Hawaii to live.” McNear years later recalled no actual invitation, and then Barack’s letter descended into vague declarations. “I am often cruel, and my mind will flash on the screen scenes of violence or petty malevolence or betrayal on my part.” McNear had no idea what he was referencing, and then Barack asked, “am I a blathering chump to you right now, or do you glean some sense from this mess?”

Barack continued on similarly, invoking “the necessary illusion that my struggles are the struggles of the first man, the river is the original river . . . What else? I enjoy my body, even when it frightens or disgusts me . . . I recall you saying that you still believe the mind is stronger than the body. A dangerous distinction, Alex, a vestige of western thought.” Rereading that passage years later, McNear felt it was “condescending.” Finally leaving his “river” for firmer ground, Barack wrote that it “looks like I will take a two month vacation to Indonesia and Hawaii next month. Will be stopping in L.A. either on the way over or back, if I come back. Will get in touch before I leave . . . Love, Barack.”

Photos from sometime around Columbia’s May 17 commencement show that Stan and Madelyn Dunham made the long trip from Honolulu to New York City to see their grandson, although Barack years later explained that “I actually didn’t go to my own graduation ceremony” since “my parents couldn’t come.” Soon after, Barack flew from New York to Los Angeles, where he stayed for several days with Alex McNear in her apartment. “We had this kind of picnic lunch on the floor of my living room,” Alex recalled. Even with Barack’s invocation of “black man” and “white woman” in his letter, blackness and racial identity “really was not something that he talked about a lot,” she remembered. “It barely ever came up.” Reflecting on that visit years later, “I felt he was less engaged” than he had been four months earlier. She thought there was “an enigmatic quality” to Obama, and “most of this relationship really revolved around these letters,” irrespective of their clarity.

Obama then flew to Singapore, where he spent five days with Hasan Chandoo and his family, a visit that coincided with Asad Jumabhoy’s appearance in the championship polo match of the Southeast Asian Games. In a letter to Alex, Barack wrote that Hasan “seemed fine, if more subdued than you remember him.” Barack found Singapore “an incongruous place . . . slick and modern and ordered, one vast supermarket surrounded by ocean and forest and the poverty of ages. Mostly peopled with businessmen from the states, Japan, Hong Kong as well as various family elites of Southeast Asia.” Hasan, Asad, and Barack went to a discotheque or two, but Barack wrote Alex that he remained largely silent when Hasan talked about the choices he was facing, “primarily to leave a space for our friendship should he move into the business world permanently.”

From Singapore, Barack flew to Indonesia and stayed at his mother's comfortable Ford Foundation home in South Jakarta. Anthropologist friends of Ann's often stayed there too, and among the guests that summer was a Rutgers University graduate student, Tim Jessup. Ann's work at Ford had kept her busy throughout 1982 and into 1983. She had written a brief paper entitled "Civil Rights of Working Indonesian Women" and delivered a lecture entitled "The Effects of Industrialization on Women Workers in Indonesia" to the Indonesian Society of Development. In mid-May, she had spent four days in Kenya, of all places, less than six months after her first husband's death, but Ann never spoke about this trip to friends.

When she wrote a long priorities analysis for Ford's continued work in Indonesia, Ann recommended that they "focus on a relatively new program area, women and employment," and particularly "the role of poor women as workers and income-earners." The ideal grantee would be "a non-governmental social action group founded by women for women," but she rued "the general weakness and lack of leadership within the women's movement in Indonesia." As Alice Dewey and a colleague wrote years later about Ann, "Java"—Indonesia's principal island—"was as much her home"—if not far more—"as Honolulu."

In his letter to Alex, Barack wrote that "my mother and sister are doing well," but with Ann "the struggling seems out of her, and the colonial residue of her life style—the servants, the shopping at the American supermarket, the office politics of the international agencies—throw up continual contradictions to the professed aims of her work." Barack was writing not from Jakarta but "from a screened porch somewhere on the northwest tip of Java." He confessed that "I can't speak the language" and that Indonesians treated him "with a mixture of puzzlement, deference and scorn because I'm American, my money and my plane ticket back to the U.S. overriding my blackness," as Obama was now old enough to perceive how many Indonesians loathed his skin color. But he closed by saying, "I feel good, engaged, the mystery of reality, the reality of mystery filling me up."

From that same porch, sitting "in my sarong, sipping strong coffee and drawing on a clove cigarette, watching the heavy dusk close over the paddy terraces of Java," Obama also wrote a postcard to Phil Boerner. "Very kick back, so far away from the madness. I'm halfway through my vacation, but still feel the tug of that tense existence. . . . Right now, my plans are uncertain; most probably I will go back" to New York City "after a month or two in Hawaii." In early July, he and apparently also his almost thirteen-year-old sister Maya flew from Jakarta to Honolulu. Only then did he actually mail his letter to Alex, writing on the back of the envelope that "with the postal system in Indonesia we'd be dead and gone before it arrived."<sup>41</sup>

Barack did not write to Alex again until September 1, and by then, his tone was dramatically cooler, almost palpably angry. Reacting apparently to something Alex had written to him, Barack wrote that "you are correct when you say that initially you were to me nothing more than a lovely wraith I had shaped to fit my needs, and I fought against this and you taught me yourself and I feel I showed progress eagerly, like a repentant student coming home with high marks. All this I have admitted to you in my letters—go back and reread some." Indeed rereading them three decades later, McNear reacted immediately to Obama's self-characterization: "student? . . . They all seem more like the professor," and that he was writing lectures. She said they are "not romance letters at all."

Then Barack's tone turned almost hostile, or ugly. "When I see you, the palpitations of the heart don't boil to the surface," he told Alex. "I care for you as yourself, nothing less but also nothing more. Does this anger you?” Again, “Does this anger you? When I sit down to write I no longer feel the need to bleed for brilliance on the page.” Years later, McNear does not know why Obama’s attitude had changed so starkly during these two summer months in Honolulu. “Here was someone who I felt that I cared a lot about. I loved him, I enjoyed seeing him,” but his interest in her had somehow waned. “I trust the strength of our relationship enough that I can show myself with rollers in my hair,” Barack wrote before again asking, “Does this anger you, Alex? It shouldn’t. Friends feel weary sometimes. When I said that we will ever want what we can’t have, I missed nothing.” He referenced “the bitterness that plagues my grandparents,” a comment McNear later said contradicted everything else she recalled him saying about them.

“I seek something in myself using the clues of this wind, that boy, my mother, your pain, perhaps the world,” Barack wrote, returning to his prior form. “Yes, this requires a monumental arrogance, and of late I feel it whittling away. If my arrogance (which has always been confessed—run back the tapes) angers you, then my last letter, our last meeting, should douse it. It is precisely the arrogance, the sense of destiny, that has been absent. I no longer feel compelled to try to shackle you in my abstruse dreams.” Addressing something Alex apparently had written, “When you doubt my honesty, you give me more credit in the past than I deserve. As though I calculated to deceive you in some way, represented myself as something I didn’t believe I was. You judge me badly; I think I have been as upfront about my doubts and demons as I knew how to be.”

Barack’s defensiveness was more than evident. “And when you question my sincerity (a word much abused, like democracy and justice) . . . you haven’t been listening very well when I spoke of myself.” He closed the letter by saying, “my plans are still uncertain right now” and that he had been “typing up letters to perspective [sic] employers for the last two hours with maniacal tidiness.” But “unless a job of some interest pops up soon, I’ll be flying back to New York at the end of this month” and will stop in Los Angeles. Almost three months would pass before Barack wrote her again.

Sometime in the first half of October, Obama left Honolulu for New York. If he stopped in Los Angeles, he did not contact Alex. Arriving in New York, he stayed for one week with Wahid Hamid, who now had a job with Siemens, in a second-floor apartment in suburban Long Island. He then returned to the familiar confines of 339 East 94th Street #6A, where he crashed on the living room couch of Sohale and his new roommate. “I felt a slight longing to move back into the known quantity,” Barack wrote Alex a month later, but “the howling and drinking and haze of my short stay smothered any productive impulses I may have had, so that moving to a new situation came easily.”

Obama next found a room in a three-bedroom apartment at 622 West 114th Street #43. He told Alex that out on Long Island he had spent his days “in seclusion sorting through various letters and timetables, spying on the damp, A-frame life of suburbia, wandering along the shoulders of roads” that lacked sidewalks. Wahid was “absorbed with his work” but retains “his integrity and curiosity for the strangeness of life, and I left his apartment certain that our friendship can straddle the divide of our different choices.” His time at Sohale’s had presented “cash flow problems” that had hindered getting his “job hunt in motion” as one week he was unable to pay for postage to mail out résumés, and “the next I have to bounce a check to rent a typewriter.” To remedy that shortcoming,

I took a one week stint supervising a project to transfer the files of the Manhattan Fire Department into a new facility, a fascinating experience affording me a taste of the grinding toil of low-rung white collar jobs, as well as the ambivalent relationships established between employers, employees, and personnel agencies with their shifting mix of loyalty, manipulation, abuses of power, rebellion and concession. The workers, an odd assortment of lower income kids, elderly women and unemployed liberal arts majors, struck me as some of the best people I've met; as the 12 hour shifts (uh-huh) wore on I watched much subtle straightforward contact being made and greater political perception than I had expected (although rarely framed in political terms). I felt a greater affinity to the blacks and Latinos there (who predictably comprised about three-fourths of the workforce there) than I had felt in a long time, and it strengthened me in some important way. My role as supervisor clouded the relationship between myself and them, however, since I felt that the company was using it as leverage to extract cooperation from the people for sometimes unreasonable demands. I tapped a feeling of community that comes in people acting in concert on a certain process; yet I felt frustrated that the project was imposed from above, structured according to bids and contracts and the bookkeeper, without lasting benefit beyond the pint-sized paychecks for the workers involved.

At 622 West 114th, "I occupy a room in the apartment of a woman in her late twenties," Dawn Reilly, who was "a dance instructor and taxi cab driver. The arrangement is fine for now. The place is large and warm, we see little of each other and when we do we maintain a pretty good patter. I suspect I may move if and when the opportunity for a lease arises, though, simply because the rent is a bit steep, and I feel obliged to keep the kitchen clean and air out the living room when I smoke." Since salaries in "community organizations are too low to survive on right now . . . I hope to work in some more conventional capacity for a year, allowing me to store up enough nuts to pursue those interests the next."

He closed by remarking that "I feel lonely yet surefooted, and hope all goes well for you . . . Get in touch when you get a chance, or impulse. Love, Barack." A month earlier, Alex had begun seeing a new young man, and she believes she did not reply. Six months would pass before she next contacted Obama.<sup>42</sup>

Within days of mailing that letter, Barack saw a posting at the career office of Columbia's School of International and Public Affairs for a job at Business International Corporation, an international finance information and research firm founded in 1956 that published numerous analytical and data service periodicals from its offices on the seventh floor of One Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, on the west side of Second Avenue between 47th and 48th Streets in midtown Manhattan. The job had been posted by BI's Cathy Lazere, a 1974 graduate of Yale who had earned an M.B.A. at New York University before joining BI's Global Finance Division eight months earlier, in February 1983. Lazere was responsible for a bimonthly newsletter entitled Financing Foreign Operations—Interest Rate & Foreign Exchange Rate Updater, a four- or five-page publication that cost $900 to subscribe to annually but helped BI pull in a tidy profit as one of a bundle of services that major corporations purchased through individual client programs. In November Lazere was being promoted by division vice president Lou Celi to oversee both FFO and its sister reference publication, Investing, Licensing & Trading (ILT), which was edited by Beth Noymer, a 1983 graduate of Franklin & Marshall College who had joined BI just four months earlier.

Lazere had a roommate at Yale who was from Hawaii and had graduated from Punahou, so when a résumé arrived listing that as well as Columbia, Lazere invited him for an interview. Obama impressed her as "articulate and bright," and knowing he had attended Punahou, "I assumed he came from a privileged background.” Cathy introduced Barack to Beth Noymer and telephoned Lou Celi to get his approval before offering Barack the position. Obama’s salary would be about $18,500—a respectable sum for a newly minted B.A. in 1983—and he would be expected to write for the finance unit’s flagship newsletter, Business International Money Report (BIMR), as well as to do the research and copyediting necessary to churn out each issue of FFO. A few years later Barack would tell a questioner that he took the job at BI because “I wanted to know how money worked.”

More than three dozen correspondents all around the world submitted the data and material that Lou Celi’s unit sliced and diced to produce their multiple publications. FFO’s content, as its title made clear, was both arcane and impenetrable. Celi’s top deputy and sidekick, Barry Rutizer, had started out at BI doing FFO, and he said, “I couldn’t even read it when I was editing it.” Cathy Lazere agreed. “I was certainly bored when I was editing that stuff.” At the time of Obama’s arrival, issues of FFO consisted of lengthy country-by-country lists of exchange rates accompanied by brief comments and a summary table of “Foreign Exchange Rates of Major Currencies.” Barack had his own office, but the composition and production of BI’s publications took place on a central word processing system that relied upon Wang terminals scattered around the office rather than individually assigned. As a result “we sort of duked it out over Wang time,” Beth Noymer said, with almost everyone regularly moving around the roughly sixty-person office. “The Wangs were a big part of our lives,” Celi’s assistant Lisa Shachtman Hennessey recalled, and “every ten minutes” someone seemed to call out from the bullpen area that “the Wangs are down.” Smoking was more than allowed—“there were ashtrays everywhere,” Lisa remembered—and Obama regularly smoked Marlboros while editing manuscript copy by hand. “There was almost no way to get all your work done between nine and five,” Beth explained, especially on days when the final content had to be sent down to the print shop that BI veteran Peggy Mendelow oversaw in the building’s basement.

Much of BI’s information gathering required telephoning various midlevel officials at corporations and banks. When calls were returned, BI’s switchboard operator announced the call over an office-wide paging system if someone was not at their desk. Brenda Vinson, an African American woman in her late thirties, worked in the library and often covered the switchboard. Obama was the first black college graduate to work at BI, and his unfamiliar first name was a challenge to pronounce. Vinson remembers Barack as “very personable” toward her and her cousin, who were BI’s only other black employees; a Puerto Rican father and son staffed BI’s mailroom. There was a good bit of socializing among the young professionals who worked at BI. A nearby Irish pub was one regular destination, and Beth Noymer later described BI’s office culture as “a hotbed of young singles.”<sup>43</sup>

Obama did not socialize with his BI workmates, but sometime prior to New Year’s Eve, his friend Andy Roth invited him to a party that Andy’s brother Jon was hosting in their sixth-floor apartment at 240 East 13th Street. Jon worked at Chanticleer Press, a publisher that helped produce National Audubon Society guides, and other invitees included Genevieve Cook, a twenty-five-year-old Swarthmore College graduate who had worked at Chanticleer before beginning coursework toward a master’s degree in early childhood education at Bank Street College of Education. She was born in 1958 to parents who were Australian: Helen Ibbitson, the daughter of a Melbourne banker, and Michael J. Cook, a conservative diplomat who would go on to head up Australia’s top intelligence agency before serving for four years as ambassador to the United States. Her parents had divorced when Genevieve was ten years old, and Helen then married Philip C. Jessup Jr., an American lawyer and executive whose International Nickel Company post had him and Helen living in Jakarta during the 1970s. Genevieve attended multiple boarding schools in the U.S. before graduating from the Emma Willard School near Albany, New York. While she was at Swarthmore, her mother and stepfather Phil had moved from Jakarta to New York, and by late 1983 Genevieve was temporarily living in their spacious apartment on Park Avenue just below 90th Street after breaking up with a Swarthmore boyfriend with whom she had lived in Manhattan's East Village while student teaching that year at the Brooklyn Friends School.

Her four years at Swarthmore were the first time Genevieve attended the same school for more than two years, and it was her first time in one country for more than three straight. "At Swarthmore, I was very drawn to . . . the drug oriented counterculture" and "its ritualized pot smoking," she wrote in her impressive 1981 senior anthropology thesis, "Dancing in Doorways." For the thesis, she interviewed fifteen fellow students who were also the children of expatriates, "people who spent their lives from the time they were born moving around from country to country, who are not members of any one culture, who come from nowhere in particular, and who do not really belong anywhere. You will always know them when you meet them."

At the Roth brothers' party, Genevieve did know one when she met one. She and Obama struck up a conversation that lasted several hours after they discovered their mutual ties to Indonesia and expatriate similarities. "I remember being very engaged, and just talking nonstop," she later wrote. "We both had this feeling of how bizarre and exciting it was that we'd both grown up in Indonesia, and we felt we very much had a worldview in common." Barack was in no way aggressive. "If anything, he struck me as diffident . . . although also at ease with himself" and "clearly interested in pursuing this conversation with me." She found him "just really interesting, intellectually," and she later reflected that "the thing that connected us is that we both came from nowhere—we really didn't belong." Before the night was out, he handed her a small scrap of paper—"Barack Obama 866-8172 622 W. 114th #43"—that she still retains thirty years later. After a phone call the next week, she agreed to meet him at his apartment for dinner, where Barack cooked for the two of them. "Then we went and talked in his bedroom. And then I spent the night. It all felt very inevitable," she wrote in a private memoir.

That evening stood in sharp contrast to Genevieve's rejection of a dinner host seven months earlier. That spring she had taken a course at Bank Street that involved having the students share recipes with their classmates. Three decades later Genevieve still had the "Floating Island Pudding" she shared as well as "Zayd's Catsup," a contribution from a thirty-seven-year-old classmate. At the end of the semester, that classmate invited her to dinner at his apartment at 520 West 123rd Street #5W. Five-year-old Zayd and his two-year-old brother Malik were asleep, as was Chesa, another almost two-year-old member of the household, whose mother and father were both in prison.

Genevieve was initially surprised that the only food her host had for dinner was grapes, but it quickly became clear what he wanted for dessert. He explained that he was in an open relationship; he and his partner had been leading figures a decade earlier in a group whose slogans included "Smash Monogamy!" His partner was not coming home that night; indeed she was residing involuntarily at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in lower Manhattan, where she would remain for another six months. "He gave getting me into bed quite a good go," Genevieve recalled, but with a thirteen-year age difference between them, he "seemed awfully old to me!" Her host "was quite miffed that I was not impressed by his 'status'" as a notorious former radical, albeit one whose FBI “Wanted” poster made him appear to have just fallen out of bed rather than striving to get into one. He “backed off when I wasn’t interested,” and Genevieve’s rebuff may have had a greater impact than she realized.

Four months later a federal judge gave her host’s partner a weekend furlough so the two former anti-monogamy advocates could marry, and two months after that, the judge allowed her to return to 520 West 123rd Street on a Christmas furlough. Four days after New Year’s, the judge granted a motion to vacate the contempt citation that had kept Bernardine Dohrn jailed since May 19, and she was free to remain with her two sons and now husband, Bill Ayers. As Genevieve would pluperfectly capture the essence of the story, sometimes indeed the “truth is so much stranger than fiction!”<sup>44</sup>

On Monday, January 9, Genevieve spent a second night with Barack on 114th Street, and the next day wrote in her journal, “I have not experienced the kind of intellectual stimulation Barack offers me since I left college.” She expressed similar feelings in a letter she wrote to him but did not mail, a letter she still had three decades later. “You are the first person I’ve met since being in college who has in some way engaged me in a process of self-intellectual questioning. It is a shock to recognize that my engagement with Bank St., education, friends I’ve made through Bank St. & teaching & the kind of process I’ve touted, of teaching forcing you to be self-evaluative, has all been ‘professional.’”

Over the next four weeks, Genevieve continued to record in her journal her reactions to Barack. Intercourse was pleasant, and in bed “he neither came off as experienced or inexperienced,” she later recalled. “Sexually he really wasn’t very imaginative, but he was comfortable. He was no kind of shrinking ‘Can’t handle it. This is invasive’ or ‘I’m timid’ in any way; he was quite earthy.” In one late January entry, she wondered “how is he so old already, at the age of 22?” and she wrote two poems for Barack, one teasing him by way of implicit comparison to the mythical Orion. The second, alphabetical in form, progressed from “B. That’s for you” to “F’s for all the fucking that we do” to “L I love you . . . O is too.”

Obama spoke excitedly about Genevieve during one phone conversation with Hasan Chandoo in London, yet in a “rather mumbled” one with his mother Ann in Jakarta he made no mention of Genevieve but talked about BI. “Barry,” as Ann called him in a letter to Alice Dewey, “is working in New York this year, saving his pennies so he can travel next year . . . he works for a consulting organization that writes reports on request about social, political and economic conditions in third world countries. He calls it ‘working for the enemy’ because some of the reports are written for commercial firms that want to invest in those countries. He seems to be learning a lot about the realities of international finance and politics, however, and I think that information will stand him in good stead in the future.”

With Genevieve, Barack spoke of BI “only to be disparaging” and only “very rarely” did he speak about his actual five-days-a-week work tasks. “His entire attitude was bearing a necessary burden” and one he was deeply uncomfortable with. “Even just putting on the clothes to go to work in that environment was a political divide—it divided him from how he really saw himself,” she later explained. “He definitely wore it like a penance.” On weekday evenings, Barack’s posture was “They’re the enemy, and I’ve just spent all day at work” but also that “I’m above being emotionally affected by my job.”

His coworkers at BI quickly picked up on Barack’s emotional distance. Cathy Lazere, his immediate supervisor, noted his “aloofness.” “He came across as someone not interested in other people,” she said. Beth Noymer, his closest colleague, said he was “quiet and kind of kept to himself.” To vice president

Lou Celi, Barack came across as “shy and withdrawn” and “always seemed aloof.” Lou’s deputy Barry Rutizer thought Obama “was kind of self-involved” and “somewhat withdrawn.” Lou’s assistant Lisa Shachtman remembered Barack as someone who was “sitting back and observing” others rather than interacting with them. BIMR editor Dan Armstrong recalled that Obama “really just kind of kept to himself” and “never joined us” when everyone went out after work. Dan thought “diffident” was the perfect adjective, and in Peggy Mendelow’s memories Obama “had an obvious ‘Do Not Disturb’ sign on him.” Years later one colleague would describe Barack as “the whitest black guy I’ve ever met.”<sup>45</sup>

Barack’s life with Genevieve on 114th Street, where she came on Thursdays after a class at Bank Street as well as on weekends, was a separate world from his workday week. In mid-February, Genevieve recorded that Barack the night before had “talked of drawing a circle around the tender in him—protecting the ability to feel innocence and spring born—I think he also fights against showing it to others, to me.” The next day, Presidents’ Day, she recorded her worries about her “unwillingness to believe that he really does like the time spent with me, that he likes me.” Alluding to BI, it “makes me cross that he’s sitting there in that office while all the others take the day off—too soon to scorn the blatant taking advantage of the least powerful on the totem pole—but I hope he will soon find a way to make it clear he sees limits to what can be thrust on him—the loose ends, the overtime.” Her thoughts returned to their weekend together. “It means so much more than lust, after all, all this fucking we do.” Four days later, after Thursday night together, she wrote of “making love with Barack, so warm and flowing and soft but deep—relaxed and loving—opening up more.”

But Genevieve had her own self-doubts. “It’s all too interior, always in his bedroom without clothes on [or] reading papers in the living room. I’m willing to sit and wait too much.” Barack did go out to Long Island one weekend to see Wahid, who had now married his longtime girlfriend Ferial “Filly” Adamjee, yet with Genevieve their time together was interior indeed. She worried “that what men reach for and stay with is the availability to them of a warm time in bed, while they put up with or dismiss the ‘noise’ women ‘indulge’ themselves in.” While “the sexual warmth is definitely there . . . the rest of it has sharp edges, and I’m finding it all unsettling and finding myself wanting to withdraw from it all. I have to admit that I am feeling anger at him for some reason, multi-stranded reasons. His warmth can be deceptive, tho he speaks sweet words and can be open and trusting, there is also that coolness . . . Both of us wary . . . and that is tiring.”

The next weekend found a return to warmth, with Genevieve pleased by Barack’s compliments, “his saying ‘You’re sweet to me,’ that I’m kind, as if he’s not accustomed to that, has not had much of that.” One evening at dinner, Genevieve recorded, she had an image “of being with Barack, 20 years hence, as he falters through politics and the external/internal struggle lived out.” One week later, with Genevieve experiencing a bout of tearful self-pity, “Barack said he used to cry a lot when he was 15—feeling sorry for himself.” Fifteen would have been his tenth-grade year at Punahou, when Barack was closest to Keith Kakugawa, but Genevieve was happy that he “won’t let important things go unspoken. ‘Speak to me.’”

Yet more often Genevieve felt a self-distancing on Barack’s part, “a sense of you biding your time and drawing others’ cards out of their hands for careful inspection—without giving too much of your own away—played with a good poker face. And as you say, it’s not a question of intent on your part—or deliberate withholding—you feel accessible, and you are, in disarming ways. But I feel that you carefully filter everything in your mind and heart . . . there’s something also there of smoothed veneer, of guardedness . . . I'm still left with this feeling of . . . a bit of a wall—the veil.”

In early March, Genevieve moved from her parents' Park Avenue apartment to a top-floor, two-bedroom apartment in a Park Slope brownstone at 640 2nd Street that was owned by relatives of a Brooklyn Friends School secretary. One mid-March morning, she telephoned West 114th Street and for a moment mistook the voice of the third roommate, Michael Isbell, for Barack. Michael's firm "I'm good" in response to Genevieve's "How are you?" made her realize "that Barack often doesn't feel firmly good."

Barack and Genevieve saw even less of Michael than they did of Dawn Reilly, whom they mostly interacted with on Sunday mornings. Michael worked in advertising, had a full-time girlfriend, and remembered Barack as a quiet, studious smoker. Michael did not get along with Dawn as well as Barack did, and Genevieve believed Dawn "had this kind of motherly attitude towards" Barack, even though she was just five years older. Genevieve remembers Dawn as "a vivacious character . . . very fond of Barack" and "she thought we were a very cute couple. She saw enough of us that she was very aware when things were good" and also when "things got a little bit strained." Genevieve recalled that in mid-March, Dawn told her, "I feel more tension between you two" and said she believed Genevieve was good for Barack, whom she thought was confused about what he wanted. To herself that day Genevieve wrote, "I'm a little worried about Barack. He seems young and defenseless these days."<sup>46</sup>

Barack intrigued Genevieve greatly, but there is "so much going on beneath the surface, out of reach. Guarded, controlled," she wrote to herself. Genevieve took the initiative to buy them tickets to a one-woman performance of three short plays by Samuel Beckett at his namesake theater on West 42nd Street. In the last of them, Rockaby, actress Billie Whitelaw onstage uttered just one word, "more." In between her four increasingly fearful incantations of that one syllable, the audience heard "the tortured final thrashings of a consciousness, as recorded by the actress on tape." At its close, the audience experienced "relief" as "death becomes . . . a happy ending," New York Times critic Frank Rich wrote, saying it was "riveting theater . . . that no theatergoer will soon forget." In her journal, Genevieve wrote that "Billie Whitelaw was superb."

At the end of March, Hasan Chandoo arrived in New York to prepare for his move from London to Brooklyn in early summer. The 1984 Democratic presidential race was in full swing, and on Wednesday evening, March 28, top contenders Walter Mondale and Gary Hart were joined by third-place contestant Jesse Jackson for an intense televised debate from Columbia's Low Library, moderated by CBS's Dan Rather. By that time Obama was actively interested in Jackson's campaign, and the next Saturday, March 31, he persuaded Hasan, Beenu Mahmood, now in his first year at Columbia Law School, and even Sohale, to join him in attending a Jackson campaign rally on 125th Street in central Harlem. Three days later, Jackson finished a strong third in the New York primary with over 25 percent of the vote, including presumably Barack's. Both Hasan and Beenu also remember that spring and summer that Barack often carried with him a well-worn copy of Ralph Ellison's famous 1952 novel Invisible Man, which he was reading and rereading. Beenu believed that "Invisible Man became a prism for his self-reflection," and in retrospect Beenu thought that over time "Ellison assisted Barack in reaching a fork in his life."

But that fork was more than a year away. Later that night, Barack and Genevieve joined Hasan and Sohale at the latter's East 94th Street apartment, where Barack had lived a year earlier. "Long time friends, easy with each other but also challenging," Genevieve wrote in her journal the next day. Everyone “did several lines of cocaine, which added an edge to it all.” For Barack, the almost three years that had passed since he lived with Hasan in South Pasadena in 1980–81 had been almost entirely drug-free, certainly when compared to that year at Oxy and indeed the three previous as well. His twelve months living with Sohale in 1982–83 had seen plenty of “partying” by Siddiqi, but only with Hasan’s incipient move to New York would Barack feel compelled, on account of their friendship, to reengage in something that without Hasan he felt no need to seek out. He was seriously involved with a woman who smoked pot daily, but except when they were at parties with Hasan, Sohale, and Imad, Barack and Genevieve did not partake of such pursuits.<sup>47</sup>

Before the end of that weekend, Barack told Genevieve that “I really care very much about you” and that “No matter how things turn out between us, I always will.” She wrote in her journal that he talked to her as well about his “tendency to be always the observer, how to effect change, wanting to get past his antipathy to working at BI.” A week later “Barack talked of his adolescent image of the perfect, ideal woman—searching for her at the expense of hooking up with available girls.” Presently she imagined him “opting for dirtying his hands in the contradictions and overwhelming complexities this city offers” and resolved that “I must enjoy Barack while I can.” Recounting a scene Barack had described to her, “The image of Barack shaking his grandpa by the shoulders and asking ‘Why are you so damn unhappy?’ really struck me.”

In early April, Barack received a call from Alex McNear, who was still living in Eagle Rock, and soon after, he sent her a long letter, one that portrayed his role at BI somewhat differently from how his coworkers and Genevieve did. “I’ve emerged as one of the ‘promising young men’ of Business International, with everyone slapping my back and praising my work. There is the possibility that they offer the job of Managing Editor for one of the publications, which would involve a hefty raise, but an extended stay,” Barack asserted. “The style and substance of what I write” was such that “I can churn out the crap without much effort” yet “the finished product confronts me as an alien being, not threatening, but a part of another system, another sensibility.”

Barack’s description of some of his interactions with colleagues beggared belief. “Without effort, I find I can perform with flawless grace, patching up their insecurities, smoothing over ruffles among the co-workers.” Yet he described his own attitude with considerable accuracy. “All of them, including my superiors, sense some sort of tethered fury, or something set aside, below the calm surface . . . so that I remain somewhat alien to them.” Indeed “the implacable manner is not an act, nor is the anger underneath,” but Barack acknowledged that his colleagues “are good people, warm and intelligent.” He told Alex, “I’ve cultivated strong bonds with the black women and their children in the company, who work as librarians, receptionists,” and reported that the only other black men “one sees are teenage messengers.”

Barack admitted “the resistance I wage does wear me down—because of the position, the best I can hope for is a draw, since I have no vehicle or forum to try to change things. For this reason, I can’t stay very much longer than a year. Thankfully, I don’t yet feel like the job has dulled my senses or done irreparable damage to my values, although it has stalled their growth.” But, “like other malcontents, I have my other life as opposed to my working life . . . weeknights I spend a few hours writing, a few hours eating, and take occasional walks along the river. I recently finished the first fiction piece I’ve attempted in over a year, and I got some good feelings doing it, even though it’s not top quality. I still have a certain ambivalence towards writing/art as a vocation.” As for “my political reading/spectating—my ideas aren’t as crystalized as they were while in school, but they have an immediacy and weight that may be more useful if and when I’m less observer and more participant. On weekends I see Sohale, Wahid et al. fairly frequently and let myself slip back into old comfortable activities like bullshitting and watching basketball,” though to Alex, Barack made no mention of his reintroduction to cocaine. He confessed that “I’ve also become quite close to an Australian woman who teaches in a Brooklyn grade school. She doesn’t put up with a lot of my guff, and has a good sense of humor without any cynicism, which is a good tonic for my occasional attitude problems.” Obama ended the letter by saying “look forward to seeing you in the summer if you choose to come back East. Love, Barack.”<sup>48</sup>

The divergence between how Obama described his interactions with his BI colleagues and how they viewed him was great indeed. Eugene Chang, one of the two editors of the finance unit’s lead newsletter, Business International Money Report, made an effort to get to know Obama, inviting him to lunch at a Korean restaurant and mentioning how he jogged. Barack’s responses were chilly and abrupt: “I don’t jog, I run.” Susan Arterian, a decade older than Obama, thought “there was a certain hauteur about him and a somewhat cultivated aura of mystery.” To her, “BI was a friendly place” with lots of “wonderfully quirky characters,” and Eugene’s BIMR coeditor, Dan Armstrong, saw Barack as “reserved and distant towards all of his coworkers,” notwithstanding how BI was “not a corporate place in any way.”

Bill Millar, a 1983 graduate of CUNY’s Baruch College, found Obama “arrogant and condescending,” someone who “treated me like something less than an equal” even though Millar was a higher-ranking assistant editor. Millar once argued with Barack about corporations that did business in South Africa, and another colleague, Tom Ehrbar, recalled Barack quarreling about the CIA with another coworker who did not remember the exchange. As Peggy Mendelow described Barack, he “kept very much to himself” and “didn’t seem to want to be there.”<sup>49</sup>

Barack was far more interested in old friends than in making new ones. Genevieve described “Barack’s face opening up in a broad grin after talking with Bobby [Titcomb] on the phone in Honolulu.” She also described their sexual interactions positively: “really communicating instead of merely getting off.” At the end of April, Genevieve wrote, “I’m falling in love with Barack. . . . Spent Sunday with Barack in the park.” They saw a boy in a sandbox “with his Superman cape on, and I launched into some kind of spiel about kids and imagination and fantasy, and he launched into this thing about superheroes and was revealing about some relationship he had to superheroes, and I thought, ‘Oh my God, that’s fascinating, I’ve never heard him come out with that before,’ and I pounced on it and wanted to really like push an exploration of it” but Barack gently rebuffed her.

At the end of April, old Oxy friend Sim Heninger came through New York and stayed with Phil Boerner, who was just about to finish his degree at Columbia. One evening, Sim, Phil, and Phil’s girlfriend Karen had dinner with Barack and Genevieve. Sim in particular was struck by the seriousness of their romantic attachment. Early in May, however, Genevieve detected a “deliberate distancing” on Barack’s part and wrote, “I think I am probably being rejected more for what I represent in Barack’s mind than for who I am.” She imagined that Barack would be more comfortable with a black woman, and she wrote in her journal, “I think I’ve known all along that he plots this into his life as something temporary—not open-ended as he had said.” She wondered if they were just “using each other,” yet understanding what was going on was difficult, because “he is so wary, wary. Has visions of his life, but in a hiatus as to their implementation—wants to fly, and hasn't yet started to take off.”

Within a week their relationship had righted itself, although Genevieve was feeling “depressed about teaching” as the school year was ending. “It so delights me that from time to time, Barack will talk about the more private, inner aspects of what he sees and feels of our relationship.” In late May, Barack told her one night “of having pushed his mother away over the past 2 years in an effort to extract himself from the role of supporting man in her life—she feels rejected and has withdrawn somewhat.” By then he knew his mother and sister were moving back to Honolulu in mid-August. Ann had learned in February that her Ford Foundation post would expire in six months. She had resolved to make the best of that by returning to her long unfinished Ph.D. at the University of Hawaii, a move that would allow soon-to-be fourteen-year-old Maya to begin ninth grade at Punahou. Ann wrote the chairman of UH's Anthropology Department to say that “the major reason” for her long absence from the program had been “the need to work to put my son through college,” and with his graduation, “I'm now free to complete my own studies.”<sup>50</sup>

Once classes ended at Brooklyn Friends School, Genevieve left New York to spend a week at her stepfather's family's estate in Norfolk, Connecticut. She dreaded the next school year, when she would be teaching first grade at PS 133 in Park Slope. “I'm feeling really bad about myself in general,” she wrote in her journal, and by phone Barack sought to reassure her. By early June, Hasan Chandoo had an apartment at the Eagle Warehouse building on Old Fulton Street underneath the Brooklyn Bridge, and both there and at Sohale's apartment on East 94th Street, Barack and Genevieve joined some assortment of the Pakistani friends almost every weekend. If Wahid came into the city, or if Beenu and his girlfriend Chinan were present, drinks and dinner would be the centerpiece of an evening. But with Hasan, Sohale, and Imad, pot and cocaine were usually involved, though Barack's ambivalence about those activities was crystal clear to Genevieve and obvious to Hasan too.

Sometimes Barack would beg off, but most times he asked Genevieve to come along—“We'll go together,” he would say—knowing that one or both of them would try to leave before the evening got too late or the activities got too “out of control and manic,” as Genevieve described it. For all her pot smoking, Genevieve did not care for cocaine, yet Barack “didn't like it when I said ‘Well I'm going to leave now’ or ‘I don't feel like coming’” because “that made it harder for him to ignore the fact that he didn't really want to go either, that he would have rather stayed home and read.”

But Barack's bond with Hasan was stronger than his self-discipline, and Genevieve thought “it seemed important to Barack that I bolster him in his desire to maintain allegiance to the guys.” To her, Barack's indulgence “was definitely out of loyalty and an inability to kind of give the flick to people who had been so incredibly loyal and embracing” of “this lost boy, who had no group, who had no community, and they knew him from before,” from Oxy, “and embraced him warmly.” Hasan was “absolutely” the driving force, not Sohale or Imad, and while that trio was “doing lots of cocaine,” Barack “did not do as much as they did.” Indeed, Barack did “a lot less of everything, like for every five lines that somebody did, he would have done half, and for every scotch that Hasan poured, he would have had one out of every ten compared to what Hasan was drinking.”

In a more understated voice, Hasan agreed with Genevieve. “We dabbled in drugs,” but with Barack “there wasn't anything excessive by him, by my standards.” As of that 1984 summer, Obama was “much more serious” than the college sophomore Hasan had lived with three years earlier, and at times Barack

“would tell me to go easy on my drinking or my smoking pot, and I’m saying ‘What a change!’” Genevieve recognized a tension between Barack’s loyalty to his Pakistani friends and his emerging realization that “somehow splitting himself off from people is necessary to his feeling of following some chosen route which basically remains undefined.” She continued to worry about “veils and lids and control,” but Genevieve enjoyed being “cosseted in Barack’s apartment” on weekend nights before returning to her Brooklyn apartment and a new roommate whose presence she found irritating. Genevieve found her intimate time with Barack special and uplifting, but she was sometimes troubled by his behavior toward the Pakistanis, writing one night that “the abruptness and apparent lack of warmth with which Barack left them was jarring.”<sup>51</sup>

A few days later Hasan and Barack had dinner at Genevieve’s apartment, and she remained fascinated with Barack’s deeper, preoccupying thoughts. He talked about Ernest Hemingway “and the integrity of grasping for those times, those visions that are ones of true magnificence and profundity,” but “when Barack speaks of missing the signs of some central, centered connection with the powerful maelstroms of deep feeling, grand scopes, I have responded with comments such as ‘Maybe you need not to look for them at such dizzying heights, but on other levels.’”

In mid-July, Genevieve took offense at “all the artifice in his manner,” but a large Saturday-night dinner at Hasan’s that included his cousin Ahmed, Beenu and his sister Tahir, and Wahid and his wife Filly left Genevieve impressed with Filly’s intelligence and independence. Yet Genevieve’s persistent self-doubts continued to trouble her feelings about Barack. “How long will it take him to see that I am silly and insecure and inarticulate in a way he will find repulsive rather than acceptable?” she wrote in her journal.

A trio of cheap photo booth pictures the couple took of themselves that summer shows Genevieve looking exceptionally energized, striking, and happy, and a somewhat full-faced Barack looking pleased and happy as well. On the first Sunday in August, Genevieve challenged him to a footrace in Prospect Park near her apartment. Barack greeted the challenge with gently mocking bemusement, but then, to his utter amazement and chagrin, Genevieve won, demonstrating that he had seriously underestimated her. “Barack couldn’t really believe it and continued to feel a bit unsettled by it all weekend” as they showered and then went to see a new film, James Ivory’s The Bostonians, starring Vanessa Redgrave and Christopher Reeve. “Being beaten by a woman,” especially when Barack prided himself on his almost daily running, “really unsettled him,” Genevieve recalled.

Genevieve believed that Barack’s running was motivated by unpleasant memories of having been a chubby boy in his pre-basketball years. “There was still quite a bit of ‘I was a fat boy’ feeling lurking underneath his resolve to be so disciplined with the running. He was very trim, except for a bit of pudgy tummy,” which “he couldn’t get rid of” and “was quite self-conscious about,” she remembered. “That’s why he ran,” to “get rid of that last little bit of being a pudgy boy.”

That did not hinder what she described as “passionate sex,” and after a week apart when Genevieve went to London, she returned to find Barack troubled after having been told by his African sister Auma, who hoped to visit New York in November, about a rumor that their father may have been murdered rather than killed by his own drunken driving. Barack and Auma had become irregular correspondents following Obama Sr.’s November 1982 death, and either just before or just after this latest word from Auma, Barack had a memorable dream about his father that he shared with Genevieve, who had also “grown up without my dad.” But now he also told her that a month earlier he had cried when he saw television news coverage of a mass murder that claimed the lives of twenty-one people at a fast-food restaurant near San Diego. “Interesting that he was connecting the two,” Genevieve wrote in her journal, “when in fact the tears he cries are, I’m sure, buried tears over his dad, and the loss over all the years without him. He was very subdued” for the balance of that weekend.

To Genevieve, who was “constantly looking for an explanation for this wary guardedness” she so often felt from Barack, the answer lay in how “he was not in touch with how deeply wounded he was by his mother’s and his father’s relationships with him.” In her mind, Barack’s “woundedness” and “abandoned child persona” meant “the amount of suppression of negative emotion is just heroic” and explained why “there was a ‘no go’ zone very, very quickly” whenever talk about deep personal feelings threatened to undermine all of that successful suppression.<sup>52</sup>

In late August, Alex McNear called Barack to say she would be arriving in New York on August 23. The two of them had dinner that night, although years later Alex would have no memory at all of that evening. Genevieve was not looking forward to the start of her school year at PS 133, but in her journal she again wrote, “I love him very much.” Obama met up with Mike Ramos for a beer one night when Mike came to New York for the first of two training events for his job at a large accounting firm. Barack talked about quitting his job at BI so he could do something more rewarding, and Mike, impressed with his friend’s courage, ended up crashing at 114th Street rather than making it back to his hotel. Either during that visit or when Mike returned to New York just before Halloween, they had dinner one night with Genevieve, whose unusual name Mike would remember years later.

Early in the fall, Phil Boerner, Barack, and another old Oxy friend, Paul Herrmannsfeldt, who was working at a publishing house, started a book discussion group at Paul’s seventh-floor apartment in Soho. Their first selection was Samuel Beckett’s 1938 novel Murphy, and Phil’s girlfriend Karen plus several friends of friends attended two or three subsequent meetings, but the group petered out within two months. Barack also attended a reading by several writers at the West End bar on Broadway just south of 114th Street that his apartment mate Michael organized just prior to moving out, but his attempt to interest Michael in his own work failed. As Phil later said, they all found Barack “an interesting yet unremarkable person,” a young man whom some saw as “a bit smug” but whom no one imagined would ever be seen as an exceptional individual.<sup>53</sup>

At BI Barack’s colleagues felt similarly. In early fall, Lou Celi and Cathy Lazere launched a new series of “Financial Action Reports” that required updating BI’s data on companies’ cash management strategies in particular foreign countries, with new information gleaned from interviews with corporate treasurers. The first two countries were Mexico and Brazil, and Obama and the slightly more senior Michael Williams were given a task that Williams remembered as “my least favorite project” at BI. About twenty treasurers had to be contacted either by phone or in person in New York, and the thirty-minute interviews had to be transcribed. Williams and Obama each took half, and though Williams recalled transcribing his own tapes, Lou’s assistant Lisa got newly arrived editorial assistant Jeanne Reynolds to transcribe at least one of Obama’s more difficult ones. Williams remembered Barack as someone who “kept to himself,” spoke only when necessary, and never seemed “fully engaged.” That was atypical indeed at “a very friendly place” with “a pretty hip crowd” that offered great opportunities for advancement “if you wanted them.”

Jeanne Reynolds recalled Barack as “quiet, reserved, polite,” and Barack’s copy editor on the Mexico and Brazil reports, newly arrived Maria Stathis, would likewise remember him as “very quiet.” Another new arrival, Gary Seidman, remembered Barack teaching him to use the Telex machine that was cheaper than the telephone for international communication. Barack seemed “aloof,” a stark contrast to his “vibrant” coworker Beth Noymer. When Obama gave Cathy Lazere formal notice one day in November that he was quitting effective early December, Cathy mused that “it must have been a little lonely for him to work at a place for a year and not be fully engaged in the world around him.”

A few days earlier, his sister Auma called from Nairobi to say she was canceling her New York trip because their younger brother David Opiyo had just been killed in a motorcycle crash at age sixteen. That news may have strengthened Barack’s resolve to leave a job he found so foreign to his political views, and although he told Cathy “he wanted to be a community organizer because he didn’t find business that meaningful,” he also was leaving BI without a new job in hand. Cathy, Gary Seidman, and the young man Cathy interviewed and then hired as Barack’s replacement, Brent Feigenbaum, all had the impression that Barack was considering law school in addition to community organizing. In Barack’s exit interview, Lou Celi told him, as he told everyone leaving BI, that he was making a big career mistake, and when Barack told editor Dan Armstrong he did not yet have a new job, Dan asked, “Are you crazy?” He also told Barack he at least should “get another job before you quit.” In Armstrong’s memory, Barack simply shrugged. Feigenbaum spent one day working alongside Barack and recalled him as “remote . . . not a terribly warm person.” Beth Noymer’s monthly calendar for December 1984 would show “Barack lunch” on Friday the fourteenth, but neither she nor Cathy nor anyone else had any memories of a farewell meal.

Asked two decades later what he recalled from his time at BI, Barack answered “the coldness of capitalism.” He told an earlier questioner, “I did that for one year to the day,” a clear indicator of his desire to leave that world for something he found more fulfilling. But giving up his BI paycheck meant leaving the apartment on West 114th Street, and on the weekend of December 1 and 2, Barack temporarily moved in with Genevieve on the top floor of 640 2nd Street in Park Slope.

Earlier in the fall, they had taken the bus to her family’s estate in Norfolk, Connecticut, where they slept in an open-air cottage and joined Genevieve’s mother and stepfather for one meal. Barack later recounted paddling a canoe on a nearby pond, and a photo shows a happy and relaxed young couple outdoors in the morning sun. Their first week together in Genevieve’s cramped quarters produced minor irritations, but a nice weekend then included seeing the Eddie Murphy film Beverly Hills Cop in downtown Brooklyn. Genevieve was the only white person in the audience, but she says she and Barack never experienced any hostility or rudeness toward them as an interracial couple.

In the days just before Barack left to spend the holidays in Honolulu, their feelings of being in each other’s way multiplied, with Barack saying, “I know it’s irritating to have me here,” and telling Genevieve that she was being “impatient and domineering.” But they exchanged Christmas gifts, with Barack embarrassed when Genevieve bought an expensive white Aran cable-knit wool sweater for him at Saks Fifth Avenue. When he asked her what she wanted, Genevieve suggested lingerie, which she says “threw him into an absolute tailspin” before he returned with something that Genevieve privately thought was “incredibly tame.”<sup>54</sup>

A week before Christmas, Obama flew to Honolulu, and he spent much of his time in transit reading a book by Studs Terkel, most likely his newly published The Good War: An Oral History of World War II.

On New Year's Day, he wrote to Genevieve that "my trip has progressed without any notable events" but that "I was foolish to think that I'd have the time or energy to work on my writing" in Hawaii because "reacquainting myself with the family has proven to be a fulltime job . . . they all have used me as a sounding board for all sorts of conflicts and emotions that have previously stayed below the surface. . . . I've been the catalyst for tears, confessions, ruminations, and accusations."

Genevieve had never met any of Barack's family, but he offered her sketches of them all. "My mother is as I last saw her, gregarious and sensitive, although she's undergoing some difficult changes after uprooting herself from Indonesia" to live in a visibly humble cinder-block apartment building at 1512 Spreckels Street, where she and fourteen-year-old Maya shared the two-bedroom unit 402, less than a block from Maya's ninth-grade classrooms at Punahou.

"My grandfather," Barack went on, now age sixty-six and retired, "appears immutable. He looks more robust than ever, even while eating donuts, smoking a cigarette, and drinking whiskey simultaneously. My grandmother is doing less well—she continues to drink herself into oblivion," indeed "incoherence," when not working. "Her unhappiness saddens me deeply. . . . It may be my helplessness in the face of her problem that angers me more than the problem itself. But she retires next year, and if the fortitude she's channeled exclusively into her work can't be transferred into the remainder of her life, not much life will remain." With Maya, "I watch with joy her development into a fine person," but being back in the all too familiar tenth-floor apartment at 1617 South Beretania meant that "ghosts of myself and others in my past lurk around every corner."

Obama wrote that his relatives all "think I'm too somber. . . . My mother explains that I was normal until 14, from there went directly to 35." Stan joked that Barack is "as mean to himself as he is to everyone else. The only difference is he likes it." But Obama was clearly discomforted by this return to his childhood surroundings. "I have trouble fitting into these Island Ways," he told Genevieve. Within blocks were "the apartment house where I was conceived . . . the hospital where I was born . . . and the school where I spent a third of my life." But nonetheless "I'm displaced here, it's not where I belong—sometimes I think my only home is on the road towards expectations, leaving what's known, complete, behind. I no longer find that condition romantic—at times I resent it deeply—but I accept it."

That sentence was as self-revealing as any Obama had ever written, but the contrast between "the incredible isolation of people here" in far-off Hawaii and "the nervous energy or self-consciousness you find in New York" was discombobulating. "My contradictory feeling for Hawaii reflects itself in my relationship with Bobby, who embodies the beauty and limitations of the place. He's making a comfortable living running a concession at a local high-school, and supplements his income with cash from a few big cocaine deals he was involved with last year"—an aspect of a best friend's life that was unobjectionable only if you viewed cocaine use itself as unremarkable.

Obama observed that Titcomb "jokes about his appetite for food and women, exhibiting a charm and flair in everything he does, but a sustained commitment or depth in nothing." But Barack added, "He loves me and I love him, but he senses different priorities in me now," though "I admire and envy his easy manner and fluid grace." One day the two old friends went scuba diving two miles off Oahu, fifty feet down. On another, Ann's mentor Alice Dewey "argued in husky tones with me and a few other of my mother's friends over politics, sexual relations, art and the economy." Only "after five hours and four cups of coffee" did Barack drive her home.

Alluding most likely to how they had met exactly one year earlier, Barack asked Genevieve, “How did you spend New Year’s Eve? Mine was not as eventful as the last one.” He told her he was flying back to New York on January 22 and would likely stay with Hasan and his cousin Ahmed at the Eagle Warehouse apartment “until I find a place. I confess to a fear of failing to find a useful gig for myself upon my return, but have no thoughts of doing anything else. I expect the transition may be tough on me,” as his prior attempts to obtain a politically satisfying job had failed, “but I expect you to have some patience with my foolishness and kick me when I get out of line. I miss you very much, and hope your enthusiasm for school stays high.” He signed off “Love, Barack.”

The same day Barack wrote that letter to Genevieve, his mother Ann privately recorded her own plans for the New Year. Many of her jottings concerned the multiple debts she owed her parents, including $1,764 per semester for Maya’s Punahou tuition, and $175 for an airplane ticket for “Barry.” The “$4,846 withdrawn from account by Toot” was later updated with “$3,940 repaid 2/6/85.” A long numerical “People List” began with Maya as #1, Ann’s Indonesian lover Adi Sasono #2, “Bar” #3, her parents #s 4 and 5, and included former brother-in-law Omar Obama as #175. The “Long Range Goals” she listed on New Year’s Day began “1. Finish Ph.D. 2. 60K 3. In shape 4. Remarry 5. Another culture 6. House + land 7. Pay off debts (taxes) 8. Memoirs of Indon. 9. Spir. develop (ilmu batin) 10. Raise Maya well 11. Continuing constructive dialogue w/ Barry.”<sup>55</sup>

Once Obama returned on January 22, Genevieve was disappointed that having him back in her daily life was “so disruptive, instead of a sweet re-meeting.” Given how challenging teaching first grade at PS 133 was, “I actually find his interruption of my focus on school as damaging, disconcerting,” but “he’s really into travelling his path with concentrated determination as well. It is still true that I want to live alone.” Obama later wrote of refusing the offer of a well-paid job from an impressive black man who headed a New York City civil rights group and had recently dined at the White House with “Jack,” the secretary of housing and urban development. Arthur H. Barnes headed up the New York Urban Coalition, but African American New Yorker Samuel R. Pierce was HUD secretary; only four years later did Jack Kemp succeed him.

Instead Obama focused on a job ad from the New York Public Interest Research Group (NYPIRG), for its Project Coordinator post at the City College of New York (CCNY) in West Harlem. NYPIRG, founded in 1973, was based on a campus chapter model first outlined in Action for a Change. A Student’s Manual for Public Interest Organizing, a 1971 book written by famous consumer advocate Ralph Nader and three coauthors, one of whom, Donald K. Ross, became NYPIRG’s initial executive director. By 1985 NYPIRG had chapters at most campuses of New York State’s two public college systems, the predominantly white State University of New York (SUNY) and the largely minority City University of New York (CUNY). Campus referenda that authorized a $2-per-student-per-semester fee provided NYPIRG’s financial base.

The project coordinator post paid only about $9,200, half of what Barack had been making at BI, and the CCNY job was open at midyear because of the departure of a young woman whose fall tenure had been unsuccessful. Yet the CCNY chapter boasted one of NYPIRG’s most experienced student leaders, Buffalo native Diana Mitsu Klos, who had moved to New York City eighteen months earlier upon being elected NYPIRG’s student board chair for the 1983–84 academic year. NYPIRG’s campus projects statewide were overseen by Chris Meyer, and 1983 Yale graduate Eileen Hershenov supervised CCNY and other Manhattan chapters from NYPIRG's tumbledown office at 9 Murray Street in lower Manhattan. On some day in late January or early February, Obama appeared there for a job interview with Hershenov and Meyer, who were "enormously impressed" with him, particularly since NYPIRG was "desperate to diversify" its predominantly white staff, especially at such a heavily minority campus as CCNY.

Obama's hiring was all but immediate, as CCNY's spring semester classes began on Monday, February 4. Eileen accompanied him up to City and introduced him to Diana Klos and seven or eight other core chapter members, including Alison Kelley, who thought Obama was "very poised, very together" right from day one. The NYPIRG chapter had a small office with desks and a telephone in a homely metal trailer known as the Math Hut that sat between CCNY's iconic Shepard Hall and the college's low-rise administration building south of 140th Street on the east side of Convent Avenue, just across from the North Academic Center (NAC), a hulking modern gray-brick behemoth that housed City's humanities and social science departments.

The key to NYPIRG's student recruitment efforts was "class raps," where the project coordinator would ask faculty members to give up five minutes of class time so that students could hear a brief pitch about NYPIRG. As of February 1985, NYPIRG's top statewide issue was its Toxic Victims Access to Justice Campaign, which sought passage of state legislation that would allow women and their offspring who had been harmed by the synthetic estrogen DES to file civil damage suits. New York was one of only seven states where such a right to sue did not exist, and generating citizen pressure on state legislators was a major focus of Hershenov and her colleagues' work.

Barack and Diana were present in NYPIRG's trailer office every day, and throughout February they concentrated on doing as many "class raps" as possible in advance of a late February "general interest meeting" intended to attract several hundred students. In some departments, like African American Studies, where senior professors like Leonard Jeffries Jr. and Eugenia "Sister" Bain were notorious for showing up late, if at all, for many scheduled classes, getting "class rap" time was easy. In others, like Political Science, Barack's efforts met with mixed success. Frances Fox Piven, who taught Politics and the Welfare State, and Ned Schneier, whose Congress and the Legislative Process also met on Tuesday and Thursday mornings, both said yes. A young associate professor teaching civil rights and civil liberties would have been less amenable, replying that it was inappropriate to sacrifice classroom time for nonacademic matters.

Like all CUNY colleges, CCNY was entirely a commuter campus, and one with "nowhere to hang out anywhere near there," as Alison Kelley recalled, so generating student participation in such a setting was a considerable challenge. Eileen Hershenov pitched in at least one day a week, and every Friday Obama joined project coordinators from NYPIRG's ten other southern New York schools for an afternoon staff meeting at 9 Murray Street. NYPIRG had an active relationship with Saul Alinsky's inheritors at the Industrial Areas Foundation, and one Friday Michael Gecan, one of IAF's four top organizers, spoke to the group and also spoke individually with Obama.

Eileen Hershenov was Barack's closest staff colleague, and they had several conversations about different models of organizing. She had read Clayborne Carson's 1981 history of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), In Struggle, and could remember even two decades later at least one conversation with Obama about SNCC's Mississippi grassroots organizing, which Bob Moses came to personify. "It was a very abstract intellectual conversation that I had with him," she recalled, one that contrasted SNCC's approach versus charismatic leaders, but all toward the end of "how do you empower people?"<sup>56</sup>

Even with his full-time weekday job up at CCNY, Obama spent all of February and early March splitting his time between Hasan's apartment below the Brooklyn Bridge and Genevieve's top-floor apartment in Park Slope, quite a commute on New York's far from reliable subways. "Who is this boy/man/person, Barack Obama?" Genevieve wrote in her journal in early February. "We communicate, we make love, we talk, we laugh. I insulted him the other night—a retaliatory 'fuck you'" for his complaining about Genevieve "always wimping out on dinners with the gang" or saying "You stay, I'm leaving" as a night drew on. "Both of us feeling dissatisfied, wanting something more—but he from himself, and me from the pair of us. . . . I don't really know or understand how he feels, privately, about me, us," given his "veiled withholding."

The next day she wrote that "since I've known him, he has not yet developed a concrete sense of direction," and in retrospect Genevieve remembered that Barack "came back from Hawaii definitely exuding impatience and frustration and dissatisfaction with the life he was leading." She was increasingly stressed by her teaching and by the shared space at 640 2nd Street. In mid-March her unhappiness led Barack to remark, "You like to make trouble." When that led to tears, Genevieve wrote that her own emotional insecurity "all relates back to my father, and his 'abandonment' of me and wanting desperately to have someone love me like a father." But she also believed that "all of this insecurity" is "a product of the conversation" she and Barack had had "about living together," coupled with all of the "distance on his part." Before the end of March, Genevieve found a better apartment at 481 Warren Street #4A in Brooklyn's Boerum Hill neighborhood.

Obama was still in touch with Oxy friends Phil Boerner and Andy Roth, and by early 1985 Andy was living with musician friend Keith Patchel in an informal sublet at 350 West 48th Street in Manhattan's rough Hell's Kitchen neighborhood. Patchel had left for Sweden at the first of the year to work on a record with his friend Richard Lloyd, a member of the underground band Television, and in March Andy was headed to Managua, Nicaragua, for more than two months. Apartment 4E had been home to the grandparents of neighbor Nick Martakis, a friend of Television's manager, and Keith and Andy simply paid Nick $200 or $250 a month in cash—"there was no lease" and "everything was on the down-low," Keith explained. "Keith and I were expected to keep a low profile," Andy remembered, and even incoming mail had to be addressed "c/o Martakis." The building was "decrepit," a step down even from Sohale's apartment on East 94th Street, but it was relatively spacious. It was also a shorter subway trip to CCNY in West Harlem, and on Sunday, March 31, Barack moved in there, while continuing to spend each weekend at Genevieve's Warren Street apartment in Brooklyn.

Two visitors whom Barack had met two years earlier in Jakarta—his mother Ann's anthropologist friends Pete Vayda and Tim Jessup—came for dinner one weekend. Tim was Genevieve's older stepbrother—the son of her stepfather, Phil Jessup. Barack did not say much to Genevieve about his NYPIRG work, and he never introduced her to any staff or students: "that compartmentalizing thing," she later remarked. Genevieve continued to wrestle with her own issues, and in mid-April wrote in her journal, "I am making a commitment here and now to stop smoking pot. I must. Because I am debilitating myself."

Genevieve's ongoing anxieties about teaching were always close to the surface. One mid-April weekend Genevieve told Barack that the older teachers at PS 133 had said, “Just stick in there. Nobody has a good first year, and the pension’s really good.” That pension reference so offended Barack he almost yelled in response. “It just really set him off. I had never seen him so upset,” Genevieve recounted. “He was almost thumping the table he was so upset—the idea that you would sell out for security” made him “so angry.” The next weekend Genevieve and Barack walked from Boerum Hill into Brooklyn Heights, and by Sunday afternoon, he was “acting a tad hostile. When he talks of enjoying being alone, I wonder that he so regularly attends this weekend pattern of ours,” she recorded.<sup>57</sup>

On Wednesday, May 1, the CCNY chapter of NYPIRG held a demonstration at Broadway and 137th Street to protest the abysmal condition of that IRT #1 line station. This was part of NYPIRG’s Straphangers Campaign for better subway service across the city. The next day a noontime rally outside NAC drew attention to how the NYPIRG chapter, in tandem with CCNY’s student government, had gathered more than a thousand handwritten letters to members of Congress opposing the Reagan administration’s proposed budget cuts for Pell Grants and guaranteed student loans in the pending Higher Education Reauthorization Act.

That weekend Barack and Genevieve went to Hasan’s apartment on Saturday night and got “high on coke,” she recorded in her journal. On Sunday Barack sat around her Warren Street apartment reading the New York Times and watching basketball. As he left that evening, Barack “said he felt strained,” and then told Genevieve, “This apartment is alien to me,” a comment she found hurtful. “Barack is discovering the ennui of life being uneventful and unfulfilling and not knowing where to look for the source of it,” she wrote. In retrospect she thought he was “depressed” and “not really talking that much.” She sensed “a great deal of disappointment and more emotional involvement” with his NYPIRG job than at BI. Barack’s inability to distance himself from his job as he had at BI made him “significantly more troubled by what was going on at work.” Genevieve thought that “as long as he was still at BI and paying his dues,” Barack had believed that a community organizing job would “be the fulfillment of his dream” and gave him hope for the future after his self-imposed 365-day sentence was up. But “the disappointment with how his actual experience” at NYPIRG had played out was leaving him “very broody.”

Yet the CCNY students and NYPIRG staffers who worked most closely with Barack could not have been happier with him. On Tuesday, May 7, NYPIRG’s annual Lobby Day in Albany drew almost two hundred students from around the state, and the senate leader who previously had blocked passage of NYPIRG’s Toxic Victims Access to Justice bill told reporters, “I am convinced we will have an agreed-upon bill before the session ends.” The next afternoon CCNY’s NYPIRG chapter hosted a well-publicized community forum on federal budget cuts featuring Frances Fox Piven. CCNY’s classes ended one week later, on May 15, and the NYPIRG chapter held an end-of-semester pizza party in their Math Hut office.

Alison Kelley had interacted with Barack as much as anyone over the preceding three months, and Obama had encouraged her to overcome her shyness and learn new skills, accept an invitation to join a singing group, and run for a seat on NYPIRG’s state board. “He was relentless,” and he had “a huge impact,” even if he did not realize it. “He changed the vector of my life in so many ways,” Alison later recalled. Barack was also “constantly bringing stuff in for us to read,” including publications on South Africa. In return, “Every day I’d hound him because he smoked,” and Barack’s usual reply was “We all have flaws.” Nonetheless, “every single female had a crush on him” and “everyone thought he was cute,” but “he was just always warm and friendly . . . in a very professional way.”

At the end of the semester, “we begged him to stay. We loved him,” because “we all felt that he was the perfect person for our chapter, to meet our needs,” Alison recounted. But Barack was explicit that he would not return to CCNY for the fall semester nor stay with NYPIRG over the summer. “He talked about being frustrated, that he wasn’t moving fast enough,” Alison remembered. “It was so clear that he wasn’t sure what he wanted to do, and he didn’t feel that he fit in anywhere.” Barack “was just deeply searching for his niche in the world . . . searching in terms of his own psyche.” He “seemed unsure of where he belonged” and “didn’t know where he was going.”

Eileen Hershenov “desperately wanted him to stay,” and her boss Chris Meyer remembered “having a conversation with Barack” after “Eileen put me up to trying to convince him to stay.” To Eileen it was clear that Barack “was interested in organizing but not this kind of organizing.” NYPIRG executive director Tom Wathen concluded that Barack viewed NYPIRG’s issues as “too vanilla,” and “we were disappointed, but not surprised” when he resigned at the end of CCNY’s spring semester.

NYPIRG’s top priority, the Toxic Victims Access to Justice bill, would be signed into law a year later by New York governor Mario Cuomo, but in Obama’s own subsequent references to his time at NYPIRG, he never once mentioned that signal achievement. The first time he described his experience, nine years later, he stated that “when I first got involved in organizing, in Harlem, I was out there because of liberal guilt, and I got disabused of that real quickly.” NYPIRG “sent me out into the middle of Harlem to try to get people involved in environmental and recycling issues,” but “the folks in Harlem weren’t all that interested . . . and I would guilt them all the time.” That description bore no relationship whatsoever to Obama’s actual work on CCNY’s campus, nor would the single phrase he devoted to his NYPIRG work in his subsequent book—“trying to convince the minority students at City College about the importance of recycling”—be much better.

In a trio of cable news show interviews in subsequent years, Obama would say that he was “an organizer in Harlem” for “about a year,” that for “six months” he “recruited students out of the City College of New York . . . to work in the community,” and that he left NYPIRG because “the organization ran out of money.” None of these statements were accurate.<sup>58</sup>

At much the same time that his work at CCNY ended, in mid-May 1985, Barack’s relationship with Genevieve deteriorated seriously. Genevieve wrote a brief poem entitled “Where’s the Beef?” invoking a famous 1984 political aphorism. That same day she told her closest friend at PS 133, “I just wanted to chop his dick off,” and the next day, she recorded in her journal, “I called him a prick.” Years later she had no idea what had made her so “aggressively angry at him” or why her feelings had been “so vicious.” That weekend, however, they once again partied with the Pakistanis, but less than two weeks later, Genevieve wrote in her journal about “Barack leaving my life—at least as far as lovers go. In the same way that the relationship was founded on calculated boundaries and carefully, rationally considered developments, it seems to be ending along coolly considered lines.”

Once again, Genevieve’s own issues were front and center, as she acknowledged, after rereading her journal entries, “how consistently I mention having been drunk and how many times I’ve said I was giving up pot.” Yet “from the beginning what I have been most concerned with has been my sense of Barack’s withholding the kind of emotional involvement I was seeking. I guess I hoped time would change things, and he’d let go and ‘fall in love’ with me. Now, at this point, I’m left wondering if Barack’s reserve, etc., is not just the time in his life, but, after all, emotional scarring that will make it difficult for him to get involved even after he's sorted his life through with age and experience. Hard to say."

But within just a few days, on Genevieve's birthday, June 7, Barack gave her a huge philodendron. Even so, a few days later, Genevieve composed another deeply critical poem about him:

*You masquerade, you pompous jive, you act,
but clothes don't make a man, and I know you just coverin' a whole lot of pain and confusion.
You think you got it taken care of,
but I'm tellin' you bro, you don't.
You masquerade, you pompous jive, you act.*

A week later, Genevieve wrote a letter to a friend that she never sent. Only one week of school remained, and "I don't know how I've managed to survive this year: it has been horrendous." She was continuing to debate whether to teach again in 1985–86, but she was happy at 481 Warren Street, where "I'm making a home for myself. I had wanted to live with Barack—we were lovers for a year—but the relationship as far as steadiness goes has dropped away. The fact that he's 23 put us in very different places, and I was demanding more than he could give. So I just quietly stopped asking, and it all fell away. We are friends and feel close, and suddenly I find that it's not me who's the confused, needy person in a relationship."<sup>59</sup>

By the second week of June 1985, Barack Obama was unemployed again, and he had broken up with the woman with whom he had had the closest and most intimate relationship of his entire life. He was also living alone in an unfurnished apartment that Genevieve described as "creepy and very dark" under "very sketchy" circumstances that left Barack visibly nervous the few times Genevieve ever visited him there.

But his NYPIRG experience at CCNY had not extinguished Barack's desire to pursue some different kind of organizing, and with time on his hands, he spent a good amount of it at the Mid-Manhattan Public Library, on the east side of Fifth Avenue just south of 40th Street. "I started casting a wide net to see if there were jobs available doing grass roots organizing all across the country," he later recounted. As Obama remembered it, he felt "a hunger for some sort of meaning in my life. I wanted to be part of something larger," something "larger than myself," indeed something less "vanilla" than NYPIRG. One resource he carefully perused was the June issue of Community Jobs. "I wrote to every organization" that advertised, and one résumé and cover letter he put in the mail some time in mid-June was addressed to Gerald Kellman, Director, Calumet Community Religious Conference, 351 E. 113th St., Chicago, IL 60628.

Jerry Kellman remembered receiving Obama's résumé, seeing his surname and Hawaiian background, and asking his Japanese American wife April whether "Obama" might be Japanese. "Sure, it could be," she replied. Within a day or so Jerry telephoned Barack in New York, and early in that conversation, it was clear that Obama was African American—just what Jerry's ad, and his DCP leadership, hoped to find. Jerry's father lived on the Upper West Side, and Jerry was already scheduled to visit him two weeks later. He told Barack they should talk in person in Manhattan.

Barack was ecstatic and nervous about his upcoming meeting with Kellman. "He was very much keyed up about it,” Genevieve remembered, “with a very strong sense of wanting to impress and be found suitable . . . but also a great deal of angst about how the future of his entire life hinged on this meeting.” There was the deep attraction of a real community organizing job, but also, visible yet unspoken, was a strong desire to break free from the weekly pattern of “partying” with Hasan, Sohale, and Imad. “He felt trapped by the Pakistanis and their expectations that he would continue to party with them,” Genevieve realized. Barack “had zero drive to substance use from within himself. It was just an ‘If I don’t, they’ll think I’m stuck up’” fear on his part. “He was only doing it so as not to rub it in their face that they were still doing the same-old same-old and he wasn’t interested.” That problem did not present itself when the group gathered at Beenu Mahmood’s apartment on Riverside Drive, or when Wahid attended, but otherwise the weekend cocaine parties extended right up through the spring and summer of 1985—“nonstop—without a doubt—continuous,” Genevieve replied when asked about that time. “It’s uppity to decline because you’re being superior, and he just didn’t want to.” She believed Barack “was very uncomfortable with what he felt was incredibly deep division between where they were going and how they chose to conduct themselves. . . . If he had been capable of hurting their feelings and being disloyal, he would have stopped engaging” in the weekend gatherings, but he was not, so the prospect of having to leave New York for an organizing job elsewhere held out a promise of freeing him from the bonds of a friendship he could not bring himself to break but very much wanted to sunder. “He mostly wanted to get away from the Pakistanis,” Genevieve believed, for “the restrictions the Pakistanis put on his sense of expanded identity and hopes for the future” had become too much.

Hasan Chandoo sensed much the same thing, especially come that spring and early summer of 1985. Barack “had a tough life in New York. No money, hard work,” and in private he had begun to lecture Hasan about how his profligate use of pot and cocaine was part and parcel of a criminal drug economy that was doing untold damage to black young men and black neighborhoods. “He’s telling me as a friend, ‘Stay away from this shit’” and become “more disciplined,” Hasan recalled. “I listened to him” and “I was taken by his maturity,” but “I didn’t stop completely.”

Just before the July 4 holiday, Keith Patchel returned to 350 West 48th Street from Stockholm. Keith was eight months into the sort of lifestyle change Barack was advocating to Hasan, and as a result “I wasn’t there very much” since “I was going to a lot of meetings.” Apartment 4E was “such a casual, come and go kind of place” that “there were endless occasions when I wouldn’t see my roommates for days at a time, especially” given the apartment’s layout. “I do remember somebody being there” when Keith returned, “somebody in a Hawaiian shirt,” but “we could both be living there and not see each other for days at a time.” Only after being told who that had been did Keith come to the realization that “I do have a recollection of meeting Barack.”

Sometime soon after the July 4 holiday, Jerry Kellman arrived in Manhattan and met Obama at a coffee shop for a good two hours. “The whole purpose of this interview for me was to ascertain his motivation,” Kellman recalled, “because it seemed like he must have had so many opportunities” given Barack’s résumé. “He was good-looking and articulate and obviously very, very bright.” When Jerry asked him what he knew about Chicago, Barack’s immediate reply—“Hog butcher for the world,” the opening line of Carl Sandburg’s famous 1914 poem “Chicago”—demonstrated just how much literature Barack had absorbed during his college years.

Kellman knew from his years in organizing that “people who were as young as” Barack—not yet twenty-four—sometimes “burn out very quickly” when they “for the first time in their life, encounter significant failure” as novice organizers. For that reason, Kellman wanted to understand why a Columbia graduate who had earned almost $20,000 at BI was applying for this trainee position and its advertised salary of $10,000. Kellman explained CCRC’s hope of staunching the Calumet region’s loss of steel industry jobs, and how church congregations were CCRC’s organizational base. He also made clear that for DCP’s Chicago parishes, he inescapably needed a black organizer. But Jerry had to know why this animated Barack.

“What he told me was that he wanted to make positive changes around economic equality,” Kellman recalled. Barack “was clearly an idealist” and “was very hungry to learn.” Indeed Obama “challenged me on whether we could teach him” more than he had experienced at NYPIRG. “‘How are you going to train me?’ and ‘What am I going to learn?’” were questions Jerry could answer convincingly given his organizing experience stretching back to IAF. Barack wondered too “how would he survive financially” on $10,000, and Kellman suggested Hyde Park as a place to live while making it clear that if Barack rose from his initial trainee status, his salary would go up as well. Jerry then offered Obama a job on the spot, which he accepted, and upon discovering that Barack did not own a car, which would be essential on the Far South Side, Kellman offered him an additional $1,000 to buy a car. A check would be in the mail as soon as Jerry returned to Chicago, and Barack agreed to make the drive to Chicago as soon as he acquired a car that would get him there. Beenu Mahmood was in Chicago, living in Hyde Park while working as a summer associate at the law firm of Sidley & Austin prior to his final year of law school, so Obama knew he had an initial place to stay.

Either that day or the next, Barack went to Brooklyn to see Genevieve at her Warren Street apartment. “He was very, very sure that Chicago would offer him the organizing experience that New York” had not, she recalled, but what she remembered most clearly was the question he posed to her: “Do you want to move to Chicago with me?” Given how their relationship had “devolved” over the previous two months, Genevieve was surprised, but “I was so sick of the withheldness that I never even hesitated with ‘No.’” Years later she would debate with herself whether Barack asked only because he was certain she would decline, or whether he still felt a deep attachment to her.

Only in retrospect would she come to believe that “all the tension he was feeling that May and June had very little to do with me” as opposed to Barack’s need to find a purpose in his life. Now he was headed to a predominantly African American working environment, even though, in her view, “he had zero experience of black culture.” Genevieve had long recognized and teased him about “the grandness of his vision,” even though “it wasn’t at all an articulated vision.” But now Barack was undertaking the most consequential decision of his still young life, leaving a city to which he repeatedly had returned following his college graduation two years earlier for a new metropolis he had glimpsed only as a young child for whom the Field Museum’s shrunken heads were Chicago’s most memorable attraction.

By July 16 Barack was looking to buy an affordable used car, and within a week, he acquired an “old, beat up” blue Honda Civic for the grand sum of $800, $200 less than what Kellman had sent him. Genevieve recorded in her journal “the thought of being alone again and somehow defenseless once Barack’s gone.” He had a good-bye lunch with Andy Roth on the Upper East Side, and early on Friday afternoon, July 26, 1985, Barack pulled away from 350 West 48th Street with all of his worldly possessions in his “raggedy” Honda.

“My radio/cassette sprang to life with a slight touch of the antenna, just as I was about to enter the West Side Highway,” he wrote some days later. “I tuned into the jazz station and drove over the George Washington Bridge, straining my neck to catch a last glimpse of the Manhattan skyline. It was overcast.” Once across the soaring span, he bore right when the expressway forked, with the New Jersey Turnpike bending south and Interstate 80 heading west as the urban clutter of Hackensack and Paterson gave way to the rural countryside of northwest New Jersey before the road descended to the Delaware Water Gap and the historic river that marked the Pennsylvania state line. It was a road he had never traveled, and as Pennsylvania passed by with nary a single city to be seen, all Barack would remember of the transit was “hazy green.”

In Boerum Hill, Genevieve mourned the departure of a man she would never see again, “sitting in a chair weeping about the fact that he had left.” She wrote in her journal, “So. Alone again . . . Barack’s leaving—now being gone-ness.” A chapter in both of their lives had closed, and for Barack a brand-new one was about to open.<sup>60</sup>

“Around 9:00PM, too tired to drive further,” Barack turned off of I-80 at the last exit before the Ohio state line. Leaving the interstate, a local highway afforded an easy right turn onto South Hermitage Road. A Holiday Inn was brightly visible, but so was a sign advertising a budget motel a few hundred yards farther north, on the west side of the road across from the Tam O’Shanter Golf Course. Less than eight weeks earlier a tornado, rare in the Shenango Valley, had leveled many surrounding trees, but the funnel cloud had inflicted only incidental damage on the Fairway Inn.

“I rang the bell at a small, ill-lit lobby, and out came a tall, gangly man with a checkered shirt, plaid jacket and golf hat. He looked like an overgrown leprechaun. . . . He pulled out a slip of paper and ran off the nightly rates in rapid fire. I told him I would take the cheapest room and gave him my driver’s license,” which featured Barack’s full name. The owner “was struck by my name”—“Hussein . . . isn’t that some bad guy there in the Middle East?”—“and asked me what I did for a living. I explained my new job, and he went into a ten-minute monologue.”

Ten-minute monologues were not unusual for Bob Elia, but the one he delivered that evening to Barack Hussein Obama would replay itself again and again in Obama’s mind in the years to come. Barack recounted Bob’s monologue in a letter to Genevieve two weeks later, and he would allude to it three years later in a magazine essay. He would also transmogrify Elia into a fictional black security guard in his first book, and he would recount Elia’s monologue virtually word for word almost half a dozen times to diverse audiences more than twenty years later.

Many individuals who come to believe that their lives stand for more—sometimes much more—than the sum of their own personal experiences retrospectively identify one signal event, one single conversation, as representing the moment when they first knew that they could contribute to the world something more eternal than their own individual fate. Such experiences occur in places sacred, historic, and profane: the kitchen of a parsonage at 309 South Jackson Street in a southern capital city on a January night, the front yard of Coffin Point Plantation on St. Helena Island on a balmy New Year’s Eve, or the lobby of a budget motel at 2810 South Hermitage Road in Hermitage, Pennsylvania, on a warm July evening.

A minister of the gospel might understandably believe he was communicating with a higher being—“He promised never to leave me, never to leave me alone. No never alone. No never alone.” Someone less religious might hear a voice from history's recent past, offering fortitude against the national security state. But when Barack Obama's foundational experience occurred, the voice he was hearing was indisputably that of fifty-two-year-old, six-foot-two-inch Bob Elia.

Bob grew up in nearby Farrell, Pennsylvania, where most of the racially diverse population drew its paychecks at Sharon Steel's Roemer Works. Bob had a number of black friends across the early decades of his life. By 1985 the local Sharon Herald had for several years been publishing the syndicated columns of conservative black economists Thomas Sowell and Walter E. Williams, and Bob had taken a hankering to both men's writings, regularly clipping and saving Williams's essays. Bob often cited their analyses when telling acquaintances how they might better themselves, and operating a motel gave Bob a never-ending population of new guests to whom he could offer his thoughts on how they could improve their lives.

Barack's brief response that he was headed to Chicago to become a community organizer was fuel for Bob Elia's fire. "Look here, Mr. Hussein, I'm going to give you the best advice anyone's ever given you. . . . Drop this public service crap and pursue something that's going to get you some money and status . . . and then maybe you'll have the power to do something for your people. I'm telling you now because I see potential in you . . . you got a nice voice, you can be one of them T.V. announcers, or one of those high-priced salesmen. Peddling bullshit, but look here, bullshit's the American way." Bob cited Williams or Sowell in telling Barack that political and social influence follow from economic strength, period. "Black people need more like this fellah, not Jesse with rhymes and jive. . . . Most folks at the bottom can't be helped by you" and "most of 'em don't want your help."

Finally Barack was able to interject a more pressing question: Where could he get dinner? Bob recommended the West Middlesex Diner, back down South Hermitage Road just south of I-80. Wanting some fresh air and time to reflect, "I took the man's words on a long walk along the highway to a small all-night diner and had supper," Barack wrote Genevieve. After eating, "the walk back was cool and silent, the stars cluttering the sky as they hadn't in five years. Back in my room, The Year of Living Dangerously"—a 1982 film set in a city that Barack himself knew, Jakarta on the eve of the mid-1960s mass killings—"was playing" on the black-and-white television. If Bob Elia's fervent plea to reconsider his new job had given him something to think about, being reminded of his years in a truly foreign land while in the middle of this drive offered even more.

Elia's comments would echo in Barack's memory for decades to come. Three years later, some of Bob's advice would be attributed to a black female school aide. "Listen, Obama. You're a bright young man. . . . I just cannot understand why a bright young man like you would . . . become a community organizer . . . 'cause the pay is low, the hours is long, and don't nobody appreciate you." In its next rendition, Bob's remarks would be made by "Ike," a fictional black security guard: "Forget about this organizing business and do something that's gonna make you some money. . . . I'm telling you this 'cause I can see potential in you. Young man like you, got a nice voice—hell, you could be one a them announcers on TV. Or sales . . . making some real money there. That's what we need, see. Not more folks running around here, all rhymes and jive. You can't help folks that ain't gonna make it nohow, and they won't appreciate you trying."

More than twenty years later, Barack would accurately recount how "I stopped for the night at a small town in Pennsylvania whose name I can't remember any more, and I found a motel that looked cheap and clean, and I pulled into the driveway, and I went to the counter where there was this old guy doing crossword puzzles” who “asked me where I was headed, and I explained to him I was going to Chicago because I was going to be a community organizer, and he asked me what was that.” Then came Bob’s monologue: “You look like a nice clean-cut young man, you’ve got a nice voice. So let me give you a piece of advice: forget this community organizing business. You can’t change the world, and people will not appreciate you trying. What you should do is go into television broadcasting. I’m telling you, you can make a name for yourself there.”

“Objectively speaking, he made some sense,” Barack would reflect in that retelling. Two weeks later, he repeated the centerpiece of Bob’s monologue word for word. Thirteen months later Obama recited Bob’s message once more, as he did again five months after that. In May 2008, Obama recounted his memory of that night yet again: “You’ve got a nice voice, so you should think about going into television broadcasting. I’m telling you, you have a future there.”

In contrast to Barack’s indelible memory of their conversation, twenty-nine years later Bob Elia had no recollection of young Obama. When asked, though, he almost immediately told a caller, “You’ve got a nice voice” before launching into a ten-minute monologue on the life-extending powers of a trio of multisyllabic nutritional supplements.

But in 1985, on the next summer morning, Barack checked out of the motel without reencountering Bob, and after heading down South Hermitage Road and bearing right onto I-80, the Ohio state line was just a few miles ahead. I-80 became the Ohio Turnpike and then the Indiana Toll Road once it crossed another state line. Chicago lay six hours ahead, but as Barack Obama drove west, he was headed toward a place he really had never been, indeed toward a place he really had never known: he was heading west toward home.<sup>61</sup>

TRANSFORMATION AND IDENTITY

ROSELAND, HYDE PARK, AND KENYA

AUGUST 1985–AUGUST 1988

West of South Bend, the Indiana Toll Road slides southward as the shoreline of Lake Michigan draws near. The Indiana Dunes give way to Burns Harbor and its huge steel mill, which marks the eastern edge of the Calumet region's industrial lakeshore. Gary and East Chicago offer a gritty industrial visage before the highway turns sharply north as the Illinois state line approaches. There the interstate becomes the Chicago Skyway, with the East Side, the Calumet River, and then South Chicago flashing by underneath the elevated roadway.

On Saturday afternoon, July 27, Barack Hussein Obama took the next exit heading for Hyde Park, turning northward on the broad boulevard of Stony Island Avenue. At 67th Street, Jackson Park appeared on the east side of the road, offering sunlit greenery all the way to 56th Street. Beenu Mahmood's summer apartment at 5500 South Shore Drive was just a few blocks away.

Obama stopped at a pay phone but discovered he had miswritten Beenu's number, and he called Sohale to get it right. Then Beenu met Barack in front of the tall luxury building, whose tenants had access to a heated swimming pool plus an on-site deli—"not exactly the setting I had envisioned for launching my career as selfless organizer of the people," Barack wrote Genevieve a few days later. "The discordance only increased when we went to a fancy outdoor café downtown to feast on barbecued ribs."

Beenu's fiancée, Samia Ahad, was in Chicago too, and after a restful Sunday Barack drove south to Roseland on Monday morning, while Beenu headed to Sidley & Austin's downtown office. At Holy Rosary's rectory, on 113th Street across from the sprawling Palmer Park, Barack met his Calumet Community Religious Conference and Developing Communities Project coworkers. Mike Kruglik, he wrote Genevieve, "reminds me of the grumpy dwarf in Snow White" with "a thick beard and mustache. He speaks with the blunt, succinct clip of working class Chicago." That first day "he barely acknowledged my presence" but as the week went on it became clear that Mike is "both competent and warm." Adrienne Jackson was "prim," "helpful and committed," with "polished administrative skills," and Obama quickly determined that she, like himself, had been "hired as much to give the staff a racial balance as she was for her abilities." Of Jerry Kellman, Barack told Genevieve, "In his rumpled, messy way, he exhibits a real passion for justice and the concept of grassroots organizing. He speaks softly and is chronically late, but is real sharp in his analysis of power and politics, and is also disarmingly blunt and at times manipulative. A complicated man . . . but someone from whom I expect I can learn a few things."

Obama also wrote that he "made full use of the amenities" that Beenu's building offered "without guilt." Samia was on her way to becoming a professionally acclaimed chef, and one evening she cooked a Pakistani dinner; Beenu's friend Asif Agha joined them, even though the apartment had no dining table or chairs. Asif, like Beenu, had graduated from the famous Karachi Grammar School before receiving his undergraduate degree from Princeton University. He was the same age as Barack, and he had arrived in Hyde Park two years earlier to begin graduate study in languages reaching from Greek to Tibetan, under the auspices of the University of Chicago's interdisciplinary Committee on Social Thought. With Beenu about to return to Manhattan for his third year at Columbia Law School, Asif was another smart and outgoing member of the Pakistani diaspora that had provided Barack's closest male friends for the past six years.

Tuesday morning Barack discovered that he had left his car lights on all night, and he needed a jump start so he could meet his day's schedule. Wednesday morning the car again failed to start, and Beenu, Samia, and Asif all helped push it to get it going. A deeply embarrassed Barack confessed to Genevieve that "I appeared to have left my brains back in N.Y." because "similar lapses have repeated themselves." By the next weekend, he had signed a lease for a small $300-a-month studio apartment, #22-I, at 1440 East 52nd Street, in the heart of Hyde Park. He also told Genevieve about the "pang of envy and resentment" he felt toward Beenu's "prestigious, well-paying and basically straightforward work as a corporate lawyer" and how it contrasted with his far more precarious existence.

Down in Roseland, Kellman's first goal was to teach Obama community organizing's defining centerpiece, the one-on-one interview, or what IAF traditionalists called "the relational meeting." All Alinsky-style organizing recognized the cardinal principle that first "an organizer has to . . . listen—a lot." According to Industrial Areas Foundation veteran and United Neighborhood Organization adviser Peter Martinez, the ability to listen is the "critical skill," for it enables an organizer "to synergize all of the things that they're experiencing so that they can incorporate that into their thinking in a way that when they talk with people, people can hear themselves coming back within the structure of what it is you're suggesting might be done." This, Martinez said, would keep people from feeling like the organizer is putting something "on top of them."

Kellman knew the first month was "very crucial" with any new recruit, and particularly with someone who "had never encountered blue-collar and lower-class African Americans." During Obama's first few days, Jerry took him along so that Barack could watch a veteran organizer ask people to talk about their lives and to say what they thought were the community's problems, listening especially for how that person's own self-interest could motivate them to take an active part in DCP. Obama "struggled with this in the beginning," Kellman recalled, as his connections with people "could be superficial," and "I would challenge Barack to go deeper, to connect with their strongest longings." But Jerry was too busy to do this full-time, and so "very quickly he was out on his own, just talking to people, day after day," with the expectation that each week Barack could conduct between twenty and thirty such one-on-ones with pastors and parishioners from DCP's Roman Catholic churches. Among the first pastors Obama called upon were Father Joe Bennett at St. John de la Salle, the church that Adrienne Jackson attended, Father Tom Kaminski at St. Helena of the Cross, and Father John Calicott at Holy Name of Mary—who had been so responsible for Jerry's ad in Community Jobs. Bennett remembered Barack asking him "all kinds of questions," and when he left Bennett thought "what a sharp, brilliant young man."

Kellman also took Obama on a driving tour of the neighborhoods DCP and CCRC serviced. More than two decades later, Barack could spontaneously describe what he saw when Jerry drove east on 103rd Street past Trumbull Park before turning south on Torrence Avenue. "I can still remember the first time I saw a shuttered steel mill. It was late in the afternoon, and I took a drive with another organizer over to the old Wisconsin Steel plant on the southeast side of Chicago. . . . As we drove up . . . I saw a plant that was empty and rusty. And behind a chain-link fence, I saw weeds sprouting up through the concrete, and an old mangy cat running around. And I thought about all the good jobs it used to provide.” As Kellman had told him, “when a plant shuts down, it’s not just the workers who pay a price, it’s the whole community.”

The people of South Deering had been living for more than five years with what Obama saw that afternoon. “The mill is just like a ghost hanging over the whole community like a cloud,” one St. Kevin parishioner explained, indeed “the ghost of the Industrial Revolution,” another resident realized. “It just sat there and rotted before everyone’s eyes,” Father George Schopp explained, and a beautifully written article in the August issue of Chicago Magazine—one that would have made a memorable impression on any aspiring young writer who read it—described South Deering in the summer of 1985 as “the essence of the Rust Belt . . . along Torrence near Wisconsin Steel, the stores are empty; only a few taverns remain.”

Kellman also took Obama southward from Roseland, to show him the brick expanse of Altgeld Gardens, which was so distant from all the rest of Chicago apart from the huge Calumet Industrial Development (CID) landfill just to the east where all of the city’s garbage was dumped, and the Metropolitan Sanitary District’s 127 acres of “drying beds” for sewerage sludge just north across 130th Street. Neither the dump nor the sewer plant ever drew much attention, yet just to the northeast, near the older Paxton Landfill, as Chicago Magazine’s Jerry Sullivan wrote, “the greatest concentration of rare birds in Illinois” was spending the summer “squeezed between a garbage dump and a shit farm.”

Obscure scientific journals with names like Chemosphere occasionally published studies that detailed how the presence of airborne PCBs was “significantly higher” around “the Gardens” than anywhere else in Chicago, but just a week after Obama’s introductory tour of the area, an underground fire at an abandoned landfill abutting Paxton—a weird and unprecedented event—drew camera crews, reporters, and city officials to the Far South Side’s toxic wasteland. The chemical conflagration took more than twelve days to finally burn itself out, and region-wide press coverage featured UNO’s Mary Ellen Montes criticizing the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency for its lack of interest. City officials suggested blowing up the remaining metal drums with unknown contents, and UNO filed suit in federal court against the EPA in hopes of jarring federal officials into action.<sup>1</sup>

In Roseland, more than a mile northwest of the underground fire, the only newsworthy event in the eyes of Chicago newspapers during Barack’s first weeks was the arrest of an initial suspect in a cold-blooded killing that was all too reminiscent of Ronald Nelson’s murder just five months earlier. One Saturday evening, shortly before Barack’s arrival, forty-nine-year-old factory foreman Enos Conard and his twenty-three-year-old son were manning an ice cream truck on 105th Street, hardly five blocks from Father Tom Kaminski’s St. Helena Church. Two men in their early thirties approached and ordered ice cream before one suddenly drew a gun. As Conard reached for his own weapon, the lead assailant fired a single fatal shot into Conard’s chest. Conard left behind a widow and four children, and a fellow vendor complained to reporters that “so many people have guns.”

A mortician from nearby Cedar Park Cemetery had drawn press attention by publicizing his offer of free funerals and burials to victims of Far South Side gun violence, and Conard’s family became the seventh to accept. In late August, police arrested L. C. Riley of Roseland as one of the assailants, and two years later both Riley and triggerman Willie Dixon, also from Roseland, were convicted of Conard's murder. Dixon was sentenced to life in prison, and three decades later, Dixon remained in the same cellblock at Stateville Correctional Center as Nelson's killer, Clarence Hayes.

Also in Roseland, although invisible to Kellman and Obama, ACORN's Madeline Talbott had hired a new organizer, Ted Aranda, who had worked previously for a year under Greg Galluzzo at UNO, to revitalize ACORN's Far South Side presence after months of inactivity following Steuart Pittman's departure in mid-March 1985. Unlike CCRC's and DCP's church-based organizing, ACORN went block by block knocking on doors to get residents together to tackle community problems. Aranda explained years later that "most of the people that I got involved in the organization were always women." The goal was to attract enough recruits to hold a community meeting, and Aranda's Central American heritage was a significant asset, because his dark complexion led most Roseland residents to assume he was African American. "That's not my identity" once "you look beyond my skin color," Ted said, but he also had an advantage in Latino neighborhoods, where "they took me for a Hispanic."

Aranda learned that Roseland residents were angry that the city had not provided them with garbage cans, and Pullman people were upset about a disco patronized by gang members. By early September, the Roseland group, COAR—Community Organized for Action & Reform—had drawn enough interest that Talbott convened a meeting at King Drive and 113th Street—i.e., Holy Rosary. In late October, the Pullman group, ERPCCO—East Roseland Pullman Concerned Citizens' Organization—succeeded in closing the disco. But by the winter, Ted Aranda "became disenchanted with community organizing as a viable model for radical change," and he resigned. By the standards of Alinsky-style organizing, Aranda's months in Roseland had been successful, but as he explained years later, he "was more convinced than ever by the end of my short organizing stint that the political system itself was the problem." And even though COAR and DCP were working in the very same neighborhood, "Barack Obama I never met at all."<sup>2</sup>

DCP's board met on the second Tuesday evening of each month, and at the August meeting in St. Helena's basement, Kellman introduced Obama so the members could formally ratify his hiring. Virtually everyone was taken aback by how youthful he seemed. "My first thought was 'Gee, he is really young,'" Loretta Augustine recalled years later, and she whispered that to Yvonne Lloyd sitting next to her. Yvonne's first reaction was just like Loretta's: "We had children older than he was." The always outspoken Dan Lee said aloud what they all were thinking: "Whoa, this is a baby right here." Obama smiled and acknowledged that he looked young, but once he spoke to them about himself and responded to their questions, he quickly won them over.

"He was very candid in his answers—straightforward," Loretta remembered. "The impressive part was that he seemed to really understand what we were saying to him," which she considered a marked change from both Mike and Jerry. "When we talked about certain things that he didn't know about, he didn't lie. He basically said, 'You know what, I'm not really familiar with that. However, these are things that we can learn together.'" In short order, "we knew he was the right person for us," Loretta recalled, and though "his honesty has a lot to do with it," so did Barack's appearance. "His color did make a difference to us, because it's important for us and our children and everybody else to understand that people who look like us can do the job."

The day after that meeting, Barack wrote the letter to Genevieve that described his trip from New York—and his unforgettable conversation with Bob Elia at the Fairway Inn—as well as his first weeks in Chicago. Genevieve had called Barack several days earlier, and he began by apologizing for “my phone manner. You know I dislike the telephone. . . . Combined with the lingering pain of separation, I’m sure I sounded guarded and stand-offish. I’m better with letters . . . (yes, more control).” Barack said that Jerry “has thrown me into” several neighborhoods, including Altgeld Gardens and Roseland, “without much . . . guidance” at all. “There are some established leaders with whom I can work, but I must say that for now, I’m pretty confused and feel my inexperience acutely.” He realized that having “a trustworthy face” worked to his advantage, as did “the dearth of educated young men in the area who haven’t gone into the corporate world.” Barack was pleased with the job, but questions remained. “For all the kindness and helpfulness the communities have offered me so far, I can see the thoughts running through their heads—‘another young do-gooder.’ I know it runs through mine.” So “doubts of my effectiveness in such a setting remain, but at least I feel like I’m in one of the best settings to really test my values that I could hope to find right now.”

Overall, “the work offers neither more nor less than I had anticipated,” which he found reassuring. He characterized Hyde Park as “a poor man’s Greenwich Village,” but he was pleased with his apartment and “the cheap prices in restaurants” though not “the disappointing newspapers.” But another contrast from New York was more striking. “Blacks seem more plentiful, and more importantly, seem to exude a sense of ownership, of comfortable dignity about who they are and where they live than do blacks” in New York. Chicago offered “a much more visible well-to-do and middle class black population who still live in a cohering black community,” and “black culture here is more closely rooted to the South; the neighborhoods have a down home feel. . . . Even the poorest black neighborhoods seem to have a stronger social fabric on which to rely than in NY” and “as a result, the young bucks, though no less surly and pained than their NY counterparts, appear to feel less need to constantly assert themselves against the respectable, and in particular, the white, world.” Obama wondered whether “these strands of self-confidence” were due to Mayor Harold Washington, whose “grizzled, handsome face shines out from many store front windows in the areas I work.”

Barack wrote that he already had swum in Lake Michigan, but confessed “the almost daily thump in my chest, pain and longing when I think of Manhattan, and the Pakistanis, and when I think of you.” He wrote out his address and phone number and told Genevieve, “I expect you to make use of this information frequently.” He enclosed a $130 check for money he owed her, and closed by telling her about his African sister who had canceled her trip to New York ten months earlier at the last minute: “Auma did get in touch with me and will be coming through Chicago in two weeks. Very excited.”<sup>3</sup>

By late summer 1985, Auma Obama was still in university at Heidelberg, but her closest German friend was now studying at Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, a small town southeast of St. Louis, Missouri, which was far from Chicago. Auma traveled to Carbondale for two weeks, calling Barack once to update him on her plans, and then took a long train trip to Chicago, where he met her at the station and then cooked a South Asian dinner for them in his small apartment, where Auma would bunk on the living room couch. Obama was eager to have his sister tell him about their late father, and for the next ten days—interrupted only by his work—the siblings spoke for long hours about Barack Hussein Obama Sr. One day Auma went with him to work at Holy Rosary, where she met Jerry and several parish volunteers. Back in Hyde Park, one evening Auma went beyond her somewhat-edited comments about Obama Sr. and told her brother that he had been fortunate not to have grown up in his father's household, particularly after Obama Sr. married Ruth. Auma showed family photos to Barack, but she also spoke about Obama Sr.'s drinking problem and the suffering his older children endured as a result of his financial irresponsibility, Roy Abon'go even more than her. Auma also mentioned "the old man's" auto accidents and job-loss experiences, and told Barack, "I think he was basically a very lonely man." Barack generally said little in response, but he took time to show Auma Chicago's downtown sights and museums before the Carbondale friend and her boyfriend arrived in Chicago to take Auma with them to Wisconsin. Before she left, Auma urged Barack to visit her once she returned to Kenya.

Auma later remarked that the visit was "a very intense ten days together" and that "I was very conscious of trying to give him a full picture of who his father was." In the immediate aftermath of her visit, Barack said little about the new and sad portrait Auma had painted of Obama Sr. to his coworkers or to his only regular outside-work acquaintance, Asif Agha. Barack and Asif had drinks and dinner almost every Thursday night at a restaurant on 55th Street in Hyde Park. "We hit it off . . . and we saw each other extremely regularly," Agha recalled years later. "He didn't know anyone" beyond DCP, and it was obvious that "the work was stressful, and he was discovering himself." Barack did not talk much about DCP to Asif. "The only person he ever told me much about" was fellow Princeton graduate Mike Kruglik, whom Obama clearly liked. "He came up frequently." Mostly the two twenty-four-year-olds talked about writing. "I used to write poetry, and he used to write short stories," and each Thursday "we would share whatever we had been writing." According to Asif, Barack "was very serious about writing" and regularly turned out short sketches of six to ten double-spaced typed pages, but there was no real suggestion that he would pursue writing as a career. These dinners were sometimes leavened with shots of tequila, giving Obama at least one regular outlet from the stresses and strains of being a real organizer.

A decade later, Obama offered a sketch of Auma's visit that had her arriving at Chicago's O'Hare Airport, not Union Station, but that did describe her telling him about their father's tragic latter years. "Where once I'd felt the need to live up to his expectations, I now felt as if I had to make up for all of his mistakes." Another decade later, during the first six months of his emergence as a nationally known figure, Obama several times opened up about his recollections of Auma's visit. "Every man is either trying to live up to his father's expectations or making up for his mistakes," he told one questioner. "In some ways, I still chase after his ghost a little bit."

In a long interview with radio journalist Dave Davies, Obama spoke more extensively about his father than at any other time in his life, stating that during Auma's visit, he learned that his father had had "a very troubled life." He understood that some of Obama Sr.'s employment problems had occurred "in part because he was somebody who was willing to speak out against corruption and nepotism" within the Kenyan government, but the portrait his mother had so insistently painted "of this very strong, powerful, imposing figure was suddenly balanced by this picture of a very tragic figure who had never been able to really pull all the pieces of his life together." What Auma had told him was "a very disquieting revelation" that really "shook me up" and "forced me to grow up a little bit." While "in some ways it was liberating" relative to the implicit expectations Ann's glowing comments plus Obama Sr.'s own self-presentation to his ten-year-old son back in December 1971 had created, "it also made me question myself in all sorts of ways" because "you worry that there are elements of their character that have seeped into you . . . and you've got to figure out how you're going to cope with those things," particularly how Obama Sr. had behaved toward women and the offspring he sired.

Asked on camera by Oprah Winfrey about his father, Obama said, “he ended up having an alcoholism problem and ended up leading a fairly tragic life.” When a friend asked Barack to quickly compose some uplifting advice for young black men, Obama e-mailed that “none of us have control of the circumstances into which we are born” and that some will have to “confront the failings of our own parents.” But “your life is what you make it.” A few years later, Barack admitted that “part of my life has been a deliberate attempt to not repeat mistakes of my father,” whom he acknowledged “was an alcoholic” and “a womanizer.” Obama acknowledged that Auma had revealed how their father had “treated his family shabbily” and had lived “a very tragic life.” Even though Barack did not speak about this disquieting news to Asif, Mike, or Jerry, the long-term impact of Auma’s truth telling would be profound. “This was someone who made an awful lot of mistakes in his life, but at least I understand why.”<sup>4</sup>

In early September 1985, Chicago’s public school teachers went on a citywide strike. It was the third straight fall, and the eighth in eighteen years, that school days were lost to a labor dispute. The Chicago Teachers Union was demanding a 9 percent pay raise and the city had offered 3.5 percent; only 14 percent of union members had actually participated in the strike vote. Independent observers, such as education researcher Fred Hess, told reporters that both sides were being unreasonable, and a Chicago Sun-Times editorial described the union’s behavior as “unconscionable.” Quick intervention by Illinois governor James R. Thompson led to a 6 percent settlement and the loss of only two school days.

That fall, Jerry Kellman was still savoring the triumph he had experienced in early July when the Illinois legislature appropriated $500,000 to fund a computerized CCRC jobs bank that would assess unemployed workers’ skills and market their résumés to potential employers. The big pot of money had been obtained by Calumet City state representative Frank Giglio, a close friend of Fred Simari, the St. Victor parishioner who had been volunteering virtually full-time for Kellman, as well as Hazel Crest state senator Richard Kelly.

The half-million dollars would allow Governors State University (GSU) to hire twenty job-skill-assessment interviewers for ten months to create résumés for unemployed individuals. In news articles about this, Kellman said the program’s success was dependent upon “hundreds” of volunteers stepping forward and pressing employers to hire those workers. Once the funding was confirmed, Jerry made plans to shift Adrienne Jackson to help oversee the new program and began aiming for a massive public rally to kick off the enterprise. Before the end of August, he hired Sister Mary Bernstein, a forty-year-old Catholic nun and experienced organizer, and assigned her to St. Victor to handle CCRC’s Catholic parishes in the south suburbs. In tandem with Mike Kruglik and DCP, the immediate goal was to mobilize as large a crowd as possible for the kickoff rally Kellman scheduled for Monday evening, September 30, a day before the program office at GSU would open officially.

Kellman arranged for the two most powerful individuals in Illinois—Governor “Big Jim” Thompson and Archbishop Joseph Cardinal Bernardin—to speak at the event. Choirs from Joe Bennett’s St. John de la Salle and John Calicott’s Holy Name of Mary would perform, and the invaluable Fred Simari would preside as master of ceremonies. Also featured on the podium would be Lutheran bishop Paul E. Erickson, Methodist bishop Jesse DeWitt, Presbyterian executive Gary Skinner, and the towering young Maury Richards from United Steelworkers Local 1033, whom advance press reports described as “president of the state’s largest”—they might have added “remaining”—steel workers local.

Five days before the rally, the food processor Libby, McNeill & Libby announced that within the next year, it would close its Far South Side Chicago plant on 119th Street; that meant a loss of 450 good jobs. The Sunday before the rally, Leo Mahon praised his St. Victor parishioners like Fred Simari and Gloria Boyda for the time they gave to CCRC's employment efforts and reminded his congregation that scripture teaches that "the desire for money is the root of all evil."

On Monday evening, CCRC vice president Rev. Thomas Knutson hosted a pre-rally dinner for the almost two hundred program participants at his First Lutheran Church of Harvey before the 8:00 P.M. rally kicked off at nearby Thornton High School. A racially diverse crowd of more than a thousand, including a watchful Barack Obama and dozens of people from DCP's Chicago parishes, filled the gymnasium as Fred introduced the speakers, including Loretta Augustine on behalf of DCP. After Maury Richards told the audience, "we've lost forty thousand jobs in the past few years," the governor came forward and began by saying, "My name is Jim Thompson. My job is jobs." He went on to declare that "jobs are more important than mental health or law enforcement, because unless people are working and paying taxes, there won't be any resources to pay for those services."

But the evening's real star was Cardinal Joe Bernardin, who denounced racism and called for "cultural and ethnic unity in the Calumet region." He noted how unemployment "cuts across racial and ethnic lines," and he promised that "the church is here to help you" while stressing that "the real leadership must come from the laity." Sounding at times like Leo Mahon, Bernardin declared that "every person has a right to a decent home" and vowed that "the cycle of poverty can be broken and community decline can be turned around." The archbishop pledged further church support for CCRC, and the rally ended with a white female parishioner from Hazel Crest asking the crowd: "Do you want to be part of a community that controls its future?" The audience responded with lengthy applause.

For Obama, the rally and the bus ride back to Holy Rosary provided an opportunity to make some new acquaintances, such as Cathy Askew, who had sat quietly through their introductory meeting at St. Helena. He was also able to talk more with the dynamic Dan Lee, DCP's board president, and with Dan's fellow deacon at St. Catherine, the vigorous Tommy West. For Jerry, Fred, Gloria, and most of all Leo Mahon, the rally was a wonderful culmination of their efforts that reached back over five years. Harvey Lutheran pastor Tom Knutson described the rally as "a tremendous experience for the local community."

Now CCRC's challenge was to get the new "Regional Employment Network" (REN) up and running. GSU planned to have some skills assessors ready to begin interviewing unemployed individuals by early November, but in early October news broke that an Allis-Chalmers engine plant and an Atlantic-Richfield facility would soon be closing, costing up to nine hundred more good jobs.

Kellman privately had been told a few days before Bernardin's appearance that the national Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CHD) would be awarding CCRC an additional $40,000 to support the REN program, with an event on Saturday, October 26, marking the public announcement. Obama joined Kellman at the ceremony, and a story in Monday's Chicago Tribune marked his first appearance in the Chicago press: "Barack Obama, who works with the Calumet Community Religious Conference, said its grant will be used to assess skills of unemployed workers and to aid them in finding jobs." The first actual assessment sessions kicked off at St. Victor in Calumet City on November 14 and 15, attracting eighty-six applicants ranging in age from nineteen to sixty-seven years old. Six skills assessors prepared a fourteen-page information sheet on each applicant, and Adrienne Jackson wishfully told a local reporter,

“There are hundreds of employers out there who need people.” She predicted that REN would interview more than thirteen thousand job seekers during the next eight months.<sup>5</sup>

Looming most dauntingly was the future of LTV’s East Side Republic Steel plant, where the thirty-three-hundred-person workforce included twenty-four hundred members of Maury Richards’s United Steelworkers Local 1033. Since midsummer, LTV executives had been demanding tax abatements from Governor Thompson and Mayor Harold Washington; the city had responded with proposed investment incentives, as the East Side plant, just like Wisconsin and South Works before it, desperately needed significant modernization if there was any chance of long-term survival. LTV had more than $2 billion in debt, had lost more than $64 million in 1984, and its losses for 1985 could be triple that figure. Richards told reporters the only way to save aging U.S. steel plants was a commitment from the federal government.

Frank Lumpkin told a congressional subcommittee that the underlying issue was more fundamental: “jobs or income is the basic human right, the right to survive.” Throughout the late summer of 1985, Frank had been writing to Chicago’s daily papers, saying that unemployed workers “are fed up with programs for training and retraining when jobs don’t exist and with job search programs that only provide employment for those who run them.” His bottom-line demand was clear: “the federal government must take over and run these mills—nationalize them—for the good of our country and our community.”

In the Chicago Tribune, Mary Schmich profiled former Local 65 president Don Stazak, who now worked as toll collector on a nearby interstate rather than for U.S. Steel. “I thought of the company as a father,” he told Schmich. In early November, Maury Richards and his 1033 colleagues decided that their situation was so dire that previously full-time officers like the local’s president would return to work in the mill rather than draw union paychecks.<sup>6</sup>

In late September, Obama got news that was almost as disquieting as Auma’s revelations about their father: Genevieve wrote to confess that she had become sexually involved with Sohale Siddiqi. Soon after Barack’s late July departure for Chicago, Genevieve had flown to San Francisco to visit a friend before returning to New York on August 14. That evening she and Sohale “went to a Bonnie Raitt concert together and did ecstasy, that’s what did it,” she later recounted. Her own struggles with alcohol had not improved in the wake of Barack leaving and with the beginning of another school year at PS 133, yet Barack thanked her for “your sweet letter” when he wrote back to her. “The news of Sohale and you did hurt . . . in part because I was the last to know—the Pakis were sounding awfully stiff the last time I spoke to them. But mainly the hurt was a final tremor of all the mixed-up pain I had been feeling before we parted—watching something I valued more than you may know pass from what is, what might still be, to what was.”

But Barack’s first two months in Chicago leavened his heartache. “It seems that we have both ended up where we need to be at this stage in our lives,” so while “the pain of your absence is real, and won’t lessen without more time, I feel no regrets about the way things have turned out.” He ended by saying he hoped to get back to New York sometime in the months ahead. “All my love—Barack.” Reflecting back years later on what had transpired, Genevieve mused that Barack was probably “very disappointed with me,” for given Siddiqi’s dismissive attitude toward life, Barack no doubt “thought Sohale was an empty shell for a man.”

In Chicago, Barack’s work environs offered him better opportunities for self-reflection than his once-a-week reimmersion in the easy camaraderie of the Pakistani diaspora when he met up with Asif Agha.

Jerry Kellman's invaluable sidekick Fred Simari saw Barack at Holy Rosary almost every weekday that fall. Simari recalled Obama as "quiet, laid back," "extremely bright," and as someone who "seemed like he really studied everything." Father George Schopp had the same impression: Barack was in "learning mode," just "watching and reflecting." In addition to his daily work discussions with Jerry, Mike, and Mary Bernstein, Barack also interacted with Holy Rosary secretary Bonnie Nitsche and the parish's most committed volunteer, Betty Garrett. "We took him as our son from jump street," Betty said of herself and Bonnie. The two regularly pestered Barack and Holy Rosary's forty-one-year-old pastor, Bill Stenzel, about their cigarette smoking, which was allowed indoors only in the rectory's kitchen. This addiction brought Barack and Bill together more than would otherwise have been the case, but that fall Obama also visited every week with St. Helena's forty-five-year-old Father Tom Kaminski. Like Leo Mahon and George Schopp, Bill and Tom were both progressive and challenging priests, men whose religious faith accorded far more closely with Joe Bernardin's Catholicism than with the hierarchical, top-down archdiocese that John Patrick Cody had ruled. Bonnie Nitsche and her husband Wally thought that Bill's strong but gentle spirit made Holy Rosary's small multiethnic congregation into "a microcosm" of what a community would be if you "got rid of prejudices." The rectory "was like one big office," Bill remembered, with the organizers on one side of the first floor, and Bill and Bonnie on the other.

From the beginning, Bonnie thought Barack "was more together, more poised" than his older coworkers, and Bill recalled that Barack became "very curious" about religious faith while suddenly being surrounded by so many committed Catholics. "He had a curiosity about what's this phenomenon" and a "very respectful" attitude toward faith. Obama asked if he could attend Sunday mass, and Bill can recall him sitting with the congregation. Jerry Kellman was about to convert to Catholicism, and he understood how "the churches we dealt with were extended families," ones that exposed Obama to "a broad sense of religion." For Barack "his sense of church and his sense of God became very much a community experience," and "it was a very formative period" for him, Jerry explained. Obama often drank coffee with Tom Kaminski, and they talked "about all sorts of things," including family, but Fred Simari believes that Obama's time in the kitchen at Holy Rosary had the most impact. "Bill Stenzel spent a tremendous amount of time with Barack," and "some of that spiritual-type formation" that Bill exuded "wore off on Barack, there's no doubt."

That fall, Barack continued his one-on-one conversations with pastors like Bob Klonowski of Lebanon Lutheran in Hegewisch and Catholic parishioners like Loretta Augustine at her home west of Altgeld Gardens. "It was surprising how receptive people were to talking with him," Loretta remembered. Tom Kaminski noted "what a terrific listener he was" and watched as Barack's acceptance spread. At the three-month mark, Obama's $10,000 trainee salary was doubled to $20,000, the apprentice director salary that Kellman had advertised five months earlier.<sup>7</sup>

Meanwhile the warfare between Harold Washington and the city council majority opposed to him, led by South Chicago's 10th Ward Alderman Ed Vrdolyak, was constantly in the headlines. Washington had accepted UNO's invitation to speak at its annual fund-raising banquet on October 30, where the mayor would present a thank-you award to the archdiocesan Campaign for Human Development (CHD). Attendees were greeted outside by picketers led by South Deering Improvement Association president Foster Milhouse, who told reporters, "We want UNO out of our neighborhood, and we want Father Schopp and UNO out of St. Kevin's." The far right's complaints continued with a letter to the editor of the

Daily Calumet denouncing CCRC and UNO and calling for concerned citizens to “rid their communities of these revolutionaries.” An anti-UNO rally at the Calumet City American Legion hall featured Foster Milhouse and attracted a crowd of about a hundred, and another letter to the Daily Cal thanking the paper for its coverage warned of the philosophy of the “anti-God idolizer of Lucifer” Saul Alinsky.

With UNO adding affiliates in other Hispanic neighborhoods, Mary Ellen Montes chaired an evening meeting that drew a crowd of two thousand. Mayor Washington, Governor Thompson, and powerful Illinois House speaker Michael J. Madigan all joined Lena on stage, but afterward she denounced Thompson’s refusal to commit $6 million for a new West Side technical institute. UNO and other Southeast Side groups continued to fight against any expansion of the area’s overflowing landfills, but with city officials all too aware of Chicago’s looming garbage crisis, Washington’s aides maintained an ominous silence on the issue. City officials had finally acknowledged that the well water samples from the isolated Maryland Manor neighborhood south of Altgeld Gardens “definitely contain cyanide,” but the projected cost of $460,000 to extend water and sewer lines to those taxpayers’ homes postponed any remedial action, even though the Tribune and the Chicago Defender ran prominent news stories about the problem. More than a year would pass before the work was carried out.<sup>8</sup>

In mid-November Obama was finally able to write a long letter to Phil Boerner. “My humblest apologies for the lack of communication these past months. Work has taken up much of my time,” but now “things have begun to settle into coherence of late.” Barack described Chicago for Phil, calling it “a handsome town” with “wide streets, lush parks,” and “Lake Michigan forming its whole east side.” Although “it’s a big city with big city problems, the scale and impact of the place is nothing like NY, mainly because of its dispersion, lack of congestion.” Chicagoans are “not as uptight, neurotic, as Manhattanites,” and “you still see country in a lot of folks’ ways,” but “to a much greater degree than NY, the various tribes remain discrete. . . . Of course, the most pertinent division here is that between the black tribe and the white tribe. The friction doesn’t appear to be any greater than in NY, but it’s more manifest since there’s a black mayor in power and a white City Council. And the races are spatially very separate; where I work, in the South Side, you go ten miles in any direction and will not see a single white face” excepting in Hyde Park, a considerable exaggeration on Obama’s part. “But generally the dictum holds fast—separate and unequal.”

Obama said his work took him to differing neighborhoods, with residents’ concerns ranging from sanitation complaints to job-training programs. “In either situation, I walk into a room and make promises I hope they can help me keep. They generally trust me, despite the fact that they’ve seen earnest young men pass through here before, expecting to change the world and eventually succumbing to the lure of a corporate office. And in a short time, I’ve learned to care for them very much and want to do everything I can for them. It’s tough though. Lots of driving, lots of hours on the phone trying to break through lethargy, lots of dull meetings. Lots of frustration when you see a 43% drop out rate in the public schools and don’t know where to begin denting that figure. But about 5% of the time, you see something happen—a shy housewife standing up to a bumbling official, or the sudden sound of hope in the voice of a grizzled old man that gives a hint of the possibilities, of people taking hold of their lives, working together to bring about a small justice. And it’s that possibility that keeps you going through all the trenchwork.”

But Obama’s most vivid image was the one Kellman had shown him three months earlier in South Deering: “closed down mills lie blanched and still as dinosaur fossils. We’ve been talking to some key unions about the possibility of working with them to keep the last major mill open, but it's owned by LTV," which "wants to close as soon as possible to garner the tax loss," Barack told Phil. He ended the letter by saying his apartment was "a comfortable studio near the lake" and that "since I often work at night, I usually reserve the morning to myself for running, reading and writing." He enclosed a draft of a short story dealing with the black church and asked Phil to mark it up and return it. "I live in mortal fear of Chicago winters," and "I miss NY and the people in it . . . Love, Barack."

The letter documented several significant turning points in Barack's new life. Most important of all was the emotional attachment Barack had already developed toward the people on whose behalf he was working: I "care for them very much and want to do everything I can for them." The second was that now, more than three months in, Obama was much more comfortable with his weekday work. As his close friend Asif Agha remembered, "in the beginning, he was enormously frustrated because the whole scene was completely chaotic," but in "struggling with those frustrations," Asif witnessed Barack "coming together around them as a purposeful person." Kellman was focused on the jobs bank and his initial contacts with Maury Richards's Local 1033 at LTV Republic Steel, but Obama's workday involved interactions with DCP's core participants—Loretta Augustine and Yvonne Lloyd from Golden Gate and Eden Green, down near Altgeld Gardens, Dan Lee and Cathy Askew from St. Catherine of Genoa in struggling West Pullman, Betty Garrett and Tom Kaminski from central Roseland, and Marlene Dillard from the solidly working-class London Towne Homes well to the east—which presented daily challenges that were mundane as well as relentlessly unceasing.

Yet as close as Obama became with Loretta and Dan, as well as to white priests like Bill Stenzel and Tom Kaminski, he had no closer a bond with anyone than Cathy Askew, the white single mother of two "hapa" daughters—half black, half white. Askew was a small-town Indiana native whose family had shunned her after she married an African American who fathered her two daughters, then disappeared entirely from their lives. Cathy taught school at St. Catherine's, and one of her daughters, Stephanie, had a congenital heart condition that left her less than fully robust. Early on Obama told Cathy about his own father and mother. As a result, "I don't think of him as really like African American. He's African, and he's American," she said. As he later wrote, Barack also recognized "the easy parallels between my own mother and Cathy, and between myself and Cathy's daughters, such sweet and pretty girls whose lives were so much more difficult than mine had ever been."

Having lived with a black man, Cathy saw Barack as something else: "he didn't look African American to me. I was really glad to find out he was a hybrid, because my kids are hybrids." From the beginning, she thought Barack "was gawky . . . very quiet . . . very thoughtful," she remembered. In those early months, he "was at a loss for a long time, I think, over where to focus. . . . I saw him doing a lot of listening to people and trying to pull things out of people. There was no focus. Everybody seemed like they wanted something different and nobody had anything in common."

Early that winter, Obama organized a meeting at St. Catherine for area residents to voice their unhappiness about police responsiveness to the district commander. Hardly a dozen people showed up, and the commander was a no-show too. Years later, Obama would repeatedly recall that evening. Loretta had been there, as well as Cathy. "He got frustrated. I think he almost quit once," Cathy said. Obama would recount even his core members saying they were tired and ready to give up, and "I was pretty depressed." As he remembered, across from the church, in an empty lot, two boys were tossing stones at an abandoned building. “Those boys reminded me of me. . . . What’s going to happen to those boys if we quit?”<sup>9</sup>

At the beginning of December, Chicago’s steel industry was back in the news. Eighteen months earlier, Mayor Washington had appointed a Task Force on Steel to study the industry’s future, and its report demonstrated that the entire effort had been a waste of time and energy. Early on Frank Lumpkin and his Save Our Jobs Committee colleagues had hoped the task force would show that their ideas about government investment could revive one or more Southeast Side mills. Washington sympathized with these hopes, but the task force brushed aside Lumpkin and his sympathizers. Its primary academic consultant, Ann R. Markusen, asserted that “Reaganomics and industrial leadership (or lack of it) deserve the major blame” for the plant closings and added that Chicago was “a city in deep, long-term trouble.” She also acknowledged that “national and international forces beyond the grasp of local governments are important determinants of steel job loss.” Task force member David Ranney stressed that in retrospect the “idea that the steel industry in Chicago might recover appeared absurd” and that what the Far South Side experienced during the 1980s “highlights the limits of local electoral politics.”<sup>10</sup>

During November and December, Maury Richards from USW Local 1033 and Jerry Kellman from CCRC met four times with Chicago’s economic development commissioner, Rob Mier, one of Washington’s most influential aides, to determine how they should react to the loss of a thousand or more jobs if there were even a partial shutdown of LTV’s East Side mill. Mier knew that this would be “a severe blow” to the city because a majority of the steelworkers lived in Chicago, and the mill paid $18 million a year in city and state taxes while contributing $300 million to the city’s economy. The union, CCRC, and Mier agreed that everything possible had to be done to convince LTV to invest $250 million to rebuild a blast furnace and acquire a continuous caster, or alternatively to sell the aging plant to a company that would. “Most of the discussants seem to realize that neither of these outcomes may be possible,” Mier told the mayor. Noting that LTV held defense contracts worth $1.3 billion, Mier reported that “both CCRC and Local 1033 are committed to coordinating a corporate campaign against LTV if LTV refuses” to invest or sell.

Obama, Loretta Augustine, and Marlene Dillard went with Jerry to one or more of his meetings with 1033’s officers and city officials, though no one except Jerry spoke on CCRC’s behalf. On December 19 Kellman and Richards sent a formal letter to the mayor, copied to Mier, asking Washington to “provide the leadership,” in coordination with local congressmen, that would pull together a package of city, state, and federal financial incentives for LTV. The Christmas holidays stalled these actions, but in the press, LTV called its Chicago mill “more vulnerable” than its remaining ones in Ohio and cited its massive $2.6 billion debt burden, intimating that bankruptcy was far likelier than any investment of capital in the East Side plant.<sup>11</sup>

Over the holidays, Barack took off almost two weeks, flying first to Washington, D.C., to meet his—and Auma’s—older brother Roy Abon’go, who had married an African American Peace Corps volunteer named Mary. Before leaving Chicago, Barack told Tom Kaminski how apprehensive he was about seeing Roy, and the visit got off to a bad start when Roy failed to meet him at the airport. When Barack telephoned, Roy said a marital argument meant that Barack should find a hotel room rather than stay with Roy. The two brothers did have a long dinner that night, plus breakfast in the morning, before Barack headed to New York, where he would rendezvous with his mother and sister and where Beenu Mahmood and Hasan Chandoo were happy to offer free lodging and renew their close acquaintances.

Maya was now a tenth grader at Punahou, and Ann was still living in Honolulu, trying to finish her Ph.D. dissertation. Two months earlier, the Internal Revenue Service had levied a $17,600 assessment against her for unpaid taxes on her 1979 and 1980 income from USAID contractor DAI, but Ann would leave the levy unpaid for years to come. Barack ended up spending more time with Hasan, Beenu, and Wahid Hamid than with his mother and sister, and though he did not see Genevieve in person, a letter he wrote to her soon after New Year's recounted an emotional phone conversation they had had, albeit one she would be unable to recall in any detail years later.

Hard guy that I am, I've managed to stay embittered and sullen towards you for a whole week and a half. But that's about it. I won't try to analyze whether what I did was correct or incorrect, right or wrong, for you or for me. I do know that I had to vent my feelings fully; otherwise I would have choked off something important inside me, permanently. Had to get my head and heart in better communication with each other, in better balance. The consensus seems to be that the whole episode was good for me. My mother and Maya enjoyed comforting me for a change. Asif, my linguist friend in Chicago, says I need the humility.

Whatever had transpired, Barack wrote, "reminded me of the rare, fleeting nature of things. My own dispensability," and "perhaps I'm more apt to believe now something you seem to have understood better than I—when happiness presents itself . . . grab it with both hands." But "I still feel some frustration at the fact that you seemed to have wrapped me up in a neat package in our conversations. Stiff, routinized, controlled. The man in the grey flannel suit. A stock figure. It felt like you had forgotten who I was."

Friends, Barack wrote, "recognize who you are . . . even when you're acting out of character," as Barack apparently had. "I hope I haven't lost that with you. I hope I remain as complicated and confusing and various and surprising in your mind as you are in mine." He closed by saying that "phone calls will still be tough on me for the time being, but cards or letters are welcome." He hoped to get back to New York in the summer to see the child whom Wahid and his wife Filly were expecting, and "hopefully we can spend some time more productively than this last time out. Some fun, maybe. Laughter. Ambivalently yours. But w/ unconditional love—Barack."

More than six months since they had parted, the depth of Barack's emotional tie to Genevieve remained powerful indeed.<sup>12</sup>

While Obama was away, two major developments upended Chicago politics. The Chicago Sun-Times gave Harold Washington a stinker of a Christmas morning gift by revealing that an undercover FBI informant, working at the behest of the local U.S. attorney, had made cash payoffs to several city officials and aldermen. As the story played out over the coming weeks, Michael Burnett, aka Michael Raymond, had been introduced to his targets by a "friendly, easy-going" young lobbyist, Raymond Akers, whose car sported a personalized license tag: LNDFLL. Akers was the city council lobbyist for Waste Management Incorporated (WMI), which had 1985 revenues totaling $1.63 billion.

Four months earlier two administration appointees had accepted as much as $10,000 in cash from Burnett, and on December 20, FBI agents had confronted 9th Ward alderman Perry Hutchinson at his Roseland home. On two occasions in early October, Hutchinson had accepted a total of $17,200 from Akers in a lakefront apartment near Chicago's Navy Pier. Unbeknownst to Hutchinson, FBI agents in the apartment next door filmed the encounters with a camera inserted through the common wall. A week later Hutchinson accepted another $5,000 from Akers in Roseland. All told, Hutchinson had received $28,500, and he told journalists, "I figured as long as the guy was dumb enough to give me all of that money, I'd be smart enough to take it." Hutchinson claimed he used $8,500 to hire an additional staffer and had distributed the remaining $20,000 to schools and community groups in Roseland. Reporters were unable to identify any recipients.

Soon it was revealed that a second black alderman and mayoral supporter, Clifford Kelley, who had led a city council effort to discredit a top WMI competitor, had accepted cash bribes too. Then news broke that city corporation counsel James Montgomery allegedly had been aware of at least one of these payoffs months before Washington first learned of the bribes on Christmas morning. The Chicago Tribune described this as "a widening scandal that some believe could cost [Washington] re-election" a year later. Montgomery quickly resigned, but several weeks later a Tribune story headlined "Lobbyist Paid for City Aide's Vacation" showed that a year earlier, Akers had given a travel agent $4,200 in cash to cover a weeklong trip to Acapulco for Montgomery and his family. No charges ensued.

Independent white voters who loathed Chicago's long history of public corruption had been essential to Washington's 1983 triumph, and they would be needed for his reelection in 1987. Ironically, as the controversy built, mayoral opponents like Ed Vrdolyak remained largely silent. One opposing alderman explained to the Tribune: "If we do nothing, the mayor might ultimately bury himself."

Despite Washington's huge popularity among African Americans, his first three years in office had been anything but successful. Some months earlier, Chicago Magazine—not a bastion of Vrdolyak supporters—had published a thoroughly negative report on Washington's record to date. He "has been miserably inept at communicating his ideas to the city" and "his administration is plagued by excessive disorganization," Chicago reported. Washington had "gained 30 pounds" and looked "physically run-down." One black activist who had championed his election back in 1983, Lu Palmer, complained that Washington was relying upon "apolitical technocrats" who were "barricaded on the fifth floor of City Hall. The people aren't part of it." The magazine also said Washington "may be the least powerful Chicago mayor in recent history" and singled out the Chicago Housing Authority (CHA) as a "full-fledged disaster." Politically, Washington's agenda was "to a great extent, stalled," primarily because Vrdolyak's city council majority kept the mayor largely "on the defensive."

When the bribery scandal broke, Washington's administration was already besieged. Yet a federal appeals court ruling in August 1984 that black and Hispanic voters were so underrepresented by the city's existing ward map that the Voting Rights Act was being violated seemed to provide an opening for Washington, because new elections could overturn Vrdolyak's 29–21 council majority. In June 1985, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review the appellate finding, and the case was sent to a district judge who instructed the opposing lawyers to redraw seven wards, all of which were represented by Washington opponents. On December 30, the court ordered new elections in those wards to be held on March 18. In the interim, Washington announced that Judson H. Miner, the forty-four-year-old civil rights lawyer who had litigated the redistricting challenge, would be his new corporation counsel.<sup>13</sup>

But on the Far South Side, the fate of LTV Republic's East Side steel mill was still in question. In early January, a front-page Wall Street Journal story described the company's prospects as "dim at best," and a week later Crain's Chicago Business published a long report that the Daily Calumet said "sent shock waves through the Southeast Side." Jerry Kellman told the local paper that LTV should put the mill up for sale, but Maury Richards said that the 1033 union understood that the East Side facility was "losing between $5 million and $8 million every month."

In mid-January Obama attended a three-day training event in Milwaukee for minority organizers sponsored by the Campaign for Human Development and the Industrial Areas Foundation. Soon after he returned, Chicago headlines confirmed Jerry and Maury's fears: "LTV Announces 775 Layoffs" plus the closing of the East Side mill's most modern blast furnace. Kellman told reporters that Illinois officials had "written off the steel industry" and GSU's Regional Employment Network immediately scheduled four days of skills-assessment interviews at Local 1033's office in an effort to find new jobs for laid-off workers. Yet everything Frank Lumpkin and his colleagues had experienced in the years since Wisconsin Steel's sudden closure told them how scarce jobs were on the Far South Side and in the south suburbs.

Loretta Augustine and Yvonne Lloyd encouraged Barack to focus on the sprawling Altgeld Gardens public housing project, just east of where they lived. They introduced him to their pastor at Our Lady of the Gardens, Father Dominic Carmon, and Obama also met with parents whose children attended Our Lady's small Catholic grade school. He was introduced to Dr. Alma Jones, the feisty principal of Carver Primary School and its adjoining Wheatley Child-Parent Center, virtually all of whose students came from within Altgeld. Jones was immediately impressed with Barack. "Talking to him, he was so much older than he was. It was like talking to your peers rather than somebody the age of your children." In a community where few people could imagine meaningful change, Jones stood out as an important voice of encouragement for a young organizer venturing into unfamiliar territory.

Despite Altgeld residents' letters to Mayor Washington complaining about "heavy drug traffic" seven days a week, no city residents were more completely ignored and forgotten than the tenants of Altgeld Gardens. Dr. Gloria Jackson Bacon, who almost single-handedly provided medical care to Altgeld residents for decades, explained that by the 1980s "many of them did not venture outside. Many of them lived almost like insular lives inside of Altgeld." Bacon recalled others speaking pejoratively of "'those people out there, those people out there,' and I'd say, 'These are your people.'" Loretta Augustine remembered once taking some Altgeld schoolchildren to the zoo and realizing that "one or two of the kids had never been downtown before." Loretta referred to Lake Michigan, and "the kid responded, 'Chicago has a lake?'" As Alma Jones told one reporter who visited her school, "Altgeld Gardens is an isolated, enclosed island. We have no stores, no jobs and one traffic signal."<sup>14</sup>

Barack continued his weekly get-togethers with Asif Agha, but his social life was so meager that Kellman and Mary Bernstein discussed ways to help him meet more people his own age. "He felt to me like a nephew," Mary remembered, with Barack calling her "Sistah," and she calling him simply "Obama." In her eyes, Barack "was always serious," indeed "driven," but above all "he was very solitary." Bernstein recalled that Barack once asked her, "How am I going to get a date?" working in Roseland and spending his evenings at meetings or visiting DCP parishioners. "You don't want to date any of the women I know," Mary humorously replied. "They're all old, and they're all nuns."

Loretta Augustine, Yvonne Lloyd, and Nadyne Griffin were all looking out for the young man's welfare. "I felt very protective, very motherly towards him," Loretta later told journalist Sasha Abramsky.

“We were worried that he wasn’t eating enough,” Yvonne Lloyd recalled. “We were always trying to make him eat more.” Loretta could see that Barack was “very focused” and “very serious,” and more than once she suggested he lighten up. “You shouldn’t be so somber and uptight and serious all the time.” Obama later said he was indeed “very serious about the work that I was trying to do.” Marlene Dillard’s strong interest in jobs had her spending as much time with Barack as anyone, and though she found him “very dynamic” and “very sincere,” his maturity meant she “never looked at him as a son.” But Nadyne Griffin felt just like Loretta did: “He was just like a son to me,” and Tom Kaminski found the church ladies’ solicitude heartwarming: “Everyone wanted to be his mother, everyone thought she was his mother,” and “I felt like an uncle.”

Barack stayed in touch through regular long-distance phone calls with old friends like Hasan Chandoo, Wahid Hamid, and Andy Roth, and in late February, he sent Andy a long letter that was similar to the one he had written Phil Boerner three months earlier:

As I may have told you on the phone, when you’re alone in a new city, the fullness or emptiness of the mailbox can set the tone for the entire day.

Work continues to kick my ass. A lot of responsibility has been dumped on me: I’m to organize an area of about 70,000–100,000 folks and bring the local churches and unions into the action. I confront the standard stuff: the turpitude of established leaders (i.e. aldermen, preachers); the lassitude of the masses; the “we’ve seen middle class folks come in here before and make promises and ain’t nothin’ happened” attitude, which is true; my own inhibitions about playing for power and manipulating folks, even when it’s for what I perceive to be their own good. At least once a day I think about what I’m doing out here, and think about the pleasures of the upwardly mobile (though still liberal Democratic) lifestyle, and consider chucking all this. Fortunately, one of two things invariably snap me out of my brooding: 1) I see such squalor or degradation or corruption going on that I get damned angry and pour the energy into work; or 2) I see a sign of progress—one of my leaders, a shy housewife, dressing down some evasive bureaucrat, or a young man who’s unemployed volunteering to help distribute some flyers—and the small spark will keep me rolling for a whole day or two.

Who would have ever believed that I’d be the sucker who’d believed all that crap we talked about in the Oxy cooler and keep on believing despite all the evidence to the contrary. Speaking of contrary, I’m in such a state for lack of female companionship, but that will require a whole separate exegesis.

A few weeks later, Barack sent a postcard to his brother Roy and his wife Mary, and a longer message to Phil Boerner. He thanked Phil for his encouraging comments about the short story Barack had sent him, but he emphasized what a “discouraging time” he was having:

Unfortunately, I haven’t had much time for writing (stories or letters) lately, what with this work continuing to kick my ass. Experienced some serious discouragement these past three weeks, mainly because of the incredible amount of time to get even the smallest concrete gain. Still, I’m putting my head down and plan to work through my frustrations for at least another year. By that time I should have a fairly good perspective on both the possibilities and limitations of the

No one in mid-1980s Chicagoland had anywhere near the degree of success Jerry Kellman did in winning major grants from the Campaign for Human Development, the Woods Fund, the Joyce Foundation, and Tom Joyce's small but always-pioneering Claretian Social Development Fund. Grant makers regularly visited the organizations they supported, and by early 1986, Jerry had been introducing Barack as a new mainstay in DCP's Far South Side organizing work. Archdiocesan CHD staffers Ken Brucks and Mary Yu met Barack through Kellman, but the two most influential funders Barack got to know that winter were Woods Fund director Jean Rudd and program officer Ken Rolling. Jean had become Woods's first staffer five years earlier. Ken, like Greg Galluzzo, was a former Catholic priest who had spent more than half a dozen years in organizing before joining Jean at Woods in 1985. Woods's commitment to organizing was reaching full flower just as Jerry and then Barack arrived on the scene. As Jean deeply believed, "community organizing is intended to be transformational for 'ordinary' people. Through its training and actions, people recognize their worthiness, their legitimacy, their place in a democracy, their power, their voice." That was the work, and the teaching, that she and Ken wanted to support and champion.

Decades later Jean remembered when Jerry first brought Barack to meet them. "In that first meeting, I was very, very impressed. . . . He was very, very reflective, very candid . . . very winningly . . . humble about what he had to catch up on" about organizing and about Chicago. "I believe I said to my husband, 'I've really met the most amazing person today.'" But most of Woods's actual contact with DCP, CCRC, and other grantees like Madeline Talbott's ACORN was handled by Ken Rolling, who was even more impressed upon first meeting Barack. "I've just met the first African American president," he told his wife Rochelle Davis that evening. Ken said much the same thing to CHD staffer Sharon Jacobson, who a quarter century later remembered it just as Ken and Rochelle had: "I want you to watch this guy, Sharon. He's going to be president of the United States one day."

Jacobson played a leading role in CHD's grant making in Chicago, and Renee Brereton, based in Washington, was the crucial staffer for allocating national funds. She had directed $42,000 to CCRC in 1984, $40,000 in 1985, and by early 1986, Brereton and Jacobson were overseeing that year's grant to DCP. She gave DCP's application 90 out of a possible 100 points, citing as the only shortcoming the confusing organizational overlap between CCRC and DCP. Brereton believed that "DCP is expanding its power base through coalition work with unions, and public housing projects," and she was impressed with the leadership training Kellman had done with parishioners from DCP's Catholic churches. "The staff is strong with a commitment to hiring minority staff," and she recommended at least another $30,000.

Sharon Jacobson oversaw the local Chicago committee that ratified Brereton's recommendations, and she noted DCP's intent to develop an employment training and placement program for residents of Altgeld Gardens as well as its desire to improve Far South Side public schools. She wrote that "the large geographical area" DCP sought to cover "is too broad" and threatened to dissipate DCP's efforts rather than focus them, but DCP was Chicagoland's "strongest organizing project. In the past year, we have witnessed thorough leadership training, successful multi-issue campaigns, and widespread grassroots community support," and $33,000 was committed to DCP.

Jacobson also wrote to Brereton that Obama's attendance at the CHD-IAF minority organizer training in Milwaukee had proven notable; out of twenty attendees, he and one other "had demonstrated the most potential," leading Jacobson and Mary Yu to recommend that Barack be invited to attend IAF's premier training event, a ten-day course that took place each July at Mount St. Mary's College in the Santa Monica Mountains above Los Angeles. CHD would pay Barack's $500 tuition, $400 room and board, and also cover his travel expenses.<sup>16</sup>

On March 18, special elections were held in the seven redrawn city council wards. Washington's backers captured two seats from Vrdolyak's 29–21 majority, but two other pro-Washington candidates fell short of the necessary 50 percent plus 1 and were forced into runoff contests to be held on April 29. Victory was assured for the Washington supporter in the black-majority 15th Ward, but in the 26th Ward, two Puerto Rican candidates, one of whom was sponsored by powerful Vrdolyak ally Richard Mell, faced off amid a cascade of election-misconduct allegations. The Chicago Tribune labeled the 26th Ward contest “the most closely watched election in Chicago history,” with both Washington and Vrdolyak campaigning there two days before the rematch, and Washington's young election lawyer, Tom Johnson, a 1975 graduate of Harvard Law School, keeping a close eye on the proceedings. When Washington's ally, Luis Gutierrez, prevailed by a surprisingly comfortable margin of more than 850 votes, the mayor attained a 25–25 city council split, putting him in position to cast a decisive tie-breaking vote—at least until the next regularly scheduled city elections just one year later.

While most of Chicago focused on the Washington vs. Vrdolyak contest, another vote—by United Steelworkers members on a dramatically concessionary new contract with LTV—was building to its own climax on April 4. One week earlier, on March 28—the sixth anniversary of Wisconsin Steel's closure—Harold Washington met with Frank Lumpkin's Save Our Jobs Committee. At LTV Republic's East Side mill, Maury Richards campaigned against the proposed 9 percent reduction in workers' hourly wage rates and benefits. But even though 1033's members voted against the new contract 1,254 to 750, well over 60 percent of LTV's nineteen thousand steelworkers in other states approved it.<sup>17</sup>

As winter turned to spring, DCP began to focus on the forlorn state of the Far South Side's public parks, a visible example of basic city services being denied to black and Hispanic neighborhoods but not white ones. The city's parks were overseen by a quasi-independent entity, the Chicago Park District (CPD), which remained a notorious nesting ground for white Democratic ward organization loyalists, even after Washington's three years in office. Two energetic DCP members—Nadyne Griffin, who had a special interest in Robichaux Park, up at 95th Street, and Eva Sturgies, who lived across the street from Smith Park, at 99th and Princeton—had brought this issue to Obama's attention. DCP began distributing leaflets in the solidly middle-class blocks around Smith Park, encouraging the community to attend a meeting to address the problem. Aletha Strong Gibson, a college graduate homemaker in her early thirties who lived one block south on Princeton, knew that Smith Park “really wasn't very safe or conducive for young children” like her six- and four-year-olds. Gibson went to the meeting and spoke up. Afterward Barack “said he'd like to come meet with me about doing some more work on the parks issue,” and following that one-on-one Aletha became a key recruit.

One day early that spring, when Barack was visiting the handsome old Monadnock Building in the downtown Loop, which housed many small progressive organizations, he stopped into the offices of the ten-year-old Friends of the Parks (FOP) and introduced himself to John Owens, a twenty-nine-year-old army veteran who had become FOP's community planning director a year earlier after finishing a degree in urban geography at Chicago State University. Owens was immediately impressed with Obama. “This guy sounds like he's president of the country already,” Owens recounted just four years later. “He had an air of authority and a presence that made you want to listen.” Barack talked about the discriminatory treatment accorded Far South Side parks, and Owens explained some of what he knew about “the ins and outs of the Chicago Park District.” Barack had “all kinds of personality,” and “we sort of clicked,” Owens explained.

Barack invited John down to Roseland, and they worked together to start compiling a list of parks the CPD was ignoring: Abbott Park, east of the Dan Ryan Expressway; West Pullman Park, on Princeton Avenue; Carver Park, down in Altgeld Gardens; and the huge Palmer Park, just north of Holy Rosary. One afternoon in Palmer Park, gunshots sounded nearby, and they both ducked behind parked cars. Owen recalled Obama saying, ““You hear that? Whoa!”” and remembers thinking, ““Well, he hasn’t been around here very long.””

John and Barack hit it off. Some evenings they went to music clubs together. “I could see he was somebody that I could learn a lot from,” said Owens, and Obama also could learn from Owens, a native of the South Side’s middle-class Chatham neighborhood, about his life experiences as a black man who had grown up in Chicago. Johnnie—as he was often called—quickly became Barack’s first truly close black male friend, at least since the cosmopolitan Eric Moore at Oxy. Before the end of April, Barack asked Johnnie to attend the upcoming July IAF training in Los Angeles, and Owens readily agreed.<sup>18</sup>

In early May, Jerry Kellman’s CCRC got another major grant: $30,000 from the Joyce Foundation to support Mike Kruglik’s organizing work in Chicago’s south suburbs. But Kellman also used his connections within Chicago’s Catholic archdiocese to re-create, in somewhat different form, Tom Joyce and Leo Mahon’s original vision of CCRC as an organization straddling the Illinois–Indiana state line to encompass the entire Calumet industrial region. Jerry had been thinking about restarting work in Indiana even when Barack first arrived, but underlying that was a fundamental truth that Leo and Tom had experienced and that Greg Galluzzo best articulated in explaining that “what was joined together industrially and geographically is not together politically.”

Chicagoans, especially black Chicagoans, who were deeply proud of their first black mayor, identified with their city. Residents of the south suburbs, many of whom had fled Chicago in earlier years, focused on their own townships and the larger overlay of Cook County, not the city’s government. Indiana residents paid little attention to Chicago politics and even less to Illinois. These regional identities were more significant than Leo and Tom’s belief in a “Calumet community.” Also the diocese of Gary, in northwest Indiana, was organizationally separate from the Chicago archdiocese, with independent financial access to local and national CHD resources.

By early May, Kellman had successfully attained funding from Father Tom Joyce’s Claretian Social Development Fund for what he called the “Northwest Indiana Organizing Project,” and thanks to Bishop Wilton Gregory, one of Cardinal Bernardin’s deputies, Bernardin requested that Norbert F. Gaughan, who had become bishop of Gary in October 1984, meet with Gregory and Kellman so that CCRC’s work could be reborn east of the Illinois state line. Gaughan agreed to commit his own diocesan funds to the effort, and sent a letter to the pastors of all his parishes, encouraging them to work with Kellman, who began establishing ties with existing groups such as East Chicago’s United Citizens Organization. But neither UCO nor the larger Calumet Project for Industrial Jobs, with a predominant union focus, used the church-based organizing model Kellman had deployed so successfully in creating DCP. Kellman’s and Kruglik’s Illinois efforts outside Chicago would be given a new, regionally distinct identity as the South Suburban Action Conference (SSAC), with Jerry as its executive director until his shift to Gary was complete. Everyone agreed that all three pieces—Barack’s, Mike’s, and Jerry’s—would flourish better on their own than under the old “Calumet Community” rubric.

By late spring 1986, it was clear that Frank Lumpkin’s cynical complaint that CCRC’s Regional Employment Network only created employment opportunities for its own employees was true. One headline announced that “Regional Employment Network Reports Initial Success,” but, as the article made clear, the organization’s definition of “success” was its data bank of 1,350 job seekers, not actual job offers. Governors State University appealed to state officials for an additional $375,000 to extend the program past the summer of 1986, but the request received no support. Obama would later remember REN as “a bust” that failed to find work for even one applicant. The savvy Fred Simari recalled how “there was an elaborate system to assess their needs,” but it “was all smoke and mirrors, the whole thing.”<sup>19</sup>

By mid-April, Barack had been working for several months to broaden DCP’s outreach with Altgeld Gardens residents, but with only modest success. Then one lady, Callie Smith, handed him an ad she had seen in April 14’s Chicago Sun-Times. “Specification No. 8632” sought bids for the “Removal of Ceiling and Pipe Insulation Containing Asbestos at the Management Office Building of Altgeld Gardens, 940 E. 132nd Street.” The bids were due April 30, and specifics could be obtained at Chicago Housing Authority (CHA) headquarters in the Loop. Potentially cancer-causing asbestos had been discovered in December 1985, but Altgeld was not the only CHA property with such a problem: asbestos had just been uncovered in two apartments at the Ida B. Wells Extension Homes in the Bronzeville neighborhood. Linda Randle, an organizer at the nearby Centers for New Horizons and who lived in another part of Wells, told her friend Martha Allen, who wrote for the Community Renewal Society’s (CRS) monthly Chicago Reporter, about the asbestos. Allen arranged for laboratory testing of a sample from Wells, and the results were shocking: “to find that much amosite [a type of asbestos] there is astounding,” one scientist stated.

Obama met Randle at a CRS-hosted meeting of organizers, and when Linda mentioned the discovery at Wells, Barack pulled out the Sun-Times ad and said, “the same thing is happening in Altgeld.” Linda and Barack agreed to be in touch, and back in Altgeld, Callie Smith called CHA manager Walter Williams to ask if the CHA had determined whether or not asbestos was present throughout the hundreds of homes as well as in the management office. In his own later telling, Obama accompanied Callie to a meeting where Williams said the CHA had checked and none had been found. Smith and Obama understandably doubted that assertion and sought documentation to back up Williams’s claim.

On May 9, several residents met with Gaylene Domer, executive assistant to CHA executive director Zirl Smith, to request immediate, independent testing of Altgeld residential buildings and public release of the results. They also asked that Smith appear at an Altgeld community meeting to respond to residents’ concerns. After a week with no response, Callie Smith, Loretta Augustine, and two other members of the Altgeld Developing Communities Project sent a Western Union Mailgram to Smith, with a copy to Mayor Washington. Citing the May 9 meeting, followed by CHA’s silence, their message repeated the two requests and asked for a written response within five days. On May 20 they wrote to Washington on CCRC letterhead and asked his staff to intervene.

Coincidentally or not, that same day CHA contacted a testing firm, and within twenty-four hours two vacant apartments and two boiler rooms were surveyed, with asbestos readily apparent in three of the four locations. Although most of the asbestos pipe insulation was in good condition, the inspectors warned that in residences it “is highly subject to damage” and should be removed whenever apartments become vacant.

That same day a Developing Communities Project press release noted the Altgeld complaints and said residents would visit CHA’s downtown headquarters the next morning. The Chicago Defender quoted liberally from Callie Smith’s statements in the release: “Basically we feel like we’ve been lied to and given the run-around,” she said. “We think it’s typical of the arrogance of the CHA to remove hazardous materials from its own offices without even checking to see if residents have the same problems.” WBBM Newsradio 780 began covering the story from daybreak onward.

Obama had booked a yellow school bus to take his community members to CHA headquarters downtown, and he had multiple copies of an outline of the residents’ demands. But only a modest number of people, including Callie Smith and Hazel Johnson of PCR, plus several children, showed up for the trip. When they arrived, they were brusquely told that Zirl Smith was unavailable, but the presence of one or more TV crews motivated officials to promise that testing would move ahead and that Smith would attend a community meeting in Altgeld on June 9.

Obama, in his own account nine years later, gave the CHA visit an oddly outsized importance, writing that “I changed as a result of that bus trip, in a fundamental way,” since it had suggested “what might be possible and therefore spurs you on. That bus ride kept me going, I think. Maybe it still does.” He also wrote that only eight people, rather than “about 20 Altgeld residents” as reported in the press, made up his group.

On the next night’s 10:00 P.M. WBBM Channel 2 newscast, reporter Walter Jacobson recounted his inability to get anyone from CHA to respond to residents’ complaints about what “literally may be a question of life or death.” Instead, “the public affairs director of the CHA is getting her lunch while the people who live in the CHA continue getting poisoned by asbestos.” It was powerful television.

A CHA press release the next day said the issue was “resolved” and that test results demonstrated “no asbestos exposure danger.” Zirl Smith appeared on WBBM’s 10:00 P.M. newscast and insisted that “residents know we’re here to serve them” and that “we are good managers: we feel a responsibility to our residents.” Three days later, WBBM revealed on its 6:00 P.M. show that it had paid for testing at both Altgeld and Wells and had gotten dire results. “This is definitely a threat to human health, a threat to the health of the people who live there,” a medical expert told viewers. “It’s a situation that should be corrected as soon as possible.”

Within an hour, CHA ordered emergency inspections, and on WBBM’s 10:00 P.M. news, 2nd Ward alderman Bobby Rush called CHA’s behavior “criminal.” When the CHA’s inspectors finally began work at Altgeld on June 4, they found “many samples of exposed asbestos,” Walter Jacobson told WBBM viewers. While that was taking place, Obama and three Altgeld residents—Hazel Johnson, Evangeline “Vangie” Irving, and Cleonia Graham—were at City Hall trying to invite Washington to attend the Altgeld community meeting. With TV cameras rolling, the four were sent to an impromptu meeting in a tiny room with Washington’s city council floor leader, 4th Ward alderman Tim Evans. “We are sincere about having this taken care of,” Vangie Irving explained. Hazel Johnson added, as journalists looked on: “We’re asking the mayor to save our children and ourselves. We don’t have faith in promises from CHA management. With the mayor’s support, I think we’ll get some action.”

Evans promised to take their concerns to the mayor, and Obama was mentioned in the next day's Sun-Times and Defender. The former identified him as a "community organizer," but Evans would remember having the impression Barack was "related to someone who actually resides in CHA because that was the way he was relating to these people, like a member of their family. It was clear they had talked before that meeting about who would deal with what aspect of the plight" and when one participant got nervous, "this young man got up and sat next to the person who was supposed to speak. . . . 'Let Alderman Evans know what concerns you have.' He was not there to impose himself on them, he was there to facilitate their discussions with the so-called powers that be."<sup>20</sup>

The next day Zirl Smith made a bad situation worse by admitting to a city council committee that CHA had discovered the asbestos six months earlier and then blaming residents "for disturbing the asbestos-covered pipes, creating a crisis themselves." Bobby Rush responded that it was "very irresponsible" to allege that tenants were purposely "exposing themselves and their children to possible cancer," and after the session, Smith hid in a men's room to avoid WBBM reporter Jim Avila and his camera crew.

On Monday night, Avila as well as crews from two other TV stations were waiting at Our Lady of the Gardens school gymnasium for Smith's 6:30 P.M. appearance. Callie Smith and others had gone door to door in Altgeld, encouraging residents to turn out, and approximately seven hundred people jammed into the "hot, steamy" gym. But by 7:30 P.M. there was no sign of Smith, and the crowd was "boiling over" when he finally arrived, seventy-five minutes late. Once he was at the podium, moderator Callie Smith asked him, "Do you have a plan to remove the asbestos that's in our homes?" and handed him the microphone. In the Tribune's description of the scene, "Smith shrugged and said, 'I don't know. We have not completed all the tests on the apartments. As soon as this is complete, we will start the abatement process.'"

That response infuriated the crowd, and shouts of "No" drowned him out. Obama had told Callie and her colleague Vangie Irving, "Try not to let the director hog the microphone," but Smith resumed his answer—"We've started in Altgeld and we're going from apartment to apartment to determine the severity of the asbestos." Callie, standing to Smith's left, reached her right hand to take the microphone from Smith, who parried her with his left hand—"We will install an abatement plan that you'll be—excuse me, excuse me" and sought to retain the mike as the crowd began chanting, "Take it away, right away."

Then Vangie Irving reached in, grasped it, and handed it to Callie. As she did so, Smith stood up and slowly walked out. The uproar grew, an older man in the crowd collapsed, and the meeting was over. Outside, Smith had his driver call for an ambulance as some residents chanted, "No more rent." Smith told reporters, "I'm perfectly willing to meet with them, but I can't under these circumstances." Tuesday's Sun-Times reported Smith saying "that 'people who do not live in Altgeld' were behind the meeting."

As Smith's black Ford LTD pulled away, Obama called his volunteers together and told Callie that he had messed up and should have coached her on how to deal with Smith and the microphone. Dan Lee told Barack not to blame himself, that they had prepared for every possibility except Smith physically commandeering the mike. Adrienne Jackson believed the crowd had felt empowered by what had happened, that "they had stood up to somebody," and she viewed the evening "as a success." The 10:00 P.M. newscasts offered a different verdict on the meeting. WBBM's coverage said the residents had kept Smith from speaking; WMAQ's Carol Marin said the moderators had not allowed Smith to use the microphone, and so “Smith walked out.”

Barack was more disconsolate than he should have been, and when he got back to his Hyde Park apartment, he called Johnnie Owens, who had turned down Barack’s invitation to attend. “He was certainly very clearly upset over what had happened,” Owens recalled. “He sounded angry at himself . . . and felt there was more that he could have done to prepare the leadership and sort of anticipate the problems that occurred.” To everyone else, the Altgeld meeting was a blip in the daily news cycle, and coverage of CHA’s testing and abatement work—the asbestos was far worse at Ida B. Wells than at Altgeld—continued throughout the summer as CHA sought federal funding to help cover the costs.<sup>21</sup>

In the midst of the asbestos campaign, Obama bought his airplane ticket to Los Angeles for the IAF training in mid-July, with the Chicago archdiocese’s CHD staff reimbursing its $196 cost. He also sent a late May postcard to Phil Boerner, writing, “Work continues to be rough, but I’m learning at a steady clip and am starting to see some results. We were on the tube and made the papers this week” and “I took a busload of public housing tenants downtown to protest living conditions. Still following up on this.” A few days later, he sent a lengthier greeting card to Genevieve, whose birthday was on June 7:

The pace of my life has quickened these past few months; feel like I’ve broken through the lengthy “Buddhist” phase—acting more forcefully, letting myself make mistakes. I’ve stopped eating peanuts, I’m working like a bitch, still writing when I have the time.

Made some good new friends; still miss my old ones. And trying to develop a new kind of discipline in myself—not the stiff martial discipline I’d let myself get locked into, but more the discipline to decide what feels right, to dig deep, take risks and make sure that I’m enjoying myself. A good time, a hungry time, and I give much credit to you for it (your pokes and prods had a subtle but sure effect).

Barack closed by asking, “Still going to stop teaching next year?” and offering “Regards to Sohale, the family, etc. Love—Barack.”

A week or so after the Altgeld meeting, Barack went to dinner with Asif Agha, his girlfriend Tammy Hamlish, an anthropology graduate student, and a mutual friend and classmate whom they wanted to introduce to Barack. Almost a year had passed since twenty-four-year-old Barack had last enjoyed any “female companionship,” as he put it in a note three months earlier to Andy Roth. But Asif and Tammy’s initiative would have momentous consequences, almost as great as Barack’s decision a year earlier to leave New York and find an entirely new life in Chicago.<sup>22</sup>

Sheila Miyoshi Jager was two years younger than Barack and a 1984 graduate of Bennington College in Vermont. She had attended two years of middle school in France and had spent 1984–85 in Paris, writing a thesis in French on Claude Lévi-Strauss toward an M.A. from Middlebury College. Lévi-Strauss suggested she pursue anthropology and recommended she study Korea, a country he had just visited, and he recommended her highly to his friend Marshall Sahlins, a well-known anthropologist at the University of Chicago. In September 1985 Sheila arrived there to begin the doctoral program in anthropology.

Sheila grew up in Northern California, where her father, Bernd, a polymath psychologist whose Ph.D. dissertation at Duquesne University had dealt with Freudian psychoanalysis, worked as a clinical psychologist at two state hospitals and taught psychology at California State University’s Sonoma County campus. Born in Groningen, the Netherlands, in 1931, Bernd was not yet nine when the Nazis occupied Holland in May 1940. Three years later he watched “hundreds of our Jewish neighbors being herded like cattle to the train station” in the middle of the night, and he would always “vividly remember the German soldiers as they loudly goose-stepped” through town. Bernd’s father, Hendrik, played a major role in an underground network that sheltered dozens of Jewish children from the Nazis. One young girl, Greetje de Haas, lived with Hendrik, his wife Geesje, and their two sons for three years. The Jagers’ courageous involvement was posthumously recognized when Israel’s Yad Vashem honored them with inclusion on the Wall of Honor in the Garden of the Righteous in Jerusalem.

After World War II, Bernd studied at the Royal Institute for Tropical Agriculture outside Amsterdam before spending two years working under Albert Schweitzer at Lambaréné, in what was then French Equatorial Africa. He fell in love with an African woman whom he sought to marry, but that came to naught. From there Bernd came to the U.S., and during a year’s study at Berea College in Kentucky, he met and married Shinko Sakata, a Japanese woman six years his junior. Together they moved to Groningen, where Bernd earned an M.A. before they returned to the U.S., eventually settling into a handsomely situated three-bedroom home in Santa Rosa, ten miles north of Cal State’s Rohnert Park campus. Five years after Sheila’s birth, a younger brother named David joined the family, and in time Shinko Jager became a well-known Sonoma County potter. Bernd’s closest friend, Michael Dees, who also worked at one of the hospitals, witnessed all of Sheila’s childhood. “I’ve known her since she was one,” he recounted years later. Bernd and Shinko “had strict parameters with her,” he recalled, and “did a very good job raising Sheila.” Mike would remain close to her even half a century later: “She’s like a daughter to me.”

Barack quickly became deeply taken with the bright, beautiful, and intense half-Dutch, half-Japanese Sheila. She wore her dark hair in a short pageboy-style cut, and as Barack would later write, she had “specks of green in her eyes.” Three or four times in June and early July, they went on double dates with Asif and Tammy. Hanging out with a trio of anthropologists was no problem for the son of Ann Dunham, Asif recalled, because Barack “knew the idiom, he knew the concerns, and he was right at home.” Asif encouraged Barack’s interest in Sheila, joshingly telling him from recent experience that asking “Can I kiss you now?” was a surefire way to pose the question. As Asif remembered it, Barack soon let him know it had worked. Barack and Sheila—“two mixed-race kids,” she would later say—were together almost every day in the two or three weeks before he left for Los Angeles on July 8.

In the aftermath of the asbestos campaign, Barack finally had time to turn his attention to two other DCP efforts. Prior to asbestos, Barack had thought that DCP’s best chance to organize within Altgeld was to focus on residents’ lack of employment opportunities and on how the city’s primary jobs-referral agency, the Mayor’s Office of Employment and Training (MOET), offered no services on the Far South Side below 95th Street. DCP had made contact with MOET officials, and finally a visit to Our Lady of the Gardens in Altgeld by MOET director Maria B. Cerda was scheduled for August.

By early July, the DCP women interested in tackling the discriminatory behavior of the Chicago Park District (CPD) were also ready to move. Harold Washington, after his late April city council victory, was now able to win approval of two new CPD board members. Washington’s appointees, architect Walter Netsch and African American arts figure Margaret Burroughs—Frank Marshall Davis’s old friend “Flo” in Sex Rebel: Black—would give him a board majority that could sideline CPD superintendent Ed Kelly and transfer his authority to Washington aide Jesse Madison. This would effectively undermine the core of Chicago's traditional Democratic machine, for journalists believed that a thousand of the CPD's thirty-four hundred full-time employees were precinct captains and political operatives, particularly from Kelly's own 47th Ward. When, on June 16, the new board majority did just that, Kelly filed suit challenging the action's legitimacy. In the meantime, on July 2, DCP gave Netsch and Burroughs a tour of disheveled Far South Side parks before they spoke at a DCP community meeting at St. Helena of the Cross. The two new members told DCP to bring a list of needed repairs that CPD staffers had failed to make to the next CPD board meeting on July 10.

The next day a judge upheld the board's removal of Ed Kelly, who lashed out angrily at the mayor. "Washington's ruined this city," Kelly told reporters. "He's going to be gone. We've got to get him out." On July 10, after Obama was already in Los Angeles, St. Helena parishioner Eva Sturgies took charge of DCP's presentation. She had carefully prepared a list of forty-one requests regarding eight different parks that DCP had given to CPD employees two months earlier—and only ten had been completed. At the meeting, Sturgies summarized the disappointing inaction: "The summer is already half over, and we have only seen work done on the most cosmetic aspects" of DCP's list. She indicated that DCP knew, thanks to Freedom of Information Act requests it had submitted, that CPD staffers had not even prepared work orders for the other items. Sturgies said that Far South Side citizens want "the same kind of service that other neighborhoods in the city get."

Four days later, a court ruling reaffirmed the authority of Harold Washington's new appointees, and the next week Ed Kelly surrendered his post, promising, "I don't get angry. I get even." Washington quickly named George Galland, corporation counsel Judson Miner's former law partner, as the Park District's new attorney. Galland announced that thousands of supposed jobs on the CPD's payroll were "blatantly illegal," and vowed to clean house. "It has been one of the most valuable havens for employment by the Democratic organization," Galland tartly commented.

Before Obama left for Los Angeles, he and Jerry Kellman attended a ceremony where Joseph Cardinal Bernardin publicly presented the CHD grants, including the latest $33,000 to DCP for organizing in Altgeld Gardens and for Barack's prospective plan "to improve high school and college opportunities for minority students," a CHD press release noted. Then, following the holiday weekend, Barack left for Los Angeles on Tuesday, July 8.<sup>23</sup>

In the fourteen years following Saul Alinsky's 1972 death, IAF had abandoned its Chicago roots, but attending an IAF training was still a rite of passage even for experienced organizers. Three years earlier Greg Galluzzo, Mary Gonzales, and their younger UNO colleague Danny Solis had taken it thanks to Peter Martinez, and in 1985 UNO's Phil Mullins attended as well. Mount St. Mary's College was IAF's long-standing summer location, with trainees arriving on a Tuesday afternoon. Wednesday was devoted to two basic staples of IAF teaching: "World As Is/World As Should Be 'Power' Session" and "Power and Self-Interest." The 125 or so attendees were divided into groups of about 25, with the IAF's five senior "cabinet members"—Ed Chambers, Ernie Cortes, Mike Gecan, Arnie Graf, and Larry McNeil—rotating among them.

Obama was already familiar with Alinsky's major themes and principles, thanks to Kellman, Kruglik, and the three-day Milwaukee event six months earlier. Ed Chambers, Alinsky's lead inheritor, had articulated them in a small 1978 volume titled Organizing for Family and Congregation. Alinsky's best-known principle was that “power tends to come in two forms: organized people and organized money.” But Alinsky had never fully grasped a second point that was now emphasized by Kellman, Galluzzo, and Chambers: “one of the largest reservoirs of untapped power is the institution of the parish and congregation,” because “they have the people, the values, and the money.”

Mike Gecan acknowledged that Alinsky had failed to “create organizations that endured,” and by 1986 IAF was striving for permanency through growth: “as the number of local churches in the organization increases, the organization becomes increasingly self-sufficient” thanks to each congregation’s financial support. Obama already knew that the number of organizers a group could hire was dependent on its funding. Barack understood how organizers had to prioritize “the finding and developing of a strong collective leadership,” and thanks to the many one-on-ones Kellman had had him conduct, he appreciated how “the single most important element in the interview is the interviewer’s capacity to listen.”

As Jerry and Mike had made clear, it was crucial to “select and engage in battles that can be won,” instead of larger problems—like the closure of Wisconsin Steel—that were obviously insoluble. Resolving small issues would “season people in victory.” Failures sapped morale and enthusiasm, whereas with small victories “a sense of competence and confidence grows.”

For individuals already working as organizers, the ten-day IAF training was “designed to force reflection on what you have done, what you didn’t do, and ways and means of approaching reality and institutions based on a clear understanding of the tension between self-interest and self-sacrifice. The first week is spent in getting people to look at who they are, what their visions are, are they willing to reorganize themselves and their visions.” The first day’s sessions would “force people to reflect and open up to the world as it is against the world as it should be,” and participants read a portion of Viktor Frankl’s famous 1946 book Man’s Search for Meaning. From there, the training explored “the difference between issues and problems” before sessions on “how to spot and develop leaders” and “how to do a power analysis of a particular community.” Next were the more confrontational elements of the Alinsky model: choosing “enemies” and “creating crises.”

The fourth day was devoted to individual meetings between attendees and the IAF trainers. Mike Gecan, who remembered Obama from their brief meeting eighteen months earlier at NYPIRG, was struck by how Barack now seemed “very intellectual, very abstractly intense. He’d be very intense about an idea,” such as identity, but “very detached about the people.” Instead of personalizing a subject, “he’d be lost in the idea,” exhibiting “very little connection” and seemingly “abstracted from relationships and others,” Gecan recalled.

Early in the training, before a session with Arnie Graf, Obama learned from either Gecan or Ernie Cortes that Graf was married to an African American woman and had several interracial children. Graf remembers that Barack sought him out, and from Friday onward, the two had “a series of conversations . . . that were not related to the training. He had lots of questions . . . he’s very curious about interracial relationships and children and how you raise a child.” Graf remembers Obama wanting to know how Arnie felt “as a white person, raising interracial children and being in a solidified marriage.” Barack did not say much about his own childhood, but he wanted to hear about Arnie’s experience: “How do my children see themselves, how do they identify themselves and how do I feel about that and how does my wife feel about it?”

Arnie and his wife Martha had met in graduate school, and by 1986 they had been married for thirteen years and had three children: two boys and a girl, ages ten, seven, and three. Barack wondered how they raised them “to understand who they are?” Arnie replied that given his children’s ages, “I’m not sure how they see themselves quite yet,” but that they knew their racially distinct grandparents well. Barack explained, “People look at me and approach me as an African American, but I don’t have that history” and “I have to develop a way of understanding because that isn’t my experience.” Individuals who did not know Obama viewed him as black, but until he arrived in Chicago, the only African Americans he had really known were Frank Marshall Davis, Keith Kakugawa, and Eric Moore.

Obama and Graf’s initial conversation about race and identity ran close to two hours. Barack’s friend Johnnie Owens was at the training too, and on Saturday afternoon, they went to Will Rogers State Beach to try out the Pacific Ocean. Johnnie was already impressed by Barack’s insistence on some form of exercise “every single day,” and one evening, Obama reproached Owens for eating dessert. Once in the water, Johnnie was astounded by Barack’s self-confidence as a swimmer: “he goes way out there,” Owens remembered. “He’s used to being in that ocean,” as all his Punahou friends could attest. Owens also went along when Obama asked for a tour of some of South Central L.A.’s most gang-infested neighborhoods. “It was a real experience. I was freaked out,” Owens recalls.

In the second week, Obama had another long conversation with Arnie Graf, again focused on “family and race.” But Barack also asked Arnie to talk about his experiences helping build a chapter of CORE, the Congress of Racial Equality, as a college student in Buffalo in the early 1960s. The IAF wanted to add minority organizers to its staff, and Arnie suggested that Barack come work with him in Baltimore. Barack said he had moved around a lot in life and wanted to stay in Chicago: “I have to have some place where I want to be that feels like home.” Graf asked whether Barack envisioned a career as an organizer, and Obama said no. “I’d like to organize for another couple of years, because I think I need to get that under my belt. I need to understand on the ground how to relate.” Then, according to Graf, Obama said he thought he would go to a top law school and become a civil rights lawyer and perhaps a judge, a career his grandmother and mother had repeatedly mentioned to him.

Monday was devoted to analyzing how an Alinsky organization chose an “enemy” and how it could use a confrontation in a way that leads to a relationship with someone who had been ignoring you. “It’s a relational tool, not a tactic,” Mike Gecan explained. “The purpose of polarizing is to get into a relationship and then depolarize it.” Tuesday focused on values and congregations, Wednesday on IAF as an organization. Before the training ended at midday Thursday, Obama spoke again with Arnie Graf and said he had most enjoyed the theoretical basis that underlay the world-as-it-is-versus-the-world-as-it-should-be dialectic, but that he was uncomfortable with how IAF conceptualized enemies and confrontation. Both Graf and Gecan wanted to recruit Barack to IAF, even though they worried that he seemed to grasp everything “more in the intellect than in the gut,” as Graf put it. “There’s something missing here,” Graf thought, because Barack “always seemed one step removed from himself.”<sup>24</sup>

Thursday afternoon Obama flew back to Chicago. It had been an edifying ten days, an experience that underscored how “the key to Alinskyism is a kind of pragmatic rationality” and that an organizer “must be pragmatic and nonideological.” In Chicago, Barack was met by a Tribune front page that announced: “LTV Files for Bankruptcy.” Financial analysts said this “virtually assures” the closure or sale of the mill, and on Saturday, the news turned worse when LTV terminated the medical benefits and life insurance of its more than sixty thousand retired workers nationwide, an action that Local 1033 president Maury Richards denounced as “outrageous and inhuman.” On Tuesday, when reports circulated that U.S. Steel would soon lay off up to two-thirds of the 757 men still employed at South Works, the USW threatened to strike. In quick succession, the USW then struck LTV’s profitable Indiana Harbor mill in East Chicago, but not the East Side plant, where several retired managers who also had lost their health benefits joined Richards and hundreds of 1033 pickets while other colleagues kept the mill running. When a federal bankruptcy judge ordered LTV to restore the retirees’ benefits, the USW terminated its strike, but then two days later struck U.S. Steel, and South Works shut down. The next week LTV announced that it would lay off 1,650 of the 2,300 remaining workers at the East Side mill before the end of the year.

This meant the end for Chicago’s last integrated steel plant. Richards told reporters that many 1033 members “feel helpless and without hope,” a familiar refrain to everyone who had witnessed Wisconsin’s closure six years earlier. Jerry Kellman said LTV’s East Side mill had no future “unless the governor takes action,” but Thompson gave no sign of doing so and Kellman’s outreach to Local 1033 lessened. “It didn’t lead to any lasting working relationship there,” Richards remembered.

The ripple effects were everywhere. A small-business owner in south suburban Dolton who had lost $1,000 when Wisconsin closed in 1980 told the Daily Cal that LTV owed him $8,000 he was unlikely to recoup. At a 1033 meeting, with members anxious that the local would lose its union hall for nonpayment of rent, the official minutes recorded an incident in which one agitated officer “threatened M[aury] Richards with physical harm.” A Chicago Tribune feature story, referring to what had happened at Wisconsin Steel, South Works, and now LTV, described “chilling levels of alcoholism, emotional stress, and physical illness” among the unemployed and their families. There was no denying that over the past six years “the deterioration of the Southeast Side has been catastrophic.” The Daily Cal’s superb steel reporter, Larry Galica, toured the largely silent South Works and pronounced it “a modern ghost town,” and Richards blamed the steel companies’ “failure to reinvest in their facilities to modernize them” as the reason why tens of thousands of people had suffered so traumatically since March 28, 1980.<sup>25</sup>

Amid this latest steel crisis, Harold Washington formally kicked off his reelection campaign before a crowd of four thousand supporters at a Loop hotel. Weeks earlier, in late April, Washington had reiterated his opposition to any new landfills, even though he knew there was no solution to Chicago’s garbage crisis other than finding additional landfill capacity somewhere. In late May he quietly approved what the city insisted was a “reconfiguration,” and not “an expansion,” of the huge CID landfill just east of Altgeld Gardens. Environmental purists like Hazel Johnson were understandably not happy, but a heavy majority of his administration’s Task Force on Solid Waste Management endorsed his action, including IACT’s Mary Ellen Montes.

An even more imminent threat to what remained of the Southeast Side was the disappearance of gainful employment. Washington’s aides reported, “Stores and local businesses are closing down because the only purchases are for bare necessities. The area is becoming blighted and people’s attitudes are of hopelessness.” Additionally, “there is a great need for more police coverage,” since “there are not enough police officers on the street patrolling the neighborhoods.”<sup>26</sup>

In August, Maria Cerda, the director of the Mayor’s Office of Employment and Training (MOET), finally appeared at a community meeting in Altgeld Gardens to respond to DCP’s request that MOET open an office within reasonable travel distance of the Gardens. Obama had prepared Loretta Augustine to chair the meeting, but almost immediately, Cerda became “very aggressive and domineering,” according to Loretta. “I was supposed to introduce the issue, and she tried to take over,” and became openly patronizing, asking Loretta, “Do you even know what we do?” Then, from the back of the room, came Barack’s voice: “Let Loretta speak! We want to hear what Loretta has to say!”

Obama was determined to avoid another breakdown like the Zirl Smith session, so he put aside his own rule about remaining quietly in the background, and this time intervened forcefully if anonymously. Loretta remembered that “people kind of picked it up,” chanting “Let Loretta speak!” In the end, Cerda agreed that MOET would open an office on South Michigan Avenue in central Roseland, a ten-minute bus ride from the Gardens, before the end of November.

By midsummer, Greg Galluzzo and Mary Gonzales were expanding UNO’s reach by linking up with and reactivating the Gamaliel Foundation, founded in the 1960s but long dormant. Greg had been seeking funding for this new vision since early 1986, and he believed that Gamaliel could serve as a training institute that would “generate a flow of leadership for the city’s future.” Mary and Greg saw community organizing as “the way people can move from a sense of helplessness and isolation to active participation in the decisions affecting their lives.” Greg felt that Chicago’s vibrant “movement” activity in earlier years had “distracted people” from pursuing long-lasting change. “Compared to the work of real community organizations, movement activity is much less grounded in communities,” he wrote. By September Greg had raised almost $100,000 for Gamaliel, with the two largest grants—$40,000 and $30,000—coming from the Joyce Foundation and the Woods Fund.

Within UNO, Danny Solis and Phil Mullins wanted to train the parents of Chicago public school students: “Improving the quality of education in Chicago is the city’s greatest challenge and clearest need.” Citing the research of Fred Hess on Chicago dropout rates, Gamaliel noted how “students are simply not prepared to handle high school classes.” By 1986, that represented a bigger problem than ever before. “Ten years ago in S.E. Chicago, a student at Bowen High School could drop out of school and get a job in the steel mills making more money than their teachers.” That world was gone, and “the major obstacle” to improving outcomes for current students “is the ineptness and mismanagement at the Board of Education level.”

Like IAF, Gamaliel would do trainings, and in early August, a one-week course for sixty community group members took place at Techny Towers, a suburban retreat center owned by the Society of the Divine Word. Obama, having the full IAF training to his credit, delivered a presentation there one day, and among those in attendance was Mary Ellen Montes. “Everyone was awed by Barack,” Lena remembered. “I was getting divorced,” and as a single mother with three children, she now had a full-time job at Fiesta Educativa, an advocacy group for disabled Hispanic students. She was immediately taken with the young man three years her junior. “Barack was extremely charismatic,” and she wanted to see more of him. “We talked quite a bit after I met him at Techny Towers,” and with Sheila Jager in California visiting her family, Barack and Lena spent a number of late-summer evenings together in Hyde Park.

“We went out to eat a few times” and “we just enjoyed talking to each other,” Lena recounted. “He was a lot of fun to talk to and we really enjoyed each other’s company.” Obama would remember some intense making-out, while Lena explained, “I’m a passionate person.” What she termed “the relationship/friendship that we had” became a close one as Barack became part of the UNO–Gamaliel network. Greg Galluzzo believed that “the continuing development of community organizing as a profession is mandatory,” and with Gamaliel often bringing its organizers together, Barack and Lena were now professional colleagues as well as intimate friends.<sup>27</sup>

Obama had been in Chicago for more than a year, and it had been a more challenging and instructive period than any other of his life. He had learned a great deal about others and himself. He had bonded with Mike Kruglik, Bill Stenzel, and Tom Kaminski, as well as with DCP leaders, such as Loretta Augustine, Dan Lee, and Cathy Askew. He had also made two good friends around his age: Asif Agha and Johnnie Owens. But more changes were coming.

Jerry was shifting his focus to Gary, after being bruised by the failure of his Regional Employment Network, which could not claim to have placed even one unemployed worker in a meaningful new job. Given what was now transpiring at LTV’s East Side mill and at South Works, jobless workers on Chicago’s Far South Side faced even dimmer prospects for employment in the immediate future. Obama later wrote that Kellman had told him that CCRC’s region-wide aspirations, like DCP’s highly disparate neighborhood composition, were fundamentally ungainly and that he “should have known better.” Jerry asked Barack to come with him to Gary, but Barack said no: “I can’t just leave, Jerry. I just got here.” Kellman warned him, “Stay here and you’re bound to fail. You’ll give up organizing before you give it a real shot,” but Barack stood firm. He saw a fundamental human difference between them. Barack in twelve months had established meaningful emotional bonds with half a dozen or more colleagues, while Jerry, as Obama later wrote, had “made no particular attachments to people or place during his three years in the area.”

Obama also made a personal decision that was unlike anything he ever suggested to Genevieve: he asked Sheila Jager to move in with him. “It all seemed to happen so fast,” she later explained. Earlier in the summer, Barack had renewed his one-year lease on his studio, but it was too small for two people. Johnnie Owens was living with his parents and looking for a place, so Barack suggested he sublet the studio. Sheila had no support apart from her graduate fellowship, but Barack offered to cover the $450-a-month cost of apartment 1-N at 5429 South Harper Avenue, a quiet, tree-lined block of three-story brick buildings.

Sheila thought it was “really spacious,” with a living room, an open study, “a good-sized bedroom,” and a large, eat-in kitchen. “I thought it was a bit plush for a struggling couple,” but with Barack’s $20,000 salary and $100 a month from Sheila toward food and shopping, by early October the young couple had set up house. Barack continued to see both Asif and Johnnie regularly, with Barack taking Johnnie to see a fall exhibit featuring the work of French photojournalist Henri Cartier-Bresson at the Art Institute of Chicago.

Soon after moving in with Sheila, Barack tardily responded to a letter and short story Phil Boerner had sent him. Barack confessed to feeling older, or at least overextended. “Where once I could party, read and write, with a whole day’s worth of activity to spare, I now feel as if I have barely enough time to read the newspaper.” He counseled Phil about writing fiction, recommending that he focus on “the key moment(s) in the story, and build tension leading to those key moments.” He also suggested that Phil “write outside your own experience,” because “I find that this works the fictive imagination harder.” Barack spoke of thinking about and missing Manhattan, “but I doubt I’ll be going back.”

Then he introduced Sheila. “The biggest news on my end is that I have a new girlfriend, with whom I now share an apartment. She’s half-Japanese, half-Dutch, and is a Ph.D. candidate” at the University of Chicago. “Very sweet lady, as busy as I am, and so temperamentally well-suited. Not that there are no strains; I’m not really accustomed to having another person underfoot all the time, and there are moments when I miss the solitude of a bachelor’s life. On the other hand, winter’s fast approaching, and it is nice to have someone to come home to after a late night’s work. Compromises, compromises.”

Obama’s pose that fear of cold temperatures underlay his desire that Sheila and he live together downplayed his own decision and initiative. Then he updated Phil on how DCP was now becoming a freestanding organization, “which gives me no one to directly answer to and control over my own schedule. But the downside is that I shoulder the responsibility of making something work that may not be able to work. The scope of the problems here—25 percent unemployment; 40 percent high school drop out rate; infant mortality on a par with Haiti—is daunting; and I often feel impotent to initiate anything with major impact. Nevertheless, I plan to plug away at it at least until the end of 1987. After that, I’ll have to make a judgment as to whether I’ve got the patience and determination necessary for this line of work.”<sup>28</sup>

The breakup of CCRC, with DCP and the South Suburban Action Conference (SSAC) taking its place, coincided with Leo Mahon leaving St. Victor. He had announced seven months earlier his September departure, and he had felt his energy flagging before that. In one of his last pastoral letters, Leo addressed the LTV and South Works news in words that echoed across the previous six years. “Catholic social teaching insists that the workers have first right to the fruits of their labor,” in line with “the Christian principle that workers, not money, come first.” Corporations should put “human concerns ahead of profit and dividends,” but LTV and U.S. Steel had made “clear that power and profit are both more important than people and jobs.” Leo’s advice was the same as in 1980: “let us translate our concern and our outrage into protest and into political action.”<sup>29</sup>

Following Kellman’s shift to Gary, Greg Galluzzo took on a formal mentoring role to Obama by becoming DCP’s “consultant.” He introduced Barack to a young tax attorney, Mary-Ann Wilson, who at no charge—“pro bono”—would handle the state and federal paperwork necessary to establish DCP, like UNO before it, as an independent, nonprofit corporation.

Illinois, like the Internal Revenue Service, required a bevy of forms and submissions that Barack and DCP members would spend a good portion of that fall completing and signing. A set of bylaws was copied and updated from an earlier version Kellman had drafted in 1984. Illinois articles of incorporation required three directors—Dan Lee, Loretta Augustine, and Tom Kaminski were named—as well as a registered agent. Barack, as “project director,” left blank the space asking for his middle name. A separate, full-fledged board of directors listed Dan as president, Loretta as vice president, and Marlene Dillard as treasurer, along with everyone who was active in DCP: Cathy Askew, Yvonne Lloyd, Nadyne Griffin, Eva Sturgies, and Aletha Gibson, plus several women who had signed in at a meeting or two but not reappeared.

Simultaneous to his work with Mary-Ann Wilson, Barack was conducting one-evening-a-week training for DCP members at Holy Rosary, while also drafting his own initial grant applications. The trainings, informed by what he had learned during his ten days with IAF, involved DCP veterans such as Dan Lee and Betty Garrett plus relative newcomers such as Aletha Strong Gibson. They also attracted new faces such as Loretta’s neighbor Margaret Bagby and Aletha’s close friend Ann West, a white Australian whose husband was black and president of the PTA at Turner-Drew Elementary School.

Another important PTA figure, Isabella Waller, president of the regional Southwest Council, brought along her best friend, Deloris Burnam. Ernest Powell Jr., the politically savvy president of the Euclid Park neighborhood association and someone Barack had recruited over the summer, came as well. Close to twenty people attended the weekly sessions, at which Barack always took off his watch and put it on the table so he could see it during the training.

For Obama, the grant applications were a major concern. The first would go to Ken Rolling and Jean Rudd at the Woods Fund, which he hoped would renew the $30,000 given to CCRC for DCP in 1986. The ten-page, single-spaced document offered a retrospective account of the past fourteen months, and made clear, as he had stressed previously, that the Far South Side's "two most pressing problems" were a "lack of jobs, and lack of educational opportunity." Obama had one especially audacious goal for 1987: a "Career Education Network to serve the entire Far South Side area—a comprehensive and coordinated system of career guidance and counseling for high school age youth" with "a centralized counseling office" augmenting in-school counselors so as to reduce the dropout rate and channel more black high school graduates into higher education. "Youth in the area," he warned, "are slipping behind their parents in educational achievement."

Obama already knew that to build DCP two types of expansion were necessary: an outreach to congregations beyond the Roman Catholic base that Kellman had developed and the recruitment of more block club and PTA members like Eva Sturgies, Aletha Strong Gibson, Ann West, and Ernie Powell. DCP's neighborhoods, from Altgeld northward to Roseland, West Pullman, and even solidly middle-class Washington Heights, were ill served by their elected officials, who "have generally poured their efforts into conventional political campaigns, with almost no concrete results for area residents." Obama spoke of the need to "dramatize problems through the media and through direct action," but DCP's most pressing need was funds to hire another African American organizer. He realized a $10,000 entry-level salary would not attract experienced candidates, so DCP's proposed 1987 budget called for $20,000 for that position and an increase in Barack's salary to $25,000.

Ken and Jean at the Woods Fund told Barack to introduce himself to Anne Hallett, the new director of the small Wieboldt Foundation, whose interests closely paralleled those of Woods, and also to consider applying to the larger MacArthur Foundation. Obama visited and spoke with Hallett in November, and soon thereafter a front-page story in the Chicago Defender highlighted MacArthur's announcement of $2.4 million in grants to community organizations, including $16,000 to Frank Lumpkin's Save Our Jobs Committee. Before the year's end, Obama submitted to Wieboldt a formal request for $10,000 that was virtually identical to the one he had sent Woods. Boasting that DCP was "an organization equal to any grass-roots effort going on in Chicago's Black community right now," Obama admitted that his employment and educational opportunities agenda represented "an ambitious program." He said DCP needed "about two years" to recruit enough churches to be self-sustaining, and he told Hallett that DCP would soon reach out to MacArthur too.<sup>30</sup>

The Far South Side's two most notable developments in fall 1986 were both environmental. In late September, Waste Management Incorporated withdrew its long-pending application to open a new landfill west of South Torrence Avenue and would instead target the 140-acre O'Brien Locks site on the west bank of the Little Calumet River, surrounded on three sides by WMI's huge CID landfill. UNO treated this news as a huge victory, infuriating environmental activists Hazel Johnson and Vi Czachorski, whose Altgeld Gardens and Hegewisch neighborhoods were just west and east of the O'Brien site. Johnson and Czachorski's organizations, along with Marian Byrnes, formed a new antidumping alliance, Citizens United to Reclaim the Environment (CURE). Together with Sierra Club members, CURE organized a well-covered protest outside City Hall. As officials continued to seek the least bad solution to Chicago's looming landfill crisis, UNO and CURE would be on opposite sides wherever the battle line was drawn. A few weeks later, 10th Ward alderman Ed Vrdolyak, a nemesis of Harold Washington as well as UNO, threw his support behind CURE.

That dispute seemed mild compared to a front-page headline in the October 25 Chicago Tribune: "South Side Facility Burning 'Superwaste.'" The incinerator at 117th Street and Stony Island Avenue, little more than a mile from South Deering's Bright Elementary School to the north and Altgeld Gardens to the southwest, was one of just five nationwide that was licensed to burn highly toxic PCBs. Although a front-page 1985 Wall Street Journal story ominously headlined "Plants That Incinerate Poisonous Wastes Run Into a Host of Problems" had cited the plant's location, neither UNO nor most anyone else in Chicago had taken note that it was operating close to capacity, burning more than twenty thousand gallons of PCBs seven days a week. Experts agreed that incineration was much better than burial, but neither Illinois EPA nor Chicago officials had objected to this facility's location.

In early November, United Neighborhood Organization held its annual dinner at an East Side banquet hall. Frank Lumpkin was one of two honorees, and the guest speaker was George Munoz, the new young president of the Chicago Board of Education. Newspaper photographs showed two of Chicago's most promising Hispanic political stars—Munoz and Maria Elena Montes, as Lena's name now sometimes appeared—seated on the dais. UNO and Gamaliel's expansion had elevated Danny Solis to UNO's executive director and Southeast Side organizer Phil Mullins to a supervisory role, and in Mullins's stead, Bruce Orenstein, a young IAF veteran who knew Greg Galluzzo, took charge of UNO's Southeast Side work.<sup>31</sup>

As Barack was drawn into Greg Galluzzo's UNO and Gamaliel network, one Gamaliel board member, John McKnight, stood out as the most intellectually intriguing voice at the regular gatherings, where most participants adopted a macho tone. Throughout the mid-1980s, McKnight had continued the same powerful themes he had voiced in earlier years. "Through the propagation of belief in authoritative expertise, professionals cut through the social fabric of community and sow clienthood where citizenship once grew," he told one audience while warning of the danger that "a nation of clients" posed to a democratic state. In an article entitled "Community Organizing in the '80s: Toward a Post-Alinsky Agenda," McKnight and his younger colleague Jody Kretzmann declared that "a number of the classic Alinsky strategies and tactics are in need of critical revision." Rather than confronting some "enemy," the emphasis should be on "developing a neighborhood's own capacities to do for itself what outsiders will or can no longer do." The focus should shift public dollars away from salaries for service providers to investment in "local productive capacities" that will strengthen rather than weaken communities.

A year earlier, in November 1985, Chicago Magazine—a monthly not easily mistaken for a social policy journal—had devoted six glossy pages to a lengthy interview with McKnight. In the article, he said Chicagoans needed to recognize that "the industrial sector of America has abandoned us," and that a new future loomed. "We're turning out young people from universities right and left who really are looking for something to do. In the elite universities what do we offer them? We offer them the chance to become lawyers.” On the other hand, a sizable population of heavily dependent poor people was necessary to support the “glut” of professional servicers “who ride on their backs.” Public funds should be used to employ low-income people rather than pay servicers to patronize them. “To the degree that the War on Poverty attempted to provide services in lieu of power or income, it failed,” McKnight argued. “Poor people are poor in power.” For poor Chicagoans to become citizens rather than clients, “shifting income out of the service sector into economic opportunity for poor people is absolutely essential.”

In early 1986 McKnight wrote in the Tribune that instead of subsidizing medical behemoths, local health dollars should be directed toward “creating neighborhood jobs that provide decent incomes for local people.” In a subsequent interview, he decried “a society focused on building on people’s weaknesses,” one that emphasized “deficiency rather than capacity.” Service professionals’ control over the lives of the poor magnified rather than alleviated their poverty, for “if you are nothing but a client, you have the most degraded status our society will provide.”

Health services were the most dire problem, and publicly funded “medical insurance systematically misdirects public wealth from income to the poor to income to medical professionals.” Yet change would be difficult because “many institutional leaders” had come to see communities as nothing more than “collections of parochial, inexpert, uninformed, and biased people” who understood their own needs far less well than did service professionals. “Institutionalized systems grow at the expense of communities,” and America’s “essential problem is weak communities.”

John McKnight’s influence on people exposed to his social vision was profound even if unobtrusive. Ellen Schumer, a fellow Gamaliel board member and UNO veteran, said that within the world of Chicago organizing, McKnight “really challenged the old model.” His impact was also felt throughout Chicago’s progressive foundations, with Wieboldt acknowledging that it was “fortunate to have John McKnight join us” at the board’s annual retreat “to talk about the substantive changes in Chicago neighborhoods today that require new strategies for organizers.”<sup>32</sup>

If McKnight was Chicago’s most significant social critic, the front pages of the December 3, 1986, editions of all three Chicago daily newspapers announced another: G. Alfred “Fred” Hess, a little-known policy analyst, education researcher, and former Methodist minister. After completing a Ph.D. in educational anthropology at Northwestern University in 1980, with a dissertation on a village development project in western India, Hess had joined the foundation-funded Chicago Panel on Public School Finances, and in 1983 he succeeded Anne Hallett as executive director.

Hess had made the front pages of Chicago’s daily papers nineteen months earlier thanks to a lengthy study entitled “Dropouts from the Chicago Public Schools: An Analysis of the Classes of 1982–1983–1984.” The Chicago Sun-Times had summarized Hess’s findings in a boldface banner headline: “School Dropout Rate Nearly 50 Percent!” His discovery that 43 percent of students who had entered Chicago high schools in September 1978 dropped out prior to graduation was a percentage that Obama had accurately cited a year earlier when he had written to Phil Boerner about the worst ills plaguing the neighborhoods where he worked. Hess’s data readily showed that high schools with predominantly minority populations had a dropout rate as high as 63 percent.

One Tribune story highlighted how at one Roseland high school, remaining in school did not mean students were studying. “We were sitting at a lunch table in the cafeteria rolling joints one morning,” a seventeen-year-old girl told reporter Jean Latz Griffin. “There was a security guard right next to us, but he didn't say anything. People smoke it anywhere. Some teachers say 'Put it out,' but no one really does anything. You can't snort coke inside school though. That would be too obvious." Out of Corliss High School's eighteen hundred students, only forty-eight were taking physics, only seventeen had qualified for the school's first-ever calculus class, and almost 50 percent were enrolled in remedial English. A report similar to Hess's, from a parallel research enterprise, Donald Moore's Designs for Change, revealed that only three hundred out of the sixty-seven hundred students who had entered Chicago's eighteen most disadvantaged high schools in 1980 had been able to read at a twelfth-grade level if they graduated in 1984.

In a prominent Tribune feature four weeks before Obama arrived in Chicago, Hess had warned that Chicago Public Schools (CPS) were damaging the city's future. "We are in danger of creating a permanent underclass that is uneducated and unable to advance. It means a set of neighborhoods in which the majority of people are constantly unemployed and a strain on the social system in welfare and the high cost of crime. If we don't take strong action now, we'll pay for it later." Don Moore emphasized how job losses were magnifying the consequences of CPS's failures. "Parents are feeling a real desperation now because they are seeing unskilled jobs disappearing . . . 20 years ago the manufacturing industries in Chicago didn't depend on employees being terribly literate. The economy has changed." Former Illinois state education superintendent Michael Bakalis wondered to the Tribune why "the general community of Chicago, particularly the business community, has not been absolutely outraged by the performance of the Chicago Public Schools." In July 1986, Hess told Crain's Chicago Business that the way to reform public schools was to develop "real power for local citizens to control their local schools. Let local citizens hold local school officials accountable for the effectiveness of their schools. This would be real and significant decentralization of power that could make a difference."

Illinois state law mandated that high school students receive at least three hundred minutes of daily instruction. Beginning in spring 1986, Hess's Chicago Panel discovered that many Chicago high schools had fictional "study hall" classes in their students' otherwise skimpy schedules that created a false paper trail to meet that requirement. The resulting report, "Where's Room 185?," released on December 2, created an immediate uproar. The Tribune editorialized that CPS "administrators are deliberately and illegally cheating students of part of the education to which they are entitled." It also showed that in an overwhelming majority of actual classes, teachers actively taught for less than half of the class period. Noting how recently promoted CPS superintendent Manford Byrd's response was to "hunker down and criticize the design of the study," the Tribune declared that it was "inexcusable that it took an outside research panel" to uncover CPS's "fundamental failure."

The Chicago Defender ran a prominent page-three story, "Dropout Rate Irks Parents," publicizing DCP's desire to meet with board of education president George Munoz to discuss the problem. "We have a lot of dropouts," DCP project director Barack Obama told the Defender. "We acknowledge that the dropout question is complicated, and there are no quick fixes to keep kids in school. We are urging Munoz to study the counseling system, recommend changes, and expand the numbers. This will have a direct effect on kids in the schools now." Obama also said that students' preparation prior to their high school years should be examined, "because there are a lot of possibilities out there."<sup>33</sup>

In addition, two public controversies highlighted Altgeld Gardens residents' problems with both the CPS and the CHA. On December 4, one day after "Where's Room 185?" debuted in Chicago newspapers, the Defender's Chinta Strausberg reported on six teachers at the Wheatley Child-Parent Center who had transferred to other schools because they feared that Wheatley was permeated with asbestos. Superintendent Byrd insisted that tests had shown the air at Wheatley was “safe,” but Wheatley parents threatened to boycott the school and demanded an immediate inspection. On December 15 just 37 of Wheatley’s 377 young children attended school, and for the next two days that number dropped to 17 and then 11. One parent told the Tribune, “We can’t help but notice that the kids go to school all week and come home with rashes and wheezes. When they are home for the weekend, it all clears up.”

The boycott continued until the Christmas–New Year’s break, but being “home” at Altgeld was no picnic either, as a Tribune series detailing what it called the CHA’s “national reputation for mismanagement” documented. “If I had a job, I wouldn’t be here. This is not a good place to raise kids,” one young Altgeld mother told the newspaper while complaining about the prevalence of youth gangs. Two days later the Tribune reported that Zirl Smith was resigning as CHA executive director, and the next day’s paper emphasized how “Chicago has used the CHA as a way to isolate blacks.”

When news broke that administrative ineptitude had cost CHA $7 million in federal aid, CHA’s board chairman resigned as well. Fifteen months would pass before asbestos removal finally began in some 575 Altgeld homes, almost two years after Smith’s tumultuous visit to the Gardens. Harold Washington’s press secretary, Al Miller, later recounted the mayor remarking that “he didn’t believe there was a solution” to the CHA’s profound problems.<sup>34</sup>

Shortly before Christmas, Barack Obama and Sheila Jager flew to San Francisco to spend a holiday week at her parents’ home in Santa Rosa. Although they had been living together for hardly four months, their relationship had quickly become one of deep commitment—indeed, so deep that for several weeks they had been discussing getting married during the trip to California.

Asif Agha had watched their relationship grow. Over the previous sixteen months, Asif had seen “Barry”—as he alone called Obama—acclimate to Chicago. “We were kind of an anchor point for each other,” and “Barry” spoke frankly to Asif about his acculturation. “I am the kind of well-spoken black man that white organization leaders love to give money to,” Asif remembered Obama remarking. Asif saw Obama with the eyes, and ears, of a linguistic anthropologist. “In terms of his performed demeanor, diction, speech style, he was white, not black,” Asif observed. Obama was open enough with Asif for him to know that Barack’s significant girlfriends prior to Sheila had been white, and Asif appreciated the underlying duality of Obama’s Chicago experience. His weekday work in Altgeld and Greater Roseland immersed him in African American life in a way that no prior experiences ever had, but in Hyde Park, his home life with Sheila and their occasional socializing with other anthropology graduate students was entirely multiethnic and international, just like his Punahou and Pakistani diaspora life had been in Honolulu, Eagle Rock, and New York.

Asif Agha. Eunhee Kim Yi. Arjun Guneratne. Their names alone, just like Sheila Miyoshi Jager, highlighted their international and ethnic diversity. Tania Forte was Egyptian, Jewish, and had grown up in France. Chin See Ming was born and raised in Malaysia before graduating with honors from Rice University in Houston. It was a “very, very cosmopolitan” group, Ming recalled, and when Sheila one day introduced Ming to Barack, I “just assumed he was a graduate student.”

For Sheila and her classmates, the first two years of the graduate anthropology program were “like boot camp,” Ming explained. Everyone had to take a double-credit introductory course called Sociocultural Systems, taught by Marshall Sahlins, a prominent anthropologist but “not a warm and cuddly person” and indeed “a very, very scary man” to some. Sheila coped far better with Sahlins than most of her classmates, and in her dissertation she wrote that “my greatest intellectual debt” was to Sahlins. “There was a very strong esprit de corps among the grad students” and “people worked very hard,” Ming recalled. “You were never off,” and everyone knew that student attrition would reach 50 percent.

Asif knew Sheila as “a very wonderful, wonderful person,” someone who was “passionate” about her work as well as her relationship with Barack. One evening the three of them accompanied Asif’s girlfriend Tammy Hamlish to a talk that her aunt Florence Hamlish Levinsohn, an outspoken local writer, was giving. Three years earlier Levinsohn had published a “patchy, parochial, frankly admiring” biography of her university classmate Harold Washington just after his election as mayor. Tammy had wanted Asif to meet Aunt Florence, but the evening quickly devolved into an unmitigated disaster. Asif remembered that he “started giggling at what the lady was saying, and Barry and I made eye contact, and that was fatal, because then for the next ten minutes we kept uncontrollably giggling and couldn’t control it and almost falling off our chairs because what the lady was saying was just absurd. And neither of us could control it, and because we were sitting next to each other and kept making eye contact, we’re triggering each other over and over and over. Tammy meanwhile is turning red,” and Levinsohn took note of their behavior too. She “was most upset” and “Tammy was mortified,” Asif recalled.

Apart from that embarrassing scene, Barack and Sheila were familiar faces at anthropology graduate students’ occasional parties. Sheila Quinlan, a Reed College graduate who was a year ahead of Sheila, remembered how “everyone thought they were a very sincere couple.” Barack was “quiet,” “friendly,” and “a sweet boy.” Indeed, as Chin See Ming put it, Barack “fit into the scene,” just as he likewise had learned to do in Roseland and even down in the Gardens. Jerry Kellman watched as Obama comfortably embraced his dual lives. “He found a way to be part of the black community and live beyond the black community,” Kellman explained. “He discovered he could live in both worlds.”<sup>35</sup>

But in December 1986, and for almost two years thereafter, the looming and overarching question was whether Barack Obama could live in both worlds with Sheila Miyoshi Jager as his wife. Five months earlier, before asking Sheila to live with him, he had inquisitively questioned Arnie Graf about the long-term dynamics of interracial marriage and raising half-black, half-white children. And although most passersby and even most anthropology students would not see them in such a way, Sheila knew that “Barack is as much white as I am.” With her half-Japanese ancestry paralleling his half-Kenyan, she and Barack were equally white—one half apiece.

“Marriage was THE vital issue between us and we talked about it all the time,” Sheila explained more than two decades later. Barack “kept work matters and his private life separate,” so their marriage conversations, while known to Asif, were not something Kellman, Kruglik, Tom Kaminski, or Cathy Askew ever heard about from someone so “very private” as Obama. In their time alone together, Sheila saw someone whom no one in DCP ever did, someone with a “deep seated need to be loved and admired.” In their evenings at the spacious apartment on South Harper, Barack read literature, not history, while Sheila had more than enough course readings to occupy her time. And, of course, there was another dimension as well. Barack “is a very sexual/sensual person, and sex was a big part of our relationship,” Sheila later acknowledged.

Everything had come together fast. In “the winter of ’86, when we visited my parents, he asked me to marry him,” Sheila recounted. Mike Dees, her father’s closest friend and Sheila’s virtual uncle, had been told by Bernd in advance that Barack was a prospective son-in-law. “He and Sheila . . . were going to get married,” Dees explained. “They were coming out, they wanted to get married, and so they called me to come up and look the guy over and see what I think.”

One day right after Christmas Mike drove up to Santa Rosa, and “I ended up with Barack for an afternoon,” he recalled. “We just visited.” Barack was clearly a “very bright guy,” and, complexion aside, came across like “a white, middle-class kid.” Then, after dinner, Bernd and Mike had “a big political thing with Barack” while Sheila and her mother Shinko were occupied elsewhere. The two older men and Barack found themselves on “completely opposite sides of the fence,” Mike explained, because “we’re both conservative Republicans.” Barack “kind of thought he was going to lecture to us” about politics and ideology, “and we kind of shot him down.” It got “really heated” and “went on for quite a while.” Barack seemed “very taken aback by it,” Mike recalled. “Barack kind of thought he was going to sit down and get anointed. He’s very self-centered, and he ended up getting beat up.”

Although Barack “didn’t do very well,” to Mike “it was just a political argument. I think to the father and Barack it was more than that,” indeed, much more. “For Barack it was a big deal, for Bernd it was a big deal,” because Barack “was going to be the chosen one that night, and it didn’t work out” that way. It was readily apparent that the older man was sitting in judgment on the younger, perhaps not so differently from the time twenty-five years earlier when Stan Dunham had first met Barack Obama Sr. But here the verdict was negative, not positive. “I don’t know whether his color entered into the picture or not,” Dees said about Bernd’s attitude toward Barack.

By the end of the evening, and again the next morning, Bernd made his view of Barack and his marriage proposal crystal clear. “Bernd was against it,” because he felt that Barack was unworthy of his daughter’s hand. Sheila remembers that “my father was concerned over his ‘lack of prospects’ and wondered whether, as a community organizer, he could even support me, something that deeply offended Barack. My mom liked Barack a lot, but simply said I was too young” to get married. “I went along with their judgment, basically saying ‘Not yet,’” she recalled. The unsettling holiday visit concluded, and “they ended up going back without getting married,” Mike Dees affirmed.

Barack and Sheila would revisit that decision again and again over the twenty months that lay ahead.<sup>36</sup>

During the first week of January 1987, Gamaliel held a three-day retreat for its seventeen organizers, plus Ken Rolling from Woods, at a Holiday Inn in south suburban Matteson. More important, Obama was now meeting for at least an hour a week, one on one, with Greg Galluzzo to talk about his Developing Communities Project work. Greg’s monthly calendar recorded the regularity of their discussions: Thursday morning, January 15; Wednesday lunchtime, the 21st; Friday morning, the 30th. On Wednesday, February 4, they spoke for two and a half hours; on Monday, February 9, for two more. Wednesday, the 11th, Greg came to Barack’s apartment; Tuesday, the 17th, they met for another ninety minutes—ten hours of conversation in just thirty days.

As anyone who knew Galluzzo would testify, he was so intense that no discussion with him ever devolved into idle chitchat. Deeply committed to his belief that “the essence of organizing is the transformation of the person” into someone who was “serious about being a power person in the public arena,” Greg’s self-confidence and challenging interpersonal style was robust indeed. True to the Alinsky tradition, Greg's insistence that people unapologetically seek power for themselves was completely nonideological and entirely pragmatic: "Find out what people want," he said, "and then we'll decide what we're going to do about it." He also agreed with the Alinsky tradition of avoiding insoluble "problems" while constantly searching out winnable "issues." Greg knew it was essential to "learn politics as the art of the possible." He believed that, properly taught, "community organizers are pragmatists" who firmly appreciate that "in 99 percent of the cases the end does justify the means." In addition, an Alinsky organizer assumed a dual public and private life. As one veteran put it, "you compartmentalize life and then it allows your consciousness to go to the beach."<sup>37</sup>

On the Far South Side, parents in Altgeld Gardens, aided by Barack, maintained their boycott of the Wheatley Child-Parent Center until January 20, when the CPS provided documentation that no asbestos had been found in the school. The boycott energized Altgeld residents' interest in Hazel Johnson's People for Community Recovery, and Mayor Washington spoke at a PCR meeting that drew several hundred people. The Tribune reported a new U.S. Environmental Protection Agency study that had found that "more than 20,000 tons of 38 toxic chemicals are emitted into the air each year in the Lake Calumet region on the Southeast Side." The Daily Calumet reported that Waste Management's 1986 quarterly earnings were up an astonishing 349 percent, and a WMI representative, Mary Ryan, had quietly begun speaking with interested parties about WMI's desire to add the O'Brien Locks site as an adjoining landfill to its huge CID dump just east of Altgeld. Ryan spoke first with Bruce Orenstein, UNO's new Southeast Chicago organizer, and Mary Ellen Montes. "Waste Management would be very willing to bring benefits to the community, gifts to the community, for your acquiescence, your agreement to allow us to dump there," Orenstein remembers Ryan explaining. He and Lena were intrigued by Ryan's offer but wanted to ponder what dollar amount would be appropriate and how such a sum should be managed and invested. Ryan also called on George Schopp at St. Kevin, Dominic Carmon at Our Lady of the Gardens, Hazel Johnson of PCR, civic activists ranging from Marian Byrnes to Foster Milhouse, and Obama on behalf of DCP. In mid-February Lena, Bruce, Hazel, and Barack met to discuss how to respond to WMI's bold initiative.<sup>38</sup>

But Obama's top priority in early 1987 was recruiting supporters for his Career Education Network. In addition to Dan Lee, Aletha Strong Gibson, and Isabella Waller, the three DCP members most interested in the proposal, he also discussed his idea with four people he already knew: Dr. Alma Jones, the indomitable principal of Carver Primary School in Altgeld; John McKnight, whom he was getting to know well through Gamaliel; Anne Hallett of the Wieboldt Foundation, with whom he had spoken in November and who had given DCP a $7,500 grant; and John Ayers, a close friend of Ken Rolling's who had observed DCP's "Let Loretta speak!" meeting with Maria Cerda and worked for the prestigious Commercial Club. McKnight and/or Hallett suggested that Barack approach Fred Hess, and Hess recommended that Barack introduce himself to Gwendolyn LaRoche, the education director of the Chicago Urban League. LaRoche scheduled a thirty-minute appointment, but her conversation with the "very polite young man" lasted "about two hours." LaRoche explained that much of the federal and state funding that was supposed to go to schools with high concentrations of poor students was instead being spent on administrative jobs at CPS headquarters. "Barack was very much interested in" how "our kids were being cheated" by CPS, Gwen LaRoche Rogers recalled years later. The Urban League was already sponsoring after-school tutoring programs in churches, an approach that would fit perfectly with DCP's congregational base.

Obama reached out as well to Homer D. Franklin at Olive-Harvey, a fifteen-year-old community college just north of 103rd Street that was named for two African American Medal of Honor recipients, and to George Ayers at Chicago State University, on the south side of 95th Street. Olive-Harvey would be crucial to Barack's hope of establishing a job-training program focused upon public aid recipients and especially Altgeld Gardens residents. DCP also won board of education president George Munoz's agreement that CPS counseling specialists would cooperate with DCP's effort.

Obama would later say that his Far South Side work was inspired by what he knew about the history of the black freedom struggle during the 1950s and 1960s, and in late January 1987, Chicago's public television station, WTTW, joined in the nationwide PBS broadcast of the six-part landmark documentary series Eyes on the Prize on Wednesday evenings at 9:00 P.M. These first six episodes covered only the years from 1954 to 1965—a second set of eight programs three years later would include an episode focusing on Chicago's own 1965–1967 Freedom Movement—but the Defender and the Tribune publicized and praised the early 1987 Eyes telecasts. The Defender also accorded a full-page headline to a review of a new biography of Martin Luther King Jr., calling the book “a magnificent and unvarnished study” based upon “exhaustive research.” Written by one of Eyes' three senior advisers, the book devoted the better part of two long chapters to King's role in the Chicago Freedom Movement. Those chapters highlighted how one particular Chicago civil rights activist, thirty-two-year-old schoolteacher Al Raby, had convinced King to come to Chicago and had been at his side throughout every day of the 1966 campaign.

In subsequent years, Raby played a significant role in the 1970 revision of Illinois's state constitution before running unsuccessfully for 5th Ward alderman in Hyde Park. Eight years later, Harold Washington's top political adviser, Jacky Grimshaw, persuaded Washington to name Raby his campaign manager for his successful 1983 primary campaign against incumbent mayor Jane Byrne. But as Raby's longtime closest friend, Steve Perkins, later explained, “Al and Harold just didn't have good chemistry” and indeed “rarely communicated.” Once Washington triumphed, Raby was “moved aside” and “totally marginalized.” Raby ran for Washington's now-vacant congressional seat, but the new mayor backed labor veteran Charles Hayes, and Raby's loss seemingly left him with “no future in Chicago.” He accepted the number two post at Project VOTE!, a trailblazing voter registration organization, and moved to Washington, D.C.

Eighteen months later, in early 1985, Raby returned to Chicago after Jacky Grimshaw convinced Harold Washington to name him as the new head of the city's Commission on Human Relations. But Al Raby was no one's bureaucrat. Instead, as Steve Perkins would emphasize, notwithstanding how Al was “an intensely private person,” he was also “a continual talent scout, always looking for new activists with special gifts.” Judy Stevens, Raby's deputy at the commission, also watched as “he mentored people.” By early 1987 Al was living in Hyde Park with Patty Novick, who two decades earlier had introduced Al and Steve.

One morning Obama joined Patty and Al for breakfast, and soon after, Al called Steve: “he wanted me to come have breakfast with Barack, and so we had breakfast at Mellow Yellow,” a well-known Hyde Park eatery. “Barack was fabulous. He was smart, he was articulate—it was a joy to meet him,” Steve remembered. Patty recalled how “I want you to talk to” was one of Al's favorite phrases, and one day in early 1987 Raby took Barack to City Hall and introduced him to Jacky Grimshaw, who was serving as Washington's director of intergovernmental affairs. According to Jane Ramsey, the mayor's director of community relations, "Al was all over the place," and Grimshaw can picture Barack that day: "he was a kid," although a "very serious" one. But Raby was far more influenced by his experiences with King than by city politics. "Al was determined to create a base for a long-term movement," Steve Perkins emphasizes.<sup>39</sup>

In early 1987, Harold Washington's aides were focused on his reelection, and Jane Byrne was mounting a stiff challenge in the upcoming Democratic primary. The mayor's employment aide Maria Cerda had made a point of renting a portion of Local 1033's East Side union hall as a new jobs-referral site. Maury Richards said that income "was just totally instrumental in keeping us afloat" and "at a critical time." Soon Richards was put on the city's payroll part-time, allowing him to hold the local union together while also staffing the Dislocated Worker Program. Washington needed all the votes he could get in Southeast Side precincts, and Maury was deeply thankful to Washington, whom he described as "a great guy." Eight days before the election, steel was poured at South Works for the first time in seven months, another small victory for South Side steelworkers.

Just before midnight on February 25, Byrne conceded defeat after mounting a "powerful challenge" to Washington, whose 53.5 to 46.3 percent victory "was much closer than the mayor's strategists had been counting on," the Tribune reported the next day. But the headline "Mayor's Tight Win Just Half the Battle" pointed to the April 7 general election, when Washington would face two white Democrats running as independents: Cook County assessor Tom Hynes, a relative "Mr. Clean" by Chicago standards, and 10th Ward alderman Ed Vrdolyak, the mayor's worst nemesis. Fewer white voters had turned out to support Byrne than had voted against Washington in 1983, though the mayor's own white support had barely risen from four years earlier. A larger, more heavily white electorate was possible on April 7, but Washington was "a heavy favorite" as long as both Hynes and Vrdolyak remained in the race.<sup>40</sup>

On the Far South Side, Obama was trying to generate more grassroots support for his Career Education Network idea. Five high schools drew students from major portions of DCP's neighborhoods: Harlan at 96th Street and South Michigan Avenue, Corliss on East 103rd Street, Julian at 103rd and South Elizabeth in Washington Heights, Fenger on South Wallace Street at 112th Street, and Carver down in Altgeld Gardens. Barack and a number of DCP's most active members, including Dan Lee and Adrienne Jackson, began staging modest street corner demonstrations near the troubled high schools to draw attention to the schools' horrible dropout rates, especially among young black men. One morning that spring, they held a rally on busy 111th Street a block north of Fenger, where one year earlier a Defender photo of the school's top academic achievers had pictured one dozen African American women. Among the passersby was Illinois state senator Emil Jones Jr., whose office was less than two blocks away. "I stopped to see what they were out there for," Jones later explained. He knew Adrienne Jackson, and she introduced Jones to Obama. "Barack was part of the group," Jones recalled. "I met him on the corner." But Jones was not happy to see protesters just down from the 34th Ward headquarters. "You have a lot to learn," he told Adrienne and Barack. "You'll get more flies with honey than you will the way you all are doing this."

Jones viewed them as an "in-your-face type of group," but invited them to his office, where they laid out their dropout prevention goals, and particularly Obama's hope of winning state funding for his Career Education Network. Jones thought Obama was "very bright and intelligent and very sincere" but also “very aggressive and somewhat pushy.” More seriously, Jones thought Obama “was naive as related to the political situation.” He did not know that in most any Chicago ward organization, real power was with the ward committeeman, who often doubled as alderman, and not with state legislators, even one with the grand title of senator. In addition, the Illinois legislature was made up of two very separate chambers.

“We can work together,” Jones told Obama, but “you haven’t got a deal on the House side” until a supportive state representative was recruited. But with Jones’s backing, Barack now had a significant state political figure, in addition to Al Raby’s City Hall connections.<sup>41</sup>

But still Obama’s biggest challenge was expanding DCP’s base beyond Roman Catholic parishes like Holy Rosary and St. Catherine and PTA groups from middle-class Washington Heights. His first significant recruit was Rev. Rick Williams, the Panamanian-born pastor of Pullman Christian Reformed Church (PCRC) on East 103rd Street. PCRC had been founded in 1972 as a “mission” church when Roseland’s four long-standing Christian Reformed churches left the neighborhood in the wake of its rapid racial turnover. Williams arrived at PCRC in 1981, and by early 1987 PCRC possessed the most racially integrated congregation on the Far South Side.

One day Obama and Adrienne Jackson called on Williams, who was immediately impressed by Barack’s “humility” and “his ease with people.” Williams also saw that Obama’s focus on growing DCP was rooted in an IAF-style worldview: “they wanted to work with churches because churches have values and churches have people and churches have money.” But Williams also knew that building an ecumenical base for DCP would be difficult because “these churches are of different persuasions, denominations, ways of thinking. . . . Creating community out of these churches” would be “a very complicated thing,” and even more difficult for some pastors because Barack himself was “not a church-going person.” But because Obama was “a principled person,” Williams readily signed on, telling Barack, “You are wise beyond your years,” when he and Adrienne departed.

Just a block west of Holy Rosary was Reformation Lutheran Church. One young woman from that congregation, Kimetha Webster, had been active in DCP for months, and sometime that spring, she took Barack and Bill Stenzel there and introduced them to the church’s new young pastor, Tyrone Partee, as well as her father, John Webster, a congregation mainstay and the church’s caretaker. If Obama’s Career Education Network became a reality, its after-school counseling and tutoring efforts would require more space than Holy Rosary alone could offer. Obama explained DCP’s aspirations before asking, “Pastor, do you think it’s possible that we could do some things here at the church?”

Partee was, like Barack, just twenty-five years old, and he came from a politically active family. His uncle Cecil Partee, the longtime committeeman of the 20th Ward, had served for two decades in the Illinois state legislature, including one term as president of the state Senate, a landmark achievement for an African American in the thoroughly white Illinois state capitol. Cecil Partee also was a crucial supporter of Harold Washington and now served as city treasurer. Tyrone immediately offered Barack Reformation’s support and space in its Fellowship Hall. “I believed in what he was doing for our community,” Partee said. But getting to know John Webster was even more valuable because he offered to show Barack around Roseland. “Everybody knew Mr. Webster,” Partee recalled. “He knew the good and the bad on everything.”

A third pastor Barack called upon was Alonzo C. Pruitt, a former Chicago Urban League community organizer and now the young vicar of St. George and St. Matthias Episcopal Church on 111th Street. St.

George was known for its weekday program that each morning fed about forty hungry people, some of whom lived at the nearby Roseland YMCA and others in the neighborhood's abandoned buildings. Pruitt was also impressed with Obama and agreed to lend his name to DCP's efforts.<sup>42</sup>

Among Roseland's many churches, the faith most widely represented was not Catholic, Lutheran, Christian Reformed, or Episcopal; it was Baptist. Baptist churches were freestanding and independent, not tied to any denominational hierarchy or bishop, and their pastors could be as iconoclastic as they chose to be. By early 1987, central Roseland's most immediately pressing problem, as Pruitt's feed-the-hungry program highlighted, was the increase in the number of homeless people. That problem had its roots in the foreclosed loans and boarded-up homes that had increased dramatically in the past seven years due to the loss of tens of thousands of jobs, in the steel mills and also at previously vibrant manufacturing firms, from Dutch Boy and Sherwin-Williams paints to Carl Buddig meats and the Libby, McNeill & Libby food cannery.

Late in 1986 the Daily Calumet's superb steel reporter, Larry Galica, in an article about the human costs of unemployment, quoted Alonzo Grant, a black Roseland homeowner with a wife and three children who had lost his job at South Works and not found a new one. "I have no income whatsoever. I can't receive public aid. I'm three months behind in my house mortgage payments, I'm two months behind in my car payments, and I'm behind in my utility bills."

Starting in late 1985, Neighborhood Housing Services (NHS), a ten-year-old foundation-supported organization whose mission was to help homeowners in declining, heavily minority neighborhoods, began planning a Roseland program at the request of Ellen Benjamin, executive director of the Borg-Warner Foundation. Benjamin had been interested in Roseland for several years, and within six months, the Borg-Warner Foundation committed $450,000 to NHS Roseland. Chicago's Department of Housing soon matched that with $500,000 in city funds, and the state of Illinois contributed $200,000. By late 1986, NHS had named a neighborhood director and had appointed a local board that included Salim Al Nurridin, a Roseland civic activist and native of Altgeld Gardens who had converted to Islam years earlier.<sup>43</sup>

Early in 1987, with Alonzo Pruitt of St. George in the lead, six Roseland churches announced they were offering overnight shelter to any needy person on evenings when the temperature fell well below freezing. Also participating was Mission of Faith Baptist Church, whose pastor, Rev. Eugene Gibson, was president of the Roseland Clergy Association (RCA), and Fernwood United Methodist Church, whose pastor, Rev. Al Sampson, was a forty-eight-year-old veteran of Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference whom King himself had ordained as a minister. Those three clergymen were taking the lead in protesting the lack of black professionals at a heavily patronized bank in Beverly, a largely white neighborhood immediately west of Washington Heights. They were also demanding youth employment opportunities at a large shopping plaza west of Beverly in Evergreen Park.

Pruitt, Gibson, and Sampson's efforts received prominent coverage in the Defender, and sometime in early 1987 Obama got Gibson on the phone and won an invitation to the RCA's next regular meeting. As Obama later told it, he made a brief presentation to the ten or so clergymen before someone else arrived late to the meeting. "A tall, pecan-colored man" with straightened hair "swept back in a pompadour," wearing "a blue, double-breasted suit and a large gold cross across his scarlet tie" asked Barack whom he represented.

When Barack said DCP, the minister said that reminded him of a white man who had called on him many months before. “Funny-looking guy. Jewish name. You connected to the Catholics?” When Barack said yes, this person whom Obama called “Charles Smalls,” responded that “the last thing we need is to join up with a bunch of white money and Catholic churches and Jewish organizers to solve our problems . . . the archdiocese in this city is run by stone-cold racists. Always has been. White folks come in here thinking they know what’s best for us. . . . It’s all a political thing.” Smalls knew Obama meant well, but Barack wrote that he felt he was “roasting like a pig on a spit.”

Years later, a journalist named Al Sampson as the intolerant preacher, and Obama later confirmed that identification, explaining that he had just changed the appearance of the short, stout, and dark-skinned Sampson. Asked for the first time about the allegation, Sampson said he did not recall ever meeting Barack Obama in the late 1980s, but in a 2002 video interview Sampson had expressed his admiration for the notoriously bigoted Louis Farrakhan.

More than a quarter century later, Alonzo Pruitt still had a “vibrant memory” of that RCA meeting, with Barack wearing “an open-necked pale yellow shirt” and light brown dress shoes. Pruitt could picture Barack “carefully listening” and “responding with courtesy and restraint even when” others “did not practice courtesy and restraint. I was impressed that he was not defensive or hostile even when a reasonable person might choose the latter. At first I thought he was aloof, but as the meeting went on I realized that his getting angry would simply create a new issue with which to deal, and he was focused on what he perceived to be the heart of the matter.”<sup>44</sup>

Obama received a dramatically warmer welcome when he visited Trinity United Church of Christ (TUCC) on 95th Street. Trinity was well known to every minister on the South Side because its pastor, Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., had grown his congregation from just eighty-seven members when he started there in 1972 to more than four thousand by the day Obama first visited. Almost two years earlier, Adrienne Jackson had tried unsuccessfully to interest Wright in DCP, and in Obama’s own later account, an aged “Reverend Philips” with a dying church first recommended he visit Wright. Yet among Chicago’s black preachers, an undocumented consensus would emerge that it was Rev. Lacey K. Curry, the dynamic pastor of Emmanuel Baptist, a vibrant church in the Auburn Gresham community north of DCP’s self-defined 95th Street boundary, who had told Barack to go see Wright.

But Wright would attest to much of Obama’s account of his first visit to Trinity, where Wright’s attractive secretary, Donita Powell Anderson, was at least as interested in the young gentleman caller as was her pastor. “She was smitten,” Wright smilingly remembered. In Barack’s telling, Wright’s first words to him were a humorous greeting: “Let’s see if Donita here will let me have a minute of your time.”

As of March 1987, forty-five-year-old Jerry Wright had already lived an eventful life. Raised by two well-educated parents in the Germantown neighborhood of northwest Philadelphia, Wright knew the black church from his earliest years because his father, Jeremiah Sr., was pastor of Grace Baptist Church. Years later, in a long interview, Wright would confess to misbehavior during his high school years—including an arrest for car theft—that was more serious than any of Obama’s indulgences while at Punahou. Jerry followed his father’s and mother’s footsteps and began college at Virginia Union University in Richmond before dropping out and enlisting in the marines. After two years, he changed uniforms and became a navy medical corpsman, ending up at Lyndon B. Johnson’s Bethesda bedside when the president underwent surgery in late 1966.

Upon leaving the service, Wright enrolled at Howard University to complete his undergraduate degree and also earn a master's. Reconnecting to religious faith, Wright entered the University of Chicago Divinity School before becoming an assistant pastor at Beth Eden Baptist Church, in the Morgan Park neighborhood west of central Roseland. By late 1971, that affiliation had ended and Wright was searching for new employment when an older friend and mentor, Rev. Kenneth B. Smith, mentioned that the small congregation of Trinity UCC, where Smith had been the founding pastor in 1961, was searching for a new minister. Wright was interviewed by Vallmer Jordan, one of TUCC's most dedicated members, and on March 1, 1972, Wright became Trinity's pastor.

Wright inherited a small congregation and an annual budget of just $39,000, but the church had something almost equally valuable: a newly coined church slogan that declared Trinity as "unashamedly black and unapologetically Christian." When the United Church of Christ created Trinity, it was aiming for a "high potential church" that would attract "the right kind of black people," according to longtime Trinity member and staffer Julia M. Speller in her University of Chicago Ph.D. dissertation. "The class discrimination exhibited by the denomination" was stark, and soon after arriving at Trinity, Wright complained publicly that his new congregation had become "a citadel for the ultra-middle-class Negro." He later quoted one founding member as confessing that "we could out-white white people," and he also wrote that a "'white church in a black face' is exactly what we had become!"

Just two blocks east of Trinity were the Lowden Homes, where DCP's Nadyne Griffin lived, and Wright later remembered that when he arrived at Trinity, "we first had to stop looking at the neighbors around the church as 'those people.'" Within eight months, he had introduced a new youth choir, and not long after that, he told the senior choir to expand its repertoire to embrace gospel music. Those innovations caused almost two dozen of Trinity's existing members to leave the church, and Jerry later wrote that "eighteen months into my pastorate . . . I felt as if I were a failure. It seemed to me as if everyone was leaving our church."

But these changes brought in new members, and by 1977 Trinity's congregation had grown to four hundred. In late 1978, the church moved into a new building with a seven-hundred-seat sanctuary, and in 1980, with Wright's powerful sermons now being broadcast on the radio, Trinity's membership began a rapid climb, reaching sixteen hundred by early 1981. The congregation included a number of prominent black Chicagoans, such as well-known Illinois appellate judge R. Eugene Pincham and Manford Byrd, like Val Jordan a charter member since 1961. In early 1981, when Byrd was passed over for promotion from deputy to superintendent of the Chicago Public Schools in favor of a black woman from California, Trinitarians were among the many black Chicagoans who vocally protested the denial of what Trinity called Byrd's "earned ascension" in favor of an outsider. In response, Val Jordan and several others drafted a wide-ranging statement of values, modeled in part on the Ten Commandments, as a way of honoring Byrd at an August 9, 1981, ceremony. Trinity's twelve-point "Black Value System" was notable for its powerful "disavowal of the pursuit of middleclassness" and an attendant warning against thinking "in terms of 'we' and 'they'"—i.e., "those people"—"instead of 'US'!"

By fall of 1982, Trinity had reached twenty-eight hundred members and its annual budget was now $700,000. In response, Wright and a trio of academically oriented members—Sokoni Karanja, Ayana Johnson-Karanja, and Iva E. Carruthers—drafted an almost two-hundred-page "compendium text for church-wide study." Wright wrote an eleven-page statement of Trinity's mission, beginning with a forceful call for “a conscious cutting across class and caste lines and so-called economic levels” and “utterly abandoning or rejecting the notion of the ‘middle class’ as the proper vineyard into which God has called us to labor.”

Wright also called out the usually unspoken dangers that “Black self-hatred” posed in African American communities, and he later recalled with some embarrassment how he had been entirely ignorant of the harm that youth gangs were doing in neighborhoods like Roseland until his eldest daughter Janet and her boyfriend were robbed at gunpoint in 1982 on Halsted Avenue, less than ten blocks from the Wrights’ home, by several Gangster Disciples. But perhaps equally daunting was how his daughter got her property returned, along with an apology, in just three hours after complaining to a next-door neighbor who knew who to call.

In that 1982 essay, Wright emphasized that Trinitarians “start from the cultural strengths already in existence within the Black tradition,” a view in keeping with John McKnight’s social capital emphasis. Throughout the decade, Trinity’s outreach ministries would grow along with the church, with a food co-op and a credit union being joined by a housing ministry that addressed the problem of foreclosed, boarded-up homes plus a high school counseling project and Saturday youth programs. “Educating constituents as to all the nuances and subtleties of the racist political system operative in Chicago,” Wright wrote, “is a very definite part of our ministry at Trinity.”

In 1983, Wright took a lead role, along with eight other black churchmen including Al Sampson, in fervently endorsing Harold Washington’s mayoral campaign. Borrowing Trinity’s own “unashamedly black and unapologetically Christian” slogan, the statement was supported by more than 250 members of the clergy. By 1986 Trinity had more than four thousand members, twenty-eight of whom were preparing for the ministry, and Wright was preaching at two separate Sunday services to cope with the growth. One charter member cited Wright’s “ability to call all his parishioners by their names, even as the church membership grew into the thousands,” as one more of his impressive gifts. Julia Speller wrote that by 1986 “a definite mission-consciousness began to emerge at Trinity,” and Jerry was pursuing a deepening interest in black Americans’ African cultural roots. Wright had been profoundly influenced by the pioneering black liberation theologian James H. Cone’s landmark 1969 book Black Theology and Black Power, although he strongly faulted Cone for calling African Americans “a people who were completely stripped of their African heritage.” Trinity, Wright wrote, “affirms our Africanness,” including “the premise that Christianity did not start in Europe. It started in Africa,” and “we affirm our African roots and use Africa as a starting point for understanding ourselves, understanding God, and understanding the world.” Indeed, “we understand Africa as the place where civilization began.”

By the time of Obama’s visit to Trinity in March 1987, word about Jeremiah Wright’s church had spread well beyond Chicago. A PBS Frontline television crew and well-known black journalist Roger Wilkins had just spent days at Trinity preparing an hour-long documentary on the church that would be nationally broadcast ten weeks later. “The rooms of Trinity are crammed full of its members all day, every day,” Wilkins told viewers while describing the church’s outreach ministries and Bible-study classes. “Trinity is one of the fastest growing and strongest black churches in America.”

Responding to Wilkins’s questions, Wright spoke colloquially and bluntly. For black teenagers in Roseland, Wright said, “You can’t be what you ain’t seen. . . . So many of our young boys haven’t seen nothing but the gangs and the pimps and the brothers on the corner,” and in their daily lives “they never have their horizons lifted.” But Wright also emphasized black Americans’ lack of self-esteem. “If I can somehow be white: a lot of black people have that feeling. If I can somehow be accepted. And Africa is a bad thing. I’m not African. I’m not African. I’m part Indian. I’m part Chinese. I’m part anything.”

That part of Wright’s worldview would resonate deeply with Barack, but his perspective on the breadth and depth of American racism matched that of Martin Luther King Jr. “How do we attack a system, get at systemic evil and realize that it’s not the individuals, it’s the system,” he told Wilkins. “You hate the sin and not the sinner.” Wilkins closed the telecast with a prophetic description of Trinity’s importance. “This church will be measured by how much of its power will reach beyond its own doors, and by how much its members will reach back, back to those left behind.” The day of the broadcast, the Sun-Times told Chicagoans not to miss “a compelling and moving portrait of one Chicago clergyman who has made a difference.” Jeremiah Wright “sets a standard of excellence that should inspire clergy of all faiths.”

“The first time I walked into Trinity, I felt at home,” Barack later told Wright’s daughter Janet. Furthermore, Obama recalled, “there was an explicitly political aspect to the mission and message of Trinity at that time that I found appealing.” In their first 1987 conversation, Barack tried to sell Wright on DCP’s program. “He came with this Saul Alinsky community organizing vision,” Wright recounted years later. “He was interested in organizing churches,” yet Barack’s depth of knowledge about the black church was woeful indeed. “He didn’t know who J. H. Jackson was,” Wright remembered, naming the conservative, dictatorial president of the National Baptist Convention who pastored Chicago’s Olivet Baptist Church and was infamous for changing Olivet’s address from 3101 South Parkway to 405 East 31st Street when Parkway was renamed Martin Luther King Drive.

Wright remembers that Obama “had this wild-eyed idealistic exciting plan” of “organizing pastors and churches” all across Roseland in support of his Career Education Network. “I looked at him and I said, ‘Do you know what Joseph’s brother said when they saw him coming across the field?’” Obama, utterly unfamiliar with the Bible, said no. “They said ‘Behold the dreamer.’ You’re dreaming. This is not going to happen,” Wright told him. “You’re in a minefield you have no concept about whatsoever in terms of trying to get us all to work together, even on something as important as the educational issues in the Roseland community,” Wright explained, citing the twin evils of denominational divides and local Chicago politics.

Given Wright’s busy schedule, that first conversation ended after an hour. But Obama soon returned, talking first with Donita before sitting down with Wright, who remembers he had “questions about this unknown entity, the black church, and its theology. . . . I had studied Islam in West Africa, and he wanted to know about that.” In addition, “we talked about the difference between theological investigation, rabbinic study, and personal faith, personal beliefs, and how I separated those two,” Wright recalled. “Our visits became more of that nature and that level than the community organizing piece, because I said, ‘That ain’t going to happen. If you mention my name, I can tell you preachers who are not coming in the Roseland area.’” That surprised Obama, and Wright also spoke about the black church’s “rabid anti-Catholic” sentiment. “We would spend time talking about religious stuff like that to help him understand that brick wall he’s running up against in terms of organizing churches.” So “most of the time . . . we talked about how insane” religious antipathies could be, “more so than community organizing.”

Barack continued to visit Wright in the months ahead, and their conversations gave Obama a greater understanding of why almost all of the people with whom he was working held their religious faith as a source of strength that could give them courage. It not only “bolstered them against heartache and disappointment” but could be “an active, palpable agent in the world,” undergirding their involvement by offering “a source of hope.” Witnessing that, Barack remembered, “moved me deeply” and “made me recognize that many of the impulses that . . . were propelling me forward were the same impulses that express themselves through the church.”<sup>45</sup>

Obama was even more warmly welcomed by Father Michael Pflieger at St. Sabina Roman Catholic Church in the Gresham neighborhood, well above DCP’s northern boundary. The thirty-eight-year-old Pflieger had been a seminary classmate of Holy Rosary’s Bill Stenzel, had first met Jerry Wright five years earlier in an Ashland Avenue barber shop, and was well acquainted with Deacon Tommy West, the energetic DCP member from St. Catherine’s who spent more time at St. Sabina than at his home church. Pflieger had grown up barely a mile west of St. Sabina on Chicago’s Southwest Side, and in 1966, at age seventeen, he had watched as an angry white mob attacked an open-housing march being led by Martin Luther King Jr. in Marquette Park, just a few blocks north. By 1987 Pflieger had been at St. Sabina for twelve years, and although his congregation was nowhere near the size of Trinity’s, no church in Chicago, and certainly not one with a white priest, offered as vibrant a Sunday service as Mike Pflieger did.

Years later, Pflieger recalled that Obama “came in and introduced himself and what he was doing.” He spoke about how churches “were the most powerful tool in the community for social justice and for equality” and how they should be actively pursuing those goals, not watching from the sidelines. “I was amazed by his brilliance,” Pflieger recalled; he was struck as well by “his aggressiveness.” Pflieger asked Barack “what was his church,” because “people that want to work with churches ought to be in a church.” Barack replied that “he was still looking, had been visiting some places, Trinity being one of them.” Pflieger had expected a twenty-minute conversation, “and it went much longer.” He offered Obama his full support, and after Barack left, Pflieger could remember “walking out of this room saying, ‘That’s somebody to be watched. He’s going places.’”<sup>46</sup>

For Obama, these early months of 1987 were intense as he expanded his horizons and added to his growing set of influential acquaintances. On March 2, in faraway Jakarta, Lolo Soetoro died of liver disease at age fifty-two. If Ann called Barack with the news—“they did not talk often,” Sheila recalled—he did not mention it to her or anyone else. He also “never talked that much about his dad” or his death to Sheila, and as best she could tell, “Barack’s father played virtually no emotional role in Barack’s life.” He continued his weekly conversations with Greg Galluzzo—an hour on March 4, ninety minutes each on March 13 and 20, another hour on March 24—and he also introduced his good friend Johnnie Owens to Galluzzo.

Barack and Johnnie had begun discussing whether Johnnie would leave Friends of the Parks and join Barack at DCP, but Owens needed a salary much like Barack’s $20,000, and that meant Barack would have to add the MacArthur Foundation as a funder in addition to CHD, Woods, and Wieboldt.

By mid-March, Barack’s most pressing concern was on the jobs front, and on Monday, March 23—just two weeks before Election Day—Mayor Washington was coming to Roseland to open the much-delayed new Far South Side jobs center that his employment deputy Maria Cerda had agreed to establish more than six months earlier. In the run-up to that ceremony, Barack dealt extensively with Salim Al Nurridin, a politically sophisticated Roseland figure whose Roseland Community Development Corporation (RCDC) was relatively low profile but whose long-standing acquaintance with one of Barack's new mentors allowed for an easy introduction to this young organizer who was "under the tutelage of Al Raby."

As a native of Altgeld, Salim knew Hazel Johnson, and he had significantly helped 9th Ward alderman Perry Hutchinson, now well known for his star role in the FBI's sting operation, win the seat he was now in danger of losing on April 7. Salim had become a Muslim under the influence of Roseland's least-known figure of quiet political significance, Sheikh Muhammad Umar Faruqi, who oversaw a mosque on South Michigan Avenue, but Salim was not a Nation of Islam "Black Muslim." The new jobs center would be located in a building that Faruqi and Roseland's low-key Muslim community had acquired. Salim worked easily with Barack, whom he saw as "a very energetic and purposeful young man, with a passion to do things effectively."

On that Monday morning, Washington and his two-man security detail arrived at the RCDC office at 33 East 111th Place. The mayor had been told he would be greeted by Loretta Augustine on behalf of DCP as well as Salim, and that Maria Cerda, Perry Hutchinson, DCP's Dan Lee, and "Barac" Obama would be there as well. A city photographer snapped away as the hefty Washington, holding his own notes and with his trench coat thrown over his left arm, shook hands with local well-wishers as a beaming Loretta stood to his right clad in a handsome white coat. The mayor and Cerda listened carefully as Loretta thanked him for coming. One photograph captured Sheikh Faruqi a few paces behind Washington; three different photographs include a tall young man with a slightly bushy Afro standing in the rear of the small room, listening intently to Washington and Loretta.

Obama would later quote the mayor as saying to Loretta: "I've heard excellent things about your work." Then the entire group walked outside and turned south on South Michigan Avenue. With traffic blocked off and the sun in their faces, Washington and Loretta led the procession a little more than a block to the new office at 11220 South Michigan. Sheikh Faruqi trailed slightly to Loretta's left; Cerda, 34th Ward aldermanic candidate Lemuel Austin, and state senator Emil Jones Jr. trailed to Washington's right. At the front door of the new office, Washington, Cerda, Loretta, and a camera-hogging Perry Hutchinson posed with a white ribbon and a pair of scissors. The mayor spoke to the crowd, and then the ribbon was cut. The mayor climbed into his car for a short drive to 200 East 115th Street, where he broke ground for a future Roseland health center. Barack had emphasized repeatedly to Loretta that she should press Washington to attend a DCP rally for their Career Education Network program, but Loretta had not gotten a commitment.

In his own, overly dramatized retelling of the morning, Barack cursed in anger at her failing and stomped off while Dan Lee tried to calm him down. Loretta remembered no such scene, saying she had "never seen him angry" even when he must have been. "I've seen him drop his head," but, beyond that, "he never showed it." Tommy West agreed. "You could never see him angry." Later that day, Barack had an initial appointment with a Hyde Park physician, Dr. David L. Scheiner, who would remember Obama exhibiting no emotional turmoil during his office visits.<sup>47</sup>

On March 28, four hundred former Wisconsin Steel workers attended a seventh-anniversary rally in South Chicago, where their pro bono lawyer, Tom Geoghegan, told them he hoped their lawsuit against International Harvester—which had just renamed itself Navistar—would soon go to trial. A day earlier Frank Lumpkin and others had picketed outside Navistar's annual meeting at the Art Institute of Chicago. Envirodyne Industries, to which Harvester had sold Wisconsin before its sudden closing, was also suing Navistar, “alleging fraud and racketeering,” the Tribune noted. The U.S. Economic Development Administration had recouped a tiny portion of its $55 million loan to Envirodyne by selling the mill as scrap to Cuyahoga Wrecking for $3 million, but Cuyahoga went bankrupt before clearing the site, leaving the rusting shell of one mill as a haunting symbol of South Deering’s past. “Frank Lumpkin deserves a spot in the organizers’ hall of fame,” the Tribune rightly observed.

On April 2, Obama joined Mary Ellen Montes and Bruce Orenstein for a joint UNO–DCP press conference in response to Mary Ryan’s private approaches on behalf of Waste Management Inc. Barack, Lena, and Bruce had decided that playing hard to get—indeed, very hard to get—would maximize the price WMI had already indicated it was willing to pay to expand its Southeast Side landfill capacity. UNO and DCP publicly embraced a no-exceptions moratorium on any new or expanded landfills, while calling for WMI to “commit to a long-term reinvestment program” for the “economic development of neighborhoods around its landfills,” the Sun-Times reported. UNO and DCP were sending a clear message they were willing to make a deal, but WMI had to be generous in purchasing their assent.

The next day, Barack again met for an hour with Greg Galluzzo—in April, as in March, they would have five hours of conversation spread over four weekly meetings. Most of Chicago was consumed by the mayoral contest that would climax on April 7. Ed Vrdolyak was running a surprisingly populist, multiethnic campaign, while Tom Hynes seemed focused on trying to take down Vrdolyak rather than targeting Washington. The Tribune heartily endorsed the mayor, saying that “Chicago is in better shape today than it was when Mr. Washington took office” in 1983. Uppermost among Washington’s “unfinished business,” the paper pointedly added, was “helping depressed neighborhoods get better housing and more jobs.”

Two days before the election, Tom Hynes dropped out, in a strategic attempt to unite white voters behind Vrdolyak. On Election Day, Washington swept through Altgeld Gardens in a voter-turnout effort, and he ultimately triumphed with almost 54 percent of the vote. One poll showed him winning 15 percent of white voters and 97 percent of blacks. In Washington’s best precinct, Marlene Dillard’s London Towne Homes, a young 8th Ward precinct captain named Donne Trotter was given credit for the mayor winning 795 out of the 798 votes cast. Citywide, Ed Vrdolyak received 42 percent, which the Tribune noted was “better than anyone had predicted.” There also was no question that “the biggest loser” was Tom Hynes, whose sullying of the family name among black Chicagoans would redound in another election two decades later. Another loser was Alderman Perry Hutchinson, who was narrowly edged out by his predecessor, Robert Shaw, in what one observer termed “a choice between two snakes.” An indictment followed just six days later, and Hutchinson was soon on his way to federal prison, where he died at age forty-eight.<sup>48</sup>

Obama had attained such a glowing reputation among the CHD staffers at the Chicago archdiocese that Cynthia Norris, the thirty-year-old director of the Office of Black Catholic Ministries, requested that he conduct a training session for the eighteen delegates Chicago was sending to the National Black Catholic Congress in Washington in late May. Norris wanted the delegates to be well prepared to represent Chicago at the huge assembly, the first such gathering since 1894, and Obama trained them in the basement of Holy Name Cathedral, the famous diocesan seat just west of downtown’s Magnificent Mile.

At the end of April, Gamaliel hosted a second weeklong training session at Techny Towers in suburban Northbrook. DCP’s Margaret Bagby was among the forty or so community members who attended, along with Lena, Mike Kruglik, and CHD's Renee Brereton, plus younger organizers such as Linda Randle. Augustana College senior David Kindler, a young trainee who had already gotten a taste of organizing work in the Quad Cities area where Rock Island, Illinois, and Davenport, Iowa, face each other across the Mississippi River, would remember Mary Gonzales as the star performer among an otherwise all-male and largely macho cast of trainers: Greg Galluzzo, Peter Martinez, and Phil Mullins. "Hard-assed" and "maternal," Mary was just "phenomenally good." Barack took charge of at least two sessions, and Kindler would recall him as someone who "likes everybody to love him."

Galluzzo wanted to nurture and develop new, full-time organizers, and he was regularly petitioning every possible foundation to contribute to the first-year salaries of beginning organizers, just as Kellman had done with CHD and Woods when he hired Barack. Galluzzo knew that organizers must develop "sensitivity, patience and inventiveness" and understand that "he or she is there as a facilitator" who has to motivate community organizations composed entirely of volunteers. "Since every church is an important potential organizing base," Greg said, "an organizer needs to know something of the theological and institutional characteristics of the churches in the community."<sup>49</sup>

Barack's top priority was still his Career Education Network, and his goal was to win Washington's support for the program. Thanks to Al Raby's introductions at City Hall, Barack had already spoken with Luz Martinez, a relatively junior aide, about a mayoral endorsement, and in early May a seven-page document entitled "Proposal for Career Education and Intervention Services in the Far South Side of Chicago" was sent to Washington with a cover letter bearing the names of DCP president Dan Lee and now "Executive Director" Barack H. Obama. The cover letter said DCP wanted "to identify concrete ways that we can positively impact our schools" and emphasized that they "are not seeking any City funding for our program," although they did want the mayor's "whole-hearted support and endorsement of our program" and requested that he meet with DCP leaders sometime in the next month. They also asked that Washington "keynote a large meeting of parents and church leadership," which DCP hoped to convene in mid-June.

In Barack's own letter to Luz Martinez, he volunteered that Al Raby might have already mentioned DCP's request to her or to her immediate boss, Kari Moe. The proposal said the number of blacks graduating from college in Illinois had declined since 1975, and that the dropout rate at the five Far South Side high schools was more than 40 percent. The scale of what Obama and DCP envisioned was grandiose, with "two central offices" coordinating the work of staff representatives at each high school plus supplementary personnel in various churches and social service agencies. The document said the program would give "individualized attention to at-risk students" and offer "incentives for student performance." It would be "administered by the Developing Communities Project," would have thirteen full-time employees as well as twenty part-time tutors, and required an annual budget of $531,000. "State funds would be used to fund this first year of the program," with corporate and foundation support increasing the projected budget to $600,000 and then $775,000 in the two subsequent years. Obama's plan might have seemed familiar to anyone who recalled Jerry Kellman's Regional Employment Network and its initial $500,000 in state funding, but in this case underperforming high school students were taking the place of unemployed steelworkers.

Barack believed a key ingredient was his "Proposed Advisory Board," a list of fifteen people who "have been invited or have already accepted" a request to participate. His list was headed by Albert Raby and state senator Emil Jones, but it also included Carver-Wheatley principal Dr. Alma Jones, Chicago State president Dr. George Ayers, and Olive-Harvey president Homer Franklin. They were followed by Rev. Jeremiah Wright, Dr. Gwendolyn LaRoche of the Chicago Urban League—whose name was misspelled—and Father Michael Pflieger. Also on the list were Ann Hallett of the Wieboldt Foundation, education researcher Dr. Fred Hess, Northwestern University’s Dr. John McKnight, and John Ayers from the Commercial Club. The list concluded with three of DCP’s most committed members: Dan Lee, Aletha Gibson, and Isabella Waller.

Obama’s proposal did not go over well at City Hall. Three of the mayor’s aides marked up the document, highlighting its astonishing scale, eye-popping budget, and the preponderance of professionals on the proposed board. One staffer wrote that it needed “more parents/local community residents, student(s), employer(s),” but even a Sun-Times story headlined “’85 Dropout Rate Topped 50% at 29 City High Schools” failed to elevate DCP’s request among staff priorities. Fred Hess emphasized in the Tribune how the utmost priority should be “to make the schools more accountable at the local level,” and by May powerful Illinois House speaker Michael J. Madigan, along with Danny Solis and Mary Gonzales of UNO, had embraced a Hess-drafted school autonomy pilot program, House Bill 935.

That plan would allow up to forty-six schools to operate independently of the CPS’s hierarchical bureaucracy, and when Washington appeared at UNO’s twenty-eight-hundred-person annual convention at the Chicago Hilton on May 21, he was pressed to support the bill. Washington told the crowd that UNO had “hit the nail on the head” in demanding more local autonomy, which Hess and others interpreted as an endorsement. The bill passed the Illinois House the next day, but Washington’s top aides quickly signaled that the mayor was actually opposed to such a “drastic” decentralization of CPS. Rival researcher Don Moore at Designs for Change opposed it too, and when Education Committee chairman Arthur Berman killed the measure in the state Senate, UNO acquiesced. Hess was furious, arguing that far-reaching educational changes during “the early years are the most crucial” if there was to be any hope of reducing sky-high dropout rates during high school.

Barack still sought a response from the mayor’s office to his plan, and he contacted Joe Washington, a young staffer who was a Roseland native, but made no headway. Disappointed at City Hall’s lack of interest, Barack wrote another letter to the mayor, this one featuring the names of fifteen additional signatories in addition to DCP president Dan Lee. Three were DCP members—Aletha Gibson, Isabella Waller, and Ellis Jordan, a fellow PTA leader—and twelve were Roseland clergymen: Bill Stenzel, Rick Williams, Tony Van Zanten, Paul Burak, Tom Kaminski (whose surname was misspelled), Eddie Knox (a new DCP recruit who was the recently arrived pastor of Pullman Presbyterian Church), Joe Bennett, Alonzo Pruitt, Tyrone Partee, and three more.

Obama’s inclusion of these new names suggested that a demonstration of DCP’s interdenominational support would impress either Joe Washington or the mayor. As pastors of “representative religious institutions of the Far South Side,” the signers warned that “high school age youth have been hit hard by the problems of the Chicago school system. In our area, we have seen too many youth drop out, join gangs, and turn to drugs and teen pregnancy instead of staying in school and going on to stable and successful careers.” The letter again requested a brief meeting with the mayor to discuss what was now called “a pilot Career Education and Intervention Network.” Noting that it would complement Washington’s nascent Mayor’s Education Summit, it said, “we see the urgent need for this program. We also see the need for your leadership and support in getting it started.”

But invoking the twelve Roseland pastors was not any more successful for Barack. One Washington aide jotted on the letter: “Mr. Obama is paid staff person. From Roseland upset w/ Joe.” A note to Kari Moe’s secretary instructed, “Do not schedule meeting,” and two weeks later the office file on DCP was marked “Close.” Months would pass before Barack was able to meet with one of Washington’s top aides.<sup>50</sup>

By late May, Barack and DCP’s board decided to concentrate on the education project and pull back from any further employment focus. The new MOET office had been a signal achievement, but DCP’s visits to major local employers—Libby, McNeill & Libby, Carl Buddig, and Sherwin-Williams—to request that they hire local residents had only uncovered news that all three were soon closing their Far South Side plants. No one in DCP was more focused on jobs than Marlene Dillard, but this shift to education opened up tensions within the organization that began with Jerry Kellman’s initial decision to have DCP cover such a wide group of different neighborhoods. The southern trio of Altgeld Gardens, Eden Green, and Golden Gate were geographically separate from Roseland and West Pullman, and the westernmost and easternmost neighborhoods, Washington Heights and London Towne Homes, were not eager to be associated even with Roseland and especially not with the Gardens.

These divisions were personified by the differing perspectives of Loretta Augustine and her two close friends, Yvonne Lloyd and Margaret Bagby, each of whom lived just west of Altgeld, and the two different women who represented St. John de la Salle parish on DCP’s board, Marlene Dillard and Adrienne Jackson. “Certain issues I was not interested in,” Dillard explained years later. “I couldn’t center myself around individuals who were in Altgeld Gardens.” Residents of London Towne were “not on the poverty line,” and although they worried about job loss, they did not require the most basic job training skills that most Altgeld residents needed. In addition, “my son went to a private school,” so Roseland’s failing public high schools likewise were not a high priority. “I don’t feel that London Towne and Roseland can be linked together,” for “we have different values and different interests.”

Yvonne Lloyd, who lived near Altgeld in Eden Green, agreed with Dillard’s explanation. The areas “had different problems” and indeed were “totally different” because solid residential areas like London Towne had “facilities that Altgeld didn’t.” She, like Margaret and especially Loretta, believed Altgeld’s scale of deprivation meant it should be DCP’s top concern, because “those were the people we were really, really concerned about” the most. Betty Garrett, the gentle mainstay of Bill Stenzel’s congregation at Holy Rosary, watched as the divide deepened between Loretta and Marlene. “They fought constantly,” she recalled, mostly over Dillard’s emphasis on jobs. “Loretta wanted it to be more widespread.” Marlene understood that Loretta “was more interested in poverty issues” than she was, and over time her attitude became “let Loretta and them take care of Altgeld Gardens.”

Barack was very close to both Loretta and Marlene, often talking with Marlene’s mother and helping Marlene when she ran for election to London Towne’s board of directors. Yet by May 1987, there was no getting around the power struggle within DCP, and how Loretta’s viewpoint was more widely shared than Marlene’s. “Barack was the person who held it together” as long as it did hold, Marlene recalled, but after the May meeting, she shifted her attention to DCP’s nascent landfill alliance with UNO’s Southeast Chicago chapter.

If DCP hoped to make Barack’s Career Education Network even a modest-sized reality, it needed a second full-time organizer, such as Johnnie Owens, and the money to pay his salary. By late spring 1987, Barack had submitted his grant proposal to the MacArthur Foundation, where it went to Aurie Pennick, an African American and South Side native. MacArthur had little experience with community organizing, but soon after Pennick's arrival in 1984, she had initiated a program called the Fund for Neighborhood Initiatives, which would direct about $700,000 annually toward "revitalizing some of Chicago's poorest communities." The small world of Chicago philanthropy was highly interactive, and Pennick had heard Ken Rolling speak glowingly about DCP and was aware that it was being funded by Woods, Wieboldt, and CHD. Pennick lived in West Pullman and her daughter attended Reformation Lutheran's small school on 113th Street, so she knew of DCP's connection there too. But when she read Barack's proposal, she was "underwhelmed" by it. Pennick was deeply averse to the "top-down" type of projects that often won CHD support, and instead favored indigenous activists such as Hazel Johnson from Altgeld. She met with Barack and a trio of DCP members—Loretta, Marlene, and Yvonne—but came away with mixed reactions.

In every such meeting, as with city council leader Tim Evans almost a year earlier, Barack insisted that his community members take the lead while he remained almost silently in the background. "He would never speak. He always put us out front," Cathy Askew explained in recalling a time when she and Marlene accompanied Barack to a meeting with Jean Rudd at Woods. All of the DCP women remember Barack picking them up in his small blue car; wintertime appointments downtown were more memorable than summer ones because Barack's car had a hole in the floor and little if any heat. Yvonne Lloyd remembered the preparations for the MacArthur meeting, with Barack insisting that she, Loretta, and Marlene have the speaking parts and not him. "You have to be the ones to actually do it because this is your community, not mine," Lloyd recalled him saying. "You can tell your story better than I can."

Aurie Pennick found Loretta Augustine "very articulate, very smart" at DCP's meeting with MacArthur. "I was impressed with her. Barack was a little skinny guy in the back, said very little." Yet Pennick's South Side roots left her uncomfortable with how DCP "was very much noninclusive of lower-income folk," such as the actual residents of Altgeld. She also detected a "kind of classist thinking" in some of the DCP members' statements. Pennick told them she had not heard about them being active in West Pullman and asked Barack if DCP had held community meetings there. He assured her that DCP did have a presence there, but when the meeting ended, Pennick "wasn't sure whether MacArthur would make a grant." In subsequent days, when Pennick asked her immediate neighbors if they were familiar with DCP, no one was, and she decided that DCP was "too new and lightweight" to merit MacArthur funding.

To bolster DCP's dropout prevention focus, Barack wanted to generate parental interest in his CEN idea before school ended in early June. He and his two most energetic education volunteers, Aletha Strong Gibson and Ann West, called on the principals of all five Roseland area high schools and asked if they could hold "parent assemblies" in Roseland, Altgeld, Washington Heights, and West Pullman. Barack "was very professional . . . very articulate," Ann West recalled. "He was driven, and he was committed. . . . It didn't appear to be just a job." Aletha felt similarly, describing Barack as "heartfelt" and "committed to the people" as well as "very charismatic." He spent many hours with Aletha and Ann, but even though he knew Aletha had spent her junior year of college in Kenya, and that Ann was a white Australian woman married to an African American, Barack never said anything about his father or about Genevieve. "He was so private," Ann remembered, and they knew nothing of his personal life. "He didn't mix the two.”

DCP’s members collected a repertoire of Obama’s stock expressions, which became something of a running joke. Margaret Bagby remembered, “Whenever he tells you, ‘I don’t think,’ he’s telling you that he knows what he wants. And you really need to look out when he says, ‘My sense is that.’” Ann West recalled, “He would say to us, ‘This is what we need to do,’” and if he were asked a question and he didn’t know the answer, he would reply with one or both of these phrases: “Let me look into it” and “I’ll research it,” Yvonne remembered. They could all see, as Yvonne explained, how “precise and thorough” Barack was in making plans.

One Saturday morning before DCP’s “parent assembly” in West Pullman, Aurie Pennick was doing yard work in front of her home, when “all of a sudden I hear ‘Miss Pennick’” from someone who recognized her from behind. It was Barack, passing out flyers for DCP’s upcoming meeting. “This is a smart man. He probably figured out where I live,” Pennick immediately realized. DCP’s leafleting was extensive, and Pennick remembers going to the meeting “and it’s packed. . . . They really had thought it out,” and Barack’s careful strategizing paid off just as he had hoped. “I of course made the grant,” Pennick explained, and in September DCP received $20,000 from MacArthur for general operating support—exactly what was needed to pay Johnnie Owens’s salary.

Owens came from a working-class black family, and for him wearing a shirt and tie to Friends of the Parks’ downtown office was far more inviting than working out of DCP’s windowless office on the ground floor of Holy Rosary’s small rectory in Roseland. But Obama was determined to hire him, and Owens recalls Barack challenging him by saying things like, “‘If you’re really interested in changing neighborhoods and building power, you can’t do it from downtown.’” To sweeten the deal, Barack gave Johnnie money from DCP to buy a car, and yet was royally pissed when Owens got a brand-new Nissan Sentra, which was far swankier than the rapidly aging Honda Civic Obama was still driving. “We always had a little tension about that,” Owens remembered, but Barack was exceptionally happy to have Johnnie start in July.

DCP’s work in West Pullman had attracted some new members, including Loretta’s friend Rosa Thomas and a young housewife, Carolyn Wortham, but Barack’s grand plans for a half-million-dollar-a-year CEN depended on support from Emil Jones and the Illinois state legislature, which would be struggling with the state budget through June. Barack organized a lobbying trip to Springfield and took some of DCP’s most devoted members—Dan Lee, Cathy Askew, and Ernie Powell, Loretta and her friend Rosa Thomas, several other ladies, Ellis Jordan, as well as Loretta’s young daughter and both of Cathy’s. Emil Jones was a gracious host, posing with the whole group for a photo in his office. Dan Lee’s dark jacket and white pocket square matched his mod eyeglass frames all too well, Loretta looked lovely in a stylish white dress, and Ernie Powell personified strong workingman dignity with a well-knotted tie below one of Illinois’s more impressive mustaches. Barack wore a blue blazer, a white shirt, and no tie, but he closed his eyes when the camera clicked. Barack’s dream of obtaining a $500,000 state appropriation remained just that, although Jones arranged for the Illinois State Board of Education to give DCP a $25,000 planning grant that gave Barack enough to get a semblance of CEN started in early 1988.<sup>51</sup>

Back in Chicago, Obama continued his almost weekly discussions with Greg Galluzzo, who told numerous organizing colleagues that Barack was “really special.” But even though Greg spent more time with him than any other person in Barack’s workday world, he knew almost nothing of Barack’s home life, and he met Sheila Jager only once in passing.

The young couple's first nine months of living together had melded two intensely busy lives into an increasingly cloistered relationship where Sheila saw almost no one from Barack's day job, and Asif was their only regular contact in Hyde Park's graduate student community. Barack's heavy smoking was a regular topic of comment within DCP, and Reformation Lutheran pastor Tyrone Partee nicknamed him "Smokestack." Sheila said that at home, "he actually introduced me to smoking, so we smoked like chimneys together." She wanted a cat, and after Barack relented, "Max" joined their household and became a less-than-fully-welcome presence in Obama's life. "He drove Barack crazy because the cat would always pee" in their one large houseplant.

Sheila recalls the early months of 1987 as a time when she witnessed a profound self-transformation in Barack. "He was actually quite ordinary when I met him, although I always felt there was something quite special about him even during our earliest months, but he became someone quite extraordinary . . . and so very ambitious, and this happened over the course of a few months. I remember very clearly when this transformation happened, and I remember very specifically that by 1987, about a year into our relationship, he already had his sights on becoming president."

This change in Barack encompassed two interwoven themes: a belief that he had a "calling," coupled with a heightened awareness that to pursue it he had to fully identify as African American. The "'calling' had more to do with developing a sense of purpose in the world," Sheila later explained, and even two years earlier, Genevieve Cook had sensed an incipient presence of the same thing. She remembered thinking that "all along he had some notion of testing his own mettle and potential for greatness, and that it was as much about that personal journey as it was finding the best way to effect the maximum positive social change. Those two aspirations, the personal and the heroic," were "melded from very early on." Yet by early summer 1987, Barack's understanding of his "calling" was as "something he felt he really had no control over; it was his destiny," Sheila explained. "He always said this was destiny."

By then, Barack had gotten to know Al Raby and John McKnight, whose political roots lay in the civil rights struggles of the 1960s, and he had a relationship with Jeremiah Wright, whose theology sprang from that same soil. Barack had also developed an acquaintance with Emil Jones, a savvy politician, and he had witnessed at close range the charm and aura Harold Washington possessed even in a nondescript storefront. But as Sheila experienced and reflected upon what occurred, she realized the stimulus for Barack's transformation lay not in one or another precinct of black Chicago, but in the disparaging evaluation he had received from her father back at Christmas. "After that visit, and over the course of spring '87, he changed—brooding, quiet, distant—and it was only then, as I recall, that he began to talk about going into politics and race became a big issue between us." Once "we got back from California," Barack "became very introspective and quiet," Sheila recalled. "I remember very specifically that it was then he began to talk about entering politics and his presidential ambitions and conflicts about our worlds being too far apart."

Meanwhile, "the marriage discussion dragged on and on," but it was affected by what Sheila describes as Barack's "torment over this central issue of his life," the question of his own "race and identity." The "resolution of his 'black' identity was directly linked to his decision to pursue a political career," and to the crystallization of the "drive and desire to become the most powerful person in the world."

Eight years later, Obama would say that through organizing “I think I really grew into myself in terms of my identity,” and that his community work “represented the best of my legacy as an African American.” It had allowed him to feel that his “own life would be vindicated in some fashion,” and his immersion in black Chicago gave him “a sense of self-understanding and empowerment and connection.” Obama’s daily experiences on the Far South Side had reshaped him. “I came home in Chicago. I began to see my identity and my individual struggles were one with the struggles that folks face in Chicago. My identity problems began to mesh once I started working on behalf of something larger than myself.” He also explained that organizing had “rooted me in a specific community of African Americans whose values and stories I soaked up and found an affinity with.” And most specifically, “by the second year,” he told one interviewer, “I just really felt deeply connected to those people that I was working with.”

Sheila was convinced that “something fundamentally changed” inside Barack during the first half of 1987 that had transformed him into a “powerfully ambitious person” right before her eyes. “We lived so cut off from everyone else” that no one else was privy to her perspective, and Barack’s ability to “compartmentalize his work and home life, to the extent that the two worlds were never brought together physically” or in any social setting, meant that their increasingly stressed and intense relationship existed as “an island unto ourselves.”

In later years, Obama once said that his experiences in Chicago had “converged to give me a sense of strength.” At an expressly religious event, he cited Roseland as where “I first heard God’s spirit beckon me. It was there that I felt called to a higher purpose.” Sheila caviled at that, saying she “would not call him religious. Perhaps spiritual is a better description” of the man she lived with. “Barack was definitely not religious in the conventional sense. He talked about God in the abstract, but it was mostly in terms of his destiny and/or some spiritual force.”

Early in the summer, Barack’s older brother Roy visited Chicago and met Sheila briefly, but Barack went alone to the Chicago home of his maternal uncle Charles Payne for his nephew Richard’s high school graduation. His sister Maya had just completed her junior year at Punahou, and she wanted to visit a number of mainland colleges before submitting her applications. Ann Dunham was attending the Southeast Asian Summer Studies Institute being held at Northern Illinois University, west of Chicago in DeKalb, so she and Maya arrived in Chicago before Sheila left to see her parents in California and make a brief initial research trip to South Korea.

This was the first time Barack and Ann had seen each other in eighteen months, and Ann had gained a tremendous amount of weight and now seemed “very matronly.” She had not made much headway on her Ph.D. dissertation, in part because she had spent half of 1986 in the Punjab, working as a consultant for the Agricultural Development Bank of Pakistan. But her analysis was coming together, and one of her closest academic colleagues described her conclusions in words that echoed what her son had learned from John McKnight. “Anti-poverty programs . . . only reinforce the power of elites” and “it is resources and not motivation that poor villagers lack,” in Indonesia as elsewhere. Once Ann’s summer institute was complete, she would return to Pakistan for three more months of work. Barack’s close friend Asif Agha recalled playing volleyball out at Indiana Dunes during Maya’s visit, and Jerry Kellman remembers Barack bringing Maya along to a barbecue at Jerry’s home. During this trip, Maya wanted to see the campuses of the University of Michigan and the University of Wisconsin, where Asif spent much of the summer studying Tibetan.

Early in the summer Barack decided that he and Sheila should acquire a new Macintosh SE computer, which had debuted just three months earlier. “It was the latest model and very fancy,” Sheila remembered, and as with their rent, Barack happily footed the bill. “Barack said we both needed it,” and they each used it a lot, but when it first arrived, Barack had no idea how to operate the mouse. A call to Asif resulted in the dispatch of Asif’s other best friend, Doug Glick, a fellow linguistic anthropology graduate student who quickly showed Barack that you do not hold the mouse up in the air.

By the end of June, with Sheila away from Chicago and Asif up in Madison, Barack and Doug on several weekends made the three-hour drive up to where Asif was housesitting in some Wisconsin professor’s lakefront home. Obama years later would publicly joke that he had had “some fun times, which I can’t discuss in detail,” on those visits and “some good memories,” but Glick clearly remembered the long drives in Barack’s noisy Honda. Barack was “just a regular guy,” an “incredibly friendly guy” with “a great sense of humor.” During the road trips, Barack talked “about wanting to write the great American novel. . . . I spent an awful lot of time in the car with him. These are long drives, he can talk,” and “he doesn’t shut up.” At least once Obama mentioned an interest in law school, but he rarely talked about his DCP work. “I never heard him talking about community work and public service as the driving force of who he was.” Sometimes “I’m making fun of him,” asking, “‘If I whisper ‘shut up,’ will you hear it with those ears?’” But Barack clearly had “tremendous intelligence, tremendous charisma,” and indeed “a certain kind of aura to him,” Glick thought. Doug, like Asif, felt that “Barack is not that black,” but it also seemed as if “he was ideologically loaded a little.”

During one drive, Glick recounted, “we had a god moment. The strangest thing that has ever happened to me in my life happened with him.” Every trip included a pit stop to get gas and pick up something to drink, and on one occasion Barack was “sitting in the car in the driver’s seat” with the window open as Doug returned carrying snacks and bottles. “I tripped. The Snapple goes flying. . . . We both watch as it hits the ground, breaks like an egg, goes up through the air, goes through the window and both of the things land on his legs face up.” Yet somehow Obama was completely dry. “We’re never going to forget that,” Barack said to Doug. “Religions start at moments like that.”<sup>52</sup>

In Chicago, the battling intensified over the Southeast Side landfills and their toxic impact on nearby residents. The Sun-Times published a six-part, front-page series of stories titled “Our Toxic Trap” which focused on CID, the Metropolitan Sanitary District’s (MSD) “shit farm” just north of Altgeld Gardens, and older, more mysterious dumps like the Paxton Landfill. Hazel Johnson was quoted on the “nauseating stench” of sewage sludge permeating Altgeld and said, “it smells just like dead bodies.” In response, the state legislature created a special joint committee to investigate the problems, and the MSD’s board pledged its own study after an angry public meeting during which Johnson called one African American MSD commissioner an “Uncle Tom.” After a large illegal dump was discovered in a remote corner of Auburn Gresham, four city sanitation workers who were excavating the waste for transfer were “overcome by noxious garbage fumes” and hospitalized.

On June 30, WMI’s Mary Ryan proposed to Chicago’s city council that if the city would set aside its existing moratorium on landfill growth, WMI would move forward with an “economic and community development assistance program” that could be a huge “‘catalyst’ toward revitalizing” the entire Southeast Side. But Ryan’s proposal only intensified the fury of local activists like Marian Byrnes, Vi Czachorski, and Hazel Johnson over a possible deal between the city and WMI to expand landfill capacity. “Perhaps Washington is Vrdolyak in disguise on dump issues,” James Landing, the chairman of the Lake Calumet Study Committee (LCSC), told his fellow allies.

With a new and energetic Chicago chapter of the international environmental group Greenpeace eagerly joining in, Southeast Side activists prepared for a July 29 blockade of all dumping at CID. A large rally drew media coverage, and a dozen or more Greenpeace members and local activists would chain themselves together to CID’s entrance gate to block waste trucks from entering the landfill. By the morning of the twenty-ninth, DCP’s Dan Lee, Cathy Askew, Margaret Bagby, Loretta Augustine, Betty Garrett, and Obama joined the protesters. Cathy recalled years later, “He led that. He led that in the background. He had to be there to bail them out.”

The day was “beastly hot,” one young Greenpeace member remembered, and “wearing a media-friendly buttoned-down shirt” became a sweaty mistake. But the blockade was a grand success. The Daily Calumet reported that a crowd of 150 people gathered and said it was “the largest environmental protest in years.” As many as a hundred waste trucks were backed up on the nearby expressway and unable to enter CID, as protesters chanted, “Take it back!” They blocked the entry gate from 10:00 A.M. until midafternoon. One photo caption said: “Wearing a gas mask, Deacon Daniel Lee of the Developing Communities Project . . . makes a point about odors and toxic wastes.”

Some reporters lost interest as the day dragged on, and the next morning’s Sun-Times erroneously reported that “there were no arrests.” Leonard Lamkin, an East Side activist who joined the chain-in, said that “when the media went away, that’s when they made the arrests.” Hazel Johnson and Marian Byrnes were among the sixteen participants taken into custody, and the women remained jailed for six hours even though the men were released in less than two. Scott Sederstrom, the young, overdressed Greenpeacer, thought “it was almost an act of mercy by the Chicago police to take us into their air-conditioned precinct house for booking. . . . The Cubs game was on TV in the station” and comments about baseball leavened the fingerprinting process. “As a further act of generosity, they let me stay in the air-conditioned area watching a little more of the game” instead of moving Sederstrom to a holding cell. Given the Cubs’ all-too-typical performance, though—they were trailing 10–0 by the seventh-inning stretch—interest in the game understandably waned. Weeks later the charges were dropped against defendants who agreed not to enter any WMI properties for one year.<sup>53</sup>

Before the summer ended, Hazel Johnson and Marian Byrnes staged three more protests near the CID entrance, taking care not to get arrested. They also testified before the special joint legislative committee, chaired by Emil Jones. Assisting Hazel was a thirty-five-year-old black man who had just returned to Chicago after working toward a master’s degree at Harvard University’s Kennedy School of Government and who had earlier won a Rhodes Scholarship to attend Oxford University in England. Like Jones, Melvin J. “Mel” Reynolds was eyeing a challenge against incumbent U.S. congressman Gus Savage in the spring 1988 Democratic primary, and both men—like Savage—were eager to raise their profiles among district residents angry over authorities’ inability to take meaningful action against the Southeast Side’s multiple toxic threats.

Several months earlier, Harold Washington had elevated Howard Stanback to an influential post as his assistant in charge of the city’s infrastructure. An African American economist, Stanback had taught at New York’s New School for Social Research until he came to Chicago as Maria Cerda’s deputy at MOET. His new appointment made him the mayor’s primary adviser on Chicago’s landfill crisis, and in late summer 1987, Stanback gave Washington a memo that laid out the city's options. Chicago had done "very little towards developing and implementing alternatives to dumping," making the city almost completely dependent on landfill availability. The only solution was "the O'Brien Locks property currently owned by the Metropolitan Sanitary District," but using that property would mean lifting the moratorium and incurring a huge uproar from Southeast Chicago.

Stanback gave the mayor two options for how to proceed. One would be to convey the land to WMI, to whom "the site is probably worth $1 billion," and in order "to neutralize opposition to lifting the moratorium," WMI would contribute sufficient funds to the surrounding neighborhoods, just as Mary Ryan's outreach efforts envisioned. Stanback believed that this could succeed, even with WMI's "negative image," and that this was superior to the second option, which would involve the city itself operating a landfill on the O'Brien Locks property. Stanback believed political opposition would be higher to this scenario because it would not include WMI's contributing to community revitalization projects. "Operating a landfill is not a business the City should enter," Stanback recommended.

One Saturday, Stanback drove to South Chicago to meet Bruce Orenstein at UNO's East 91st Street office. Also there that morning was DCP's Barack Obama, whom Bruce had asked to join them. Stanback described the city's thinking regarding the landfill and WMI's proposal, but he also explained that Washington wanted to be sure that WMI's big gift would not be controlled by the Southeast Side's traditional power brokers, particularly South Chicago Savings Bank president James A. Fitch, a longtime backer of mayoral rival Ed Vrdolyak and the dominant figure in the four-year-old Southeast Chicago Development Commission (SEDCOM). If a deal could be cut with WMI, the mayor wanted his allies—such as UNO, with whom Washington had worked in close alliance for four years—to take charge of the windfall.

"Barack in particular, his eyes got so bright," Stanback remembered. "He said, 'This can be one of the biggest community development coups of all time.' I said, 'You're right,'" but UNO at present had no development capacity. "We agreed that nothing was going to happen anytime soon," Stanback recalled, but "we agreed in principle" that UNO, DCP, and the city would closely coordinate as discussions moved forward. When Fitch then wrote to another Washington aide, budget director Sharon Gist Gilliam, to initiate a discussion of lifting the moratorium to allow for WMI's use of the O'Brien parcel, Gilliam waited twelve days before sending Fitch a cold, rude reply stating that she had given his letter to Stanback.<sup>54</sup>

For Obama, the late summer of 1987 was a busy and intense time. Throughout July, his hourly consultations with Greg Galluzzo were more than weekly, but from August forward the two men met only twice monthly, as Greg began having ninety-minute or longer sessions with Johnnie Owens almost weekly. One weekend, Barack met Ann and Maya in New York, where Maya was looking at Barnard College and Ann was visiting friends before returning to Pakistan via London. A rooftop photograph shows Ann and Barack with several of her anthropologist friends, including Tim Jessup, who had first met Barack in Jakarta four years earlier and had seen him again in Brooklyn in 1985 with Genevieve. Barack stayed with Hasan and Raazia Chandoo in Brooklyn Heights, playing basketball nearby with Hasan and walking across the Brooklyn Bridge into Manhattan.

Hasan recalled that "by that time he knows for sure he wants to be a political person," and Beenu Mahmood, then a lawyer in Sidley & Austin's New York office, remembered the visit similarly. "By that time he was very clear that he was going into politics” and “it was very clear that law would be the vehicle for getting into politics for him.” Several nights Raazia cooked dinner, but one thing had most definitely changed: by 1987 Barack never again “partied” as he had so many times in 1984 and 1985. Hasan recalled Barack mentioning how brutally cold Chicago winters were and also remembers him describing the time he and Johnnie had to duck behind a car when they heard gunfire nearby in Palmer Park. Raazia, five years younger, found “Barack a little bit arrogant”—just “intellectually arrogant,” Hasan interjected—“so I didn’t want much to do with him.”

Obama was back in Chicago by the end of the second week in August, and he may or may not have seen a prominent headline in the Defender that would have reminded him of an influential relationship from earlier in his life: “Frank Davis Dead at 81.” During Sheila’s midsummer visit home, she told her mother much of what Barack had said to her in recent months, and Shinko Jager in turn recounted Sheila’s comments to Mike Dees, the family’s closest friend, who had met Barack months earlier during the Christmas holiday. Barack’s marriage proposal still loomed, and “if Sheila went with Barack, she would have to follow his lead. He wanted to be president.” Shinko remained opposed to the marriage, “but she never gave a reason,” Mike recounted. “I was against it because I thought they were two ambitious people, and I knew they wanted their own separate careers, and he was talking about being president, which I thought was a little strange” for a twenty-five-year-old community organizer. But there was also something more, something Barack had begun to articulate to Sheila. “There was a problem there,” Mike recalled. “He was concerned if he was going to take the steps to the presidency with a white wife.”

One August Friday, Sheila joined Barack for the trip to Asif’s summer house in Madison. Sheila was “very quiet” and slept in the back of the car most of the drive, but an unusual tension was present. By Saturday morning, the problem broke into the open, and Barack and Sheila kept pretty much to themselves upstairs. But according to someone there that weekend, “it’s the summer . . . these houses are old. You’d die if you closed windows. Everything is open.” From morning onward “they went back and forth, having sex, screaming yelling, having sex, screaming yelling.” It continued all day. “That whole afternoon they went back and forth between having sex and fighting.”

Others remember “moving around to the other side of the porch just to be able to talk.” It “was a long weekend” and “an incredibly unpleasant one,” one person recalled. “It was so stressed and tense.” Barack tried “to be more social about it,” and “they came down a few times to grab a beer, to eat,” but “then they went back up to scream or fight.” Sheila was “a very sweet person . . . very mild-mannered,” and “certainly exotic” in her looks, but “shy and withdrawn” that “extremely emotional” weekend.

“They called truces here and there, but it kept popping back up” that Saturday afternoon, as “she screamed and they fought.” Sheila’s voice came through loud and clear: “That’s wrong! That’s wrong! That’s not a reason,” she was heard saying. As the others talked quietly, the explanation of what they were hearing was shared: Barack’s political destiny meant that he and Sheila could not have a long-term future together, no matter how deeply they loved each other. But she refused to accept his rationale: “the fact that it was her race.” It was clear—audibly clear—that “she was unbelievably in love with him,” that “the sex for her was the way to bring it back.” Barack “was very drawn to her, they were very close,” yet he felt trapped between the woman he loved and the destiny he knew was his. According to one friend, Barack “wasn’t black enough to pull that off and to rise up” with a white wife.

Sunday afternoon Barack drove them south to Chicago, with Sheila again napping in the back seat.

“Thank god it’s a crappy car that made a lot of noise!” A quarter century later, Sheila had almost no recollection of going with Barack to Madison, but she unhesitatingly characterized their relationship as “a very tumultuous love affair.” No matter how others saw Obama, “the Barack I knew was not emotionally detached, in control, and cool,” she stressed. Instead, Barack was “a very passionate, sentimental” and “deeply emotional person,” indeed “the most overwhelmingly passionate and caring person I ever knew.”

In Barack’s workday world, Cathy Askew, the white single mother of two half-black daughters, witnessed most starkly Barack’s newly articulated racial identity. With a new school year about to begin, Cathy told Barack about what she considered a perplexing and offensive racial conundrum: although the Chicago Board of Health said her daughters were black, their school in West Pullman wanted to count them as white. Cathy rejected this binary view of racial identity—“50-50 is a good term”—and expected biracial Barack to agree. She was astounded when he rejected any middle ground, especially since he had spent most of his childhood in a predominantly “hapa” world. But he did. “He said, ‘Well, there comes a time when you have to pick a side, you have to choose a side,’” Cathy remembered him saying. And Barack repeated it: “You have to choose.”

More than a decade later, Barack again gave voice to the sentiment he had expressed to Cathy. “For persons of mixed race to spend a lot of time insisting on their mixed race status touches on a fear” that a darker complexion is innately inferior to a lighter one, and too many nonwhite people are “color-struck. . . . There’s a history among African Americans . . . that somehow if you’re whitened a little bit that somehow makes you better, and that’s always been a distasteful notion to me,” perhaps ever since seeing that magazine story one day in Jakarta. “To me, defining myself as African American already acknowledges my hybrid status,” and “I don’t have to go around advertising that I’m of mixed race to acknowledge those aspects of myself that are European . . . they’re already self-apparent, and they’re in the definition of me being a black American.” Any other mind-set intimated racism. “I’m suspicious of . . . attitudes that would deny our blackness.”<sup>55</sup>

Fred Hess knew well ahead of time that September 1987 would witness a train wreck of historic proportions for Chicago Public Schools. The board of education needed to negotiate new contracts with multiple unions, most important the Chicago Teachers Union (CTU), and in midsummer, Hess had told the board that it could afford to offer a pay increase of 3.5 percent to teachers. Instead, the board announced a three-day reduction in the upcoming school year, thereby cutting teachers’ pay by 1.7 percent. The CTU demanded a 10 percent salary increase, and Superintendent Manford Byrd asserted that CPS could afford no raise at all. Hess labeled that claim “a bunch of bull,” and on September 4, four days before schools were to open, more than 90 percent of CTU members voted to strike.

The strike began on September 8, with Hess warning the Sun-Times that “it’s going to be a long strike because it looks like it has turned into a question of principle,” especially for Byrd. In a subsequent op-ed in the Tribune, Hess denounced “an administration that insists on adding central office administrators while cutting other employees’ salaries.” More than 430,000 students were out of school, and on September 11 a large group of parents and students from sixteen community groups picketed CPS headquarters, with the group’s spokesman, Sokoni Karanja, telling the news media that “our children are victims of a school system that is failing to educate them.”

Karanja was a forty-seven-year-old African American native of Topeka, Kansas, who had earned a Ph.D. from Brandeis University in 1971 before moving to Chicago’s historic Bronzeville neighborhood, joining Trinity UCC, and founding a family-aid organization he christened the Centers for New Horizons. Nine months earlier, Karanja had become the Woods Fund's first black board member, but this September 11 was significant because it illuminated the deepest social and political chasm in black Chicago: African American families with children in heavily minority public schools were fighting against a system made up of 41.6 percent black administrators and 47 percent black teachers.

Those numbers explained why Harold Washington had been so ambivalent four months earlier when he seemingly embraced school reform. The city's public schools provided middle-class salaries and middle-class status to thousands of black Chicago families, while at the same time they were shortchanging tens of thousands of black students. The human toll was staggering: more than 40 percent of African American men in Chicago in their early twenties and 35 percent of young African American women were unemployed, many of them lacking basic job skills because the CPS had not offered them real schooling.

"Our education system is in shambles," Rob Mier, Washington's economic development commissioner, publicly acknowledged. "We're producing a legion of functional illiterates." Some critics described "a vicious circle of incompetence," with CPS hiring teachers who had graduated from weak nearby state universities, which enrolled mainly ill-prepared graduates of Chicago high schools. As Fred Hess kept emphasizing, the abysmal state of public education in Chicago was the result not of a lack of resources, but instead of their dramatic misallocation: during the 1980s, "the number of central office administrators rose by 29 percent while the number of staff members in the schools rose by 2 percent." By 1987, CPS's central bureaucracy had reached an astonishing thirteen thousand employees.

On Thursday, September 17, two hundred angry parents picketed outside Harold Washington's Hyde Park apartment building while others targeted the homes of Governor Jim Thompson, new board of education president Frank Gardner, and CTU president Jacqueline Vaughn. The next morning more than a thousand parents and children picketed outside CPS headquarters, but as the strike moved into its third week, neither the board nor the union were showing any signs of compromise. Superintendent Manford Byrd, furious at Fred Hess's disparagement of CPS's central administration, wrote his own op-ed for the Tribune, claiming that the system's fundamental problem was "the extraordinary special needs of most Chicago public school students."

That remarkable assertion—a school superintendent labeling the majority of his system's children as "special needs" students—laid bare the deep class divide within black Chicago between middle-class professionals and "those people." As Hess later explained, again echoing John McKnight's analysis, Byrd's explicit articulation of a "deficit model of 'at-risk'" children revealed the attitudes of administrators "whose jobs depend on the existence of a pool of 'at-risk' students as clients." Unable to see that students might bring strengths to school, CPS bureaucrats could not imagine that Chicago's schools, "rather than the students themselves, might be to blame for students' lack of success," Hess explained. Only by reallocating power from CPS headquarters to local schools so as to "reemphasize local communities rather than large, hierarchical bureaucracies" could meaningful educational improvement be attained.

While most parents and community groups were angry with the CTU as well as the board, UNO simply backed the teachers' demands. As the strike entered its third week, the parents' groups, with support from Anne Hallett at Wieboldt and input from Al Raby, came together as the People's Coalition for Educational Reform (PCER). On Thursday, October 1, in what the Tribune called a “dramatic confrontation,” a predominantly black group of PCER representatives, many of whom were close allies of Harold Washington, told both the board and the CTU that a 3 percent raise must be agreed upon to end the strike. First the board, overruling Byrd, and then a reluctant CTU, bowed to the coalition’s demand, and on Saturday morning it was announced that schools would reopen on Monday. Nineteen days of classroom time had been lost in “the longest public employee strike in Illinois history.”

On Sunday, Harold Washington summoned Casey Banas, the Tribune’s education reporter, to his Hyde Park home. The mayor wanted everyone to know he understood the significance of the parents’ protests. “Never have I seen such tremendous anger and never have I seen a stronger commitment on the part of people” to make Chicago a better city. But Washington also did not want to alienate the black educators Manford Byrd represented. “There’s no discipline in many homes. There’s no stimulus in many homes. And even though the educational structure is a poor substitute to supply what the family is not supplying, it must be done,” the mayor declared. He said he would personally lead a new, far more inclusive iteration of his Education Summit to reform Chicago’s public schools. It would begin the next Sunday at the University of Illinois’s Chicago Circle campus (UICC). “We’re going to have a massive forum,” Washington promised.<sup>56</sup>

Obama and DCP had remained entirely on the sidelines throughout the protests against the shutdown. On the Monday of the strike’s final week, and after three months of trying, Barack finally had an appointment with Harold Washington’s top policy adviser, Hal Baron, to pitch his Career Education Network plan to the mayor. It was entirely thanks to John McKnight that Baron consented to see Obama, despite education aide and Roseland native Joe Washington’s negative attitude. “I did it purely as a favor to John McKnight,” Baron recalled. “John was just so high on him. . . . I think John wanted me to get him a meeting with the mayor, but he pestered me and I finally did a meeting with him myself.” Joe Washington joined Baron in Hal’s City Hall office, but Barack’s presentation was anything but persuasive. Baron remembers it as “cocky standard Alinsky bullshit” and “very glib.” He also recalls Obama saying, “We’ve got Roseland organized.” After Barack left empty-handed, Joe Washington told Baron what he thought: “That guy doesn’t know shit about Roseland.”

Far more fruitful for Obama was his relationship with John McKnight. Barack’s reactions to now two years of immersion in the macho, conflict-seeking world of Alinskyite organizing—including his first year with Jerry Kellman, dozens of hours with Greg Galluzzo, and his warm, almost brotherly relationship with fifteen-years-older Mike Kruglik—had drawn him toward McKnight’s alternative vision of human communities. At least twice Barack drove up to McKnight’s second home in Spring Green, Wisconsin, west of Madison, for weekend-long discussions. He was the only young organizer other than Bob Moriarty with whom McKnight had developed a truly personal relationship, and one weekend Barack brought Sheila along with him. Jerry, Greg, Johnnie, Mary Bernstein, Bruce Orenstein, and Linda Randle would all remember meeting Sheila a time or two, usually by chance in Hyde Park or at her and Barack’s apartment on South Harper. “She’s a cutie,” Bruce remembered, but virtually never did Barack seek for anyone in his workday world to meet or know the woman with whom he lived. Mike Kruglik never laid eyes on her.

But one Friday Barack drove north with Sheila, and McKnight remembered Barack calling him from the Penguin, a working-class bar in nearby Sauk City, to say that his shabby Honda had broken down. John drove in to pick them up, and Barack introduced him to Sheila, whom McKnight thought was “absolutely stunning.” The regulars at the Penguin “must have been pretty surprised when that couple walked in,” McKnight suggested.

That weekend, like others, was spent mostly “talking about ideas,” McKnight recounted. Barack had a “set of things he was concerned about that he didn’t think he could talk with Kellman or Greg about that was outside the true faith.” McKnight, as a longtime Gamaliel board member, knew how “absolutely rigid” Greg was about the Alinsky model’s view that the way to make people “feel powerful was their anger,” instead of feeling “powerful because of their contributions.” Barack was deeply averse to anger and confrontation, and therein lay his difficulty with the attitude that Alinsky organizing sought to inculcate in its young initiates. McKnight remembered these discussions were “mostly my . . . responding to him about questions he had,” with McKnight talking about how his asset orientation differed from the “really true faith people” like Greg. McKnight had just written a powerful new paper, “The Future of Low-Income Neighborhoods and the People Who Reside There,” addressing what he termed “client neighborhoods.” Anyone who had spent time in Altgeld Gardens would have appreciated McKnight’s analysis. Such areas are “places of residence for people who are not a part of the productive process” and “have no hopeful future.” What was needed was “a new vision of neighborhood that focuses every available resource upon production.” In a sentence that reached directly back to the quintessential lesson of the 1960s’ southern freedom movement, McKnight insisted that for a group like DCP, “it is the identification of leadership capacities in every citizen that is the basis for effective community organization.”

As McKnight and Obama continued to talk throughout 1987, what became “very clear to me was that I was talking to a young man who had not bought the true faith,” McKnight remembered, one who had come to realize that Alinskyism “is ultimately parochial” and offered no prospects whatsoever for attaining large-scale social change. As the best historian of Chicago racism, Beryl Satter, would incisively note, Alinskyism’s “insistence on fighting only for winnable ends guaranteed that” community organizing “would never truly confront the powerful forces devastating racially changing and black neighborhoods.”

McKnight’s long-term impact on Obama would be profound, irrespective of how much Barack later remembered of their conversations or how few commentators were knowledgeable enough to hear the readily detectable echos. “If you want to see an intellectual influence on Obama’s thinking, it’s John McKnight,” citizenship scholar Harry Boyte told one Washington audience two decades later. “A lot of things started in part through John McKnight,” observed Harvey Lyon, a Gamaliel board colleague whose political roots also reached back to the 1960s. Stanley Hallett, an influential urban development pioneer, a onetime theology school classmate of Martin Luther King Jr., and the husband of Wieboldt’s Anne Hallett, was also deeply influenced by McKnight. For Hallett, directing public funds to service poor people’s professionally identified needs is “money spent to maintain people in a condition of dependency,” Hallett told one interviewer. Progressive public officials needed to stop “looking at people in terms of their problems instead of their capabilities.”<sup>57</sup>

The People’s Coalition for Educational Reform issued its demands in advance of the mayor’s Sunday, October 11, summit. Calling for local school-based management, greater parental involvement in schools, a requirement that 80 percent of students perform at or above grade-level standards, and deep cuts in CPS’s huge central bureaucracy, PCER made clear its student-centered focus: “We do not want cuts to affect anyone providing direct service to students.” On Sunday, almost a thousand people packed UICC’s Pavilion as the mayor slowly made his way through the crowd. The Tribune described the almost four-hour program as having a “town-meeting atmosphere,” and called it “the most remarkable gathering to focus on the Chicago public schools in at least 25 years.” Washington proclaimed that “a thorough and complete overhaul of the system is necessary,” promised to appoint a fifty-member parent/community advisory council within two weeks, and pledged to present a unified reform plan within four months.

Washington soon convened the first meeting of his Parent Community Council, promising it would begin holding neighborhood forums before the end of November. The city’s most influential biracial coalition of business leaders, Chicago United, also shared its own school reform plan with the Tribune. Angry at Manford Byrd for his arrogance and disinterest in meaningful change, Chicago United had adopted the belief of Fred Hess and Don Moore that the best path toward improved student performance was through parental and community control of local schools. Patrick J. Keleher Jr., Chicago United’s public policy director, said, “we think the leadership could be found” and that organizations such as UNO could recruit and train interested parents.<sup>58</sup>

At the same time, Barack’s DCP work remained often frustrating. Some Saturday mornings he met with the Congregation Involvement Committee at Rev. Rick Williams’s biracial Pullman Christian Reformed Church, while he and Johnnie Owens also met with two Chicago State University (CSU) professors who had just started a Neighborhood Assistance Center. The only result of that was Barack being invited to join a CSU-sponsored panel at a mid-October conference on “Developing Illinois’ Economy.” One of his fellow panelists, CSU’s Mark Bouman, addressed “the spectacular fall of big steel,” and another speaker was Chicago Tribune business editor Richard Longworth, who had written so forcefully about Frank Lumpkin’s efforts on behalf of Wisconsin Steel’s former workers. Whatever Barack contributed to the session was unmemorable, for Longworth, looking two decades later at a photograph of himself and Obama sitting side by side, had no recollection of the event whatsoever.

In Roseland, significant economic development news came from the low-profile Chicago Roseland Coalition for Community Control (CRCCC), a twelve-year-old organization that had successfully followed through on the interdenominational protests against Beverly Bank that Alonzo Pruitt and Al Sampson had mounted seven months earlier. When the bank announced plans to open a new branch in suburban Oak Lawn, the little-known Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) of 1977 allowed CRCCC to petition the Federal Deposit Insurance Commission (FDIC) to block that expansion. Three years earlier Beverly Bank had stopped making home mortgage loans, leaving it vulnerable to FDIC enforcement of the CRA’s community service requirements that proscribed disinvestment in older neighborhoods. Advising and guiding CRCCC’s strategy was the similarly low-profile Woodstock Institute, a nonprofit fair-lending organization created in 1973 by five founders, three of whom were John McKnight, Al Raby, and Stan Hallett. Woodstock vice president Josh Hoyt, an organizer who previously had worked under Greg Galluzzo and Mary Gonzales at UNO’s Back of the Yards and Pilsen affiliates, brought the Beverly situation to the attention of U.S. Senate Banking Committee chairman William Proxmire’s staff, and Proxmire wrote to FDIC chairman William Seidman. Soon Beverly Bank was in negotiations with CRCCC president Willie Lomax, and the national American Banker publicized the tussle. By mid-September Beverly had agreed to commit $20 million worth of loans to low-income Far South Side neighborhoods over the next four years and to open central Roseland’s first ATM. “We made use of some tools of the law to get the bank here,” the courageous Lomax told the weekly Chicago Reader’s excellent political reporter Ben Joravsky. “We had to play hardball.”<sup>59</sup>

The “tools of the law” were increasingly on Barack’s mind by October 1987. Going to law school had been a possibility for years, ever since his graduation from Columbia. His grandmother more than once had spoken of a career in law and then a judgeship, and Barack had never seen his work as a community organizer as something long term. He had mentioned going to law school in passing to several people in recent years—IAF’s Arnie Graf being one—and early in 1987 Barack had heard a National Public Radio interview with Supreme Court justice William J. Brennan Jr. Brennan told NPR’s Nina Totenberg that the guarantees in the Constitution’s Bill of Rights are “there to protect all of us” and to “protect the minority from being overwhelmed by the majority.” Barack would later recall what he termed “the wisdom and conviction” of Brennan’s words.

Barack’s embrace of his “destiny,” as he described it to Sheila, had quickened his thinking for the last six months. Kellman’s move to Gary had left DCP entirely in Barack’s hands until he had been able to hire Johnnie Owens, but once Johnnie was on board, Barack’s references to law school—to Sheila, to his close friend Asif Agha, to Asif’s friend Doug Glick on their long drives up to Madison and back—became far more frequent. Early that fall Bobby Titcomb, Barack’s closest Hawaii friend, passed through Chicago, and he remembers Barack talking then about wanting to get a law degree. Asif left Chicago in early November for six months in Nepal, and one October evening, not long before he left, he went to Barack and Sheila’s apartment on South Harper. “We used to cook dinner for each other a lot,” said Asif, and that evening Barack was out on one of his several-days-a-week runs along Hyde Park’s lakeshore. “I was sitting with Sheila in the kitchen, and he walked in all sweaty,” wearing shorts, and “I remember him saying something about his law school essay, and that he had been mulling it over for many days, maybe weeks.” Mary Bernstein remembered Barack mentioning it to her as well. He had cited Harvard in particular to Asif—“his dad went to Harvard,” Asif remembered, “so he had some interest in Harvard” and “that was his first choice.” Asif had not heard what Barack had told Sheila about a “destiny,” but after two years of weekly conversations, he knew Barack “was an ambitious person.”

Several weeks earlier, Jerry Kellman told Obama about a conference titled “The Disadvantaged Among the Disadvantaged: Responsibility of the Black Churches to the Underclass.” It would be held in late October at Harvard Divinity School in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Barack agreed they should go. The weekend of “study, reflection, and worship,” as the divinity school’s dean termed it, for the two hundred attendees began on Friday evening with a sermon by Samuel D. Proctor, pastor of New York’s Abyssinian Baptist Church and one of the most famous living black preachers. Proctor’s sermon “chilled us,” one listener recounted, with its description of “the ordinary terrors of normal life in Harlem.”

Saturday morning featured a powerful and provocative lecture by Philadelphia congressman and clergyman William H. Gray. “Will we have a two-tiered society of the haves and the have-nots . . . or will we have a society . . . that allows people to move from the underclass on up?” Gray asked. For black Americans, “education is an absolute essential,” as the record was clear: “no education, no advancement,” and “blacks with no education have very little hope” of bettering their lives. Gray did not shy from naming other ills. “The leading cause of death among young black males is black-on-black crime. That’s us. Superfly selling drugs and coke in our community is not someone else. It’s us. Those who are mugging us, raping us, and robbing us are not coming from somewhere outside. It’s us. The teenage pregnancy problem is not the white man's problem, it's our problem. . . . You cannot ever escape poverty with children having children."

Two sets of four concurrent workshops bracketed a lunchtime lecture by sociologist William Julius Wilson. After the workshops ended, Jerry and Barack took a walk around the Harvard campus. "We didn't spend a lot of time with other people at the conference," Kellman recalled, "just with each other." During their stroll, Barack told him that he was applying to law schools. Kellman remembers Barack saying, "I owe it to you to let you know as soon as I can," and Kellman recalls being "very surprised." Kellman also remembers Barack saying he did not think that community organizing was an effective means for attaining large-scale change or a practical method for influencing elected officials who potentially could. Years later Obama described his thoughts similarly, saying that "many of the problems the communities were facing were not really local," and that he needed a better understanding of how America's economy worked "and how the legal structure shaped that economy." He also "wanted to find out how the private sector works, how it thinks." By "working at such a local level" he had learned that problems like joblessness and bad public schools were "citywide issues, statewide issues, national issues" and he wanted to "potentially have more power to shape the decisions that were affecting those issues." In a subsequent interview he would specifically cite decisions that "were being made downtown in City Hall or . . . at the state level." He had been able to get "outside of myself by becoming a community organizer," but the experience also had taught him that "community organizing was too localized and too small" to offer significant promise to those it sought to empower.

Saturday night's dinner speaker was Children's Defense Fund president Marian Wright Edelman, who one listener said presented a "terrifying analysis" and emphasized the need for "an ethic of achievement and self-esteem in poor and middle-class black children." Sunday morning the symposium concluded with a sermon by Harvard professor and pastor Peter J. Gomes, who worried that after two days of "some pretty depressing statistics, some very grim predictions, some very sobering analyses" the discussion had become "so intimidating, so daunting as to lead to paralysis rather than action. With more conferences like this, one will be terrified of thinking about any form of response." But Gomes believed the weekend's clear message was that "money, programs, and advocacy alone will not solve the problems of the underclass." Instead, a consensus had identified "despair as the root and fundamental disease: despair, the loss of hope, the loss of any sense of purpose, or worth, or direction, or place," an analysis all too true to someone familiar not only with Altgeld Gardens but also Chicago's Far South Side high schools.<sup>60</sup>

Back in Chicago on Monday, Barack wrote a congratulatory postcard to Phil Boerner, who had announced his upcoming marriage to his longtime girlfriend Karen McCraw. "Life in Chicago is pretty good," Barack wrote. "I remain the director of a community organization here, and I'm now considering going to law school. Makes for a busy life: not as much time to read and write as there used to be. Seeing a good woman, a doctoral student at Univ. of Chicago."

The next weekend was the beginning of Gamaliel's third weeklong training at suburban Techny Towers, with about sixty trainees joining the network's usual roster of trainers: Greg, Mary, Peter Martinez, Mike Kruglik, Phil Mullins, Danny Solis, and Barack. David Kindler now worked under Mike at SSAC in Cook County's south suburbs, and Kindler brought his Quad Cities friend Kevin Jokisch to the early November training. "Who you brought to training was a reflection of your ability as an organizer," Kindler explained, and Jokisch already had hands-on experience.

“Barack was always a great trainer,” Danny Solis remembered. “He had a presence.” After sitting in on two of Obama’s sessions, Jokisch agreed. “Barack was totally in control without appearing to be in control. . . . His sessions flowed, were all lively, and engaged participants. He drew people out, had them tell their stories in the context of the session he was leading. His style was different than many of the other trainers. Most of the trainers were aggressive, in-your-face types.” In contrast, “Barack and Mary Gonzales had a very similar way of moving, speaking, drawing people out, utilizing humor, and probably most importantly being trusted by those in the room.”

Most nights some of the trainers adjourned to an Italian restaurant and bar just down the road. “Obama showed up twice to have beers with us. The after-hours sessions were very lively,” Jokisch recalled. “Most of the debates were around politics and politicians,” with Barack jumping in. Phil Mullins remembers how Barack “saw the limitations of just pure community organization” and asked, “How do you get at these bigger issues?” Given Gamaliel’s IAF worldview, that meant Barack “was kind of out there on his own,” and he was “constantly asking himself what he actually thinks about something,” another colleague recalled. Phil, like Kindler, also knew that among all the organizers, Barack’s real relationship was with Kruglik. “That’s the tighter person-to-person relationship” for Obama, more so than Jerry or even Greg, Mullins recounted. It was “more personal,” because as everyone could see, “Kruglik’s a warmer personality.” Given his Princeton undergraduate education, plus his graduate school history background, Kruglik’s intellectual depth and acumen were unique among the Gamaliel network. He also possessed an uncommonly superb memory.

By November 1987, Mike and Barack had known each other well for more than two years, and with Mike Barack could be spontaneous and frank to a degree he rarely was with other organizing colleagues. Even a quarter century later, Mike remembered some of what Barack said to him that week. Barack’s time in Roseland had placed him “in the armpit of the region, as far away from the center of power as you can get,” and he saw a prestigious law degree as the first step on the road to true power. Mike disagreed, telling Barack not to leave organizing and instead to commit himself to building a citywide network of organizations broader than UNO’s set of community groups, a network so sweeping that it would represent the fulfillment of what King and Al Raby had hoped the 1966 Chicago Freedom Movement would become.

Barack demurred. A top law school would give him entrée to the corridors of power. “I can learn from these people what they know about power,” and a legal education would allow him to understand “financial strategies and banks and how money flows and how power flows. Then I can come back to Chicago and use that knowledge to build power for ordinary people.” But Barack was imagining more than just building a powerful network of community groups, Mike recalled. “He said to me, ‘I’m going to become mayor of Chicago. I’m thinking I should run for mayor of Chicago.’”

Barack believed that Chicago’s mayor was the most powerful of any U.S. city’s, one who with widespread grassroots support could begin the rebirth of neighborhoods like Roseland. ““At the end of the day, the question is, How do we lift people out of poverty? How do we change the lives of poor people, in the most profound manner?’ That’s what he was interested in,” Kruglik recounted.

And by November 1987, Barack had a specific political template in mind. “Harold was the inspiration,” Mike recalls. “Obama saw himself in a very specific way as following in the footsteps of Harold Washington . . . following the path to power of Harold Washington.” Ever since the mayor’s appearance at the opening of the Roseland jobs center, Barack's attempts to win direct access to Washington had foundered. "It's almost like he was saying to himself . . . 'I'm limited by the power of Harold Washington the mayor. Therefore the answer is, I'll be Harold Washington.' That's what happened," Kruglick explains. "The Harold path was to become a lawyer, become a state legislator, become a congressman, then become mayor. That's the Harold path."

Barack was "fascinated with Washington," Mike believed, and "replicating Washington step by step" was his game plan. "That was in his mind. He talked about that." Barack "was constantly thinking about his path to significance and power," and "Harold Washington inspired him to think about becoming a politician."<sup>61</sup>

The next Thursday was the launch of what Barack and DCP were now calling the Career Education Network's "Partnership for Educational Progress," a label borrowed at least in part from Chicago United's blueprint for improving the employment skills of public high school graduates. Ever since DCP's May decision to make education and particularly high school anti-dropout efforts a priority, Barack, Johnnie, and top DCP education volunteers like Aletha Strong Gibson, Ann West, and Carolyn Wortham had been in contact with Far South Side high school principals and guidance counselors and with officials at both Olive-Harvey College and Chicago State University. Thanks to Al Raby, who had just left his city human relations post so he could work for school reform at a newly founded consultancy called the Haymarket Group, Barack had recently met reform proponents Patrick Keleher, of Chicago United, and Sokoni Karanja.

In a fall proposal Obama would submit to multiple funders, he wrote that "the condition of the secondary school system called for a wider and more intensive campaign than we originally envisioned." But beyond the initial $25,000 that Emil Jones had obtained from the state board of education, CEN's only other support would be an additional $25,000 that the Woods Fund would soon officially announce.

Ever since early summer, Obama had met ambivalence among DCP's congregations about forcefully targeting the sorry state of Chicago's public schools. He later acknowledged that "every one of our churches was filled with teachers, principals, and district superintendents," or, as UNO's Phil Mullins more pungently yet properly put it, "if you removed every education bureaucrat from Reverend Wright's church, it would go under." Barack spent much of the last months of 1987 trying to expand DCP's base by approaching the pastors of largely Protestant, and mainly Baptist, Greater Roseland churches. He realized that these congregations "have had no direct involvement in the issues surrounding the public school system," and DCP wanted to enlighten them about "the need for broader reform in the school system." Jerry Kellman knew that Mary Bernstein's father, a senior Teamsters official, was a close colleague of Robert Healey, a former Chicago Teachers Union president who was now head of both the Chicago Federation of Labor and the Illinois Federation of Teachers. Mary arranged for Obama to meet with Healey, but Healey had no interest in aiding a movement that would empower parents.

Roseland's five high schools were in sorry shape. One study revealed, "High school students in Roseland are testing more than ten percent below the city-wide average," and that average was more than 30 percent below grade-level norms. The dropout rates at the two weakest schools, Harlan and Corliss, were rapidly increasing. Corliss's principal published an essay in the Journal of Negro Education describing her efforts to combat "gang activity and vandalism," "low teacher morale," "disrespectful attitude and behavior of students," and "student apathy and high failure rate" at her school. Julian, named after the pioneering black chemist Percy Julian, was considered to be the best of the five, but the principal there, Edward H. Oliver, still had a serious problem with ganglike female “social clubs.”

A crowd of three hundred showed up for CEN’s November 17 kickoff rally at Tyrone Partee’s Reformation Lutheran Church. The Defender covered the event, where DCP announced it would begin offering tutorial and counseling services at both Holy Rosary and Reformation in early 1988 to students referred by Carver, Fenger, and Julian high schools. Olive-Harvey College president Homer Franklin as well as Chicago State University vice president Johnny Hill pledged their institutions’ assistance, and Chicago United policy director Patrick Keleher said that his organization would arrange for employment internships.<sup>62</sup>

Barack was also keeping up with the city’s landfill crisis. When the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency issued a report attributing the South Side’s poor air quality to highway traffic and wood-burning stoves without mentioning landfills, the Tribune said that UNO’s Mary Ellen Montes “laughed when told of the EPA’s findings. ‘That’s crazy. Wood-burning stoves? Are there any left?’” Then the Sun-Times revealed that the Paxton Landfill had been operating without the necessary permits since 1983. The newspapers had a field day at the Washington administration’s expense, but mayoral aide Howard Stanback remained focused on the O’Brien Locks issue.

On November 16 South Chicago Savings Bank president Jim Fitch convened an initial meeting of all interested parties, ranging from South Deering’s Foster Milhouse to Bruce Orenstein and Mary Ellen Montes from UNO and hard-core landfill opponents Marian Byrnes and Hazel Johnson, who did not like anything they heard. Four days later Lake Calumet environmentalist James Landing distributed a letter warning that the Washington administration “is making prodigious attempts” to win over opponents of a new O’Brien Locks landfill.<sup>63</sup>

On Wednesday morning November 25, the day before Thanksgiving, a Chicago Tribune headline announced “948 School Jobs Axed for Teachers’ Raises.” In order to meet the pay raises in CPS’s new union contracts, 167 elementary school teachers had been terminated. Then, at 11:01 that morning, Harold Washington collapsed with a heart attack in his City Hall office. The sixty-five-year-old mayor was seriously overweight, and attempts to revive him were unsuccessful. An official announcement was delayed for more than two hours, but word that Washington had died spread rapidly throughout the city, with tearful crowds gathering outside City Hall.

“Mayor’s Death Stuns City” read one headline the next day. Black Chicago’s loss was especially painful and heartfelt. Seven months earlier, when Washington was reelected, the Tribune editorialized that “he has been a symbol more than a leader,” but he was also the greatest “symbol of black empowerment” the city had ever seen. Only with his April 1986 erasure of Ed Vrdolyak’s city council majority had Washington truly become Chicago’s mayor, and as one Tribune story poignantly declared, “Washington’s legacy is not what he did, but what he was on the verge of doing.”

The next morning the Tribune lauded Washington as “a symbol of success and dreams realized for people who felt they had little reason to dream, let alone achieve,” while again noting that “his tangible record of accomplishments is a short list.” Economic development commissioner Rob Mier would write that “many of his goals and plans remained unfulfilled or barely started.” Mier also recognized that Chicago’s loss was greater because Washington had “died at the peak of his power.”

Tribune reporter John Kass highlighted how Washington had been “an incredibly charismatic leader,” but one of Washington's most fervent early backers identified the mayor's greatest mistake. "He took the power to himself, almost like Mayor Daley" in earlier decades, "and the political maturity of black politics stopped while he increased his power." White 49th Ward reform alderman David Orr, who became interim mayor upon Washington's death, had articulated the underlying problem months earlier: "There's a large group of black aldermen . . . who don't support reform but who have to vote with the mayor because he's so popular in their wards." By tolerating rather than purging those black aldermen who professed to support him while nonetheless remaining fully loyal to the Democratic party machine, Washington had advanced "his own political self-interest at the expense of institutionalizing his reform movement," wrote historian Bill Grimshaw, the husband of Washington's top political aide, Jacky Grimshaw.

The enormity of Washington's failure became clear within the first hours after his death, as his city council majority sundered into two angrily hostile camps. Washington's true supporters rallied behind the mayor's council leader, 4th Ward alderman Tim Evans, with whom Barack and DCP's Altgeld asbestos protesters had met eighteen months earlier. Washington's opponents eagerly reached out to the black machine aldermen, who now controlled the balance of power in a political world where they no longer had to bow to a singularly charismatic leader. Washington's political base "unraveled immediately after he was pronounced dead," John Kass wrote, and Rob Mier also rued "the immediate collapse of his political coalition."

Over the Thanksgiving holiday weekend, the two factions warred publicly as Washington's body lay in state for a fifty-six-hour around-the-clock wake in the lobby of City Hall. Monday night at the UICC Pavilion where Washington had hosted his Education Summit just seven weeks earlier, his official memorial service turned into a political rally for Evans. Yet the only votes that would count were those of the fifty city council members, and by Tuesday morning, there was little question that 6th Ward black machine alderman Eugene Sawyer would become Chicago's next mayor thanks to Washington's hard-core opponents plus at least five black aldermen who would support Sawyer over Evans.

As Tuesday night's council meeting convened, a crowd of thousands stood outside City Hall, chanting "No deals" and "We want Evans." Clownish behavior marred the council's proceedings as protesters mocked black Sawyer allies like 9th Ward alderman Robert Shaw, and Sawyer was not formally elected as Harold Washington's successor and sworn into office until 4:00 A.M. Wednesday.

In skin color Gene Sawyer was just as black as Harold Washington, but as the angry crowd well knew, Chicago now had a completely different mayor than the one it had just buried. When Sawyer was asked by a historian some months later about Washington nemesis Ed Vrdolyak, his answer highlighted the chasm: "He's a fun guy!"<sup>64</sup>

"I loved Harold Washington," Barack blurted out years later when asked what he had thought of the mayor. He once wrongly but perhaps wishfully stated that in 1985 "I came because of Harold Washington," and at another time, he mused that "part of the reason, I think, I had been attracted to Chicago was reading about Harold Washington." There was no doubt that Washington, or more precisely Washington's treatment at the hands of the Vrdolyak majority during Barack's first nine months in Chicago, contributed in some degree to Barack's own embrace of a resolutely black racial identity. "Every single day it was about race. I mean every day it was black folks and white folks going at each other. Every day, in the newspapers, on TV, in meetings. You couldn't get away from it," Obama later recounted. "It was impossible for Harold to do anything."

Upon his arrival in Chicago, and throughout all of his Oxy and Columbia years prior to Jesse Jackson's 1984 presidential run, Barack had been "skeptical of electoral politics as a strategy for social change," he later acknowledged. "I was pretty skeptical about politics. I always thought that the compromises involved in politics probably didn't suit me." Jerry Kellman, Greg Galluzzo, and the Alinsky tradition of organizing certainly did not teach respect or admiration for elected officials. But watching Washington week after week, even if he had never been physically closer than in that nondescript Roseland storefront eight months earlier, had fundamentally changed Barack's mind. "You just had this sense that his ability to move people and set an agenda was always going to be superior to anything I could organize at a local level," Obama explained in 2011.

In his own telling years later, Obama was in that angry, chanting crowd outside the city council chambers that Tuesday night, witnessing what he called Washington's "second death." Yet even at the time he wrote that, Barack understood Washington's fundamental error, just as Bill Grimshaw had explained it. "Washington was the best of the classic politicians," Obama told an interviewer. "But he, like all politicians, was primarily interested in maintaining his power and working the levers of power. He was a classic charismatic leader, and when he died, all of that dissipated. This potentially powerful collective spirit that went into supporting him was never translated into clear principles, or into an articulable agenda for community change," Obama rightly stated in words that would echo painfully two decades later. "All that power dissipated."

Yet in those last weeks of 1987, Washington's death strengthened Barack's belief that now was the time to leave DCP for law school. He had "a sense that the city was going to be going through a transition, that the kinds of organizing work that I was doing wasn't going to be the focal point of people's attention because there were all these transitions and struggles and tumult that was going on in the African American community," he recalled in 2001. "So I decided it was a good time for me to pull back" and attend law school.

Barack's long-pondered personal essay was finished, but completing his application required soliciting letters of recommendation as well. Al Raby was a recognizable name to anyone who knew the history of the 1960s, and Michael Baron had given him an A for his senior year paper at Columbia, the most serious piece of coursework Barack had ever tackled. Now working at SONY, Baron readily agreed to write a letter. But Baron's knowledge of him was now more than four years dated, so Barack also went to see John McKnight, asking him to keep their conversation confidential, especially from Greg and Mary. "Would you write me a letter of reference? You're the only professor I know." McKnight immediately said yes, but asked Barack what his plans were. "I want to go into public life. I think I can see what can be done at the neighborhood level, but it's not enough change for me. I want to see what would happen in public life" and "I think I have to go to law school to do that." McKnight questioned whether Barack understood how fundamentally different life as an elected official would be from that of an organizer. While the latter was quintessentially an advocate, "my experience is that legislators are compromisers," McKnight observed, people who synthesize conflicting interests. "You want to go into a world of compromise?" he asked. Barack responded affirmatively, saying, "That's why I want to go into public life" and to pursue a role quite opposite that of a confrontational Alinsky organizer. "It's clear to him he's making a decision that that's not the way he's going," McKnight remembered. "He left for a different mode of seeking change."<sup>65</sup>

With Gene Sawyer uncomfortably ensconced in City Hall, the Parent Community Council's ten public forums were surrounded by uncertainty. At the first one, Chicago United's Patrick Keleher reiterated the business community's demand for dramatic reforms, and at the third Sawyer pledged "my commitment to the Washington reform agenda." In response, Manford Byrd protested that CPS's "many needy students" meant that any improvement in schools' performance would require "major additional funding" for more teachers, counselors, and, of course, "other professionals." DCP's Aletha Strong Gibson told one reporter that the reform movement would be undeterred by the mayor's loss. "Harold Washington did not move the community. The community moved Harold Washington," she declared. "It is incumbent upon us to keep our voices raised. We have to take back ownership of the schools."

Sawyer also inherited Chicago's landfill problem, with Howard Stanback seeking to quickly explain the city's O'Brien Locks strategy to the new mayor. Environmental activist James Landing realized that Washington's death would not alter the situation, and even he wondered whether the opponents should give up and join Jim Fitch's effort to agree on what the Southeast Side neighborhoods should demand from WMI. Senator Emil Jones's special legislative committee concluded its investigation by ruling "the lack of one centralized authority to address all environmental problems" in the area, but also bluntly acknowledging that continuing Chicago's ban on landfill expansion "is irresponsible unless the city is able to implement a successful citywide waste-disposal plan" through massive recycling.

At DCP, Barack and Johnnie were preparing the CEN tutoring program to start in early 1988, in both Roseland and Altgeld, undeterred by the December murder of an eighteen-year-old Gardens youth by five fellow teenagers, all members of the infamous Vice Lords gang. Weeks earlier Barack had asked Sheila to go with him to Honolulu for the Christmas holidays so that his relatives could meet her, the first time Barack had ever introduced a girlfriend to his family.

Madelyn had just turned sixty-five, and a year earlier had retired from the Bank of Hawaii. Stanley, almost seventy, was now retired too. Ann Dunham, still struggling to complete her dissertation, told her mentor Alice Dewey how much she was looking forward to meeting Sheila, and Sheila would always remember how exceptionally warm Ann was to her throughout the couple's visit to Honolulu. Ann was fascinated that Sheila had written her master's thesis on Claude Lévi-Strauss, and Sheila remembers the two of them "talking about that thesis, my time in Paris, and my work at Chicago." Ann was "genuinely very interested and warm and inquisitive. She was extremely generous with us and treated Barack with reverence. She really admired him and thought the world of him."

Even though Ann and Sheila liked each other very much, Sheila felt that Ann was not in favor of her and Barack getting married. She wondered if Ann "sensed what we already knew, that we were too isolated and would sophisticate each other." Sheila was especially struck by how everyone in Hawaii—Gramps, Toot, Maya—called Barack either "Bar" or "Barry." In Chicago, only Asif used "Barry." When Sheila called him "Barry for fun one day, just because everyone else was calling him that name," Obama's reaction was unforgettable. "He got so angry at me. Irrationally furious, I'd say. He told me that under no circumstances was I ever to use that name with him." Perhaps Obama had some deep boy-versus-man association to the two names, but Sheila understood that he "was very sensitive about this aspect of his life and wanted me walled off from it—like a lot of other things in his life."<sup>66</sup>

Back in Chicago, the mayor's Parent Community Council moved toward recommending that each Chicago public school be controlled by a locally elected governing board, but without Harold Washington present to embrace its conclusions, school reformers started arguing over which of several just slightly different proposals should be introduced in the state legislature. DCP participated tangentially, following UNO's lead, with Danny Solis in charge and Johnnie Owens rather than Barack following developments most closely.

In late January Barack wrote to Phil and Karen Boerner to apologize for missing their wedding, and updated them on his plans: "I've decided to go back to law school this fall—probably Harvard." At the end of the month, Barack also wrote to Anne Hallett at Wieboldt to submit DCP's 1988 grant application, but he gave no indication that he might be leaving DCP anytime soon. He wrote that "DCP has come a long way in the past year," most notably in hiring Owens, "someone with both the talent and background to become a lead organizer in his own right." Because of DCP's "success with the education issue . . . we have the potential in the coming year to become a truly powerful advocate for change not only in the area, but citywide," Barack boastfully asserted. "Whether we fulfill that potential will depend on two things: how well we parley the Career Education Network into a vehicle for organizing parents and community, and whether the relationships we have established with the major Black churches in the South Side translate into their making a full commitment" to DCP by contributing financially so that the organization could begin to wean itself from outside funders. "If we succeed, I envision us having 30 new churches involved by the end of 1988."

That was optimistic, because Obama's ongoing efforts to connect with dozens of black pastors had garnered polite conversations but few enlistments. If CEN was to grow beyond a small pilot program in which DCP housewives tutored dozens of high school students in a trio of church halls, funding was necessary for "significant expansion of the program by the State Legislature." Barack also still hoped that Olive-Harvey could reallocate resources "to create a comprehensive job training program with specific emphasis on Public Aid recipients and with the outreach and satellite facilities necessary to target the Altgeld Gardens population."

DCP would soon hire a CEN project coordinator, thanks to Emil Jones's state money and the Woods Fund, and hoped to approach major corporations through Chicago United. Barack's success at fund-raising had let him raise his own salary to $27,250 and Johnnie's to $24,000. Ideally Olive-Harvey would foot the bill to house CEN, but expanding the program for the 1988–89 school year depended on state board of education officials and state legislators.

Obama believed that "parents and churches" were "the most crucial ingredients" for "a long-term process of educational reform." Gamaliel and Don Moore's Designs for Change, now a top player in the citywide school reform movement, could be asked to provide parental training. The city's community colleges were responsible for vocational and general educational development (GED) training, but their actual track record was even worse than that of Chicago Public Schools. "Only 8 percent of the 19,200 persons enrolled in GED preparation classes in 1980 actually received certificates," Barack had discovered, and "only 2.5 percent of those enrolled in City College basic education programs end up pursuing additional vocational or higher education." Instead, just as at CPS, "funds go into central administrative tasks rather than student instruction."<sup>67</sup> was to a small church on West 113th Street just across from Fenger High School. Thirty-two-year-old Rev. Alvin Love had arrived at Lilydale First Baptist Church four years earlier, inheriting an “elderly congregation” that was “comfortable sitting and doing nothing.” Love wanted to “get this congregation engaged in their community,” and he was happy when Obama “just walked up to the door and rang the bell” and asked if Love would tell him what he thought Roseland needed. Love, like other pastors before him, asked Barack which church he belonged to. Love warned Barack that his standard response—“I’m working on it”—wasn’t going to be acceptable to all black clergymen. Barack invited Love to a box-lunch gathering of other interested pastors, and he was slowly beginning to expand DCP’s ties to freestanding Protestant congregations.

The clergymen with whom Barack was having the most contact, however, were not involved at all in DCP. One was Jeremiah Wright at Trinity United Church of Christ, whom Barack continued to visit on a regular basis. Barack also began speaking with Sokoni Karanja, a longtime Trinity member whom he had met through Al Raby when Karanja emerged as one of the most outspoken African American voices calling for school reform. Barack “was trying to think about ministers and how to organize ministers across the whole city—African American ministers—because he felt like the power that was needed for the community to get its just due was through that,” Sokoni remembered. “He was trying to think about churches and how to organize the churches.” Barack also told Sokoni about his plan to attend law school. “One of the things I notice is that a lot of these politicians get in trouble because they don’t know the law,” Barack commented. Becoming a politician was indeed his goal. “He was talking about becoming mayor of Chicago,” Sokoni—just like Mike Kruglik—remembered. “We had a lot of conversations about it,” and “that’s what he emphasized to me. It sounded like a good idea.”

The other church Barack visited frequently was St. Sabina. DCP members like Cathy Askew, Nadyne Griffin, and Rosa Thomas knew Barack “was a big admirer of Father Pflieger,” but Cathy’s fellow St. Catherine’s parishioner, Deacon Tommy West, saw the most of Barack at St. Sabina. One of St. Sabina’s wintertime ministries involved a tangible outreach to the homeless, many of whom lived in the relative warmth of Lower Wacker Drive, the underground level of a downtown Chicago roadway. “We brought clothes and food down there for them,” West explained. “My wife made corn bread” and “minestrone soup.” One evening Barack joined Tommy and Mike Pflieger for the trip downtown. “He was with us underground, feeding the homeless,” West recounted. “Lower Wacker—I remember him going to that with us,” Mike agreed. Tommy also remembered Barack saying he was about to go back to school. He “told me when he went down to Wacker Drive with us and we had the soup and the coats.” Tommy had asked why, and he recalls Barack saying, “I just get tired of getting cut off at the pass” by government officials, and “I need some other stuff. I’ve got to go. This is something I have to do.”

But one day in those early months of 1988, Barack went with Mike Pflieger and Tommy West on a different sort of outing. Years later Barack would say that “the single most important thing in terms of establishing” safe neighborhoods “is having a community of parents, men, church leaders who are committed to being present and getting into the community and making sure that the gangbangers aren’t taking over, making sure that there’s zero tolerance for drug dealing.” In 1988 Pflieger shared that sentiment as strongly as anyone could, and he had adopted an interdiction technique that was nonviolent direct action at its most aggressive: walking into a known drug seller’s home in clerical garb, asking if he could use the bathroom, then grabbing whatever narcotics he could and heading for the toilet. Only “a very small group” of men accompanied Mike on such drug raids, and Tommy West—wearing a deacon’s collar—was a regular participant.

Pfleger cannot remember Barack going with him on such a sortie, although “he very well may have.” But Tommy West recalls Barack’s involvement with great clarity. “One time he went with us to this drug dealer’s house, and Father Mike grabbed up the guy’s drugs and ran in the washroom—first he asked the guy, could he use the washroom,” and once in there Mike “dropped it and flushed it, and the guy pulls out his pistol. I said, ‘Look, put that up. He’s a priest—you don’t want to hurt him. Use it on me.’ He said, ‘No, he’s the one who did this.’ I said, ‘Don’t touch him. That’s God’s man. You don’t want God to be down on you the rest of your life. Leave him be and try to find you somewhere else.’ He said, ‘I think I will, because I’m ready to kill him.’ So Barack said, ‘Woo.’” Mike Pfleger looked calmly at his colleagues. “I’m doing God’s work. God is taking care of me.”

“He was around for that one,” Tommy affirmed. “That was the first time I remember him going inside of the drug dealer’s home with us to see what Father Mike did.” Then, with the dealer still holding his gun, Tommy again asked the man to leave: “then we can get out of here.” The dealer did take his gun and leave, and as the raiding party exited as well, “everybody was kind of shook up,” Tommy West recalls with considerable understatement.

Barack had developed significant relationships with Mike Pfleger and Jeremiah Wright, just as he had two years earlier with Bill Stenzel and Tom Kaminski. But at home on South Harper, Sheila Jager never heard a single word about any of them, or about institution-based religious faith. “I don’t think Barack ever attended church once while we were together,” and he “certainly was not religious in the conventional sense,” Sheila reiterated. Barack “never suggested going to church together,” and “I had no awareness of Jeremiah. He certainly never mentioned him to me.”

Barack’s closest Hyde Park male friend, Asif Agha, remembers their conversations similarly. “I always assumed he was an atheist like me.” Barack “had no interest in religion” and knew “nothing about Islam.” Asif’s friend Doug Glick, Barack’s companion on all those long summer drives to and from Madison, bluntly concurred. “I do not believe he believes in Jesus Christ.” Asif states the trio’s consensus succinctly: Barack “did not have a religious bone in his body.”

In Barack’s daily life with Sheila, “he didn’t tell me a whole lot about” who he was dealing with in his work, Sheila explains, “although he did bring a lot of their ideas home.” Barack “never compartmentalized ideas, which we discussed freely.” At home “we spent a great deal of our time discussing/talking about all sorts of things, which was one of the things I liked so much about him.” And, just like at DCP, Barack “was also a very good listener.” Yet “we lived a very isolated existence,” and even their immediate neighbors at 5429 South Harper barely remember either Barack or Sheila.

One longtime older resident had no recollection at all, and custodian Joe Vukojevic, who lived directly across the hall from Barack and Sheila, only remembered being introduced to Barack’s mother Ann during her summer 1987 visit. Barack and Sheila’s immediate upstairs neighbors, John Morillo and Andrea Atkins, thought Joe the janitor was “a very nice guy” but “practically never” saw Sheila or Barack. They would remember the unusual name on the mailbox, and saying hi to Sheila, but Barack was “just another guy doing laundry” in the basement laundry room.<sup>68</sup>

On January 31, the Daily Calumet reported that South Chicago Savings Bank president Jim Fitch was privately brokering talks to allow Waste Management to use the O’Brien Locks site as a new landfill in exchange for a $20 million community trust fund. Fitch then called for another gathering of neighborhood representatives at 7:30 P.M. Monday, February 8, at his bank to discuss “the structure of the community trust.” Since the Daily Cal story “events have been evolving rapidly,” Fitch explained, and “conversations with Waste Management have continued.”

UNO’s Bruce Orenstein and Mary Ellen Montes had previously attended Fitch’s conclaves, but now they grew concerned. If UNO and the city’s Howard Stanback hoped to have the community fund managed by mayoral allies, they could not allow Fitch to continue driving the conversation with WMI. Bruce and Lena called on Fitch at his bank in advance of the meeting and told him he lacked the authority to have this gathering because he had not been involved in the fight to stop the landfills. Bruce recounts telling him, “We think you’re undermining our agenda, you’re undermining the agenda of the community, the wishes of the community.” Bruce and Lena “really asked him to stop,” but Fitch was no rookie at power politics. He recognized their raw grab for control and brusquely dismissed them.

Orenstein next called Barack to ask for DCP’s support in a confrontational move straight out of the Alinsky-style community organizing playbook. Local print and broadcast journalists were notified, a press release was prepared, and late Monday afternoon prior to the scheduled meeting, Barack, Loretta Augustine, and other DCP members drove to UNO’s office on East 91st Street, less than two blocks from Fitch’s South Chicago Savings Bank. “We met there, we practiced,” Bruce remembered. “Barack and I and Mary Ellen and Loretta have devised this thing,” and shortly after 7:30 P.M., Mary Ellen led a column of more than one hundred participants, including some children, out the door and down the street toward the bank’s second-floor conference room. The goal was “to let Fitch know in no uncertain terms he does not represent the will of the community on this issue,” Bruce recounted. “We just wanted to tell him that in front of everybody else who was around the table,” including UNO and DCP’s old friend Bob Klonowski, pastor of Hegewisch’s Lebanon Lutheran Church. Bruce remembered the group very quietly “walking up the stairs and being actually quite nervous,” for “it was quite a confrontational approach to things.”

But with Mary Ellen in the lead, the “ambush”—as the Daily Cal’s front-page headline the next day called it—worked to perfection. “Mary Ellen led the charge and we walked in and the camera lights went on,” Bruce recalled. “Barack and Loretta and the TV cameras and the Chicago Tribune” reporter Casey Bukro all followed Lena into the conference room. “Everybody looks up” as Mary Ellen approached Fitch. “Tonight we publicly take the position ‘No deals Jim Fitch, no deals Waste Management,’” Lena proclaimed. “We will fight you every step of the way.” As a confrontational leader, “she was fantastic,” Bruce knew. “Then we turned on our heels and walked out.” It was a “very memorable action,” even “a hoot of an action,” and from Bruce’s perspective, Barack had shown no discomfort with these tactics: “I certainly think he enjoyed it.”

UNO and DCP’s press release claimed that “We are diametrically opposed to any ‘buyoff’ deal . . . with Waste Management,” while acknowledging that “communities are due substantial reinvestment.” A simultaneous one by Howard Stanback on behalf of the mayor’s office was deceptively titled “City Reaffirms Landfill Moratorium” and asserted that “Waste Management is misleading the public if they suggest that they are in a position to acquire O’Brien Locks for landfilling.”

As Bruce Orenstein told the Daily Calumet, “If Waste Management gets ahold of that property, out the window goes any protection for the community.” The real issue was not the fate of the O’Brien Locks acreage, whose future looked preordained, but who on the Southeast Side would control whatever community trust fund would receive the $20 or $25 million that Waste Management was clearly willing to pay. Only Hegewisch News editor and community activist Vi Czachorski gave readers a clear understanding of what was happening. “Montes wants a landfill at the O’Brien Locks,” directly across the Calumet River from Hegewisch, and in exchange, she gets “a trust that UNO would operate” rather than Jim Fitch and other traditional Vrdolyak loyalists. But UNO’s Alinskyite “ambush” not only infuriated Fitch’s nascent coalition, it also angered the trio of hardcore landfill opponents—Jim Landing, Marian Byrnes, and Hazel Johnson—who had been reconsidering their own position. Within a week, they were picketing outside Chicago’s City Hall, clear evidence that Bruce and Barack’s strategy of blowing up Fitch’s negotiations had torpedoed any prospect of achieving a community-wide consensus.

For Barack, all this tussling created a fundamental personal tension. He had made clear to John McKnight that he rejected the confrontational politics of the Alinsky tradition, even though he had just helped lead an action that was so pugnacious it had made even the hard-bitten Orenstein nervous. It unquestionably was the “most confrontive meeting he had ever been involved in,” Bruce acknowledged, and “left to his own devices, I don’t think he would have designed an action like that.” True enough. What then accounted for so stark a contradiction?<sup>69</sup>

A weekend or two after the South Chicago ambush, Barack took Sheila to see a movie that had debuted the Friday before the Fitch action: The Unbearable Lightness of Being, an adaptation of Czech writer Milan Kundera’s 1984 novel. Set in Czechoslovakia in the years leading up to the Prague Spring of 1968, the film featured three leading characters: Tomas, a young doctor, his partner Tereza, and his additional lover Sabina. The movie was not necessarily loyal to the spirit of Kundera’s book, and, at almost three hours’ length, it had not been praised in prominent reviews in the Chicago Tribune and the New York Times. The Tribune’s critic wrote that “the film has no vision and no life,” and warned that it “is likely to be incomprehensible to anyone who hasn’t read the novel.”

Vincent Canby’s Times review was more revealing. Tomas, played by Daniel Day-Lewis, lived a compartmentalized life, with “one part of his mind” analyzing something while another “part that’s outside it criticizes” the first. Tereza, played by Juliette Binoche, “falls profoundly in love with” Tomas “without knowing anything about him.” In turn, “Tomas is drawn against his will into commitment to Tereza,” yet with Sabina, played by Lena Olin, he indulges in “a passion for . . . sex that excludes serious emotional commitment . . . while always remaining a little detached.” Tomas “remains committed to Tereza, though still unfaithful.” The film conveyed “an accumulating heaviness” accentuated by its “immense length.”

Almost a quarter century later, Sheila Jager described the film as an indelible memory, explaining that it could offer “some insight into our relationship. . . . Although Barack did not fool around (not that I know of), I remember being powerfully moved by that film when we saw it together because Tomas and Tereza’s relationship seemed to so uncannily mirror the dynamics of our own—Tomas’s ‘neurosis’ like Barack’s ‘calling.’” She believed that perhaps was “why I reacted so hard when I saw that film. Because it was mirroring reality in an eerie sort of way, and I somehow understood what was happening even if I was unaware of what was going on. I remember feeling so trapped and suffocated back then, just like poor Tereza and her cheating husband. I’ll never forget that feeling of desperation, and wondering what I was going to do. I remember him telling me how he wished he could take me to the countryside and live with me,” just as Tomas does with Tereza, “but he couldn’t do that, no matter how much he loved me,” because his destiny inescapably must trump love. “I always knew that I couldn’t marry him,” yet in those early months of 1988, Sheila never doubted Barack, in part because something happened between them, something Barack subsequently never spoke about.

Barack was also close with the almost thirty-year-old Mary Ellen Montes—Lena—and he told her too about the vision of his future that otherwise he had only shared with Sheila. “He wanted to be the president,” Lena explained. “He used to say that his goal was to be the president of the United States.” Their ambitions were mutual. “By the time I met Barack, I was thinking about politics as well, with aspirations of being the mayor.” Lena told him, “I could see myself being the mayor of the city of Chicago. That’s where I’d want to end it, and his thing was oh no, he wanted to go on to be the president.” While Barack had told Mike Kruglik and Sokoni Karanja that being mayor of Chicago was his ultimate goal, Lena firmly declared, “That’s not what he’s telling me.”

Lena understood their similar trajectories. “You start to feel and realize your potential, so as you’re growing in this arena, why wouldn’t you think about those things? . . . That’s why I thought about the mayor,” and for Barack “it’s because of what he realized as he’s growing in the public arena and realizing his potential.” She knew that getting a law degree was “absolutely” his first step toward electoral politics. Across those months, “our conversations—they were real. They were genuine, sincere conversations about ourselves and what we wanted to do, what we were doing, what we were thinking of.” Lena knew Barack lived with someone. “I hear of her,” Lena explained. “Asian woman.” No, “I never met her. . . . I remember him saying she was Asian.” What did Barack tell Lena about that relationship? “He gave the impression that they lived together more because of convenience—they both needed a place to stay.”

Barack’s diminution of his life with Sheila to Lena was reminiscent of how he had characterized it to Phil Boerner eighteen months earlier: “winter’s fast approaching, and it is nice to have someone to come home to,” given his “mortal fear of Chicago winters.” After years of distancing himself from his mother, Barack’s identification as African American—not international, not hapa, not biracial—was now complete. This transformation had been immensely aided by his exposure to and ease with strong black women like Loretta Augustine, Marlene Dillard, Aletha Strong Gibson, and Yvonne Lloyd, but this success came at a high price, one visible only in the light of the distance, the unknowable distance, that was always impenetrably there. That distance, that lightness, would extend well beyond 1988.<sup>70</sup>

Two days after the action against Jim Fitch, a remarkable, substantive victory was announced by attorney Tom Geoghegan: Navistar, the renamed International Harvester, would pay $14.8 million to Frank Lumpkin and twenty-seven hundred other surviving former Wisconsin steelworkers. The largest individual payment would be $17,200, though Frank, with a better-protected pension, would receive only $4,000.

No one in Chicago doubted that Frank deserved the most credit for this achievement, and the ex-workers approved the settlement in an overwhelming vote of 583 to 75. But Frank was never someone to pat himself on the back. “It is a victory of sorts,” he told the Daily Cal. “It was the best we could get, and that’s the way everyone who voted for it felt. But we appreciate the feeling that the little guy has won and that giants can fall.” Tribune business editor Richard Longworth wrote a wonderful tribute to Frank, describing him as “an amazing man . . . who is probably as close to a saint as Chicago has these days.” Tom Geoghegan is “the only other real hero,” a commendation underscored when James B. Moran, the federal judge handling the Wisconsin litigation, publicly praised Tom’s “dedication,” “professionalism,” and “modesty in seeking fees.” Frank also represented the last of a dying breed: at South Works hardly seven hundred men were still working, and Republic LTV was down to 640. Maury Richards would soon be reelected as Local 1033’s president, but even as dedicated a steelworker as Maury was beginning to wonder what his next career would be.<sup>71</sup>

By mid-February, UNO, hoping to take the lead in Chicago’s fractured school reform movement, distributed a twenty-nine-page proposal to compete with a much more detailed plan championed by Don Moore’s Designs for Change, Sokoni Karanja, and Al Raby from Haymarket. DCP was listed as an organizational backer of UNO’s plan, but no DCP member was among the twelve names credited with preparing the document. Danny Solis, Peter Martinez, and Lourdes Monteagudo, an elementary school principal now working closely with UNO, were among them, as was an education professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago, Bill Ayers, who had arrived there six months earlier and met both Danny and Anne Hallett the previous fall. Acknowledging that “good schooling is an expensive proposition,” the UNO proposal called for the hiring of an astonishing 14,563 additional educators for Chicago’s elementary schools, at a cost of $442 million. UNO envisioned an annual CPS budget increase of $584 million, and called for a $481 million increase in state funding to support it.

On February 18, the same day that the Sun-Times gave the proposal prominent coverage, UNO and DCP brought busloads of members to a school reform hearing at board of education headquarters, but the overflow crowd intimidated officials and the meeting was adjourned. Soon a third major plan, this one backed by Fred Hess’s Chicago Panel, Gwendolyn LaRoche from the Chicago Urban League, and Patrick Keleher from Chicago United, joined the confusing fray. DCP concentrated on getting its Career Education Network off the ground, with Obama and Owens hiring an African American woman in her early thirties, Cassandra Lowe, who had been working as a college recruiter for nearby St. Xavier University, to oversee it. By early March, afternoon counseling sessions for fifty or so high school students were finally under way at Reformation Lutheran and at Our Lady of the Gardens. Asked about DCP’s 1987–88 change from an employment emphasis to its new concentration on secondary schooling, Owens explained that “the focus shifted to the more fundamental question of preparing people for jobs in a changing society.”<sup>72</sup>

By the end of February, Barack had to decide both about law school and about making his long-mulled trip to Kenya before the fall 1988 academic year began. His sister Auma had returned home from Heidelberg and would eagerly host a midsummer visit.

Barack later would write that he applied to Harvard, Yale, and Stanford, but he also applied elsewhere, including to Northwestern University’s law school, right in downtown Chicago. Acceptance letters had arrived from both Harvard and Northwestern, but with one huge difference: Harvard’s financial aid package would require him to take out loans of well over $10,000 a year, while Northwestern’s offer, the Ronald E. Kennedy Scholarship, would allow him to attend a top-twenty law school in Chicago for free. Debating his choice of school, Barack asked Jean Rudd and Ken Rolling at the Woods Fund about attorneys from whom he could seek advice. Jean’s husband Lionel Bolin was a descendent of a famous African American family, a 1948 graduate and now a trustee of prestigious Williams College, and a successful broadcast executive who, after serving in the U.S. military, had graduated from low-cost New York Law School. Woods Fund board member George Kelm, a low-key civic activist, had been managing partner of a prominent Chicago law firm, Hopkins and Sutter, before becoming president of the Woods family’s Sahara Enterprises investment firm.

Barack “was trying to make a strategic choice about which school,” Jean Rudd recalled, and Jean and Ken remember Barack telling them about Northwestern’s full-scholarship offer. George Kelm was a Northwestern Law School alumnus and a past president of its alumni association, and he strongly advised Barack against attending Harvard. Northwestern was so interested in persuading Barack to accept its Kennedy Scholarship, named after an African American faculty member who had died four years earlier at the age of forty-two, that the admissions office asked the law school’s dean, Robert W. Bennett, to speak with Obama. “The admissions people came to me and they said, ‘We’ve got a fantastic prospect for this scholarship’” and “‘we want you to try to talk him into taking it,’” Bennett recounted. “Barack was brought to my office” and “I tried to talk him into taking this Ronald Kennedy Scholarship.” Bennett was a 1965 cum laude graduate of Harvard Law School, and Barack was “the only applicant that the admissions people ever” asked him to help recruit during a full decade as dean.

Neither Kelm and Bennett’s efforts nor the full three-year scholarship were sufficient to outweigh Barack’s belief in his destiny. Harold Washington had graduated from Northwestern’s law school, and only once had a Harvard law graduate become president—Rutherford B. Hayes, in 1877. Northwestern law alumni had been major party presidential nominees five times, but William Jennings Bryan was a three-time loser and Adlai Stevenson had lost twice. It would be a costly decision for Barack—a cumulative difference of more than $40,000—but his choice was evidence of how deeply he believed what he so far had shared only with Sheila and Lena.

The only person in Barack’s workday world, other than Lena, to whom he spoke about leaving was Johnnie Owens, whom he had recruited to DCP with at least half an eye toward this decision. Johnnie remembered the moment clearly. “I didn’t have a clue until one day he asked me, ‘Are you ready to lead?’ I’m like ‘What do you mean? What are you talking about?’ ‘I’ve been accepted at Harvard Law School,’” and he would be leaving DCP to attend its three-year J.D. program. “And I’m like ‘What?’” Owens remembered, for there had been no prior indications that Barack was contemplating such a future. “Nothing. Absolutely nothing: about applying, that he was interested, anything like that. And so he began explaining to me how he’d been struggling with the thought of maybe going into the ministry versus law school.” Neither Sheila nor Lena ever heard him talk about the ministry, but as Johnnie remembers it, Barack “said he had ideas and thoughts about going into the ministry and that he had actually talked to Reverend Wright about some of this.”

Barack asked Johnnie to succeed him as DCP’s executive director, promising not only to work with the members on the transition, but also to introduce Owens to the trio of women who were DCP’s most important funders: Jean Rudd at Woods, Aurie Pennick at MacArthur, and Anne Hallett at Wieboldt. Owens agreed, but several weeks passed before Barack was ready to tell DCP’s volunteer leaders about his upcoming move.<sup>73</sup>

On March 5, ten days before Democratic ward-level and congressional primary elections across Chicagoland, the Chicago Tribune reported that Waste Management had fired two managers at its SCA chemical waste incinerator at 11700 South Stony Island Avenue for repeatedly disconnecting air-monitoring devices designed to measure the facility’s destruction of highly toxic PCBs. WMI insisted that the misconduct “did not threaten health or safety,” but Marian Byrnes, Hazel Johnson, and congressional candidate Mel Reynolds picketed the plant, demanding it be closed. Metropolitan Sanitary District officials pulled back from a plan to dump eighty thousand cubic yards of sewage sludge in a wetlands property five blocks south of SCA.

Howard Stanback, Bruce Orenstein, and Barack were working on plans to have Mayor Sawyer attend a postelection March 17 rally at St. Kevin to announce publicly the city's strategic alliance with UNO and DCP regarding landfills. On Election Day, four African American ward committeemen who were allied with Sawyer were defeated, an unsurprising verdict on the process that had made Sawyer Harold Washington's successor. Two successful challengers were forty-eight-year-old educator Alice Palmer in the 7th Ward, who defeated organization loyalist William Beavers in a virtual landslide, and young West Side activist Rickey Hendon in the 27th Ward. Another winner, in a South Side state representative contest, was 8th Ward precinct captain Donne Trotter, who a year earlier had turned out such an impressive victory margin for Harold Washington at London Towne Homes. One of the few challenges to a Sawyer loyalist that failed was Salim Al Nurridin's 9th Ward committeeman contest against Bill Shaw, whose twin brother Bob, the 9th Ward alderman, bizarrely alleged that Salim operated a harem full of welfare recipients. Only slightly more uplifting had been Emil Jones and Mel Reynolds's unsuccessful challenges to incumbent 2nd District congressman Gus Savage.

When the Tribune reported that the thirty-six-year-old Reynolds had voted only twice since he turned twenty-one, Reynolds claimed that plotters had altered his voting records. Tribune political reporter R. Bruce Dold commended Reynolds for running "a surprisingly effective first-time campaign" and praised him as "a walking role model for black achievement." But when the votes were tallied, Reynolds received only 14 percent, Jones 24 percent, and Savage won renomination with just 53 percent.<sup>74</sup>

Stanback, Orenstein, and Obama carefully scripted the St. Kevin evening rally where Gene Sawyer would eagerly agree to UNO and DCP's demand for a new mayoral task force to study the city's landfill options. Unlike Jim Fitch's committee, this new group would be heavily stacked with UNO and DCP loyalists. Howard, Bruce, and Barack jointly drafted Sawyer's remarks, and then both organizers, along with Lena and Loretta, met with Sawyer, Stanback, and other mayoral aides at City Hall. A young assistant to Stanback, Judy Byrd, remembered being struck by Barack, who "spoke with such command and such clarity." This was in stark contrast with Bruce's impression of the new mayor. "I remember in that meeting talking to Sawyer," Orenstein said, "and feeling like no one's there, no one's home." Yet the central trio worked exceedingly well together. Bruce found Barack "very collaborative and very easy to work with," and was repeatedly impressed by how Barack made sure that his top leader was never ignored or left out: "he was looking out for Loretta." In addition, "Stanback's a full partner. I remember Stanback saying at the time that he's never had a more collaborative relationship with a community organization, and he really appreciated it."

At Stanback's insistent urging, Orenstein also tried to convince some hard-core landfill opponents like Marian Byrnes to take part in the new process, but Byrnes realized that this was all leading to two predetermined ends: a new landfill at O'Brien Locks that the city desperately needed, and a $20 to $25 million community trust funded by Waste Management that would be controlled by UNO and DCP, not Jim Fitch and the wider community.

Angry but determined, Marian, Hazel Johnson, and others picketed St. Kevin that evening, distributing a no-more-landfills flyer that invoked the title and featured song from the Eyes on the Prize civil rights documentary that had aired a year earlier. UNO members tried to obstruct the leafleting, and when Hegewisch News editor Vi Czachorski, a UNO opponent, tried to enter the basement, UNO's Phil Mullins physically blocked her. “As I descended St. Kevin’s stairs, Mullins put his arms across the narrow stairway and said ‘You can’t attend this meeting.’ I tried to continue, crowds pushed. Mullins said ‘I’m getting the police. I’ll charge assault!’” Czachorski wrote in the next issue of her weekly newspaper. “I left.”

UNO and DCP’s own dueling flyer demanded that Sawyer name a new task force “made up entirely of residents who live in communities affected by landfills.” Only such a group can “take this issue out of the backrooms and into the light of day.” DCP also distributed a statement in Loretta Augustine’s name denouncing “backroom deals that ram landfills down the communities’ throats and send the enormous profits from such dumping into corporate and city coffers.”

As a crowd of more than six hundred filled St. Kevin’s basement, Orenstein paced nervously while Barack was “relaxed and cool.” Sawyer carried with him a briefing memo summarizing the remarks that Loretta and Mary Ellen would make as well as his own speech, typed out in large, bold capital letters. A seven-piece mariachi band provided entertainment as multiple TV camera crews set up their equipment. DCP president Dan Lee and St. Kevin pastor George Schopp joined Loretta, Lena, and the mayor on the stage.

DCP’s Loretta Augustine opened the meeting. “We, as residents, have had no control over what has happened in our community. We are tired of being victims. We are taking control of our own community.” Then Lena spoke, followed by Sawyer. “Waste disposal and landfill decisions will no longer be made in the back room, at a table full of politically connected financial opportunists,” the mayor read, his text sounding far more like Bruce Orenstein than Gene Sawyer. “Whatever happens here will be because you decide.”

With Lena and Loretta flanking the mayor, Lena then took charge of the traditional IAF-style colloquy with Sawyer, just as she had with Harold Washington almost five years earlier on that same stage. UNO and DCP had encouraged their supporters to be boisterous, and one reporter called the crowd “raucous.” Lena enjoyed her role to the hilt, and she began reciting the formal demand that the mayor appoint a new task force within ten days. She warned Sawyer to “be careful how you respond because this is an angry group of people tonight.” The mayor stuck to his script and pledged full acceptance of UNO and DCP’s demands. At that point, Lena turned to the cheering crowd and declared, “I’m going to take it for granted that we will have all the power we want!” As one veteran organizer later remarked, five years as a quintessential Alinsky leader had made Mary Ellen Montes into “one of the most macho women I had ever met.”

As the gathering concluded, Bruce and Barack were ecstatic about the meeting. But UNO and DCP’s Alinsky-style power grabs—first blowing up the Fitch talks, then bringing a sad sack mayor to heel before an excited crowd—had fractured the Southeast Side community. Bruce, Lena, and Barack had succeeded in infuriating and alienating the local business leadership and the true environmentalists, two groups that just weeks earlier had been prepared to join forces in a true community consensus. Ed Vrdolyak quickly put Sawyer on notice, objecting to the city allowing UNO and DCP to control negotiations with Waste Management: “For certain community organizations who without question do not truly represent the vast majority of homeowners, residents, and taxpayers to submit their community buyout (sellout) wish list is totally and completely wrong.”

But Vrdolyak’s public protest bore no political fruit, and a week later, Sawyer and Stanback announced a new sixteen-member Task Force on Landfill Options: Mary Ellen Montes led a group of five UNO supporters, including Father George Schopp; five other appointees were DCP members: Loretta Augustine, Dan Lee, Marlene Dillard, Margaret Bagby, and Father Dominic Carmon. Bob Klonowski was another ally, and no more than three appointees, including Marian Byrnes and Hazel Johnson, were likely dissenters. It was hard to imagine a more politically unrepresentative group.<sup>75</sup>

In late March Barack announced his upcoming departure. He went to see Loretta first. “He told me he was leaving and he needed to go back to school.” Most DCP members learned the news at a meeting where Barack spoke of a smooth transition to Johnnie Owens as his successor. Dan Lee recalls that “I wanted to cry” and “we all got teary-eyed. . . . He was like a brother.” Tommy West called out, “No, you can’t go,” but they all realized that Barack’s potential reached well beyond Roseland. “We hated to see him go,” Yvonne Lloyd remembered. “It was very sad,” but they all appreciated, as Betty Garrett explained, that “if he could better himself, then we wanted him to go.” Barack remembered overhearing Yvonne remark how different he seemed now than he did on that August day two and a half years earlier when Jerry Kellman had first introduced him. “He was just a boy. I swear, you look at him now, you’d think he was a different person.” Of course, in many ways indeed he was.

Cathy Askew was the most emotional about Barack’s announcement. “I was really upset,” she recalled. “I thought we were friends.” Barack remembered Cathy expressing her disappointment and saying, “What is it with you men? Why is it you’re always in a hurry? Why is it that what you have isn’t good enough?” Yet they all understood how frustrating the past year had been for Barack. “For the leader or organizer who feels expected to bring some change and improvements to the community, the day-to-day litany of roadblocks and resistances makes it hard,” one close observer of Chicago organizing wrote that spring.

Marlene Dillard had watched Barack experience repeated setbacks while always trying to hide his disappointment from DCP’s members. The outreach to Local 1033 at Republic LTV had gone for naught, the efforts in Altgeld Gardens had led to little, and only now was a tiny version of CEN getting under way. Again and again, “I always felt that it was a disappointment to him.” Whenever she and Barack visited a funder like Woods, “he was trying to project how great we were doing.” Then, “when we were leaving,” he would turn to her and apologize for his braggadocio: “Well, we’re trying.” Overall, “I think it weighed very heavy on him. . . . He was leading people, and he was getting nowhere.” Indeed, Marlene came to believe “that he felt ‘If I could just become the mayor of Chicago, I would be able to do this.’”

Ernie Powell saw the same thing. “I think Barack got a little frustrated with that, and he felt like he had to get into the seat of power.” The DCP pastors who interacted regularly with Barack understood likewise. With CEN operating out of Reformation Lutheran, Tyrone Partee saw Barack almost daily and remembered him saying, “I’m going to law school.” Barack knew Tyrone was from a political family, and to him, Barack was “clear that he wanted to go into politics. ‘I believe that’s what I’m called to do.’” Alvin Love was caught off guard by Barack’s announcement, but he realized Barack was “frustrated with the speed of change” and had concluded that “there might be a better way to do” things.

Barack went to see both Rev. Eddie Knox at Pullman Presbyterian Church and Rev. Rick Williams at Pullman Christian Reformed Church in person. With Knox, Barack presented Harvard as an opportunity he was pondering, and Knox smilingly replied, “There isn’t much to think about.” Harvard was such “a golden opportunity” and Knox believed “You’re going to go far.” Rick Williams reacted similarly. “I’m happy for you,” Rick remembered saying, “but I’m also sad, because this kind of work needs people for the long haul, people like yourself.” Rick understood Barack’s hope of building a truly large, multicongregational alliance to pursue educational reform and employment opportunity all across Chicago, but, just as Jeremiah Wright had sought to explain a year earlier, bringing people and churches together behind such an agenda was far more complicated than Barack could imagine. Rick told Barack that Harvard was “a wise decision” and wished him well. “You are going to do more for more people getting a law degree from Harvard than you would do here.” Barack had “a passion for making life better for lots of people,” Rick remembered, and to do that, “you’ve got to have power.”

Barack also visited Emil Jones at his office on 111th Street. No elected official had done more for Barack and DCP, and Jones said he was sorry to see him go. To Jones as to others, Barack emphasized that there was no question he would return to Chicago after law school. He called Renee Brereton and other CHD staffers to tell them, plus organizing colleagues like Linda Randle. Barack apologized to Howard Stanback for pulling up stakes during their landfill effort. Stanback was surprised by Barack’s choice. “‘Why are you going to Harvard?’ He said, ‘Because I need to.’ I said, ‘Are you coming back?’” to which Obama said, “I’m absolutely coming back.”<sup>76</sup>

Barack, Loretta, and Yvonne Lloyd all attended Lena’s thirtieth birthday party, but by early April, there was not much to celebrate regarding UNO and DCP’s position in the Southeast Side’s landfill war. Anger at Sawyer’s new task force was white hot, especially in Hegewisch, just across the Calumet River from the O’Brien Locks site. Hegewisch News editor Vi Czachorski asked Howard Stanback, “Why should UNO decide if there will be a landfill in our backyard?” and Marian Byrnes, Hazel Johnson, and three allies called the task force unrepresentative and called on Mayor Sawyer to disband it. That group held its first public hearing at St. Kevin on April 7, and this time UNO’s critics made it into the basement meeting room, mocking cochairwomen Lena Montes and Loretta Augustine with chants of “No deals,” the same slogan Lena had used during the Fitch ambush two months earlier.

The Daily Cal reported that Loretta defended the panel’s “makeup and goals” as a “positive development for the community and said the mayor had pledged to abide by the task force’s findings,” with its report due at the end of May. “The panel approved reopening discussions with Waste Management,” with Lena declaring, “What is different about it is that it will be talked about in open hearings, not behind closed doors.” But when old foe Foster Milhouse rose to speak, “Montes quickly closed” the meeting.

The Daily Calumet editorialized against any reopening of negotiations with WMI, and UNO’s opponents advocated for a popular referendum vote against landfill expansion on the upcoming fall general election ballot in Southeast Side wards. One week later, the task force convened its second hearing at Our Lady of the Gardens gymnasium in Altgeld Gardens, where the tumultuous Zirl Smith meeting had occurred two years earlier. Father Dominic Carmon, a task force member and Our Lady’s pastor, remembered that Barack “was there listening,” as at the previous St. Kevin session too. Howard Stanback, Jim Fitch, and WMI’s Mary Ryan all spoke to the panel as a crowd of 125 chanted “No more dumps.” For the first time, Stanback publicly acknowledged that the city did want the O’Brien Locks site to become a new landfill. Mary Ryan said WMI would immediately place $2 million into a community trust fund, with similar sums to be added every year, and it would give up title to two other parcels of land, including the marshland just below South Deering whose vulnerability had led Harold Washington to impose the initial landfill moratorium. That was followed by numerous single community members who spoke fervently against the deal. In the days that followed, the Daily Cal kept up a regular drumbeat against the task force. “Why study something no one in the community wants or asked for?” political columnist Phil Kadner queried.

As the UNO–DCP landfill gambit drew more and more flak, the task force’s third hearing, scheduled to take place at Bob Klonowski’s Hegewisch church, was postponed and moved to Mann Park’s field house. When it finally convened, Klonowski welcomed the crowd in a calm tone, but, according to Vi Czachorksi, when a city representative again explained why O’Brien Locks was the best option available, “500 angry, frustrated people shouted down the city proposal of a new landfill.” The meeting “ended abruptly when Mary Ellen Montes lost control, stating ‘This has turned into a war.’” Declaring that “It doesn’t appear we can conduct this in a civilized manner,” she dissolved the hearing, leaving the entire UNO–DCP–Stanback strategy in tatters. The mayor’s office named several additional task force members and postponed its reporting date until later in the summer, but the entire venture was now dead.

Years later, Bruce Orenstein acknowledged that his and Barack’s game plan had gone entirely awry. When “we make ourselves the center of authority . . . we make ourselves the target” for large numbers of Southeast Side residents who for years had been opposed to the city using their neighborhoods as a dumping ground. Orenstein mused that if Harold Washington had not died, perhaps the O’Brien Locks deal with Waste Management could indeed have netted the community a $25 million trust fund, just as he, Obama, and Stanback had envisioned. But Gene Sawyer had no public stature as mayor. “With a very strong mayor” like Washington, a successful outcome was highly plausible, but “now we have a very weak mayor.”<sup>77</sup>

During April’s landfill warfare, Gamaliel held its fourth weeklong training at Techny Towers, and Barack drove out there for several days’ sessions. By then, everyone knew he was leaving. Mary Gonzales was “pretty upset” when she heard, and David Kindler recalled thinking: “there goes one of our best and brightest.” Kindler’s friend Kevin Jokisch remembered telling Greg Galluzzo that Gamaliel would certainly miss Barack, with Greg responding, “We held on to him about as long as we were going to. Barack will probably end up being a United States senator.”

One evening that week, Barack drank beer with Mike Kruglik and talked about what he wanted to do after law school. “Obama is talking about his vision for a very powerful, sweeping organization across black Chicago, of fifty to 150 congregations, that would be highly disciplined, highly focused, professionally organized,” Mike remembered. “This vision . . . had such a claim on his mind” and Barack was explicit about “coming back to Chicago after Harvard and reengaging in community organizing in a more powerful way.”

Barack was thinking ahead in part because Ken Rolling and Jean Rudd at Woods had decided to fund and commission a series of articles about community organizing in Illinois Issues, the state’s premier public policy journal. Barack accepted an invitation to write one, but a quick deadline loomed. He had decided that he would travel to Nairobi to see Auma and meet the other members of his Kenyan family, but before that he wanted to spend at least three weeks on his own touring the big cities of Europe. Thus he needed to write his article before he left Chicago in late May. His essay would document how his thinking had evolved. Recent African American activism, Barack wrote, had featured “three major strands”: political empowerment, as personified by Harold Washington; economic development, of which black Chicago had seen very little; and community organizing. Barack argued that neither of the first two “offers lasting hope of real change for the inner city unless undergirded by a systematic approach to community organization.” Electing a black mayor like Washington was “not enough to bring jobs to inner-city neighborhoods or cut a 50 percent drop-out rate in the schools,” though such a victory did have “an important symbolic effect.”

At the community level, “a viable organization can only be achieved if a broadly based indigenous leadership—and not one or two charismatic leaders—can knit together the diverse interests of their local institutions.” Barack claimed that DCP and similar groups had attained “impressive results,” ranging from school accountability and job training programs to renovated housing and refurbished parks. Those assertions echoed what Marlene Dillard had heard Barack boast about during their visits to DCP’s funders, yet when he wrote that “crime and drug problems have been curtailed,” he was making his wishfulness give way to fantasy. It was true that “a sophisticated pool of local civic leadership has been developed” thanks to DCP’s recruitment and training efforts, but he admitted that organizing in African American neighborhoods “faces enormous problems.” One was “the not entirely undeserved skepticism organizers face in many communities,” as he had experienced; a second was the “exodus from the inner city of financial resources, institutions, role models and jobs,” as he had seen all too well in Roseland and especially in Altgeld. Third, far too many groups emphasized what John McKnight called “consumer advocacy,” and demanded increased services rather than “harnessing the internal productive capacities . . . that already exist in communities.” Lastly, Barack declared that “low salaries, the lack of quality training and ill-defined possibilities for advancement discourage the most talented young blacks from viewing organizing as a legitimate career option.”

Barack also argued that “the leadership vacuum and disillusionment following the death of Harold Washington” highlighted the need for a new political strategy. “Nowhere is the promise of organizing more apparent than in the traditional black churches,” if those institutions would “educate and empower entire congregations and not just serve as a platform for a few prophetic leaders. Should a mere 50 prominent black churches, out of the thousands that exist in cities like Chicago, decide to collaborate with a trained organizing staff, enormous positive changes could be wrought in the education, housing, employment and spirit of inner-city black communities, changes that would send powerful ripples throughout the city.”

Barack ended his essay on a revealingly poetic note, writing that “organizing teaches as nothing else does the beauty and strength of everyday people.” When the entire series of Illinois Issues articles was subsequently republished in book form, one reviewer quoted that sentence as the single most powerful statement in the entire volume. But another of Barack’s sentences about organizing was the most revealing of all, for when he wrote that through their work “organizers can shape a sense of community not only for others, but for themselves,” he was publicly acknowledging the self-transformation he had experienced in the homes and churches of Greater Roseland.

As early as his second year at Oxy, Barack had felt “a longing for a place,” for “a community . . . where I could put down stakes.” The idea of home, of finding a real home, “was something so powerful and compelling for me” because growing up he had been a youngster who “never entirely felt like he was rooted. That was part of my upbringing, to be traveling and always . . . wanting a place,” “a community that was mine.” His “history of being uprooted” allowed Barack to develop in less than two years what Sheila knew was “his deep emotional attachment to” Chicago, one that was almost entirely a product of Greater Roseland, not Hyde Park.

“When he worked with these folks, he saw what he never saw in his life,” Fred Simari explained. “He grew tremendously through this,” through what he acknowledged was “the transformative experience” of his life, through what Fred saw was “him getting molded.” Greg Galluzzo saw it too and said that Barack “really doesn’t understand what it means to be African American until he arrives in Chicago.” But, working with the people of the Far South Side, Barack “recognizes in them their greatness and then affirms something inside of himself.” Through “the richest experience” of his life, through discovering and experiencing black Americans for the first time, Barack “fell in love with the people, and then he fell in love with himself.”

Years later, Barack admitted that “the victories that we achieved were extraordinarily modest: getting a job-training site set up or getting an after-school program for young people put in place.” And he also knew that “the work that I did in those communities changed me much more than I changed the communities.” Ted Aranda, who had worked for Greg and in Roseland before Barack and whose Central American heritage made it possible for him to be accepted as black or Latino, came to the same conclusion as Barack. “I’m not sure that community organizing really did that much for Chicago,” he reflected. “I don’t know that we had any really tremendous long-term effect.” But Greg, looking back on a lifetime of organizing, understood the great fundamental truth of Barack’s realization: “it’s the people you encounter who are the victories.” For Ted, the disappointments and frustration of organizing radicalized him. A quarter century later, deeply devoted to Occupy, Ted was driving a cab. Greg understood as deeply as anyone that “the great victory of the whole thing is Barack himself.”<sup>78</sup>

In mid-April, the Spertus museum, part of a historic Jewish cultural center on South Michigan Avenue in downtown Chicago, opened a seven-week exhibit depicting the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi henchman who had played such a central role in the anti-Semitic effort to exterminate European Jews. The centerpiece of the exhibition was a continuous film of the trial, supplemented by large photographs and illustrations of newspaper stories plus Jewish artifacts documenting the culture that the Nazi Holocaust had sought to destroy.

The Tribune publicized the opening, and then, less than three weeks later, a front-page Tribune story revealed that anti-Semitism was alive and well even in Chicago’s City Hall: “Sawyer Aide’s Ethnic Slurs Stir Uproar,” read the headline of a story about mayoral assistant Steve Cokely, who had recently delivered four “long and frequently disjointed” lectures under the auspices of Louis Farrakhan’s Nation of Islam (NOI). Tapes of them were on sale at an NOI bookstore, and while anti-Semitism lay at the center of Cokely’s often incoherent ramblings about a “secret society,” he also called both Jesse Jackson and the late Harold Washington “nigger.” Even worse, it was revealed that Mayor Sawyer’s office had known about the recordings for more than four months, and three weeks earlier representatives of the Anti-Defamation League had met with Sawyer about the lectures. But Cokely was still on the mayoral payroll.

Well-known Catholic monsignor Jack Egan labeled Cokely’s retention a “travesty,” but a number of prominent black aldermen defended Cokely. Danny Davis, a supposed reformer from the 29th Ward, called Cokely “a very bright, talented researcher with an excellent command of the English language.” The 9th Ward’s Robert Shaw, citing voters he knew, said, “I don’t think it would be politically wise for the mayor to get rid of Mr. Cokely.” But the Tribune published a blistering editorial, denouncing Cokely as “a hate-spewing demagogue” and “a fanatic anti-Semite” and also lambasting Davis. After five days of feckless indecision, Gene Sawyer finally fired Cokely, but the damage to Chicago, never mind to Sawyer’s indelibly stained reputation, was already done. That evening, at a large West Side rally, Roseland’s Rev. Al Sampson introduced Cokely to a cheering crowd as “our warrior” and declared that “this is a case of Jewish organizations trying to stop one black man from having the right to speak.”

In the middle of this, Barack took Sheila to see the Eichmann exhibit. Both of them would long remember what ensued. In Obama’s later account, in the one single public reference he would ever make to his 1980s girlfriends, he created a character who was a conflation of Alex, Genevieve, and mostly Sheila who goes with him to “a new play by a black playwright.” Several weeks earlier Barack had taken Sheila to see a Chicago amateur production of August Wilson’s powerful 1985 play “Ma Rainey’s Black Bottom,” but Sheila would remember the aftermath of the Eichmann exhibit more vividly than Wilson’s play. As they left, she asked Barack not about Eichmann, but about Steve Cokely and why so many prominent black Chicagoans were defending him rather than denouncing his moronic anti-Semitism. In Obama’s version, his white girlfriend asked about black anger, and he replies: “I said it was a matter of remembering—nobody asks why Jews remember the Holocaust, I think I said—and she said that’s different, and I said it wasn’t, and she said that anger was just a dead end. We had a big fight, right in front of the theater,” and “When we got back to the car, she started crying. She couldn’t be black, she said. She would if she could, but she couldn’t. She could only be herself, and wasn’t that enough.”

Obama would admit that “whenever I think back” to that argument, “it somehow makes me ashamed.” Sheila and Barack did argue angrily that early May night on South Michigan Avenue, but it was because “I challenged him on . . . the question of black racism,” and his response was so disappointing that their argument became “pretty heated.” As Sheila recalled it, “I blamed him for not having the courage to confront the racial divide between us,” but in retrospect, she concluded that the chasm between them was not racial at all. Instead it lay in the profound tension between Barack’s insistence on “realism,” on pragmatism, and what she believed was simply a lack of courage on his part. “Courage was a big issue between us,” and their arguments over her belief that he lacked it were “very, very painful.”

In early May, Sheila and Barack’s mutual friend Asif Agha returned to Hyde Park after six months in Nepal. He remembers thinking at the time that “they had a good relationship. They were really tight, really solid,” but he also noted that the tensions between them were even greater than they had been during that tumultuous weekend in Madison nine months earlier. Asif thought Sheila had a deeper commitment to their lives together than did Barack, and now, listening to Barack talk about his goals, Asif understood that his friend “wanted to have a less complex public footprint” as a future candidate for public office, particularly in the black community. Asif recalls Barack saying, “The lines are very clearly drawn. . . . If I am going out with a white woman, I have no standing here.”

Asif realized just how profound the tension had become for Barack between the personal and the political. “If he was going to enter public life, either he was going to do it as an African American, or he wasn’t going to do it.” When asked if Barack had said he could not marry someone white, Asif assented. “He said that, exactly. That’s what he told me.”<sup>79</sup>

Even as his time in Roseland was ending, Obama still had to keep up with DCP’s school reform alliance with UNO. Johnnie, Aletha Strong Gibson, and Ann West were more involved than he was, but DCP continued to follow UNO’s Danny Solis and Lourdes Monteagudo. By late April, what was left of Harold Washington's official Education Summit had failed to endorse reform legislation that was muscular enough to satisfy top reformers like Don Moore, Fred Hess, and Pat Keleher of Chicago United. So UNO and DCP were now formally backing Chicago United's proposal, which was introduced in the state legislature by Senate Education Committee chairman Arthur L. Berman as S.B. 1837.

When Berman's committee held a daylong hearing on four competing bills on Tuesday, April 26, Barack and a small group of DCP members including Loretta Augustine, Rosa Thomas, Aletha Strong Gibson, and Ann West traveled to Springfield to lobby legislators and to hear Lourdes Monteagudo testify on behalf of UNO and DCP in support of S.B. 1837. Writing in the Tribune, CPS superintendent Manford Byrd once again energized reform advocates by decrying their attacks on "some monolithic, intractable bureaucracy which in fact does not exist" and claiming that "the school system is broadly understaffed." First the Sun-Times and then the Tribune began publishing multipart exposés on CPS's failings. The Trib series debuted with a long feature on one elementary school, "a hollow educational warehouse" that is "rich in remedial programs that draw attention to a child's failures." An accompanying editorial warned that "Chicago's public school system is failing its children and jeopardizing the city's future." The next day, in a culmination of negotiations that Don Moore's Designs for Change colleague Renee Montoya had been conducting with UNO's Danny Solis, DFC's reform bill, H.B. 3707, sponsored by African American Chicago representative Carol Moseley Braun, was strengthened with the addition of provisions from Chicago United's S.B. 1837. UNO and DCP joined in publicly shifting their support to the Braun bill, whose cosponsor was progressive Chicago Puerto Rican state senator Miguel del Valle, and reform energies increasingly coalesced behind the Braun-del Valle measure. In one Trib story, powerful 14th Ward alderman Edward Burke declared that "nobody in his right mind would send kids to public school." In another, Manford Byrd called himself "probably the most gifted urban administrator in this country" while once again dismissing CPS's obligations to its students: "When you're all done, the learner must learn for himself."<sup>80</sup>

In the final ten days before Barack's departure from Chicago for his two-month trip to Europe and then Kenya, things came completely apart at 5429 South Harper Avenue. Ever since Barack had transferred to Columbia almost seven years earlier, he had kept a journal, using it to record vignettes that might find their way into a future book and also sometimes for creating drafts of short stories and even letters to friends. Sheila knew of Barack's practice, and sometime after their heated argument outside the Spertus museum, she decided to take a look at it. Lena Montes heard from Barack what ensued. "She reacted to this journal that he kept under his bed or mattress," Lena recalled. "I remember when he says that she found some journal, and he talks about somebody in this journal and that she's upset" after she read it. Barack did not tell Lena whether she was that someone. "Was it a straw that broke the camel's back? I'm not sure. I just remember him saying that she . . . was leaving because of this journal."

Just as Barack was about to leave Chicago, Sheila moved out of their apartment and moved in with her younger friend Simrit "Sima" Dhesi, who had just completed her undergraduate degree at the University of Chicago, and her sister in an apartment four blocks away at 5324 South Kimbark Avenue. Sheila later said that May 1988 "was kind of a blur for me." Barack mentioned what was happening not only to Lena, but also to Loretta Augustine and even to his archdiocesan friend and Hyde Park neighbor Cynthia Norris. Cynthia understood that Sheila "was upset," and that the tensions between her and Barack were "because of her race. . . . Yes, I do remember that." Norris knew that Barack "had a lot of respect for” Sheila, and from what she knew, “I thought he handled things very, very well.” Loretta remembered it similarly. “He talked to me about her,” she recalled. “We had some really open and candid conversations” about the turmoil. “He obviously cared for her,” and was disturbed by what was happening. “I remember telling him, ‘If it’s really real, what you all have, you’ll come back’” after his trip and revive the relationship, ““and if it’s not, you’ll go forward.””

A number of small going-away parties occurred during Barack’s last week before he departed. Reformation Lutheran caretaker John Webster remembered one there, which was also where the small CEN program was now centered; Margaret Bagby recalled another one at St. Catherine’s with catered food. One evening everyone from DCP was invited to a quiet party at a small restaurant in suburban Blue Island. Greg Galluzzo, who had spent so many hours with Barack over the previous eighteen months, “bought him a briefcase and had it engraved” with just “Barack” as a useful going-away present for a law student.

On another night, Barack and Bruce Orenstein went out to drink beer, and Barack asked Bruce what he would be doing ten years from now. “I’m going to be making social change videos,” Bruce answered. Bruce in turn asked Barack the same question. He said he intended to write a book about his upcoming trip to Kenya, and then “I’m going to be mayor of Chicago.” Bruce was taken aback. “That was the first I heard of it,” and “I thought it was a lot of moxie to say that he was going to be mayor.”

A few days later, with Sheila having moved from their apartment, Barack flew east. Almost that same day, a dinner announced several weeks earlier was taking place to honor Frank Lumpkin for the eight years he had devoted to winning recompense for the Wisconsin steelworkers who had been thrown out onto the streets of South Deering back in March 1980.

Frank’s loyalties had not changed. The banquet’s proceeds would “benefit the People’s Daily World,” the newspaper of the Communist Party USA, but that did not deter a trio of notable figures from signing on as public patrons. State Senator Miguel del Valle, sponsor of the pending school reform bill, was one, 22nd Ward reform alderman Jesus “Chuy” Garcia was a second, and Monsignor Leo T. Mahon was a third. “Best wishes to a man who fights for justice,” read Leo’s greeting in the banquet program. Maybe Foster Milhouse and the other right-wing zealots had been right all along, that social justice Catholicism and grassroots communism were indeed one and the same.

Roberta Lynch, CCRC’s first staff organizer, and Tribune business editor Dick Longworth both sent their apologies for being out of town, but a crowd of more than four hundred attended, including U.S. congressman Charles Hayes, a veteran of both labor struggles and the 1966 Chicago Freedom Movement. The Daily Calumet gave the event glowing coverage—“Lumpkin Honored at Dinner”—and three days later editorialized in his honor, simply and accurately calling him “a hero.” After eight years of organizing, Frank Lumpkin had prevailed, and even triumphed.

Just short of three, Barack Obama was headed toward Harvard Law School with the intent of becoming not just mayor of Chicago but eventually president of the United States.<sup>81</sup>

Barack had scheduled a full month to see the great cities of Europe all by himself: Paris, Madrid, Barcelona, and Rome, then to London and from there to Nairobi. He later wrote that he anticipated “a whimsical detour, an opportunity to visit places I had never seen before,” but his memory would be that “I’d made a mistake” in allocating so many days for his European grand tour, because “it just wasn’t mine.” After almost three years of interacting with a dozen or more people almost every single day, now he was entirely alone in countries where he knew virtually nothing of either the language or the culture.

Before the end of May he was busily dispatching postcards to Sheila, Lena, Cathy Askew, and Cynthia Norris from Paris, “some quite humorous,” Sheila remembered. To Cathy, he wrote about how beautiful the buildings were, to Cynthia he described the city’s astonishing appeal: “I wander around Paris, the most beautiful, alluring, maddening city I’ve ever seen; one is tempted to chuck the whole organizing/political business and be a painter on the banks of the Seine. You’ll be amused to know that since I don’t know a word of French, I’m left speechless most of the time. Wish you a fruitful summer. Love, Barack.”

Traveling largely by bus and train, Barack was also reading a journalistic account of modern Africa in preparation for his visit to Kenya. He later told about meeting and trying to converse with a Senegalese traveler on the way from Madrid to Barcelona, but in subsequent years, Barack never referred to any experiences or memories from his four weeks on the continent. By the last weekend in June, he was in London, where Hasan and Raazia Chandoo had moved six months earlier from Brooklyn. The three of them had lunch in a brasserie before seeing Wim Wenders’s new film, Wings of Desire, at a cinema in Notting Hill.

From London Heathrow, Barack flew to Nairobi. His sister Auma and his Aunt Zeituni, the family member who had been the closest to his late father, met him at the airport, but Barack’s suitcase did not arrive until several days later. In preparation for his visit, Barack also had read a brand-new book on Dedan Kimathi, a Kenyan anticolonial warrior of the 1950s whom the British had executed in 1957, but instead of discussing Kenyan history while he stayed at Auma’s apartment, sleeping on her couch, they talked mostly about their extended clan of relatives. “There was never a moment of silence or embarrassed awkwardness” between them, Auma recalled. But with Barack wanting to meet as many family members as possible, “It wasn’t all nice. Sometimes he wanted to see a relative I didn’t really get along with, and he’d be like ‘It’s my right, and I need to see them, and I’m not going alone, and you’re coming with me,’” she explained.

Auma always assented, although her thoroughly unreliable Volkswagen Beetle was their primary mode of transport around sprawling Nairobi. One drive took them to see Auma’s mother Kezia and her sister Silpa Jane, who six years earlier had been the telephone caller who told Barack of his father’s death. On another, Zeituni took Barack to meet her older sister Sarah, who was living in a scruffy slum. But the most difficult visit was to Ruth Baker Ndesandjo, whose son Mark—Barack’s younger brother—was home for the summer and about to begin graduate school at Stanford after having just graduated from Brown. Barack later imagined that Ruth had invited him and Auma to come for lunch, but both Ruth and Mark convincingly remember Barack and Auma turning up with no forewarning. As Mark recounts, a “very awkward, cold” encounter ensued, as Ruth found the unexpected arrival of her ex-husband’s namesake “pretty traumatic.” Years later she recalled, “I closed up. I had nothing to say,” for “I didn’t have the capacity to talk with him or exchange with him because he was a reflection of a man I hated. So I didn’t want anything to do with him.”

Barack wanted to see more of Mark, and they arranged to have lunch a few days later. Mark remembered thinking that Barack had a “cold” demeanor, “absolutely no sense of humor,” and “wanted to shut out any emotional involvement” with his likewise half-Luo, half-white American brother, especially when Mark bluntly stated that “our father was a drunk and he beat women.” Barack later admitted that meeting Ruth and Mark, and grasping at least in part how abusively his father had treated them, affected him deeply. “The recognition of how wrong it had all turned out, the harsh evidence of life as it had really been lived, made me so sad,” far more so than he had been three years earlier when he had learned during Auma’s visit to Chicago just how deeply tragic a life Barack Obama Sr. had led.

During Barack’s second week in Kenya, Auma took him on a wild-game safari, and then the two of them plus Zeituni and Kezia took a train northwest to Kisumu and then a jitney bus to the family homestead at Nyang’oma Kogelo. There Barack met Sarah, the stepmother who had raised his father. Barack asked her if anything of his father’s still survived. “She opened a trunk and took out a stack of letters, which she handed to me. There were more than thirty of them, all of them written by my father,” carbon copies “all addressed to colleges and universities all across America” from when Obama Sr. was seeking admission to the University of Hawaii and other colleges. Holding them reminded Barack of the letters he had written a few years earlier, “trying to find a job that would give purpose to my life.”

That moment, even more than standing at his father’s unmarked grave in the side yard of Sarah’s small, tin-roofed brick home, marked the most powerful and direct paternal link Barack had ever experienced. The connection was underscored when relatives remarked that Barack’s voice sounded “exactly how his father spoke.” Barack’s visit to Nyang’oma Kogelo, like his earlier one to Aunt Sarah in that Nairobi slum, made Barack realize that his Kenyan relatives’ lives sometimes paralleled those of people whom he knew in Altgeld Gardens. Pondering John McKnight’s analysis, in Kogelo Barack wondered whether “the idea of poverty had been imported to this place, a new standard of need and want.”

Barack later wrote that while in Kenya, “for the first time in my life, I found myself thinking deeply about money,” perhaps foreshadowing the debt load he was about to take on to follow his father’s footsteps to Harvard rather than attend Northwestern cost free. He told Auma that his decision to attend law school was a response to his experiences in Chicago, because as a community organizer he could not “ultimately bring about significant change.” Back in Nairobi, everyone went to a photography studio so that a family portrait could be taken, and Barack and Auma made a brief visit to an elementary school so that he could meet his youngest sibling, George, the son of Jael Atieno.

One night Auma took Barack to meet one of her former teachers, a woman who had also known their father. Barack recounted her presciently telling him that being a historian “requires a temperament for mischief” and instructing him that when confronted with roseate fictions, “truth is usually the best corrective.” For his final weekend in Kenya, Auma and Barack took a train eastward to the country’s second largest city, coastal Mombasa. Overall, “it was a magical trip,” Barack remembered, an immersion into the life of the father who had abandoned him, an immersion that “made me I think much more forgiving of him” than he had been before experiencing Luo life and culture for the very first time.<sup>82</sup>

Before the end of July, Barack returned to Chicago, where he was all alone in the 5429 South Harper apartment until the lease expired in early August. When Asif’s friend Doug Glick stopped by, he was struck by how different the place looked without Sheila. But Barack and Sheila’s two months apart had not ended the relationship between them. Johnnie Owens had run into Sheila in Hyde Park during the summer and remembers how “upset,” even “brokenhearted” she seemed about what had happened just before Barack’s trip. But Barack’s more-than-weekly letters from Europe and Kenya had rebuilt much of their bond. Even so, in little more than two weeks he had to head to Massachusetts before the start of Harvard’s fall semester. He needed to purchase a better car than the blue Honda Civic that he had driven from Manhattan just over three years earlier, and he replaced it with an off-yellow 1984 Toyota Tercel hatchback he bought for $500 from a suburban police officer.

Barack also wanted to be sure that Johnnie's transition was going as smoothly as possible, not just at DCP, where everyone already knew Johnnie, but also with DCP's downtown supporters. "He made sure that the leaders were comfortable," Johnnie remembered, but "the main thing he did was transfer those financial funder relations" with Jean Rudd at Woods, Anne Hallett at Wieboldt, and Aurie Pennick at MacArthur. Just a few weeks later, MacArthur would award DCP its second annual $20,000 grant. Barack "left the organization in a very good position," Johnnie explained, and the effort Barack put into the transition further showed that he intended to return to Chicago after law school.

Barack's greatest disappointment was the lack of state funds to expand DCP's after-school tutoring program, but with state government consumed by the struggle over Chicago school reform, the legislature had remained in session beyond its normal end-of-June adjournment to pass a compromise bill. At the end of May, reform forces had reunified themselves into a new coalition called the Alliance for Better Chicago Schools, or ABCs, with UNO playing a lead role and DCP a minor one. A massive June 6 rally had called upon reform supporters to make their case in person to state legislators in Springfield, and the slogan "Don't come home without it!" became reformers' new rallying cry.

The Chicago City Council approved a vote of no confidence in Manford Byrd by 39 to 4, soon followed by the resignation of a board of education member who now felt similarly. "I assumed education was the first priority of the whole system, and it is not," retired business executive William Farrow announced. Down in Springfield, House speaker Michael J. Madigan brought the interested parties together for marathon negotiation and drafting sessions in his office. Danny Solis and Al Raby both took part, but the most influential participant was one of Madigan's deputies, Chicago state representative John Cullerton. By the end of June Al Raby was proclaiming that "real reform of Chicago schools is within our grasp," and on Saturday, July 2, both houses of the state legislature passed a compromise bill. Failure to adopt the measure by the end of June would delay its effective date for a year, but Chicago United's Patrick Keleher said the bill represented "as much if not more than any of us had hoped for."

Barack heard far less encouraging news about his other top concern, the Southeast Side landfill tussle. Mayor Sawyer's new UNO-and-DCP-dominated task force had held additional public hearings during June, and in late July met privately with both city and Waste Management representatives. By the end of the summer, its report to Sawyer was complete, though several weeks would pass before cochairs Loretta Augustine and Mary Ellen Montes joined the mayor at a City Hall press conference. "The city of Chicago is facing a crisis," Sawyer announced. "We're going to have to bite the bullet and do some things that we would prefer not to do," namely allow the O'Brien Locks site to become a landfill. That outcome had always looked inevitable, but Bruce, Barack, and Mary Ellen's strategic success in blowing up the Fitch negotiations meant that any landfill now would be controlled not by Waste Management but by the Metropolitan Sanitary District.

Alinsky-style warfare had not only destroyed a likely Southeast Side consensus to accept a quid-pro-quo deal with Waste Management, it had deprived those neighborhoods of the multimillion-dollar bounty WMI had been willing to pay. It was a debacle all around. A decade later, Jim Fitch would be sent to federal prison for eighteen months and fined $1 million for looting bank funds throughout the 1980s in order to contribute to Southeast Side politicians. Another decade further on, with UNO having abandoned

South Chicago and transformed itself into something that bore no resemblance to the organization that Mary Gonzales, Greg Galluzzo, and Mary Ellen Montes had originally built, UNO would endorse a Waste Management effort to expand Southeast Side landfills.

In Barack's final days before he left for Harvard, the DCP members to whom he had become closest held a small barbecue for him at Loretta Augustine's home. He assured them, "If you have problems, you can contact me and I'll do what I can." He also had a trio or more of presents for them, wooden figurines he said he had brought back from Kenya. Dan Lee remembered that Barack gave him "a statue of a warrior with a chipped beard." Cathy Askew recalled admiring a giraffe, but "I think he gave me the zebra because of the mixed black and white stripes," an acknowledgment of their disagreement about biracial identity.

Mary Ellen Montes did not attend that party, but one evening Barack took her out to dinner at a downtown restaurant. "We had our own kind of little going-away party, Barack and I, and it was just Barack and I," she remembered. Barack promised to write to her, and he would, but that night, or the next morning, was the last time Lena and Barack would see each other in person.

With the lease on the South Harper apartment expiring several days before Barack planned to leave, he joined Sheila in her apartment on South Kimbark. She was preparing to leave Chicago soon too to begin her dissertation fieldwork in South Korea thanks to a Fulbright fellowship, and when she joined Barack for a farewell visit to Jerry Kellman's home, they had a question for Jerry and his wife. "They come to dinner at our house," Jerry remembered, "and they say 'Could you please keep this cat?'" The Kellmans willingly agreed to give Max a new home. "Barack was not sad to give Max away," Sheila explained, but for Max the transition was all to the good, and he would enjoy eight years of love with the Kellmans.

Jerry knew that Barack and Sheila were not breaking up, just headed in different geographical directions. He thought "they had a great, healthy relationship," although one that was now constrained by Barack's career plans. "By the time Barack left to go to law school, he had made the decision that he would go into public life," Jerry realized. Indeed, "my sense is that Barack's dream was to come back and possibly become mayor of Chicago."

But Barack was still trapped between his belief in his own destiny and his deep emotional tie to Sheila. One day that final week "he said that he'd come to a decision and asked me to go to Harvard with him and get married, mostly, I think, out of a sense of desperation over our eventual parting and not in any real faith in our future," Sheila recalled. Her memory was reminiscent of Genevieve's from three summers earlier, when Barack had asked her to come to Chicago with him, and Genevieve had thought Barack was asking her only because he was certain her answer would be no.

Now, once again, the answer was no, and Sheila was upset by Barack's presumption that she should postpone, if not abandon, her dissertation research in order to accompany him to Harvard. A "very angry exchange" followed, with Sheila feeling that Barack believed that his career interests should trump hers.

Barack started eastward within a day or two, knowing he could stay temporarily with his uncle Omar, who had remained in greater Boston ever since first arriving there thanks to his older brother a quarter century earlier and whose phone number and address Aunt Zeituni had given Barack while he was in Nairobi. But before heading back down Stony Island Avenue to the Skyway and then the Indiana Toll Road, Barack needed to have one other conversation.

“I was a little troubled about the notion of going off to Harvard. I thought that maybe I was betraying my ideals and not living up to my values. I was feeling guilty,” he told a college audience just six years later. Barack called Donita at Trinity and made an appointment to see Jeremiah Wright to seek his counsel about those doubts. In a way, it was just like the conversation he had had nine Augusts earlier, in Honolulu, when eighteen-year-old Barry had gone to visit Frank Marshall Davis before leaving for Occidental and life on the mainland.

Years later, before their relationship was torn apart, Wright would say that Barack was “like a son to me.” One of the most knowledgeable and savvy women in black Chicago would make the same point: “Jeremiah Wright was the black male father figure for Barack,” she emphasized. “Don’t underestimate the influence that Jeremiah had on Barack.” Wright would not specifically remember their conversation that August day, but Barack always would. In a way, it was a three years’ bookend to the admonishing monologue about being a do-gooder that Bob Elia had given him that night in the motel lobby on South Hermitage Road.

That exchange would stay with Barack always, as would this one, but the substance of Wright’s message was identical to the warning that old Frank had voiced: “You’re not going to college to get educated. You’re going there to get trained,” trained “to manipulate words so they don’t mean anything anymore,” trained “to forget what you already know.” Wright’s message was just five words, ones that would ring in Barack’s ears for the entire two-day drive eastward: “Don’t let Harvard change you!”<sup>83</sup>

EMERGENCE AND ACHIEVEMENT

---

HARVARD LAW SCHOOL

SEPTEMBER 1988–MAY 1991

Omar Onyango Obama, the younger brother whom Barack Obama Sr. had helped come to the United States in 1963 to attend high school, was by August 1988 an unmarried forty-four-year-old store clerk living in central Cambridge. Omar's apartment at 48 Bishop Allen Drive was his twenty-seven-year-old nephew's first destination when Barack exited the Massachusetts Turnpike upon arriving from Chicago. Omar had never completed high school, but his mundane work life had not kept him from developing keen political interests. "I am a Pan-Africanist," he wrote in a letter to Ebony magazine, one who shared "the dreams of brothers Marcus Garvey, W. E. B. Du Bois and Malcolm X." Barack had never met his uncle Omar, but Omar happily hosted him while Barack scoured the Boston Globe's classified ads looking for a place of his own.

John "Jay" Holmes owned the handsome, almost century-old Queen Anne-style Langmaid Terrace apartment building at 359–365 Broadway in Somerville's Winter Hill neighborhood. Harvard Law School was a twelve-minute, two-and-half-mile drive away, but for $700 a month a one-bedroom basement-level "garden" apartment there offered more private and spacious quarters, including a nice exposed-brick living room, than other rentals closer in. By the end of August, Barack was happily settled at 365 Broadway #B1, and on September 1, Harvard Law School (HLS)'s two-day registration and orientation for first-year students—"1Ls"—got under way on its multibuilding campus on the east side of Massachusetts Avenue, a short distance north of Harvard Square.

The entering class of 1991 numbered 548 students, selected from among seventy-one hundred applicants. Forty percent of the new class were women, and 22 percent were nonwhite, including fifty-seven African American students, of whom almost two-thirds were women. That was impressive diversity: the 2L and 3L classes had started with sixty and seventy-three African Americans, respectively. While the average age of the new 1Ls was twenty-three, with an overwhelming majority coming directly from their undergraduate studies, 5 percent of the class was over the age of thirty, including "many students who experienced the 'real world' before coming to law school," according to the weekly Harvard Law Record. Word among the faculty was that "preferences for applicants who had taken time off, engaged in public works, or participated in other significant outside activities or experiences" had played a significant role in admissions decisions.

The school had an illustrious reputation but a deeply troubled internal culture. For three years, the faculty had been embroiled in toxic ideological warfare that had seen four junior faculty members denied permanent appointments, the first such tenure denials in seventeen years. That quartet was seen as "crits," or proponents of "critical legal studies" (CLS), a left-wing school of thought that viewed legal rules and doctrines as inherently conservative rather than politically neutral. While several prominent crits, including CLS's most erudite proponent, Roberto Mangabeira Unger, a Brazilian legal philosopher, were senior members of the Harvard law faculty, other full professors, including Robert C. Clark and David Rosenberg, were perceived as conservative “law and economics” devotees who were generally hostile to the work of critics.

James Vorenberg, dean of the law school since 1981, had announced his upcoming departure from that post in April 1988, just as tensions over a second issue of faculty composition—racial and gender diversity—were reaching a new peak as well. Seven years earlier, the roughly sixty-member Harvard law faculty had included just one tenured woman and a single tenured black male, who passed away in 1983. By 1988 there were five senior women, all white, and two tenured black men—Derrick Bell and Christopher Edley—with one more woman and three additional black men—Charles Ogletree, Randall Kennedy, and David Wilkins—all on the cusp of consideration for permanent appointments. In May 1988, the Black Law Students Association (BLSA) occupied Vorenberg’s office in a “study vigil” to protest the school’s failure to appoint additional minority faculty, with Professor Bell and legendary civil rights organizer Robert Moses addressing a student rally the next day.

Even with their healthy representation in each entering class, Harvard’s black law students felt a constant need to prove they were just as qualified as their white classmates to succeed at HLS. “Everything here says you can’t do it,” graduating BLSA president Verna Williams remarked in a fifty-page 1988 BLSA publication. “BLSA fights that negative attitude, and that builds you up.” The 1988 class had found BLSA in “disarray” upon their 1985 arrival and had worked to show that black students could attain leadership positions in multiple student organizations. By their 3L year, they had succeeded, with 1987–88 marking “the first time in HLS history that black law students, in significant numbers, had not only gotten involved in campus organizations outside of BLSA, but had done so with such success and capability that their peers . . . asked them to lead the organizations.”

But law students of all races were deeply unhappy with the institution’s culture. In the late 1980s “attending Harvard Law School was a miserable experience for the majority of its students,” one highly supportive alumnus later acknowledged, and a 1988 forum soliciting student input regarding the selection of Vorenberg’s successor instead focused on “the alienation students have felt from the law faculty,” the Harvard Crimson reported. “I don’t always feel that professors are here who can teach,” one 3L woman told the paper. “Law school seems to exist primarily for the professors.” Another 3L wrote in a subsequent memoir, “I didn’t know any of my law school professors,” and described how “the one thing that actually drew the student body together was a widespread disenchantment with our teachers.” He also recounted that although 70 percent of his classmates had arrived at Harvard expressing an interest in practicing public interest law, only six out of 474 actually accepted legal-services jobs after graduation.

Four years earlier a young sociologist, Robert Granfield, had begun questioning scores of Harvard law students to analyze the “complex ideological process that systematically channels students away from socially oriented work.” He concluded that “students come to believe that effective social progress occurs primarily through the use of elite positions and resources.” Graduates “feel that they have emerged with their altruism intact, while having actually been co-opted” into joining large corporate law firms as a result of their acculturation at what he called “a tremendously powerful co-optive institution.” The bottom line was that “employment in organizations designed principally to serve the corporate rich came to be seen as highly compatible with public service ideals.”

BLSA’s long, mid-1988 report included a four-page essay entitled “Minority and Women Law Professors: A Comparison of Teaching Styles,” written by a graduating 3L who had accepted a job at the Chicago office of Sidley & Austin, one of the country’s most prominent corporate law firms. Michelle Robinson had taken Criminal Law with Charles Ogletree and Family Law with Martha Minow, a young professor who had been awarded tenure in 1986 and whose father was one of Sidley & Austin’s best-known partners. Robinson briefly interviewed both Ogletree and Minow, as well as David Wilkins, because she saw each of them as highly atypical faculty members: “each one of these professors spends an enormous amount of time with students—particularly minority and women students,” she wrote. Robinson clearly admired Minow, writing that “sitting in her Family Law class is like sitting in the studio audience during a taping of the Phil Donahue Show.” Not all compliments are actually flattering, but it was David Wilkins, in just his second year of teaching at Harvard, who supplied the real gist of Robinson’s essay. “The problem here is that only about ten percent of the professors care enough about students to spend time with them,” he bluntly told her. “Consequently, this ten percent gets a disproportionate share of students to counsel.” He pointed out further that they bore that heavy ancillary burden while also striving to write the law review articles necessary for promotion to tenured full professor.

Like many of her fellow students, Robinson lamented the law faculty’s relative lack of “people who possess the enthusiasm, sensitivity and ingenuity necessary to bring excitement back into the classroom.” She also decried the school’s lack of interest in hiring a more diverse faculty and said it “merely reinforces racist and sexist stereotypes,” attitudes that also were manifest in “the rude statements and questions posed by students”—white students—“to Professors Wilkins and Ogletree.” But as Robinson’s acceptance of Sidley & Austin’s highly remunerative job offer underscored, another defining element of the law school’s culture was that the high cost of a Harvard education provided a powerful incentive for graduates to take the best-paying jobs available.

Several hundred graduating students had completed a Robert Granfield questionnaire that probed that subject, and a heavy majority acknowledged that “the necessity of repaying educational loans” had been a decisive factor in their own job decisions. With most graduates leaving Harvard saddled with tens of thousands of dollars in debt, law students “are co-opted into futures of providing service for the corporate elite,” Granfield concluded. Verna Myers had arrived at the law school straight from her 1981–82 senior year as president of Columbia and Barnard’s Black Student Organization. “I went to Harvard expecting to change the world,” but in 1985, “I left Harvard thinking ‘How can I pay my loans?’”<sup>1</sup>

The first day of Harvard’s fall 1988 registration for 1Ls featured a 1:00 P.M. financial aid session. Tuition for the year was $12,300, with total costs for a student living off-campus estimated at $22,450. That day or the next, the new students also received their course schedules for the fall semester. The entering class was divided into four numerically identified sections—I, II, III, and IV—of about 140 students apiece. Each section had five core first-year courses: Civil Procedure, Contracts, Torts, Criminal Law, and Property. Within each of those four sections, each student was also assigned to a thirteen-member “O Group”—O as in Orientation—which would then become their ungraded, fall semester one-afternoon-a-week Legal Methods class, taught by an upper-class student. Each O Group had a faculty mentor, and for Section III, to which Obama was assigned, one of the five substantive courses, Torts, would be divided into a trio of smaller, forty-five student classes. For Section III, Civil Procedure and Contracts would last the entire year, three hours a week. Torts and Criminal Law would meet five hours per week in the fall semester. In the spring, when 1Ls could choose a single elective from among half a dozen choices, Section III would have Property five hours per week, and the Legal Methods class would morph into a prolonged “moot court” exercise in which two-person teams briefed and argued faux court cases. One odd feature of Harvard’s first-year schedule was that final exams for the fall classes took place only in mid-January, well after the Christmas and New Year’s break.

The first classmates the new students met were their fellow members of the O Group, who introduced themselves alphabetically. Richard Cloobek was a twenty-two-year-old Dartmouth graduate from Los Angeles. African American Eric Collins, from North Carolina, had just graduated from Princeton. Twenty-three-year-old UCLA graduate Diana Derycz had just finished a master’s degree at Stanford. Then came a trio of visibly older men. Rob Fisher had grown up on a farm in Charles County in southern Maryland before graduating from Duke in 1976 and completing a Ph.D. in economics there six years later. From 1982 until a few months earlier he had taught economics at the College of the Holy Cross in western Massachusetts. Mark Kozlowski, a 1980 graduate of Sarah Lawrence College, had spent the past eight years studying political theory at Columbia University and was about to submit his Ph.D. dissertation on the constitutional thought of American framer and president James Madison. When Barack Obama introduced himself, “the way he spoke was very, very memorable,” Richard Cloobek recounted. “He was talking about black folks and white folks” and “what really, really struck me is that I got the impression he was neither.” Mark Kozlowski remembered Barack mentioning both Hawaii and Indonesia when he spoke. “I was immediately very impressed with Barack” and “I was immediately taken with the voice.” The trio of Fisher, Kozlowski, and Obama made Cloobek realize “there was a big distinction between the older people and the younger people,” and Diana Derycz remembered similarly, thinking “how brainy people were” in this new northeastern environment.

After Obama was a twenty-two-year-old Tufts graduate. “I’m Jennifer Radding. I have no idea how I got in,” she said. She remembers that Barack was among those who laughed, and “he knew I was a bit of a jokester,” Jennifer explained. Jeff Richman had just graduated from the University of Michigan, and Sarah Leah Whitson was a brand-new graduate of UC Berkeley with family roots in the Middle East. The high-powered group featured strikingly diverse experiences. Diana Derycz had spent five years in Mexico as a child and was working part-time as a professional model. Fisher had studied in Australia for three years during and after graduate school, Barack had lived almost three years in Indonesia, and Whitson had spent summers with relatives in Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon.

O group instructor Scott Becker, a twenty-five-year-old 3L who was a graduate of the University of Illinois, found himself supervising a group of 1Ls some of whom—Rob, Mark, and Barack in particular—were older and more worldly-wise than he. The first day’s mandate was to conduct some sort of attorney-witness Q&A exercise, and when it was over, Barack immediately introduced himself to the obviously brilliant Rob Fisher, who was seven years his senior. “We instantly became friends,” Fisher recalled. Rob’s intellectual enthusiasm and energy belied his thirty-four years. In 1986, New York University Press had published his book The Logic of Economic Discovery: Neoclassical Economics and the Marginal Revolution. The book’s title purposely mirrored Karl Popper’s famous The Logic of Scientific Discovery, and the major figure in Fisher’s work was the late Hungarian philosopher of science Imre Lakatos, whose scholarly work in Popper’s empiricist tradition was vastly better known than his role as a hard-core Stalinist in Hungary's post-World War II Communist Party. Fisher's focus was what he termed "A Lakatosian Approach to Economics," and his volume had garnered enthusiastically positive reviews in scholarly journals. "The book effectively demonstrates the applicability of the philosophy of science to the history of economics," one reviewer wrote, adding that "the argument is crystal clear and largely persuasive." A second observed that "the reason neoclassical economists like Lakatos so much is that his philosophy is intended fundamentally to explain the evolution of physics," since "neoclassical economics wants desperately to be a social physics."

Fisher remembered from the first day that Barack "recognized he was in a playground for ideas," one where he could exercise "his love for intellectual argument." It was a passion that Rob shared, and from that day forward the somewhat unlikely duo would become an inseparable pair whom scores of classmates recall as the closest of friends. Barack remembered his initial experience of Harvard Law School similarly. "I was excited about it. Here was an opportunity for me to read and reflect and study for as much as I wanted. That was my job," and a much easier one than what he had confronted at the Developing Communities Project. "When I went back to law school, the idea of reading a book didn't seem particularly tough to me."

The four fall 1L courses gave Barack some large books to read, and he needed to read them with painstaking care. In Contracts, Professor Ian Macneil, a 1955 Harvard Law School graduate who was visiting for the year from Northwestern University, had assigned his own Contracts: Exchange Transactions and Relations, 2nd ed., which was more than thirteen hundred pages long. In Civil Procedure, the text for the year, Richard H. Field et al.'s Materials for a Basic Course in Civil Procedure, 5th ed., came in slightly shorter, at 1,275 pages. Section III's fall semester of Civ Pro was taught by Professor David L. Shapiro, a 1957 summa cum laude Harvard Law graduate and former Supreme Court clerk, but in December Shapiro would become deputy solicitor general of the United States, and the course would be taken over for the spring semester by Stephen N. Subrin, a visiting professor from Northeastern University Law School.

In Criminal Law, Professor Richard D. Parker, a 1970 Harvard Law graduate and another former Supreme Court clerk, assigned Paul H. Robinson's brand-new Fundamentals of Criminal Law, a mere 1,090 pages. And in Torts, Professor David Rosenberg, a 1967 graduate of NYU's law school who had taught at Harvard since 1979, would use Page Keeton et al.'s Cases and Materials on Tort and Accident Law, which at 1,360 pages was the bulkiest of the four.<sup>2</sup>

After the long Labor Day weekend, 1L classes commenced on Tuesday morning, September 6. For Section III, their first class session was Contracts with Ian Macneil, whom the members of Barack's O Group had already met for a brown-bag lunch in his role as their faculty mentor. Since Macneil was almost as new to Harvard as they were, the assignment had little practical value, but the Scottish Macneil—in private life he was the eminent forty-sixth chief of Clan Macneil—seemed like a nice man.

But in the classroom, Macneil's use of the traditional Socratic method brought out an utterly different personal demeanor. Most members of Section III would remember their first class at Harvard Law School for the rest of their lives. They had been informed five days earlier, in the semester's initial number of the weekly, mimeographed HLS Adviser newsletter, by both Macneil and David Shapiro, what to read in advance of Tuesday's classes. Macneil's reading included the preface to his casebook, in which he repeatedly used the Latin abbreviation "e.g." and also stated his somewhat iconoclastic definition of the course's core concept: "contract encompasses all human activities in which economic exchange is a significant factor—marriage as much as sales of goods." That highly inclusive definition distinguished his text from others. "Thus the range of activities treated goes beyond those traditionally associated with the doctrinally structured first year contracts course." Organized with an eye toward "functional patterns, rather than doctrinally," the book "focuses on the negotiational and remedial processes that continuing exchange relationships generate."

Ian Macneil began Tuesday's 9:00 A.M. class by telling Section III's 140 students that no matter where they had gone to college, no undergraduate education had taught them to read as carefully as they would have to in order to succeed at Harvard Law School. "For example, I bet you don't know what the difference between i.e. and e.g. is," he remarked while glancing at his seating chart and randomly calling upon Alicia Rubin, a 1987 graduate of Harvard College.

Rubin knew enough Latin to nail the answer cold: "i.e. stands for id est, that is, and e.g. is exempli gratia, for example," she replied. "That really ticked him off," she recalled, because Macneil had not anticipated an immediate correct response. "Well, Miss Rubin," he said, "let's see if you've done the reading for today. Can you define a contract?" Rubin "had not even bought my books yet," and "so I fumbled around" trying to answer. Seated next to her was Michelle Jacobs, a 1988 Harvard College graduate who quickly realized that John Houseman's fictional contracts professor in the 1973 film The Paper Chase was, at least in Ian Macneil's classroom, no Hollywood exaggeration. "Oh my god! It really does happen!" Jacobs remembered thinking.

Jacobs knew that Macneil "had this bizarre definition of contract that was in our reading," and "I had written it down, and I kept trying to give it to her," but Rubin was focused only on Macneil. "Then he said something to the effect of 'Don't embarrass yourself further. Please leave the room, do the reading you were supposed to do, and then come back and see if you can take a better stab at it.'" David Attisani, a 1987 graduate of Williams College, watched the exchange and thought it "idiotic." So did Eric Collins, the African American Princeton graduate who was in Obama's O Group. He recalls thinking that "if this is how law school is, I've made a mistake." Rubin said she rose, "borrowed somebody else's textbook," and headed for the door. Richard Cloobek also remembered the scene. "It was a very, very powerful moment, and he was such an asshole."

In the hallway, Rubin read through the preface of Macneil's casebook. "It seemed like an eternity, but it probably was only ten or fifteen minutes." She went "back into the room," and "then he calls on me again." Rubin tried "to stumble through some kind of response," but Macneil "picked me apart again." She felt "absolutely mortified and miserable," but finally the class ended. "It was just a horrible first day of class," Rubin recalled, but a few minutes later, in a nearby hallway, an older student she did not know came up to her. "He put his hand on my shoulder and was like 'You know, you did a really nice job.'" He introduced himself as Barack Obama. "He was giving me this little pep talk," and Ali Rubin was hugely appreciative. Barack's comments were "really nice."

David Shapiro's first session of Civ Pro featured a discussion of Goldberg v. Kelly, a 1970 U.S. Supreme Court decision protecting the due process rights of welfare recipients. Richard Parker's Crim Law and David Rosenberg's Torts also started the semester without incident, but each morning Section III's Contracts class met with Macneil, the room was riven with tension as the students waited to see whom he would call upon next. "If someone's terrified, they're not learning very well," recounts Amy Christian, a magna cum laude 1988 graduate of Georgetown University who later became a law professor herself. She “couldn’t stand” Macneil’s classroom style, and most of her classmates soon felt likewise.

Making things worse, Macneil demanded that students initial an attendance roster each morning to demonstrate who was present. American Bar Association accreditation standards for law schools mandated that students actually attend most of their classes, but in 1988 the majority of law professors, at Harvard and elsewhere, paid little attention to this requirement. Macneil’s policy, followed by angry warnings when it was discovered that some people were signing in for absent classmates, roiled Section III even further. “People felt it was juvenile,” Lisa Hay, a 1985 summa cum laude Yale graduate, recalled. The practice was “really juvenile for a professional school,” agreed Martin Siegel, a 1988 highest honors graduate of the University of Texas.

“Relations between Macneil and the class broke down very severely very quickly,” Mark Kozlowski explained. In class Macneil came across as “a very angry person,” remembered Morris Ratner, who had just graduated with distinction from Stanford. The “toxic atmosphere” made the course “a disaster,” the exact same word that David Troutt, a biracial African American 1986 graduate of Stanford, used when recalling the day Macneil “cursed at me.” Aside from Macneil’s attendance policy, there was also the burden of “how demanding he was in terms of the volume of material that you had to cover and also because of how ruthless and unforgiving he was of people who weren’t prepared,” explained Paolo Di Rosa, a 1987 magna cum laude graduate of Harvard College. “He really humiliated people who weren’t prepared.” Michelle Jacobs came to believe that Macneil “liked humiliating people.” Jennifer Radding remembered the day Macneil called on her about secured transactions. “I’ll never forget it—obviously I’m still traumatized all these years later,” she joked equivocally. Greg Sater, like Ratner a 1988 Stanford graduate with distinction, felt Macneil was “really verbally abusive to people,” and Sarah Leah Whitson found him “so angry and critical and disparaging of students.” Di Rosa used the same adjective as Sater—“abusive”—to characterize Macneil, who was “just a monster,” and Di Rosa agreed with Amy Christian that the result was “more fear than respect.”

Rob Fisher was the only student who had spent six years at the front of a college classroom, but he fully shared his classmates’ view that Macneil was “a horrible professor” and Contracts “was the most painful course.” Fisher and Mark Kozlowski, also older, both quickly grasped that Macneil’s idiosyncratic approach was profoundly simplistic. “He had one idea,” Fisher recalled, “that contracts are relationships.” Kozlowski was even more dismissive, viewing Macneil’s focus as “a pointless effort to apply absolutely standard social science rhetoric to contracts.” Even worse, “he spent a lot of time on his theory and not a great deal of time on learning contracts,” which quickly led many in Section III to believe they were being shortchanged relative to friends in other sections. “There was a sense that Section III was not learning contracts at the same level as the other students and learning the doctrine,” recalled Tim Driscoll, a 1988 summa cum laude graduate of Hofstra University. “People just really thought that they were not learning contracts law, and they were getting cheated,” agreed Gina Torielli, an older student who had graduated from Michigan State with high honors.

Jackie Fuchs, a 1988 summa cum laude graduate of UCLA who before college played bass guitar alongside Joan Jett in the Runaways, agreed that Macneil was “very hard to get along with,” but she felt he simply “did not know how to relate to people in their twenties.” Kozlowski was less charitable. Not only was Macneil “extremely antagonistic in class,” he repeatedly “would simply insult people to their face,” and not just young women like Ali Rubin. Mark remembered a conservative white male politely saying he did not understand a question, yet Macneil responded, “It’s a point that would be obvious to any intelligent person. It’s not obvious to you.” Shannon Schmoyer, who had graduated summa cum laude and first in her 1987 class at the University of Oklahoma, summed up Section III’s view of Ian Macneil: “he was an embarrassment to Harvard Law School.”<sup>3</sup>

Not all of Barack’s time and energy during the fall semester’s first weeks were devoted to his casebooks and class time. The law school’s Hemenway gym was indisputably a dump—a word that a dozen alumni used for the facility—but its convenient location made finding pickup basketball games easy, as long as yoga classes or volleyball matches were not taking place. Only a few hours after reassuring Ali Rubin how well she had coped with Macneil’s onslaught, Barack late that afternoon went to Hemenway and found a group that included twenty-two-year-old African American 1L Frank Harper, a magna cum laude graduate of Brown University, and four African American 2Ls: Kevin Little, Leon Bechet, Frank Cooper, and Kenny Smith. African American 1L David Hill, a 1986 high honors graduate of Wesleyan University, soon joined the regular late-afternoon mix.

When a student intramurals league got started shortly into the semester, a half-dozen of the black Hemenway regulars, including Barack, came together briefly on a team they called BOAM: Brothers on a Mission. “We weren’t very good,” remembered Kevin Little, perhaps HLS’s top basketball devotee. All during that 1L year, Barack spent a good deal of time on the basketball court, but “he didn’t want to hang out afterwards,” Leon Bechet recalled. “It seemed like he always had a schedule . . . like he had a mission and he had a purpose.”

With the 1991, 1990, and 1989 classes together, Harvard had more than 150 black law students on campus that fall, and the BLSA chapter seemed to have as much energy as their 1988 graduating class. BLSA scheduled its own orientation event for 1Ls soon after their arrival on campus. David Hill remembered how “Barack is holding court” and other new students “thought he was not a 1L” as they listened to him. “People were very surprised that this guy was a 1L simply because of how he was handling himself.” An evening or two earlier, standing in the checkout line at the Star Market in Porter Square, just up from the law school, Barack had introduced himself to an African American woman he recognized from the first day’s financial aid orientation session. “I think we’re both at Harvard,” he said to Cassandra “Sandy” Butts, a 1987 graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Butts was in Section I, but “we certainly bonded over some of our challenges in the financial aid office,” and she, like Rob Fisher, became a close friend of Barack’s in their first days at Harvard.

Butts was with Obama and David Hill at that BLSA gathering when 3L Sheryll Cashin approached. Cashin too recalled other students listening as Barack spoke. “Within a couple of minutes, all of the people around were just hanging on his every word.” Barack was “dressed kind of shabbily,” and “I remember him talking about community organizing.” Also listening was one of the youngest 1Ls, Christine Lee, a 1988 Oberlin College graduate who was still a few days shy of her twenty-first birthday. Lee had spent her early childhood in Paris, but when she was ten, her white mother left her alcoholic African American father and took her to live in Boerum Hill, Brooklyn, where she grew up as the black daughter of a white single mother. From Christine’s youthful perspective, Barack sounded “kind of full of himself,” because “he acted like he’d come from a whole life of work in the trenches rather than just a little stint after college.” Barack “seemed pretentious,” and “I immediately did not like him.”

Barack remembered listening to and first meeting Derrick Bell at that BLSA orientation, but he was not immediately drawn to any of the five African American men on the law faculty. Even though Charles Ogletree was an untenured visiting professor, the 1978 Harvard Law graduate was an enthusiastic cheerleader for the school's black law students, and by mid-September, Ogletree had begun convening the first of four fall semester "Saturday School" sessions during which he hoped to reassure black 1Ls that they should not allow self-doubts to prevent them from succeeding at Harvard Law School. Derrick Bell and David Wilkins joined Ogletree, as did Charles Nesson, a white 1963 summa cum laude Harvard Law graduate who had worked in the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division before joining the Harvard faculty. Ogletree was at pains to stress that the Saturday-morning sessions were "not a remedial course," and BLSA leaders, like Ogletree, used the gatherings to encourage black 1Ls to become active in and seek out leadership roles in a variety of student organizations. About forty students attended the initial meeting, and Obama's black classmates remember that he rarely if ever attended "Saturday School."<sup>4</sup>

By mid-September, something else occurred in Barack's life that he did not mention to any of his new law school friends. Sheila Jager was staying with him at his Somerville apartment. Her Fulbright fellowship was for her to spend twelve months doing her dissertation fieldwork at Seoul National University in South Korea. After Barack left for Harvard, Sheila had intended to leave Chicago in mid-September and go to Seoul. But Barack wrote to her soon after his arrival in Cambridge, and after some phone calls, Sheila agreed to fly to Boston before going to South Korea.

"Why did I end up with him for a month in his Somerville apartment before leaving for Korea?" Sheila asked herself after recounting how she had refused to accompany Barack to Harvard. "I never said that I wouldn't visit him," she remembered, and she also recalled how her parents, who were then in Japan, were "really angry with me" when they learned she was staying with Barack and would not arrive in Seoul until after they had left the Far East.

Barack and Sheila's weeks together in the private basement apartment became a replay of their final months in Chicago before Barack's trip to Europe and Kenya. "I felt smothered by Barack, by his neediness to be the center of my world, by his sheer overpowering presence, and by the isolation I felt because we were always alone," Sheila recalled. Barack recounted what he most liked about his new life as a law student. "I do remember Barack telling me about Rob, although we never met. He described him, as I recall, as 'a bear of a man' and talked about him with great warmth, as a kind of older brother. . . . He said the two of them were the smartest people in their class at Harvard and ran rings around everybody else." Many of Rob and Barack's Section III colleagues were coming to share that characterization as the fall semester progressed, but after a month in Barack's apartment, Sheila was indeed ready to leave for Korea.

"He was like a huge flame that sucked up all the oxygen, and toward the end of our relationship, I felt breathless, exhausted really. I remember getting off the plane in Seoul and feeling like I could breathe again." Deep down, Sheila's feelings for Barack remained the same as in Chicago. "I knew at that point that the relationship could not work in the long term even though I loved him very deeply. He, of course, realized this as well. When I left for Korea, I felt as if I had abandoned him, although the split was completely mutual."

But even when Barack drove Sheila to Logan Airport, their relationship had not seen its true end.<sup>5</sup>

As September turned to October for the 1L students in Section III, their distaste for Ian Macneil gave way to gallows humor as they realized they could do nothing to alter their fate. The section took on the mordant nickname of “the Gulag.” Lisa Hay, who had worked for Democratic presidential nominee Michael Dukakis’s campaign before beginning her 1L year, began anonymously producing a weekly mimeographed newsletter chronicling life in Section III entitled Three Speech. It recorded odd or humorous statements from their reading and from classroom comments. Macneil, of course, was a prime target. One headline was: “You Make the Call: Fact? or Fiction?,” followed by a quotation from Macneil’s Contracts casebook: “Habit, custom and education develop a sense of obligation to preserve one’s credit rating not altogether different from that Victorian maidens felt respecting their virginity.”

Hay quoted Macneil’s maladroit attempts at classroom humor that often backfired. For example: “The sexual relation is a good one for you to think about—in the context of this course, I mean.” Or when Macneil asked, “Give me an example of a voluntary exchange,” Richard Cloobek, one of Section III’s best provocateurs, volunteered, “Having sex with your girlfriend,” to which Macneil replied, “Give me an easier one.” The next week, when the concept of inadequacy arose, Macneil bluntly asked one student, “Does your girlfriend ever say you are inadequate?” and a few days later, he insultingly told another, “Maybe you don’t have the skills to be a law student.”

When Hay crafted a top-ten list of reasons for not doing Macneil’s assigned readings, entries included “slept through class,” “was laughing too hard at footnotes to read the text,” and a joke about Macneil’s almost daily references to the Encyclopedia of Philosophy. Most pointed of all was “Proportionality: Contracts homework out of proportion with length and value of class.” In October, Hay reported a joking exchange between two classmates: “‘If I learned I only had a week to live, I’d want to spend all my time with Macneil.’ ‘Why’s that?’ ‘Because he makes every minute seem like a year!’”

With the November presidential election, pitting Massachusetts governor Dukakis against the Republican nominee, Vice President George Bush, drawing near, Barack registered to vote on October 4. Starting the next day, he also began racking up a remarkable run of thirteen parking tickets over the next four weeks on his rusty yellow Toyota, with most of them happening on Mass Avenue just west of the law school. On campus, student politics were roiled when the conservative Federalist Society chapter objected to the student government’s reserving two committee seats for the Coalition for Diversity. Jesse Jackson addressed a pro-diversity rally of twelve hundred people, and Derrick Bell renewed his calls for greater minority representation on the law faculty.

David Shapiro’s Civ Pro course was Section III’s most vanilla class, but most students thought Shapiro was an excellent, witty teacher. Classmates and Shapiro recall Obama speaking only irregularly in Civ Pro, but they do remember him as one of the most talkative voices in Richard Parker’s Crim Law classroom. Parker had “a class discussion” style that stood in contrast to Macneil’s classic Socratic method, recalls Kenneth Mack, one of Section III’s other African American men. Mack thought Barack was a standout presence from the first week of class. “He was a striking figure,” Mack said. “He spoke very well, and very eloquently,” and seemed “older and wiser than the three years that separated our birth dates. . . . It seemed like I was twenty-four, and Barack was thirty-four,” like Rob Fisher. “He and Rob seemed like they were the same age.” Shannon Schmoyer agreed: Barack “just seemed so much more mature” than most other 1Ls.

Parker was an entertaining teacher, and having Peter Larowe, a former police officer, in the class sometimes added a bracing dose of reality to discussions. Several students recalled Parker saying, “If you’re going to a protest, always take your toothbrush,” and Lisa Hay’s Three Speech recorded one exchange after Larrowe mentioned his background to Parker: “‘Does everyone know that you were a police officer?’ ‘They do now. . . . No more undercover work,’” Larrowe joked. Fisher also vividly remembered Parker querying students about their own experiences with police officers and one attractive woman describing how she was patted down outside a bar. “How did that make you feel?” Parker asked. “Oh, it was kind of nice,” she replied as the entire class erupted in laughter.

Sarah Leah Whitson remembered Obama once making some real-world rather than doctrinal point in a colloquy with Parker, and Richard Cloobek recalled a similar scene where Barack “spoke from the black perspective in Crim class because something had happened to him where he’d experienced racial discrimination in profiling, and it was very personal.” Sherry Colb, valedictorian of Columbia’s 1988 graduating class and Section III’s most loquacious female voice, remembered that when the subject of acquaintance rape came up in class, Barack expressed displeasure with what others had said. “‘I don’t even understand why we’re debating this. Why is silence enough? Why aren’t people looking for “yes”?’” Sherry recalled Barack asking. “I think the women in the class really appreciated that because there were other males in the class who took a more reactionary position.”

Sima Sarrafan, an Iranian American honors graduate of Vassar College, realized that Obama “had a more pragmatic view of the law” than most classmates or professors. Roger Boord, a 1988 magna cum laude graduate of the University of Virginia, remembered Barack as “this voice of authority . . . his voice was like Walter Cronkite.” But especially in Parker’s class, Barack, David Troutt, and Sherry Colb spoke up so regularly that it generated irritation and derision from some fellow students. Most Section III students spoke only when asked to. “The last thing I ever wanted would be to be called upon,” Greg Sater explained. “Most of my friends were the same way, and we would never in a million years ever raise our hand.”

In stark contrast, Section III’s most self-confident voices, or “gunners,” in longtime law student parlance, raised their hands almost every day in participatory classes like Richard Parker’s. Dozens of Obama’s classmates remember him consistently waiting until a discussion’s latter part before he chimed in, with comments that he thought synthesized what others had said. “He never really took a very strong, argumentative position,” Ali Rubin recalled. Dozens laughingly recalled his insistent usage of the word “folks” as well as his regular introductory refrain of “It’s my sense” or “My sense is,” phrases that DCP members remembered hearing regularly during his time in Chicago. Barack “particularly loved to engage with Professor Parker,” Haverford College graduate Lisa Paget recalled. She has a “vivid” memory of Barack remarking, “Professor Parker, I think what the folks here are trying to say is” so as “to synthesize what other people were saying.” Barack “clearly liked to speak,” but “sometimes people got frustrated because they didn’t feel like they needed him” to speak for them. “‘Say what your own thinking is, don’t tell him what we’re thinking!’”

Decades later, particularly for classmates who had become jurists or prominent attorneys, recollections of just how intensely irritating Obama’s classroom performance had been were burnished with good humor. But even though he was always prepared, always articulate, and always on target, many fellow students tired of Obama’s need to orate. Barack “spoke in complete paragraphs,” Jennifer Radding recalled, but “he often got hissed by us because sometimes we would all make comments” and then “he would raise his hand and say ‘I think what my colleagues are trying to say if I might sum up,’ and we’d be like ‘We can speak for ourselves—shut the fuck up!’” Radding thought Obama was “a formal person, reserved” but “always friendly.” Yet “I’m not sure he related to women as well on a colleague basis” as he did with older male friends like Rob, Mark Kozlowski, and Dan Rabinovitz, a former community organizer interested in politics. Jennifer remembered Barack asking Rob and Dan substantive questions, and “then he’d ask me did I party over the weekend.” One day “I called him on it, and I just said, ‘You’ve got to be kidding me. You’re someone who’s so liberal, and so women’s rights, and you talk to women like they’re not on the same level.’ It horrified him to hear that,” and “I wasn’t the only one who felt this way.”

The joking about Obama’s classroom performance intensified as the fall semester progressed. One classmate, Jerry Sorkin, christened him “The Great Obama” because “he had kind of a superior attitude,” Sorkin’s friend David Attisani remembered. “Barack would start a lot of his speeches with the words ‘My sense is,’ and Jerry would walk around kind of stroking his chin saying ‘My sense is.’” Gina Torielli recalled that when Obama or especially Sherry Colb raised their hands to speak, more than a few of the younger men would “take out their watches to start timing how long” they talked. In time it became a competitive game, one played at many law schools over multiple generations, and often called “turkey bingo,” in which irritated classmates wager a few dollars on how long different gunners would exchange comments with the professor. Section III named its contest “The Obamanometer,” Greg Sater recalled, for it measured “how long he could talk.” But Sater explained how there “was a great feeling of relief to all of us whenever he would raise his hand because that would take time off the clock and would lower the chances of us being called upon.”

No one questioned the value of what Barack, Sherry, or David Troutt had to say, but much of Section III got tired of hearing the same voices day after day. With Barack, Greg said, “we were envious of him in many ways because of his intellect,” self-confidence, and poise, but that did not stop the Obamanometer. “We’d kind of look at each other and tap our watch,” he recalled. “You might raise five fingers,” predicting that long a disquisition, “and then your buddy might raise seven.” Jackie Fuchs remembered the label a little differently, explaining that students would “judge how pretentious someone’s remarks are in class by how high they rank on the Obamanometer.”<sup>6</sup>

Criminal Law was the course in which Barack “pontificated”—as Jackie called it—the most, but the class and professor that Barack and Rob found the most intellectually stimulating was Torts, with David Rosenberg. With only one-third of Section III’s students in that subsection, it was more intimate than Contracts, Civ Pro, or Crim, and the forty-five students responded enthusiastically to Rosenberg’s high-energy, in-your-face style and tough-minded libertarian economics. Everyone remembered Rosenberg’s invitation to a 6:30 A.M. law library tour, when he would discuss the practicalities of thorough legal research. Amy Christian, Richard Cloobek, Diana Derycz, and Barack were among the half dozen or so students who showed up, and Three Speech recounted Rosenberg insisting during it, “I am not a masochist.”

David Attisani “loved” Rosenberg’s class. “He was my most useful professor by a wide margin,” and Rosenberg also held a volleyball clinic and took a large group of students out to dinner. Richard Cloobek agreed that Rosenberg was “the most practical and realistic and effective” of Section III’s professors. He also was often the most entertaining. Mark Kozlowski remembered Rosenberg asserting that Harvard-trained lawyers taking legal-services jobs was the equivalent of MIT engineering graduates becoming appliance repairmen. Three Speech captured an exchange in which one student asked Rosenberg if a passage in one case opinion was dicta, or beside the point; Rosenberg responded, “No! That’s crap!”

Kozlowski and Cloobek remembered how captivated Fisher and Obama were with Rosenberg, and Ali Rubin thought that “from the beginning Rosenberg treated Rob and Barack differently” than other students. Cloobek believed Obama spoke just as much in Torts as he did in Crim, demonstrating to all how “incredibly, intensely smart and thoughtful” he was, even relative to classmates who had graduated at the top of their classes from the nation’s best colleges and universities. Obama was “intellectually curious” and “sincere in his academic passion,” Cloobek thought, but he also seemed “extremely arrogant, very conceited.” Yet he admitted that Barack and Rob spoke “at a level that was just beyond my comprehension.”

David Rosenberg remembered Barack as “one of the most serious students I’ve ever encountered.” Rosenberg’s approach to Torts involved “applying social and natural science to social problems” in a heavily economic, functionalist manner. He recalls that “Obama and Fisher were determined to figure out what was going on, absolutely determined.” The two came by his office “almost twice or three times a week, not to talk about the course in ways that would translate into a better grade, but to talk about the actual problems that I was raising and the approach.” Rob and Barack were always together—“you couldn’t separate them,” Rosenberg explains—but “they weren’t a duo in their mind-sets,” and “it didn’t seem like one was dependent on the other. They were quite independent,” and always raising “social policy questions” when they came by. Rosenberg remembered that in class, Obama “asked good questions, he fought through hard problems. I thought he was going to be a top academic.”

Rob remembered that “Barack was very active” in Torts and “loved that class.” Rosenberg “met argument with argument, and valued creativity,” and “Barack and I just had a great time in that class. We were constantly arguing and talking and enjoying it and going to visit Rosenberg,” and Torts overall was “an absolute blast.” Rosenberg “had this intense intellectual passion” and a “creative style of lawyering that greatly appealed to us both.” Rob believes that “Rosenberg had a vastly bigger influence on Barack’s and my thinking about law” than their other 1L instructors combined.

Four years earlier, Rosenberg had published a major article in the Harvard Law Review calling for a restructuring of tort litigation in mass exposure cases like asbestos through the courts’ use of “aggregative procedural and remedial techniques,” an argument he revisited in a shorter 1986 HLR essay. In fall 1988, Rosenberg was writing an additional commentary, calling for “collective processing” and comprehensive settlements in mass tort cases rather than “legislative insurance schemes.” He was already so impressed by Rob and Barack that he sought their input on his draft manuscript. When it was published in May 1989, the first page included thanks to Rob and Barack for their “substantive criticism and editorial advice,” a remarkable acknowledgment for a Harvard law professor to bestow upon two 1L students.<sup>7</sup>

Amy Christian remembered a day in Torts when “one of Barack’s two front teeth was broken diagonally so that like half the tooth was gone,” a casualty from the previous afternoon’s basketball game, he told her. “A couple of classes later he came in, and his tooth looked totally normal.” Kenny Smith, a 2L, remembered Barack as “a good player,” but two recollections of Obama from among the wider population of classmates who went up against him either in intramural matchups or the almost daily pickup games were his penchant for “trash talk” insults to opposing players and his tendency to call “baby” fouls in self-refereed games. Barack “was cocky as a basketball player, he was not as a regular person,” 1L Brad Wiegmann thought. Martin Siegel recalled “being in a game with him where he called a foul” and “he just headed to the other end of the court.” Oftentimes, “being a law school, if people called fouls there was a tendency to have that devolve into a crazy argument.” Not so with Obama. In “a sign of his status,” everyone “followed him without objection. It was as if he had said it, and therefore it was so.”

Greg Sater had formed a volleyball league, and their court time was just after basketball, but the basketball players would refuse to give up the floor. “They would always give me shit,” Sater recalled, and then Barack would “sweet-talk me into giving them an extra few minutes, always.” He was “very disarming” and “very good at defusing situations and being a peacemaker.” Rob Fisher had similar memories from pickup basketball games, but they spent far more time studying than on the basketball court.

The press of coursework led Barack to give up on the irregular journal he had kept ever since his first year in New York, and he and Rob often studied at his Somerville apartment rather than in Harvard’s law library. Rob remembers that Barack was very proud of “three Filipino gun cases,” big long wooden boxes he had bought to serve as bookshelves, but otherwise the “apartment was very sparse,” with “a little TV,” some “spare furniture,” and overall an “ascetic” feeling. “He and I would sit around his apartment,” Rob recalled, “and just bang ideas back and forth for hours.”

Rob appreciated that Barack was “very much a synthetic thinker,” just as other classmates had sensed from his many summary expositions, and Rob realized as well that virtually everyone around them “recognized from the start” that Barack was “exceptional.” Rob understood that Barack’s time in Chicago had been “an extraordinary experience for him,” and although Rob has no memory of any such conversation, one of his closest friends vividly remembers a phone call early in Rob’s time at Harvard in which Rob said he had just met the first African American president of the United States.

“Barack and I both looked at law school as an intellectual playground, a place to develop ideas, to have fun with ideas,” Rob explained. “There is no question, when he was in law school, his path in his mind was to be a politician. That is where he was going, and that was crystal clear from day one of law school,” along with definitely returning to Chicago upon graduation. During their conversations, Rob learned that “Barack recognized he had exceptional talents, and that that was a gift from God, that was something special.” Barack “felt a great moral obligation to use” his “special gifts” to “help people . . . and that was very palpable, very real, and very deep.” Just as Sheila Jager had heard Barack speak about his destiny, Rob too understood that Barack had a sense of himself that was rooted in his experiences in Roseland. “The way he described it to me,” Rob recalled, during “long deep conversations . . . he pictured an elderly African American woman sitting on a porch and just saying to him, ‘Barack, you’ve got special gifts. You need to use them for people.’ That was a very deep-seated belief. There’s no question about that,” even in the fall of 1988. Rob also knew that Barack’s identification as black “was a choice,” and that “making choices about identity did limit personal choices, and that pained him.”

Barack “spent so much time together” with Cassandra “Sandy” Butts that a mutual friend explained how “everybody thought they were dating, even though I don’t think that was ever the case.” As Jackie Fuchs forthrightly put it, voicing a perception widely shared among female classmates, Barack “gave off zero sexuality. . . . He came off as completely asexual.” His relationship with Sandy, who was four years younger and whose parents had divorced before she was a year old, had an older brother–younger sister closeness.

“When I first met Barack, I thought he was this black guy from the Midwest, and he did not volunteer his background, other than coming from Chicago,” Cassandra explained. “I didn’t know that Barack’s mother was white until a couple of weeks into knowing him. It wasn’t something that he volunteered.” Sandy was interested in Africa and had visited Zimbabwe and Botswana as an undergraduate, and only after Barack mentioned his trip to Kenya did his family story emerge: “My mother is white.” Like Rob, Sandy also soon realized that Barack’s years in Chicago had been “the most formative” of his life, and “he talked about how powerful the position of mayor of Chicago was,” just as he had told Mike Kruglik and Bruce Orenstein months earlier. Barack “certainly saw in Harold Washington a model,” one who was “incredibly influential,” and “his ambition was to eventually run for mayor.” In Cassandra’s memory there was no question Barack “wanted to be mayor of Chicago, and that was all he talked about as far as holding office. . . . He only talked about being mayor, because he felt that is really where you have an impact. That’s where you could really make a difference in the lives of those people he had spent those years organizing.” She remembered too that “Barack used to say that one of his favorite sayings of the civil rights movement was ‘If you cannot bear the cross, you can’t wear the crown,’” a rough approximation of Martin Luther King’s January 17, 1963, statement—“The cross we bear precedes the crown we wear”—that was featured in the epigraph of the King biography that had been published midway through Barack’s time in Chicago.

Cassandra believed Barack’s intellectual seriousness made him “a bit of a geek in law school,” but his Chicago experiences gave him a real-world grounding most of his younger classmates lacked. She remembered a 1L discussion among black students about whether the preferred label should be “black” or “African American.” “Barack listens to all of this, and near the end . . . he basically makes the point that it was kind of this false choice, that whether we’re called ‘African Americans’ or ‘black,’ it really doesn’t matter, what matters is what we’re doing to help the people who are in communities that don’t have the luxury of having this debate.” Cassandra thought of Barack as “African and American,” with “a sense of direction and focus” that distinguished him. Compared to his younger classmates, Barack seemed “incredibly mature,” with a “very calm” demeanor, and Cassandra thought “Barack was as fully formed as a person could be at that point in his life.”

An informal study group emerged that included David Troutt, Gina Torielli, and Barack. They met sometimes at the BLSA office or at Torielli’s apartment. On one occasion, when Barack was outside smoking, Gina worried that “my landlord was going to call the police” after seeing a black man on the front porch. On another, when everyone was saying what their dream job was, Barack “said he wanted to be governor of Illinois.” Still, most of Barack’s study time was spent with Rob, and when the law school’s 1989 Yearbook appeared some months later, an early page featured an uncaptioned photo of Barack sprawled on a couch listening as a smiling Rob spoke while holding a loose-leaf notebook. “When I think of those two that year,” Gina Torielli explained, that picture “is how I remember often finding them.” The photo captured the ring on Barack’s left index finger that he had worn ever since his first year at Oxy. Rob remembered precisely when the picture was taken. “I was explaining macroeconomics to Barack, and . . . we also had an extended discussion about the national debt in that session and how and whether it mattered.” It was no accident that Cassandra thought Barack something of a geek, or that virtually everyone in Section III looked up to Rob and Barack as the smartest minds in their midst.

Barack was more forthcoming with Rob than with anyone else at Harvard, indeed with anyone other than Sheila and Lena. Even though Barack “never mentioned mayoral politics” and never said anything “that would suggest to me that he had his sights on mayoral politics,” it was clear “he was just extremely politically ambitious” and “wanted to go as far as he could. There was no doubt in my mind he was thinking presidency” and “he shared that with me at the time.”

Obama’s classmates could see that too. We “knew he’d be in politics. That was obvious right from the start,” Sherry Colb explained, and Lisa Paget agreed that Barack “was clearly going to be a politician.” David Attisani thought that Harvard’s classrooms were “something of a rehearsal for him for public life,” that “he was getting himself ready” and seemed to be “self-consciously grooming himself for . . . some kind of public life.” In retrospect, Jackie Fuchs thought Barack “had already decided that he was a future president,” and wondered if his self-transformation mirrored that of her past bandmate, Joan Jett. “I’m sure Barack as a child was perfectly ordinary, just like Joan was. Until the moment he decided that he was a star.” Fuchs was not enamored of the 1988 Barack—“in law school the only thing I would have voted for Obama to do would have been to shut up”—but among the 1Ls who socialized together, David Troutt believed there was “none more careful, more guarded about his personal life than Barack.” David Attisani likewise viewed Barack as “a very private guy” who was “quite cautious about where he appeared socially.”

One Thursday evening, several young members of Section III, including Scott Sherman, a 1988 highest honors graduate of the University of Texas at Austin, decided to head down to Harvard Square to drink. Seeing Obama studying nearby, Sherman invited him to join the group, but Barack demurred. “No, you young guys go on down and have fun. I have work to do here,” and Barack’s comment left Sherman “feeling like a sophomoric frat boy. He was serious” and “he was not wasting his time at the law school,” Sherman recalled. “He was there for a reason,” and there was no gainsaying the five-year age gap between Barack and most of his fellow students.

Years later, classmates pictured how Barack appeared back then. “He always wore the same ugly leather jacket,” Jennifer Radding said, and everyone remembered seeing him smoking outside Harkness Commons—“the Hark”—or, during the winter, in a basement smoking room that was one of the few authorized locations after a Cambridge antismoking ordinance had taken effect eighteen months earlier. “He really did smoke a lot,” Mark Kozlowski recalled, and sometimes in the basement, Barack talked with Kenyan LL.M. student Maina Kiai, who also had arrived that fall. Kiai remembered him “always asking questions about Kenya and Africa,” and “we talked a great deal about poverty in the USA.” Diana Derycz also recalled Barack as a “big smoker” who was “outside smoking” before classes even in winter. Sarah Leah Whitson believed that by 1988 at Harvard Law smoking was a symbolically transgressive act that set one apart from the student mainstream. Rob Fisher thought that Barack “enjoyed it,” and Lisa Paget remembered that when Barack was “walking on campus in his leather jacket with his typical cigarette in his hand, he had swagger.”

Barack was also among several dozen 1Ls who signed up to do scut work—“sub-citing,” as in substantive citation checking—for the Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review, one of the law school's student-run journals that welcomed 1L participation. At the end of October, Barack's sister Maya, who was a freshman at Barnard College in Manhattan, came up for a weekend, including a Halloween-evening dinner party at Barack's apartment for which ten or so people were encouraged to come in costume. Rob and Barack's 1L friend Dan Rabinovitz and his buddy Thom Thacker came wearing whale outfits inspired by the freeing that week of two creatures that had been trapped in the ice off Point Barrow, Alaska.

"I remember from early on thinking that Barack was the single most impressive individual I'd ever met," Rabinovitz recalled, and that his Somerville apartment "seemed incredibly hip." Barack had "made it a great place to live," and his taste for Miles Davis and similar musicians was evident from "the wonderful jazz playing in the background." Dan had also been an organizer, and he agreed with Barack "that to really deal with the fundamental issues in people's lives, you needed to engage the political system." Dan too remembers how Barack "made clear absolutely it was his intention to go back to Chicago and to be involved politically." Thom Thacker vividly recalls that Halloween evening, perhaps because Barack "possessed a magnetic charm" or more likely because Maya was now "drop-dead gorgeous." But either that evening or a few days later, Thom would recount how "I remember Dan remarking to me that he thought Barack would be president of the United States one day."

On November 8, 1988, George Bush handily defeated Michael Dukakis to keep the presidency in Republican hands. "Dukakis's loss was a major loss, and we were feeling it," David Troutt recalled, but Mark Kozlowski remembers David Rosenberg beginning Wednesday's Torts class with a caustic quip about the Supreme Court aspirations of one of his favorite colleagues: "Larry Tribe can unpack!" Rosenberg's respect and affection for Rob and Barack was now expressing itself in a different way, because when their favorite NBA team, the Chicago Bulls—"We were both big Michael Jordan fans," Rob says—was in Boston that night to play the Celtics, Rosenberg gave them "like second row" tickets so they could watch an "awesome" 110–104 Bulls victory in which Jordan scored fifty-two points.<sup>8</sup>

By early November, Rob, Barack, and Mark Kozlowski had agreed to work together on the upcoming spring semester Ames Moot Court exercise, and they also enlisted Lisa Hertzner, another member of their small Legal Methods class and a 1988 Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Stanford. The Legal Methods course had proven more daunting for 3L instructor Scott Becker than for most of the 1Ls. "Barack was so far ahead of the curve intellectually," Becker remembered, that often sessions featured the "hyper-ambitious" Obama explaining, "I think this is what Scott means by that," although never in a way that embarrassed Becker.

Barack and Rob were also beginning to think about summer jobs for 1989, and Barack wanted to return to Chicago. Barack's old friend Beenu Mahmood, who had welcomed him there in 1985 while he was a summer associate at Sidley & Austin, was now in his third year as a lawyer in Sidley's New York office, and "I suggested that he seriously look at Sidley," Beenu remembers. Barack had kept in regular touch with Beenu, who believed by 1988 that "Barack was the most deliberate person I ever met in terms of constructing his own identity."

Sidley actively sought out top 1Ls, and Beenu recalls speaking with Sidley managing partner Thomas A. Cole about Barack. Well before Christmas, his résumé arrived at Sidley's Chicago office, where 1972 Harvard Law School graduate John G. Levi oversaw the firm's recruiting at his alma mater and 1976 Northwestern Law School graduate Geraldine Alexis headed up Sidley's minority associate recruiting effort.

On the Friday after Thanksgiving, Barack learned the surprising news in that day's New York Times: "Albert Raby, Civil Rights Leader in Chicago with King, Dies at 55." A memorial service at the University of Chicago's Rockefeller Chapel attracted more than a thousand mourners, and Teresa Sarmina, one of Raby's former spouses, spoke of how he "would get excited about a person and the potential he could see in that person."

In Cambridge, the last two weeks of fall semester classes featured a December 7 meeting with Ian Macneil that about 60 percent of Section III attended. "A wide range of complaints were voiced," Macneil recalled, and tensions were raised further because the final exam in the yearlong course would not take place until late May. Only in their final week of classes in mid-December did Section III learn that its other exams would take place on the afternoons of Monday January 9, Wednesday the 11th, and Friday the 13th. With Civ Pro teacher David Shapiro leaving for Washington, students' marks on the two-and-a-half-hour open-book midyear test would constitute half of their eventual grade on Harvard's somewhat odd A+, A, A-, B+ B, B-, C-, and D eight-point scale. Shapiro posed only two essay questions of equal weight, one involving securities fraud and the other concerning an interlocutory (interim) appeal involving hundreds of lawsuits stemming from a hotel fire. No one could have found it easy. Two days later, Richard Parker's three-and-a-half-hour open-book Crim Law exam posed three questions weighted at 50, 25, and 25 percent. The first posed a hilariously complicated fictional scenario involving a racially profiled terror suspect carrying cocaine who bumps into a knife-wielding drunk who then stabs a passerby. Students were instructed to "respond specifically to all" of six analytical issues. The shorter second and third questions were visibly easier, with the former offering as one of two options an essay on the Burger and Rehnquist Courts' rulings on searches and interrogations. The third requested a response to a quotation asserting that changes in substantive criminal law doctrines offered a better chance of combating racism than did procedural reforms. On Friday the 13th, Section III's exam week ended with a three-hour, open-book, two-question Torts exam from David Rosenberg. "Careful organization will be highly valued, as will conciseness and clarity of presentation," the exam advised. One question dealt with a gang fight prompted by a movie about gang warfare, the second probed a manufacturer's liability after a polio vaccination of a child infected the youngster's father.<sup>9</sup>

With his first three exams complete, Obama flew to Chicago for ten days before spring semester classes began. Staying with Jerry Kellman's family, Barack immediately learned that Al Raby's death was not the only sadness that had befallen his Chicago friends. When Barack left Chicago in mid-August, Mike Kruglik replaced Greg Galluzzo as DCP's consultant-adviser, and in Mike's first heart-to-heart conversation with John Owens, Johnnie confessed that he was losing a struggle with cocaine addiction. "I was shocked," Kruglik recalled, but he immediately arranged for Owens to enter a thirty-day residential treatment program on Chicago's North Side and drove him there to help him check in.

A month later, Johnnie was back at DCP, but the group's core members felt he had not been prepared to fully shoulder the weight of being executive director. "John was good, but he was not Barack," Betty Garrett explained. "There was no one in my eyesight that would have been able to fill Barack's shoes." Aletha Strong Gibson remembered that they all realized that Owens "wasn't quite ready" to assume such "a high-pressure position."

Jean Rudd and Ken Rolling at Woods felt similarly. "When Barack left, Johnnie was really very feeling kind of abandoned,” Jean recalled. “He wasn’t quite ready to be in charge yet” and “just wasn’t confident at that point.” Ken agreed that “John became director before his time.” When Barack learned what had happened, he discussed the situation with Jean, Ken, and Jerry, who remembered that he was “deeply concerned about it” because “he’s feeling responsible.” Kellman also thought that if “DCP blows up in a scandal,” it could hurt Barack’s reputation. Owens recalled that Barack “suggested that I change the name of DCP” because he “figured if I didn’t do a good job with it or something went wrong, it wouldn’t come back to haunt him.” Johnnie saw Barack as deeply strategic about his own future, but Barack refused to acknowledge that. “I was pressing him one time, and he got angry. ‘No! I said no!’” But Barack’s exceptionally rare outburst did not alter Owens’s firm belief.

During Obama’s first semester at Harvard, the Illinois legislature had finally approved a comprehensive Chicago school reform bill, which Chicago United’s Patrick Keleher praised as “a fantastic bill,” one that called for every Chicago public school to be governed by an eleven-member Local School Council composed of six parents, two area residents, two teachers, and the principal. UNO and Gamaliel had played a significant role in the victory, but the hard work of implementing it still lay ahead.

Barack had corresponded regularly with Mary Ellen Montes throughout the fall. “The letters came for a while,” Lena remembered, but then there was “a determining letter that was sort of like we weren’t going to write to each other anymore, and so we didn’t.” By January 1989, Lena was involved with someone else, and she and Barack were never again in touch. In Lena’s and Sheila’s absence, and with his friendship with Johnnie now seriously strained, Barack’s two strongest Chicago relationships were with Kellman and Kruglik, and during his ten days back in Chicago, he readily helped both of them with their ongoing organizing work.

Jerry was now fully occupied in Gary, Indiana, and thanks to both Woods and the Diocese of Gary, he had just publicly launched Lake Interfaith Families Together (LIFT), named after the county that encompassed much of northwest Indiana. In Chicago’s south suburbs, Mike was rapidly growing the South Suburban Action Conference (SSAC), and in January 1989, he hired a new young African American organizer, Thomas Rush, a 1988 graduate of Haverford College.

Rush recalled that even during his first long conversation with Kruglik, Mike mentioned Barack, with the implication being that “this guy was special within organizing.” Mike asked Barack to call Thomas, and the next morning they met for forty-five minutes over coffee. Knowing that Barack was at Harvard, Rush expected someone arrogant, but instead he thought Obama was calm and self-assured, with an “even temperament.” Rush remembered that when Barack mentioned Jeremiah Wright, it was “almost like his mind left for a minute” as Barack looked away. When Thomas asked how attending Harvard Law School would connect to further organizing work, Barack said, “I don’t know that I’ll be directly involved, but this will always be a process that I support, whatever I do.”

A few days later, during a LIFT training in Gary, which Kruglik and Rush attended, Obama, along with Kellman, led the day’s sessions for a group of some forty people. At the end of the day, Rush rode back into Chicago with Barack. As Thomas recalled it, Barack mentioned “that he would like to find a good relationship,” ideally “a woman with the body of Whitney Houston and the mind of Toni Morrison.”

Before Barack returned to Cambridge, he had his summer job interview at Sidley & Austin’s Chicago office. “We brought in all of the kids who had a Chicago connection,” John Levi recalled, for twenty-minute conversations with two or more Sidley lawyers. African American applicants generally were seen by a trio of Levi, Geraldine Alexis, and Alexis's chief lieutenant, Michelle Robinson, the 1988 Harvard Law graduate who had played such an active role in BLSA before joining Sidley eight months earlier.

"Michelle I distinctly remember saying, 'I cannot see him. Will you please make sure you can see him?'" Levi remembered. He did, and "I was wowed" by Obama. "I thought he was phenomenal. He was one of the best interviews I've ever had, really." He recalls that Obama demonstrated "poise and sparkle" and clearly was "a compelling person." Geri Alexis had a similar reaction. "I remember very vividly" speaking with Barack. "He impressed me so much that I called down to the recruiting office, and I said, 'We really need to give this guy an offer before he leaves the building,' and they said, 'Well, we don't do that for 1Ls,' and I said, 'You're going to do it for this one,'" and they did.

John Levi concurred. "I called Michelle later in the day and said, 'Boy, did you miss a good one,'" and Robinson replied, "'That's what everybody is telling me.'" As Levi recalled, Barack "accepted quickly too."<sup>10</sup>

Spring classes began on January 25, and Barack, Rob Fisher, Mark Kozlowski, and Cassandra Butts all chose for their elective 18th and 19th Century American Legal History, taught by assistant professor William "Terry" Fisher, a 1982 Harvard Law graduate who had clerked for Justice Thurgood Marshall. The three-hour-a-week lecture class covered "the formative era of American law," with emphasis on the changes between the Revolution and the Civil War, especially regarding slavery. Famous cases like Marbury v. Madison and McCulloch v. Maryland were supplemented by doctrinal-specific readings addressing contracts, torts, property law, criminal law, and the status of women. The semester's final three weeks were devoted to slavery, with recent articles by leading scholars like Paul Finkelman and Robert Cottroll playing a central role.

Section III's Civ Pro also met for three hours a week, with Northeastern's Stephen Subrin replacing David Shapiro. Some students found Subrin likable, while others felt he was a letdown compared to Shapiro. Contracts with Ian Macneil continued for three hours a week while Three Speech reported an unsupported rumor that "the Scowling Scot" might remain at Harvard more than one year. Lisa Hay occasionally included a crossword puzzle, and one had the clue, "He pauses before speaking." The correct answer was "Obama."

Rob Fisher had stopped attending Contracts—"It was so horrible that I basically skipped all of it"—but Barack remained a regular if sometimes tardy presence. Three Speech's list of "highlights" included "February 21: Obama knocks on contracts door, 9:21 A.M.," more than twenty minutes late. Ken Mack remembered that Barack was one of Macneil's "favorite students," and Macneil recalled that he had "such a commanding presence. . . . I was always a little too impatient in class, so if students went off the track, I would interrupt before I should. When I did that with Barack, he said 'Let me finish.' He wasn't rude, just firm."

Spring's most weighty course was five hours a week of Property Law, taught by Mary Ann Glendon, a 1961 graduate of the University of Chicago Law School who had joined the Harvard faculty in 1987. She assigned the class A. James Casner et al.'s 1,315-page Cases and Text on Property, 3rd ed. On the first day, Glendon called on Barack, mispronouncing his surname by making it rhyme with Alabama. Barack corrected her. Paolo Di Rosa thought that "was kind of a nervy thing to do," but Barack "had the confidence to do that without being rude about it.”

Three Speech regularly captured how Glendon’s excellent sense of humor made for a relaxed classroom atmosphere. “I assume that a lot of you are in some relation to Harvard,” Glendon suggested. “What’s that relation? What? No, I don’t mean ‘serfdom.’” On another occasion, a student asked, “How long do you have to, you know, ah, live together, for these common-law marriages?” and Glendon drily responded, “Why do you ask?” Glendon was a widely popular teacher, and Rob Fisher remembered her as “an excellent professor” whom he and Barack visited for some “very open-ended, interesting intellectual discussions.” Fellow students recall both Barack and Rob as regular classroom participants. Ken Mack thought Glendon was “very interested in what Obama had to say in class” and “liked him a lot.” Edward Felsenthal, a 1988 magna cum laude graduate of Princeton, would “vividly remember” Barack as someone who “talked all the time” in Property. There were some “heated battles between Barack and Mary Ann Glendon,” Felsenthal recalled, because Obama “objected to some pretty core tenets of the common law of property.” So “they went at it,” and “nobody else sparred like he sparred with her.” Rob remembered a time when Glendon asked why a court had set aside a condominium bylaw barring children as residents. Barack spoke up, saying, “Folks gotta live someplace,” and “everyone laughs,” but the crux of his response—the reasonableness standard—was indeed key. That “tells you a lot about how he was thinking about” legal questions while at Harvard, Rob explains. He and Barack “loved” Glendon’s “great” class, even though twenty years later Glendon would refuse to appear on the same platform with her former student because of her intense opposition to abortion.<sup>11</sup>

In early February, the Harvard Law Record and the Harvard Crimson gave front-page coverage to news that the student-run Harvard Law Review had elected an Asian American 2L as its new president and an African American woman as one of its two supervising editors. Crystal Nix, a 1985 Princeton graduate who had been a New York Times reporter prior to law school, was the first black person ever elevated to one of the Review’s top masthead positions.

Far more controversial news landed a week later when Harvard president Derek Bok, a 1954 graduate of the law school who had served as its dean for three years before being elevated to the presidency in 1971, unexpectedly chose forty-four-year-old Robert C. Clark as the new law dean. Clark was “generally well-liked by students,” the Crimson reported, because he was an excellent classroom teacher, but some of his more liberal colleagues complained about the selection of the conservative law and economics proponent. In the Boston Globe and the New York Times, Gerald Frug called Clark “a terrible choice” and Morton Horwitz denounced the selection as “a disaster for the law school,” asserting that Clark had opposed the appointments of women and minority professors. Clark rebutted Horwitz’s claims as “untrue” and “terribly unfair,” while three more professors attacked Clark. In contrast, prominent liberal constitutional scholar Laurence Tribe spoke positively about Clark, and a Wall Street Journal editorial praised the selection. Several weeks later the controversy seemed to subside when the faculty unanimously promoted Randall Kennedy and Kathleen Sullivan to full professor, the third black male and the sixth white woman holding tenured appointments.<sup>12</sup>

At 12:30 P.M. on Thursday, February 23, the 1Ls’ exam grades were finally distributed. Barack and Rob had mixed reactions. In David Rosenberg’s Torts, Rob earned a straight A, and Barack something similar, but in Richard Parker’s Crim Law, Rob received only a B+, and as he remembered, “Barack and I both didn’t like the grade we got.” Many classmates would have been overjoyed to receive a B+, as they confronted lower grades than they had ever before received. For some, the “effect was devastating,” but not so for Barack and Rob, who plunged into the Ames Moot Court assignment that would culminate with a faux oral argument on Thursday evening, March 23, the night before spring break began.

The ungraded Ames exercise had four written assignments: an initial “issues analysis” of the faux case, an outline of the brief to the three-judge faux court, a draft of the brief, as well as the final brief. Throughout the six weeks, students had four conferences with Scott Becker, the twenty-five-year-old 3L from Illinois who had led their fall Legal Methods class and was now the teams’ adviser. Barack and Rob took opposing sides, with Mark Kozlowski as Barack’s partner and Lisa Hertzler as Rob’s. Their case involved two issues related to inside information and the stock market: the first was whether a clerical employee had violated the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 in buying stock based on a research report she had proofread, and the second was whether sharing that information with a friend with whom she then twice purchased stock represented a conspiracy punishable under the RICO Act of 1970. Each student team was given a twenty-two-page faux indictment of the two defendants, “Janine Egan” and “Jennifer Cleary,” that gave the facts that had led to their convictions, which were now on appeal.

Early on, Barack and Rob took the exercise “extraordinarily seriously,” Mark thought, and exhibited great determination to win the competition. But once it sank in that it was ungraded, their emerging desire to graduate magna cum laude—5.80 or better, with 6 representing A minus—took precedence. Rob knew that for Barack “it was very important to him to get magna cum laude . . . to demonstrate that things”—i.e., a Harvard Law School diploma—“weren’t given to him” as a result of how affirmative action may have helped him win admission. Mark Kozlowski realized that Barack and Rob “both decided they were going to make magna cum laude,” and that made them “less serious about” the Ames exercise as it proceeded.

In advance of the two pairs’ oral arguments before Professor Hal Scott and two other faux judges, Mark and Barack completed their thirteen-page brief, with Barack writing the insider trading argument and Mark handling the RICO question. Barack contended that Egan’s work “inevitably” and “necessarily” would have made her aware that the materials she had proofread were nonpublic information, which she then misappropriated in violation of the 1934 statute. Barack flubbed badly in referencing the U.S. “Court of Appeals of the Second District,” when he should have written “for the Second Circuit,” and a careful eye would have caught misspellings and bad grammatical errors, such as “recieve,” “the harm done by insider trading are diffused,” and “employes like Egan regarding the in no way mitigates.” It was visibly sloppy work, especially compared to what Mark offered in the RICO section. “The Egan-Cleary enterprise victimized not merely” Egan’s employer, they argued in conclusion, “but the integrity of the securities market as a whole.” Oral argument turned into “a bit of a fiasco,” Kozlowski remembered, when he “got into a fight” with Professor Scott. “Barack was somewhat angry with me afterward,” Mark recalled, but “by that point” both Barack and Rob were happy to leave moot court behind them.<sup>13</sup>

That same day, Ian Macneil received a letter from the Women’s Law Association, complaining that Section III’s Contracts reading earlier that week had contained sexist material. In dealing with a convoluted contracts problem known as “the battle of the forms,” Macneil’s casebook invoked the phrase “jockeying for position” and then quoted a couplet from Byron’s “Don Juan”: “A little still she strove, and much repented, / And whispering, ‘I will ne’er consent,’—consented.” Given Section III’s history with Macneil, some classmates knew as soon as they read those lines that controversy would follow. Bonnie Savage, the WLA chair, wrote, “Repeated instances of sexism in both your contracts textbook and your classroom discussions have been brought to the attention of the Women's Law Association." She said the Byron quote reflected "sexist attitudes" and "has no place in a contracts textbook." Indeed, "by using sexist language, you encourage sexist thought and, in essence, promote hostility against women."

Macneil later acknowledged, "I knew the class considered me a first-class bastard," but the WLA aspersions were "a bolt out of the blue." When classes resumed after spring break on Monday, April 3, every member of Section III and every member of the law school faculty received an eight-page, single-spaced letter of rebuttal that Macneil addressed to the WLA. "Throughout the year I have had a great many complaints about the course from students of both sexes," but only two had anything to do with gender, and at the December 7 grievance session, "not a word was said about any alleged sexism." Macneil declared that "this whole affair . . . reeks of McCarthyism" and said its roots lay in his efforts "to insist that students act like professionals in the classroom respecting participation, preparation, attendance, and promptness." Two days later, Macneil reiterated his mandatory sign-in policy, saying he had referred the names of three regular absentees to law school administrators. A number of students spoke up in support of Macneil, and others asked about the upcoming, much-feared final exam.

A week later, the Boston Globe published a lengthy story, highlighting "Macneil's tough classroom manner" plus "his volatile temper and argumentative style." The Globe quoted Bonnie Savage as saying the WLA feared Harvard might give Macneil a permanent appointment. More significant, Jackie Fuchs told the paper that Macneil "goes out of his way to avoid being sexist," and that she, like a good many other Section III women, felt that WLA's "letter was really out of line." The Harvard Law Record's own extensive coverage included multiple students noting that they had been given no notice that the law school's long-dormant attendance policy might suddenly be enforced.

Within Section III, the news coverage generated something of a pro-Macneil backlash. Brad Wiegmann remembered feeling badly for Macneil because "people were treating it as if it was the civil rights movement over whether you had to attend your Contracts class." Lisa Hay believed Macneil "got a raw deal" from Section III, and David Troutt agreed he was "a decent guy" whose relational view of contracts "actually was probably a good theory." Among students who later became contracts lawyers, some, like David Attisani and Shannon Schmoyer, said that Macneil's course had been of no professional value, but an equal if not greater number strongly disagreed. Steven Heinen "really appreciated his very practical approach to contracts," and said Macneil's teaching has "served me well" in later years. David Smail, who would become general counsel of a prominent international hotel corporation, remembers Macneil as "a pompous asshole," but "as much as I despised the man," Macneil's "relationship approach to contracts is one that I really fervently believe in, and I preach it every day in my business." As a general counsel, "you're living with the contract rather than just drafting it," and Macneil's perspective "is a very powerful way of looking at contracts."

Soon after the news stories, law school administrators convened a small meeting with Macneil and several students. Ali Rubin remembered that Barack had "distanced himself from" the complaints, and Mark Kozlowski knew that Barack felt "there was nothing we could do about it." Rob remembered that "Barack and I both felt that the revolution was a little over the top," and by April, Obama was playing "a mediating role" and was "calming people down."

Lauren Ezrol, one of Section III's official representatives on the Law School Council, recalled being summoned to the meeting. "It was Barack, me, and then everyone else in the room was an administrative type, like a dean of students, and Macneil was there.” They were “supposed to try to work out the issues,” but rather than some dean taking the lead, instead Barack “was the one who with great confidence talked to Macneil” and “worked out whatever resolution” was agreed to. Ezrol thought Obama was “unbelievably impressive,” and his interaction with Macneil was entirely amicable. “I was just blown away,” Ezrol remembered, “to see someone operate with such ease and confidence and maturity. It was remarkable.” Years later, just prior to his death, at age eighty, in 2010, Macneil recalled that Obama was “a calm person in a class that was not altogether characterized by people being calm,” adding that it was “obvious that his class respected him.”<sup>14</sup>

Barack and Rob continued to visit David Rosenberg even after their fall Torts class ended. Rosenberg believed they should expose themselves to “the best minds on the faculty,” and as the time for choosing 2L fall courses drew near, Rosenberg recommended well-known constitutional law teacher Laurence H. Tribe. For most 1Ls, it would take a good deal of gumption to approach one of Harvard’s most prominent professors, Rosenberg knew, but on Friday, March 31, Obama did so, and Tribe was immediately taken by this heretofore unknown student. As Tribe remembered it, their first conversation lasted for more than an hour, and before it ended, Tribe asked Obama to become one of his many research assistants, which Tribe had never asked of a 1L who had yet to take one of his courses. Tribe wrote his name—“Barack Obama 1L!”—on that day’s desk calendar page, and soon Barack drew Rob Fisher into this relationship with Tribe as well.

When word spread among their close acquaintances that both Obama and Fisher were now working for Tribe, Ken Mack can remember thinking how astonishing that was. Tribe was so impressed by Barack that he mentioned him to his colleague Martha Minow, a 1979 Yale Law School graduate who had clerked for Justice Thurgood Marshall before joining the Harvard faculty in 1981. Minow was always interested in students from Chicago, because she had grown up in the city’s northern suburbs and her father, Newton Minow, who had served as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission during the Kennedy administration, was now a Sidley & Austin senior partner. Martha told her father about Tribe’s impression of Obama, and he picked up the phone and called John Levi to ask if Sidley’s Harvard recruiters knew about this 1L who had wowed Laurence Tribe. Levi had a ready answer: “We’ve already hired him. . . . He’s coming here for the summer.”

Before Barack began studying in earnest for late May’s final exams, he faced a trio of choices. Wednesday night, April 12, was the informational meeting for 1Ls interested in the weeklong writing competition that would take place in early June to select thirty-eight members of the Class of 1991 for the prestigious Harvard Law Review. The next evening was the initial editors’ meeting for the upcoming year’s Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review, which Barack had worked on as one of thirty 1Ls during the preceding months. One 2L editor, Sung-Hee Suh, remembered Barack “talking very calmly” during a sometimes heated discussion of hate speech, “articulating both sides” of the debate as students of color and free speech absolutists disagreed vehemently on the issue. She recalled thinking he was very “calm, cool, and collected.” Outgoing managing editor Wendy Pollack noted that Barack did not participate in the journal’s election for the upcoming year’s board, a clear sign that he intended to try for the premier Law Review instead. Barack had asked David Rosenberg whether he should do so, and Rosenberg said, “Yes, of course.”

April 13 was also preregistration for fall classes, but the 1Ls would not learn until May 8 whether or not they had gotten into popular, oversubscribed courses, such as Laurence Tribe's section of Constitutional Law. Cassandra Butts remembered that "Barack did not get in," but some "special pleading" with Tribe quickly succeeded.

Monday, May 15, was the last day of spring classes, and Lauren Ezrol and Michelle Jacobs both recall Obama telling their Contracts class that anyone who would like a copy of the outline he had prepared from both semesters' worth of notes was welcome to it. Jacobs remembered that the document was easily 100, if not 150, typed pages and "had little jokes in it. It was great." Barack had many takers, because almost everyone agreed with Greg Sater's assessment that Barack "was the smartest in the class." Lauren Ezrol agreed: "he just seemed smart and impressive and so sure of himself and well-spoken and older."

Barack had his Legal History take-home exam on Monday, May 22, followed by Section III's trio of tests: Property on Wednesday afternoon, Contracts on Friday morning, and Civ Pro on Tuesday, May 30. Property and Civ Pro would cover just the spring, but Macneil's Contracts exam would determine everyone's entire grade for the full year, six credits, and "people were really worried," Brad Wiegmann remembered. David Attisani asserted that Section III suffered "mass hysteria" in advance of the Macneil final.

Mary Ann Glendon's Property exam was an unpleasant surprise to many members of Section III, with Mark Kozłowski remembering that some of the questions "had nothing to do with the stuff we had covered in class." Steven Heinen agreed, recalling that students first encountered the word "easement" only on the test. Half of the test, involving six specific questions, concerned Native Americans on "Vintucket" island who were being pressured to sell their seaside property to an aggressive celebrity. An estranged, unmarried couple's frozen embryos, a building lease, and a "takings" issue constituted the balance of Glendon's exam.

Friday morning, May 26, brought literal shrieks of horror when angry students confronted Ian Macneil's bizarrely demanding Contracts exam, which instructed them to write their answers "ONLY INSIDE THE BOX AFTER EACH QUESTION" on the twenty-five-page test. The first, three-part, twenty-minute question asked whether a U.S.–Soviet nuclear missile treaty did or did not constitute a contract, depending on how that concept was defined. An answer of up to fourteen lines was permitted. Ten subsequent questions, ranging from ten to twenty-five minutes apiece, involved, among other topics, a nephew cut out of a will on account of his race and the sale of fourteen hundred convertible sofas. Student complaints raged. Following the Memorial Day weekend, Section III's "very intense year," as Paolo Di Rosa termed it, ended with a straightforward two-question open-book Civ Pro exam from Stephen Subrin.<sup>15</sup>

Two hundred eighty-five 1Ls—179 men and 106 women—had decided to enter the Harvard Law Review's writing competition, and only one day separated the end of final exams and the distribution of the HLR materials. The weeklong assignment consisted of two parts. First was a Bluebook test—The Bluebook: A Uniform System of Citation, then in its fourteenth edition, dated back to 1926, and was the most widely used style manual in legal academia. First-year students had been introduced to the volume's arcane instructions, especially for abbreviations, the previous fall in Legal Methods, but this HLR competition was their first real opportunity to apply its editing rules.

The second and far more demanding part entailed writing a lengthy essay—in law review parlance a “note”—weighing the merits and demerits of the U.S. Supreme Court’s recent decision in DeShaney v. Winnebago County. A 6–3 majority had rebuffed a claim that a child who suffered severe brain damage at his father’s hands could sue the local child protection agency, alleging a deprivation of his Fourteenth Amendment right to “liberty.” The Fourteenth Amendment covers only state action, and the majority held that state officials do not have a constitutional obligation to protect children from their parents. Justice Harry A. Blackmun filed an emotional dissent.

Barack had a full week to work on the two-part assignment before it had to be postmarked and mailed to the Review’s offices. But on the day it was due, his car would not start, and time was short. He called Rob Fisher, who was just heading out the door, but Rob immediately drove to Somerville and took Barack to the closest post office, where there was a long line. But Rob remembered Barack successfully sweet-talking his way forward, explaining to people that his envelope had to be postmarked by noon.

On the cover sheet that accompanied the submission, the applicant was asked for their summer contact information. They also had the option of indicating their gender and race, and they could provide a brief personal statement if they had experienced any major hardships in life. The writing competition dated back to 1969, but only in 1981 did the Review introduce affirmative action into the process to increase diversity. Only a trio of rising 2L editors who oversaw the selection process would know whether and to what degree those indicators were considered when all entrants’ scores were collated.

At the Review’s offices on the second and third floors of Gannett House, a wooden Greek Revival structure that dated to 1838, newly hired twenty-four-year-old editorial assistant Susan Higgins collected the 285 entries, assigned each a number, removed their cover sheets, and began sending batches of the submissions to the three dozen 2L editors, now scattered at their summer jobs all across the country. They would grade the numbered papers and send them back to Cambridge. Some of those 2Ls wondered whether the choice of DeShaney inadvertently gave 1Ls of one particular political stripe an advantage on their essays. “There were more interesting arguments to be made on the conservative side,” thought Dan Bromberg, a 1986 summa cum laude graduate of Yale, “and so more points to be won” there than for 1Ls who sided with the dissenters. The grading was a multiweek process, at the end of which the 2L officers, including President Peter Yu, the Review’s first Asian American leader, collated the results and factored in the contestants’ 1L grades that Susan Higgins had gotten from the registrar’s office.

Half of the thirty-eight slots would go to the top writing competition scorers; the other half would be determined by an equation based 30 percent upon those scores and 70 percent upon their 1L grades. If a contestant had indicated their minority status, that fact, but not their names, was flagged on their submission. Gordon Whitman, incoming cochair of the Review’s Articles Office and a member of the selection trio, recalled that race was “a little bit of a featherweight on the process,” but it did not count “a whole lot.” Only when the numerical selections had been made did Susan Higgins match the chosen numbers with the individuals’ names: “I was the keeper of the names with the numbers,” she explained.

In midsummer, the successful contestants—twenty-two men and sixteen women—received a phone call, and then a confirming letter, telling them they had been selected. But there was a tangible cost: they would have to leave their highly remunerative summer jobs three weeks early to return to Cambridge before the beginning of fall classes, to start work on the Review’s first issue of the new academic year.<sup>16</sup>

In preparation for the summer, Barack had “sublet the cheapest apartment I could find,” hardly a block north from where he and Sheila had lived in Hyde Park. He also had “purchased the first three suits ever to appear in my closet and a new pair of shoes that turned out to be half a size too small and would absolutely cripple me for the next nine weeks.” Working at a corporate law firm like Sidley reintensified his fears from a year earlier that going to Harvard “represented the abandonment of my youthful ideals.” But choosing Harvard over Northwestern’s full-cost scholarship meant that “with student loans rapidly mounting, I was in no position to turn down the three months of salary Sidley was offering.”

Obama arrived late for his first day at Sidley’s offices at 10 South Dearborn. It was a rainy June morning. Some days earlier, he had spoken by phone with Michelle Robinson, whom Geraldine Alexis and senior associate Linzey Jones had assigned as Barack’s summer adviser because of their mutual Harvard ties. Obama remembered that “she was very corporate and very proper on the phone, trying to explain to me how the summer program at Sidley and Austin was going to go.”

Barack was shown to her office that first day, and Michelle recalled in 2004 that “he was actually cute and a lot more articulate and impressive than I expected. My first job was to take him to lunch, and we ended up talking for what seemed like hours.” She had expected a biracial, Hawaiian-raised Harvard Law student to be “nerdy, strange, off-putting” and even “weird,” but instead Barack was “confident, at ease with himself . . . easy to talk to and had a good sense of humor,” she recounted. “I was pleasantly surprised by who he turned out to be.” She did however recall that “he had this bad sport jacket and a cigarette dangling from his mouth.”

Rob Fisher was also working at Sidley’s Chicago office for the summer, and he remembered Barack coming by his office soon after they arrived. “He came in one day and said, ‘My mentor is really hot.’” As Michelle’s friend and Sidley colleague Kelly Jo MacArthur recalled, Barack wasted little time in making his interest clear. “He would try to charm her, flirt with her, and she would act very professional. He was undeniably charming and interesting and attractive,” but Michelle rebuffed Barack’s repeated suggestions that they do something together. “She was being so professional, so serious,” MacArthur remembered, and she also knew that Michelle was someone with “conservative morals.”

When Barack pressed, Michelle was characteristically direct and told him that as his adviser, it would look bad if they began going out together. Instead, she tried to set him up with several of her girlfriends, just as she did with Tom Reed, another African American 1L summer associate and Chicago native who had been one year behind her as an undergraduate at Princeton. But Barack persisted. Finally, toward the end of June, Michelle reluctantly agreed. “OK, we will go on this one date, but we won’t call it a date. I will spend the day with you.”

On Friday, June 30, they left Sidley’s offices at about noon and walked the few blocks to the Art Institute of Chicago on South Michigan Avenue to have lunch. “He was talking Picasso,” Michelle remembered. “He impressed me with his knowledge of art.” Then they “walked up Michigan Avenue. It was a really beautiful summer day, and we talked, and we talked.”

Barack had a plan. Opening that evening was a movie that already had been the subject of three different articles in the Chicago Tribune: young African American director Spike Lee’s Do the Right Thing. It was an ingenious idea, but Michelle’s concern about appearances turned all too real when they saw Sidley’s Newton Minow and his wife Jo at the theater. “I think they were a little embarrassed” at being seen together, Minow recalled. After the film, Michelle remembered, “we had a deep conversation about that” and then ended the day “having drinks at the top of the John Hancock Building,” which “gives you a beautiful view of the city.”

“I liked him a lot. He was cute, and he was funny, and he was charming,” Michelle remembered thinking, but after their encounter with the Minows she was all the more determined not to become a subject of office gossip. But when Barack invited her to accompany him to a training he had agreed to do for DCP at one of the Roseland churches, she agreed to go along.

The small group was “mostly single parent mothers,” but she recalled that Barack’s “eloquent” presentation “about the world as it is and the world as it should be” was one she would never forget. “To see him transform himself from the guy who was a summer associate in a law firm with a suit and then to come into this church basement with folks who were like me, who grew up like me,” Michelle recounted, “and to be able to take off that suit and tie and become a whole ’nother person . . . someone who can make that transition and do it comfortably and feel comfortable in his own skin and to touch people’s hearts in the way that he did, because people connected with his message,” was remarkably impressive. “I knew then and there there’s obviously something different about this guy,” something “special,” and “it touched me . . . he made me think in ways that I hadn’t before,” Michelle explained. “What I saw in him on that day was authenticity and truth and principle. That’s who I fell in love with” in that church, and “that’s why I fell in love with him.”

Every summer Linzey Jones hosted a picnic at his home in south suburban Park Forest for all of Sidley’s minority attorneys and summer associates. Events like this were standard fare because summer programs at big law firms were aimed at enticing the students into eventually accepting a permanent job offer. Evie Shockley, an African American 1L from the University of Michigan Law School who shared an office with Barack for part of that summer, recalled attending a Cubs game, seeing Phantom of the Opera, and other theater outings. “It was easy to feel like you weren’t working,” she explained.

That weekend day, Linzey Jones remembered Barack and Michelle being “very friendly with each other,” but Barack joined in when many of the men went to a nearby junior high school to play basketball for an hour. Michelle still lived with her parents in their South Shore home, a few miles below Hyde Park, and when she drove Barack back to his apartment, he offered to buy her an ice cream cone at the Baskin-Robbins on the north side of East 53rd Street. Michelle accepted, and ordered chocolate. Sitting outside, Barack told her about working at Baskin-Robbins in Honolulu “and how difficult it was to look cool when you had the apron and the little brown cap on.” Then, in a direct reprise of a question he had posed three summers earlier, also in Hyde Park, he asked Michelle “if I could kiss her. It tasted of chocolate.”

“We spent the rest of the summer together,” Barack later wrote, but a mid-July phone call informed him that a letter inviting him to join the Law Review was in the mail. That good news meant he had to be back in Cambridge by August 16 to work on the Review’s first issue. He took several days to ponder his choice. “We had a conversation about whether or not he was going to do Law Review,” fellow summer associate Tom Reed recalled. “I’m not sure if I’m going to do it,” Tom remembered Barack saying. “He was clearly on the fence,” and “there was a moment where he was considering whether that was appropriate for his path.” But finally he told HLR as well as Sidley that he was accepting the offer.

Barack and Michelle kept a very low profile at the law firm, and neither Tom Reed nor Evie Shockley had any idea they were dating. Michelle told only Kelly Jo MacArthur. “When she met Barack, things happened pretty quickly,” Kelly Jo remembered. Michelle recalled years later during a joint interview her memories of “the apartment you were in when we first started dating,” the sublet near Baskin-Robbins.

“That was a dump.” But bumping into people they knew seemed inevitable. Jean Rudd of the Woods Fund recounted, “I have a very vivid memory of having lunch on Dearborn Street at an outdoor café there, and Barack and this tall, beautiful woman walk by. And he stopped and introduced us and said that ‘This is my boss.’ . . . We chatted a little while,” and when they left “I remember saying, ‘What a couple.’”<sup>17</sup>

One late July evening, Michelle invited Barack home for dinner to meet her parents and brother. Craig Robinson, at twenty-seven years old, was two years older than his sister and also had attended Princeton University. As a senior he was Ivy League basketball’s 1983 Player of the Year, and after graduation he had played professional basketball in Europe for several years before returning home. Craig met Janis Hardiman, a 1982 Barnard College graduate, soon after she moved to Chicago in 1983, and by 1987 they were engaged and living together in Hyde Park while Craig took classes toward an M.B.A. degree at the University of Chicago. Janis and Craig married in August 1988, soon after Michelle’s graduation from Harvard Law School. Ever since Michelle’s senior year of high school, Craig had known that his sister was quick to dispose of boyfriends, so he made a point of being at the Robinson family home at 7436 South Euclid Avenue to meet this newest suitor.

Craig and Michelle’s parents, Fraser and Marian Robinson, were, like their children, lifelong residents of Chicago’s South Side. Both high school graduates, they had married in October 1960, but Fraser’s hope of finishing college was dashed by insufficient funds. In January 1964, just a few days before Michelle’s birth, Fraser was hired by the city water department, and Marian became a stay-at-home mom. In 1965 the young family moved from the Parkway Gardens Homes in Woodlawn to the cramped top floor of Marian’s aunt’s home on Euclid Avenue, in solidly middle-class South Shore. Craig and Michelle attended nearby Bryn Mawr Elementary School, where Craig skipped third grade and Michelle skipped second. Separate small bedrooms and a common study area gave them their own modest spaces at home. At work, tending steam boilers, Fraser won two promotions along with salary increases, but an increasingly dark cloud hung silently over the happy young family: at age thirty, Fraser had been diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, though, as Craig later wrote, “we never had an in-depth discussion at home about the frightening course that MS was known to take.” In time, Fraser needed to use a cane and then crutches to help him walk, but he stuck with his job. “We saw him struggle to get up and go to work,” Michelle recalled. “He didn’t complain—ever. He put his energy into us.”

When Michelle reached ninth grade and was admitted to Whitney Young High School, west of downtown, she spent hours a day riding city buses to and from school. Craig won admission to Princeton in 1979, and his father insisted the family would make the necessary financial sacrifices for Craig to go there rather than accept a full scholarship from some less prestigious institution. Michelle grew up thinking she was smarter than her brother, and although Craig had a difficult freshman year, Michelle resolved that if he could attend Princeton, so could she. Her mother knew that test taking was not her forte, and a high school counselor discouraged her interest in Princeton, but Michelle applied anyway and was admitted. The difference between the South Shore world from which Michelle came and the privileged backgrounds of Princeton’s overwhelmingly white and often wealthy student body was profoundly stark.

“The first time when I set foot in Princeton, when I first got in, I thought ‘There’s no way I can compete with these kids . . . I got in but I’m not supposed to be here,’” Michelle recalled. “I remember being shocked by college students who drove BMWs. I didn’t even know parents who drove BMWs.” In addition, black undergraduates realized that Princeton's racial climate, even in 1981, left much to be desired. Angela Kennedy, one of Michelle's closest friends, with whom she spent one summer working as counselors at a girls' camp in New York's Catskill Mountains, recalled that "It was a very sexist, segregated place. Things reminded you every single second that you're black, you're black, you're black."

Michelle thrived in Princeton's classrooms, and by the beginning of her senior year, she was applying to Harvard Law School. Yet in a reprise of high school, her faculty adviser on her senior thesis downplayed her chances. After initially being wait-listed, in late spring of 1985 she was accepted to Harvard.

Michelle's college thesis, "Princeton-Educated Blacks and the Black Community," was a powerfully self-revealing document. "My experiences at Princeton have made me far more aware of my 'Blackness' than ever before," Michelle wrote. "I have found that at Princeton . . . I sometimes feel like a visitor on campus; as if I really don't belong." Growing up in South Shore, neither of her parents had been especially outspoken about race, but Marian Robinson's father Purnell "Southside" Shields, who died in 1983, "was a very angry man," Michelle's mother explained. "I had a father who could be very angry about race," and Marian had given Craig the middle name Malcolm after the early 1960s' angriest racial firebrand. Marian was likewise wary of interracial relationships. "I worry about races mixing because of the difficulty," she confessed years later. "It's just very hard."

But Princeton made Michelle understand that "I'm as black as it gets." In her thesis, she observed that "with Whites at Princeton, it often seems as if, to them, I will always be Black first and a student second." Looking ahead, that left her fearful. "The path I have chosen to follow by attending Princeton will likely lead to my further integration and/or assimilation in a White cultural and social structure that will only allow me to remain on the periphery of society; never becoming a full participant." She confessed that "my goals after Princeton are not as clear as before" and she rued how "the University does not often meet the social and academic needs of its Black population." In addition, "unfortunately there are very few adequate support groups which provide some form of guidance and counsel for Black students having difficulty making the transition from their home environments to Princeton's environment," as both Michelle and her brother had. She now knew that Princeton was "infamous for being racially the most conservative of the Ivy League Universities." And her exposure to some fellow students had taught her something else, something prescient indeed: "a Black individual may be unable to understand or appreciate the Black culture because that individual was not raised in that culture, yet still be able to identify as being a Black person."

Harvard Law School did not offer a much different experience. Czerny Brasuell, Michelle's one black female Princeton mentor, recounted Michelle telling her by telephone from Cambridge that "If I could do this over, I'm not sure that I would." A female classmate told Michelle's biographer Liza Mundy that Harvard "was not a friendly, happy atmosphere." But once again Michelle persevered. After her 1L year, she returned to Chicago as a summer associate at the law firm of Chadwell & Kayser, working for female partner Jan Anne Dubin and staying with her parents in the home that her great-aunt had deeded to the Robinsons several years earlier, prior to her own death.

Back at Harvard for her 2L year, Michelle volunteered significant time at the Legal Aid Bureau, located one floor—and many status rungs—below the Harvard Law Review on Gannett House's ground level. After her 2L year, she was a summer associate at Sidley & Austin's Chicago office. When Sidley offered her a position once she graduated, Michelle readily accepted. At Harvard, "the plan was you go into a corporate firm. So that's what I did. And there I was. All of a sudden, I was on this path."

At graduation, her parents paid for a teasingly congratulatory message in the 1988 Harvard Law School Yearbook: "We knew you would do this fifteen years ago when we could never make you shut up." That summer, Sidley paid for the bar review class she took alongside a friend of her brother's, Alan King, but only on May 12, 1989—after taking the Illinois exam a second time—did Michelle become a member of the Illinois Bar. Working in Sidley's intellectual property group, Michelle yearned for meaningful assignments. Given her Harvard loans, her Sidley salary was attractive, but she had not really intended to be a corporate lawyer. "I hadn't really thought about how I got there," she recalled. "It was just sort of what you did."

Craig Robinson recalled the late July evening when Michelle introduced Barack to her family. "My sister brought him over to my mom and dad's house. We all met him, had dinner. They left to go to the movie, and my mom and dad and I were talking: 'Oh, what a nice guy. This is going to be great. Wonder how long he will last?'" Craig thought Barack was "smart, easygoing, good sense of humor," but given Michelle's proclivity for discarding boyfriends, Craig remembered thinking, "Too bad he won't be around for long." Marian Robinson was also impressed because "He didn't talk about himself," but instead drew out the Robinsons about their own lives and interests. "I didn't know his mother was white for a long time," Marian recalled. "It didn't come up."

Barack's taste in movies ran to the realistic, and opening that weekend was Leola, the story of a bright seventeen-year-old African American Chicago girl whose desire to attend college was endangered when she became pregnant. Filmmaker Ruby Oliver was a fifty-year-old former day care operator, and seven weeks after they saw it, Barack talked about the ninety-five-minute movie—later retitled Love Your Mama—while addressing the real-life challenges confronted by black youths. Michelle and Barack continued to see each other almost every day, and when they went out, Michelle usually paid. "He had no money; he was really broke," she remembered, plus "his wardrobe was kind of cruddy." Barack's Occidental roommate Paul Carpenter was visiting Chicago that August, and he heard about Michelle when the two old friends and Paul's wife Beth had dinner one evening. Another night, Craig and his wife Janis dropped off Michelle at Barack's sublet in Hyde Park, and Janis and Barack recognized each other from their time at Columbia. "He came out of his apartment to get Michelle, then he and I both said, 'Oh my gosh, I remember you,'" Janis recounted.

Before Barack's return to Cambridge, Michelle told Craig, "I really like this guy" and made a request. She had heard her father and Craig say that "you can tell a lot about a personality on the court," something Craig had learned from Pete Carril, his college coach at Princeton. Michelle knew that Craig played basketball regularly at courts around Hyde Park, and he remembers her asking: "I want you to take him to play, to see what type of guy he is when he's not around me." Craig agreed to take on this task, but he recalled, "I was nervous because I had already met Barack a few times and liked him a lot."

Craig quickly scheduled a meet-up, and they played "a hard five-on-five" for more than an hour. Craig's nervousness quickly fell away because he could see that Barack was "very team oriented, very unselfish," and "was aggressive without being a jerk." Craig was happy he could "report back to my sister that this guy is first rate," and Michelle was pleased. "It was good to hear directly from my brother that he was solid, and he was real, and he was confident, confident but not arrogant, and a team player.” Craig saw only one huge flaw in Barack’s skill set, but it was not relevant to Michelle’s question. “Barack is a left-handed player who can only go to his left.”

Before Obama headed back to Cambridge in mid-August, he knew that this new, two-month-old relationship with Michelle Robinson was perhaps on a par with his now-truncated, three-year-old involvement with Sheila. For Barack, the differences were huge. Sheila was also the biracial offspring of international parents; she had lived in Paris, spoke French and now Korean, and was comfortable around the globe—just like Australian-born, Indonesian-reared diplomat’s daughter Genevieve Cook before her. Michelle Robinson was a graduate of Princeton and Harvard Law School, but she was a 100 percent product of Chicago’s African American South Side, just like so many of the women and men who had revolutionized Barack’s understanding of himself during his transformative years in Roseland.

Barack’s prior relationships had been with women who, like himself through 1985, were citizens of the world as much as they were of any particular country or city. Before Princeton, Michelle Robinson had spent one week each summer with her family at Dukes Happy Holiday Resort, an African American forest lodge in White Cloud, Michigan, forty miles north of Grand Rapids. But if Barack truly believed that his destiny entailed what he thought, he knew full well the value of having roots in one place and having that place be essential to your journey. And who more than Michelle Robinson and her family could personify the strong, deep roots of black Chicago?

Although Michelle would not know that Barack had shared his deeply private sense of destiny first with Sheila and then with Lena, before he left for Cambridge, Barack told Michelle about his belief about his future role. “He sincerely felt, from day one that I’ve known him, that he has an obligation,” Michelle explained, “because he has the talent, he has the passion and he has been blessed.”<sup>18</sup>

The Harvard Law Review, founded in 1887, was in 1989 the oldest and most prestigious legal publication in the United States. Edited entirely by students—beginning with thirty-eight from the rising 2L class, supplemented each successive summer by several top-GPA 3L “grade-ons” for an annual total of about forty—the Review published eight hefty issues a year—November through June—with the law students contributing twenty to forty or more hours of work weekly, aided by a trio of female office staffers and a quintet of part-time undergraduate work-study students. Beyond the law students, there was an oversight board of two professors, the dean, and an alumnus, but they played only a nominal role. In addition, playing an obtrusive role in the Review’s life was eighty-five-year-old eminence grise Erwin N. Griswold, the law school’s dean from 1946 to 1967 (and himself the Review’s top officer—president—in 1927–28), who critiqued every issue and was available to hector the student editors.

The mid-August return to Cambridge served two long traditions. One was to initiate the new 2L editors into the sometimes-complex internal workings of the Review. The masthead—the president, treasurer, managing editor, supervising editors (SEs), and executive editors (EEs)—oversaw the work of five “offices”: Articles, which reviewed scores of long manuscripts submitted by law professors nationwide and chose a dozen or so per year for publication; Notes, which selected and edited substantive analyses written by the HLR editors themselves; Book Reviews and Commentaries, which assigned and handled shorter pieces; “Devo,” or Developments in the Law, which prepared a major team-written study of some cutting-edge topic for publication in each year’s May issue; and Supreme Court, which oversaw the annual November issue and its several dozen student-written synopses of significant cases decided during the prior term of the U.S. Supreme Court. The November issue also contained the Review's two top-status faculty contributions: the foreword, written every year since 1951 by an emerging star chosen by the editors, and a major case comment authored by an eminent academic, a feature added in 1985.

In HLR's very elaborate editing system, overseen by the managing editor, student-written work moved from the offices to the SEs and then the EEs; faculty pieces went directly from the offices to the EEs. Everything also went through a "P-read," in which the Review's president recommended editorial changes. Each fall and winter "the 2Ls are the labor, the 3Ls are the management," 2L editor Brad Berenson recounted, until a new masthead for the upcoming year was chosen from among the 2Ls early in February.

The second reason for the pre-semester start was that the November issue had to go to the printer by mid-October. The 2Ls needed an intensive refresher course in Bluebook legal citation style, followed by an introduction to two other common tasks: sub-citing, in which the accuracy of every quotation and footnoted reference in each piece was confirmed by checking the original source, and roto-pool, in which every faculty-submitted manuscript was read and evaluated by several editors before full consideration by the Articles Office.

Most 2Ls spent their first HLR semester in "the pool," where almost every weekday morning a pink slip of paper from managing editor Scott Collins would appear in their pigeonhole mailbox in the editors' lounge on the second floor of Gannett House, telling them what their work assignment was. Editors were enticed there each morning by a spread of free muffins and bagels. "My chocolate chip muffin was the mainstay of my morning," 3L editor Diane Ring recalled. Thanks to the hefty income the Review received from sales of The Bluebook, free pastries seemed like "a very interesting strategy to make sure you got all those second-years on the doorstep every morning getting their assignment, doing the work," Ring explained. Patrick O'Brien, also a 3L, remembered that "a lot of my law review involvement had to do with free bagels and cream cheese. It would get me there every morning for a free breakfast." There also were free evening snacks for those who worked late, and as a result, Berenson recalled, Gannett House became "a gathering place," "almost like a fraternity house for the editors." Marisa Chun, a 2L, explained that the editors' lounge and its television served as "our living room." With everyone's classes in nearby buildings, popping in and out was a constant feature of HLR life. For some editors, Gannett House became the center of their daily lives, while for others, especially those who were already married, the Review was more like a demanding part-time job.

The 2Ls had three ways out of the "hideous experience" of doing pool work: join the five-person "Devo" team, whose work would satisfy the law school's written work requirement; join a multiperson group assigned to edit an especially difficult article; or write a note of one's own, an option often postponed until the 3L year and almost always done for independent study credit under faculty supervision. Gordon Whitman, the 3L Articles Office cochair, had worked for a year as a community organizer in Philadelphia before starting law school and had successfully pushed for the acceptance of a manuscript that argued that the real-world theology of Martin Luther King Jr. offered a superior perspective for examining the contentions made by "critical legal studies" scholars.

The article's author, Anthony E. Cook, was an African American associate professor of law at the University of Florida who had graduated magna cum laude from Princeton before getting his law degree at Yale. Cook's dense and complicated analysis looked especially daunting, and Whitman recruited four new 2L editors to work on it: Christine Lee, the young Oberlin graduate who was just about to turn twenty-two, the now twenty-eight-year-old Barack Obama, whom Lee had disliked from their first introduction a year earlier, and two other visibly sharp 2Ls, Susan Freiwald, a 1987 magna cum laude graduate of Harvard College, and John Parry, a 1986 summa cum laude graduate of Princeton. The lengthy manuscript would require weeks of work—it was not scheduled for publication until the March issue—and these four knew by early September what their fall work for the Review would entail.<sup>19</sup>

Fall semester classes began on September 6. Barack and Rob had carefully debated their choices. In Laurence Tribe's huge and oversubscribed Constitutional Law section, which met five hours per week, they were joined by a number of their 1L Section III classmates. The assigned casebook, William B. Lockhart et al.'s Constitutional Law: Cases and Materials, 6th ed., was the best available. Word among students was that African American professor Christopher Edley, who was back after serving as issues director for Michael Dukakis's presidential campaign, was "refreshingly good." His class, Administrative Law, might sound dry and arcane, but Edley taught the sixty-five-student, four-hour-a-week class as an entirely practical "this is how the public policy process works" course, and he supplemented the main text, Walter Gellhorn et al.'s Administrative Law, 8th ed., with various other materials.

Rob and Barack had "an extended discussion" about taking Corporations, as most 2Ls did, weighing the upside value of "understanding the world" versus how their grades in the four-credit class might harm their goal of graduating magna cum laude. But they began it and kept it, finding that Professor Reinier Kraakman, a Yale law graduate with a Harvard sociology Ph.D., "had an interesting mind and approach." Kraakman focused on "the control of managers in publicly held corporations" and emphasized "the functional analysis of legal rules as one set of constraints on corporate actors." Rob and Barack found it "a good class, really cool," and "really enjoyed it."

Edley's Ad Law was "almost as exciting as the Torts class" a year earlier with David Rosenberg. "Barack and I loved the Ad Law class" and "had a tremendous amount of fun" in it, Rob remembers, for Edley was "inspiring" and had "this very functional, argumentative intellectual approach." The course "stimulated a lot of deep discussions," plus a number of office-hours conversations with Edley, whom Rob thought was "truly a great teacher."

Mark Kozlowski recalled that Tribe's Constitutional Law had "a really lively atmosphere." As in all sizable classes, seats were preassigned, and Scott Scheper, a 1988 summa cum laude graduate of Case Western Reserve University, found himself in a second-row aisle seat, at the front of the bowl-style classroom, with Obama just to his right. Like Scheper, Laura Jehl, a 1986 highest honors graduate of the University of California at Berkeley, had been in a different 1L section than Obama. But she already knew Tribe from her work on U.S. senator Edward M. Kennedy's Judiciary Committee staff, and she was also already one of Tribe's research assistants. Jehl took note of Obama from the outset of Tribe's class. He "spoke up and said something eminently reasonable, eminently thoughtful," and with an "absolutely amazing voice."

Section III survivor Jennifer Radding remembered that Barack "was exceptional in Tribe's class" and that "Tribe was like in love with him in a very intellectual way." Sarah Leah Whitson witnessed it too. "Barack seemed to be operating at another level. . . . His rapport back and forth with Tribe felt more like a dialogue among equals.” Kevin Downey, a 1988 magna cum laude graduate of Dartmouth, noted how Obama spoke in “narrative-based” style that often included references to his own experiences, while Rob Fisher, who also stood out, made “more analytic comments.” Downey thought they “were leagues beyond the rest of us.”

Seated next to Obama, Scott Scheper had as close a view as anyone. Tribe was “a whole lot more theoretical” than he had anticipated, more interested in “What’s right? What should be?” than in “How is? What is?” Obama was “facile and adept,” and “talked more than any other single individual” in the class. Scheper recalled that “Tribe spent a whole lot of time not six feet from me in what almost became personal dialogue between him and Barack. . . . He would leave the lectern and come over . . . to our side of the class and be right in front of the front row and then Barack would be talking to him.” The scene made Scheper “sort of self-conscious that I had to maintain my posture because the whole class was looking right at me because that’s where the focus of the dialogue was.”

Several weeks in, Scheper’s demanding Trial Advocacy Workshop kept him away from Con Law for several classes. When he returned, Rob Fisher was in his spot, and Scheper realized that Obama “gave away my seat because I didn’t come to class.” Barack immediately apologized: “I thought you dropped the class.” Then the regular pattern resumed. Obama “was always engaged in these esoteric discussions with Professor Tribe. . . . They spent a lot of time talking about what the law should be.” All told, Rob explained, with Tribe plus Edley and Kraakman, fall 1989 “was a pretty fun semester.”<sup>20</sup>

That fall was Robert Clark’s first as dean of the law school. The school had been in the news over the summer because of the arrest and suspension of an African American 3L accused of raping a Harvard undergraduate. But Clark played right into the hands of his detractors when he terminated the school’s public interest career counselor before the semester began. Clark called the move “a reorientation of resources” away from something that served only “symbolic, guilt-alleviating purposes,” but progressive students reacted immediately. A protest rally attracted a crowd of three hundred, with Barack’s close friend Cassandra Butts telling the Harvard Law Record, “I came to law school in particular because I was very much interested in helping people who don’t have access to the law and who see the law as being more of a hindrance than a help to them.”

Students viewed Clark’s move as a tangible, public rebuke of those motives, and quickly created the Emergency Coalition for Public Interest Placement. National legal publications and the Boston Globe all covered the controversy, but the Harvard Crimson highlighted how tiny a percentage of Harvard Law students actually took public interest jobs once they graduated. Butts told the Crimson that many students arrived with such an interest, “but with the emphasis here on corporate law, they don’t always leave with that attitude.” Given the “insurmountable number of loans they need to pay off,” students may “choose to go into corporate work, but they will be more sensitive to the need for pro bono lawyers.” As the fall semester progressed, eight hundred law students signed letters protesting Clark’s move, then dumped them outside the dean’s office during a one-hundred-person rally that the Record said had “an emotional, near confrontational tone.” As Christopher Edley ruefully recalled, Clark “was screwing up massively.”<sup>21</sup>

In late September, Barack flew back to Chicago to take part in a Friday-afternoon roundtable discussion on community organizing. Funded by Ken Rolling and Jean Rudd at Woods, the event built on the commissioned essays Obama and others had written for Illinois Issues a year earlier. Sokoni Karanja, Wieboldt’s Anne Hallett, and several local academics were part of the group, and, as he had in other settings, Barack refrained from talking until the discussion was well under way. When he did speak, Barack highlighted what he called “the educative function of organizing,” for “at some point you have to link up . . . with the larger trends, larger movements in the city or the country. I think we are not very good at that.” He suggested that “I am not sure we talk enough in organizing” about organizing’s internal culture, and “we don’t understand what the relationship between organizing and politics should be. . . . I would like to think that ideally you would focus on the local but educate for the broader arena, and that you are creating a base for political or national issues.” Barack expressed disappointment that organizing had a “suspicion of politics,” for “politics is a major arena of power” and “to marginalize yourself from that process is a damaging thing, and one that needs to be rethought.” His critique was fundamental, and strong. “Organizing right now doesn’t have a long-term vision.”

In the 1960s, “a lot was lost during the civil rights movement because there was not enough effective organizing consolidating those gains,” but now organizers were ignoring the potential of working with movement-style efforts, and “that long-term vision needs to be developed.” Barack returned to organizing’s educative mission. “How do you educate people enough so that they can be forcing their politicians to articulate their broader views and wider horizons?” he asked. “People expect politicians to express some long-term interests of theirs and not just appeal to the lowest common denominator.”

Barack sat back before again weighing in. “There is this big slippery slope of folks and communities that are sinking,” he reminded the group. How can organizing help them? “How do you link up some of the most important lessons about organizing . . . with some powerful messages that came out of the civil rights movement or what Jesse Jackson has done or what’s been done by other charismatic leaders? A whole sense of hope is generated out of what they do. Jesse Jackson can go into these communities and get these people excited and inspired. The organizational framework to consolidate that is missing,” especially given the lack of minority organizers. “The best organizers in the black community right now are the crack dealers. They are fantastic. There’s tremendous entrepreneurship and skill,” all being used to distribute illegal drugs. To help black neighborhoods, “organizing in these communities . . . can’t just be instrumental . . . it has to be recreating and recasting how these communities think about themselves.”

After a pause, Barack turned to one of his chief takeaways from his time in Roseland. Harold Washington “was an essentially charismatic leader,” although “his election was an expression of a lot of organizing that had been taking place over a long time.” All indications were that “to a large extent” Washington “wanted to give back to that process. He wanted to give those groups recognition and empower them in some sense,” as he had done so visibly with Mary Ellen Montes and UNO, but “real empowerment was not done.” An African American historian on the panel objected to Barack criticizing Harold Washington. Sokoni Karanja agreed with the angry historian, but Anne Hallett sided with Barack, who pursued his point. “When you have a charismatic leader, whether it’s Jesse Jackson or Harold Washington . . . there has to be some sort of interaction” that moves all that energy back “into the community to build up more organizing . . . more of that needs to be done.” Then the conversation shifted, but Obama made one final point: “Organizing can also be a bridge between the private and the public, between politics and people’s everyday lives.”

Barack’s comments revealed how profoundly he disagreed with the worldview of IAF and Greg Galluzzo, and how convinced he was that social change energies should be focused on the political arena. In later years hardly anyone would appreciate the significance of what Obama said that day. Ben Joravsky, a fellow participant who was already on his way to becoming one of Chicago's most perceptive political journalists, later recalled Obama's "veneer of cool" but dismissed his comments as those of "a windy sociology professor with nothing particularly insightful to say." Only journalist John B. Judis, examining this moment many years later, would highlight how Obama had voiced "a litany of criticisms of Alinsky-style organizing" and note that he had "rejected the guiding principles of community organizing: the elevation of self-interest over moral vision; the disdain for charismatic leaders and their movements; and the suspicion of politics itself." But, Judis wrote, Obama "did so in a way that seemed to elude the other participants," who objected only to Barack's remark that Harold Washington had not left behind any tangible political legacy.

Judis mused that even Obama "seemed initially oblivious to the harsh implications of his own words," but Washington's fundamental failure should have been obvious to everyone in the room, especially because the mayor's political base had so quickly fallen apart after his death, leaving Chicago with a white, Democratic machine mayor with an all-too-familiar surname. Six months earlier, Cook County state's attorney Richard M. Daley had defeated Gene Sawyer in the Democratic primary by 55 to 44 percent, and five weeks later, Daley was elected mayor, besting Alderman Tim Evans, running as an independent, by 55 to 41 percent. Ed Vrdolyak, now a Republican, garnered 3 percent and soon added a sideline as a radio talk show host to his lucrative South Chicago law practice.<sup>22</sup>

The Chicago trip was also a chance for Barack to spend a weekend with Michelle Robinson, and either then or soon after, he asked her to accompany him to Honolulu over the winter holidays. Back in Cambridge, Barack kept his distance from the burgeoning student protest campaign, despite his friendship with the outspoken Cassandra Butts, who, second only to Rob Fisher, was his best friend in Cambridge. Laura Jehl, who was working with Cassandra on a manuscript for the Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review, knew that Barack and Rob were "inseparable," and she also saw how Barack and Cassandra "were around together a lot but they didn't appear to be together," as she put it. "It did not seem to be romantic" and "it did not appear to be sexual." Another female friend concurred: "the vibe they gave off was fraternal." Laura thought that as attractive as Barack was, "there was also absolutely no body language of him that I was aware of towards anybody," and other women all agreed: "I didn't see any sexual energy from him" said one, and "never any sense" at all, recalls another.

On evenings when Barack worked on the Anthony Cook manuscript at Gannett House, he and fellow 2L African American editor Ken Mack often walked to a sandwich shop in Harvard Square for dinner. On several nights, Gordon Whitman gave Barack a lift home and spoke about how he was volunteering at the Massachusetts Affordable Housing Alliance, a Boston group headed by veteran community organizer Lew Finfer. After Barack mentioned his Chicago experience, Whitman told Finfer he should meet him. Finfer called Obama, and they met up one day at a Harvard Square coffee shop. Finfer found Barack "cool" and "dispassionate," but hoped to interest him in a return to organizing after law school. Barack politely said no. "I have a plan to return to Chicago and go into politics."

One mid-October night, 3L executive editor Tom Krause, a U.S. Navy veteran who was overseeing the group edit of the Anthony Cook article, hosted a party following a lecture by Alex Kozinski, the well-known federal appellate judge for whom Krause would be clerking after graduation. Krause invited a number of editors of all political persuasions, and Barack attended. Review editors were prized candidates for clerkships with top federal judges like Kozinski, and an astonishing 102 members of the law school's 1989 graduating class had won clerkships. Each fall 2Ls began eyeing and discussing which jurists they would apply to in the spring, and Ken Mack was astounded when Barack told him one evening that he was so focused on returning to Chicago after graduation that he would forgo applying for clerkships. When this news spread among African American students, there was open disbelief that such a top performer would pass up so prestigious an accolade. Kenny Smith was surprised and impressed, but others sensed an attitude of group disappointment. As Frank Harper put it, there were "these steps you're supposed to take" and "people thought that he was making a catastrophic error by not clerking."

Obama was a semiregular presence at BLSA meetings and parties. Cochairing a BLSA committee made him a formal member of BLSA's executive board, but the group's style was decidedly informal, with its annual spring conference the one major event requiring time and attendance by its members. After some BLSA gatherings Barack, Ken, and basketball buddies Frank Harper and David Hill would go to a pizza parlor on Mass Ave a bit north of the law school. Often joining them were two new 1Ls. Karla Martin was an African American 1987 Harvard College graduate; Peter Cicchino was white, gay, a year older than Barack, and had spent six years as a lay member of the Jesuits. Cicchino would become a defining member of the school's public interest community and a landmark figure in the public emergence of gay people at Harvard Law. Karla remembers Barack saying that he "wanted to be a change agent" notwithstanding his absence from student protest ranks. "It was clear he had ambitions," but "how that was going to play out was not clear."

Barack continued to spend more time on the basketball court than he did just hanging out. The new 1L class brought some new faces plus a familiar one into Hemenway gym's late-afternoon mix. Nathan Diament, an honors graduate of Yeshiva University, was short and fast. Greg Dingens had played defensive tackle at Notre Dame and three times won Academic All-American honors before graduating magna cum laude in 1986. Tom Wathen had been NYPIRG's executive director during Barack's four-month stint at City College four years earlier. Wathen recalled that they both did "a double-take" when they first saw each other. Compared to early 1985, when Barack was twenty-three years old, he of course seemed "more sophisticated" now at twenty-eight. "I was very impressed with him," Wathen remembered.

One day early that fall, Frank Harper, cochair of BLSA's community outreach committee, read a letter sent to the BLSA by Ronald A. X. Stokes, an inmate at Massachusetts's maximum-security state prison at Walpole, about thirty miles south of Cambridge. According to Harper, Stokes's message was a challenge: "you black students at Harvard should be ashamed of yourselves. There's a huge African American prison population; we never see hide nor hair of you." Harper called him at the prison and then "he calls me collect." Stokes sounded "very sincere" and mentioned that "we play a lot of basketball at Walpole."

That gave Harper an idea: "Let's have a basketball game." Harper called the warden, who thought, "This is very odd," but agreed to allow it if Harper could recruit five Harvard players. "Then I approach Barack. 'This isn't going to be an easy task,'" but they recruited black classmate Andre Nobles, a white Hemenway player, and a black poli sci grad student. A date was set, a van was rented, and when they arrived at Walpole, the warden gave them a stern briefing. "You're entering general population" and guards "are not going to be down there with you," only in sentry towers, Harper remembered. "If something happens, go to the corners, because we won't fire shots in the corners."

For the inmates, the game was major entertainment. "The entire prison surrounded the court to watch" as “the Walpole All-Stars” hosted five nervous Harvard gym rats. “We had a good team,” Harper recalled, and “it was definitely a competitive game,” at least until halftime. The Harvard players later joked that Obama played well until he asked the inmate who was guarding him what he was in for. “The brother said double murder, and Barack didn’t take another shot,” Harper remembered. “They won the game,” but the inmates were grateful for the students’ visit. Stokes told Harper that “he was getting out” within a few months, and “I stayed in contact with him after the game.”<sup>23</sup>

By November, Rob and Barack’s relationship with Larry Tribe had far outstripped the normal research assistants’ role, especially for first semester 2Ls. The lead piece in the Harvard Law Review’s November issue was an essay by Tribe, rather than the annual foreword, and on page one, Tribe’s first footnote stated that “I am grateful to Rob Fisher,” top 3L Michael Dorf, two postgraduates, “and Barack Obama for their analytic and research assistance.” It was a remarkable commendation, and Tribe had already invited Fisher and Obama to enroll in a spring seminar, limited to fifteen students, that would further consider the ideas expressed in his thirty-nine-page Review essay, “The Curvature of Constitutional Space: What Lawyers Can Learn from Modern Physics.”

Tribe’s description of the seminar invoked two contrasting conceptions of the U.S. Constitution: first that the original 1787 document was “Newtonian” in its promulgation of three branches, featuring “carefully calibrated forces and counter-forces,” and second, that the twentieth-century idea of an evolving “living Constitution” was Darwinian. Tribe proposed exploring a third conception, one modeled upon the work of physicists Alfred Einstein and Werner Heisenberg, “focusing on how observers alter the nature of what is observed” and considering “the concrete geometry of the space-time continuum.”

As obscure as that might sound, Rob and Barack were hooked after listening to Tribe at a late-October “organizational meeting” that began to sketch out what the selected participants would tackle. Rob wrote to Tribe that he had a “particular interest in . . . [t]he nature of the enterprise itself, that is, Law: This is the main focus of my thinking right now. Barack and I have been working on a meta-theory of the law—let’s call it post-modern epistemology. (Though Barack hasn’t seen this memo, so don’t blame him for anything in it.) I will be looking at the Constitution as both a test for and an inspiration to that meta-theory . . . the role I see it potentially playing in the seminar is as a gadfly to your physics metaphor” but “not necessarily inconsistent” with it. It was no wonder that classmates marveled at Barack’s “esoteric discussions” with Tribe and felt that he and Rob “were leagues beyond the rest of us.”

At the Law Review, editing work continued on the dense Anthony Cook article, which would not be published until March. The November issue that featured Tribe’s essay also contained the traditional foreword, authored by Erwin Chemerinsky of the University of Southern California, and case comment, by Frances Olsen of the University of California at Los Angeles. One 3L editor had been hugely impressed by Chemerinsky, a mesmerizingly intense speaker, and successfully lobbied for his selection for that prized role. Olsen was a well-known feminist scholar who had published a major article in the Review six years earlier. Her piece had undergone a very difficult edit, including the editors’ insistence that the Review would not publish the word “bitch.” As 2L editor Susan Freiwald, who witnessed one exchange, said, Olsen’s experience at the “P-read” stage exemplified how Review president Peter Yu “thought he was smarter than everyone else, including professors.” Yet as 3L Articles Office cochair Andy Schapiro stressed, the perception that Yu was indeed “the smartest” had been the decisive factor in his election as president nine months earlier. Editor Pauline Wan, a 3L, agreed. “People wanted to elect the smartest person in the room,” and “everyone felt Peter was the smartest person in the room.”

But Yu’s presidency was getting decidedly mixed reviews. During the summer, he had overseen the installation of a new computer system for the Review, but as the fall commenced, tensions grew. Chad Oldfather, who worked up to twenty hours a week at the Review as a work-study undergrad, remembered Yu as “not a warm and fuzzy guy,” and 3L editor Barbara Schneider realized that he was “not a people person.” Pauline Wan found him “remote,” and Brad Berenson, one of the most involved 2L editors, felt Yu was “a slightly aloof figure.” Kevin Downey, an active 2L, thought Peter was “not at all approachable” and “not a good leader.” Supreme Court Office cochair Frank Cooper, one of four African American 3Ls, viewed Peter as “a quiet intellectual who was focused on the academic rigor” of each issue, but “he was not even a quiet leader.”

Yu had a particularly strained relationship with Articles Office cochairs Gordon Whitman and Andy Schapiro, both of whom were lefty-liberals, in part over their selection of articles like the one by Anthony Cook. Susan Freiwald remembered Yu editing one piece and remarking that “every good idea in here comes from me.” But Freiwald thought Yu’s interactions with Frances Olsen were inexcusable, that he was “intellectually beating up” on her. During one loud, angry phone exchange, Freiwald remembers Yu “just screaming at her and her screaming back,” and it left Freiwald thinking that “Peter was an asshole.”

As the editing of the Cook manuscript proceeded, more and more of the work fell to Christine Lee. Articles Office member David Goldberg, a 2L, realized the piece “was way too long” and “a little jargony,” and fellow 2L editor John Parry saw that Christine “worked very hard” and “reorganized it, and I think made it coherent.” Christine willingly put in lots of time, but as the semester progressed, she concluded that Barack was more interested in playing basketball than doing his share of the necessary sub-citing and other work on the Cook manuscript. “We were a team,” but “he would play basketball religiously, including when there was a sub-cite due,” Christine remembered. “He definitely did the bare minimum,” and “it was just building my resentment” as “other people were covering for the drudge work he wasn’t doing.”

Executive editor Tom Krause noted that at the outset, “Barack was like the primary editor,” but “somehow it kind of was taken over by Christine, who ended up doing all the work.” Krause was not a fan of the article, but in his eyes, Christine, “to the detriment of her own grades and class work, was doing work he”—Obama—“could have been doing.” As the piece moved forward, Krause stepped up his own involvement, and he and Christine—polar political opposites—became personally close “doing the things that Barack had not done,” Christine recalled. In retrospect, even Gordon Whitman, Cook’s main proponent, realized the article was “pretty impenetrable.” Krause thought “it would have been worse if Christine and I hadn’t worked on it,” but Whitman’s verdict was appropriately biting: “In hindsight, what the hell was that all about?”

The real meat of each November issue was the individual case comments, which were anonymously authored by 3L editors. The 1989 issue surveyed twenty-five Supreme Court decisions, which brought the issue to a robust 404 pages. This earned Peter Yu a stern rebuke from Erwin Griswold: “I would like to suggest that one of the major tasks of the President is to edit out vast quantities of unnecessary words, and to keep the overall size of each issue, and of the volume, under control.” Yu responded that he shared that concern, but he cited “the extraordinary number of leading cases from this past Term” and promised that the entire volume would not be any larger than in years past.

Griswold replied that he was “not wildly enthusiastic about” the Tribe essay; “essentially the same arguments can be made without any . . . farfetched allusions to concepts developed in the field of physics.” In contrast, Griswold found Chemerinsky’s foreword “both interesting and powerful” and thought Olsen’s comment was “imaginative and stimulating.” He thought some of the case comments were “very good,” but “surely much too wordy.” Griswold was happy that the December issue, at 196 pages, would be less than half the size, but again he said the sole article, a 105-page piece on statutory interpretation, was “awfully wordy.” A thirty-one-page review of a book by philosopher Richard Rorty was “much too long” and “quite indigestible,” a “depressing” example of something “written by a professor for the professors” rather than for “active, practicing lawyers.”

Griswold was happy with the two six-page “Recent Cases” summaries, one of which, by Barack’s basketball buddy Tom Perrelli, a 1988 magna cum laude graduate of Brown, exemplified how 2L editors were expected to do at least one brief piece of individual writing in addition to their pool or team assignments. Barack may not have been doing his share of the work on the Cook edit, but by late October, he was well under way writing a comment on a late 1988 decision by the Illinois Supreme Court, which held that a young child injured in an auto accident while she was still a fetus cannot sue her mother for monetary damages. Laurence Tribe was completing work on a book surveying the ongoing U.S. political debate over abortion, and Barack was one of more than a dozen of his research assistants whom Tribe had asked to read and summarize relevant materials.

Barack mentioned the case comment he was writing to his mother at the same time he told her that, unlike the previous year’s Christmas holiday, he was coming to Honolulu and Michelle Robinson was coming with him. Maya had not returned to Barnard for her sophomore year and had joined her mother in Jakarta before returning to Honolulu, where she was waitressing at a restaurant. Barack had not seen his mother, who was now forty-six years old, since Christmas 1987, when he had taken Sheila Jager to Hawaii to meet his family. Just after he started at Harvard, Ann had moved back to Jakarta to take a job at the People’s Bank of Indonesia—Bank Rakyat Indonesia, or BRI—the country’s oldest financial institution and one specializing in microfinance, small loans to artisans and retailers. Ann had lost interest in completing her long-delayed dissertation, telling her old friend Julia Suryakasuma that “the creative part was over long ago, and it’s just a matter of finishing the damn thing.”

But her new work put her in direct contact with the people whose artisanal pursuits she had devoted her fieldwork to studying. Ann also had begun a fulfilling relationship with Made Suarjana, a married journalist eighteen years her junior, and in November, she wrote to Alice Dewey, her longtime mentor, to tell her that she would be returning to Honolulu for the holiday. She told Dewey that Maya’s time in Indonesia “seems to have done her a lot of good, unstressed her and renewed her self-confidence” after a rocky first year at Barnard. “Barry is also coming at Christmas with a new girlfriend in tow. He is still enjoying law school and writing pro-choice opinions of the abortion issue for the Law Review.”

No matter what Barack told his mother about his case comment, which went to press in early December, its pro-choice stance was extremely measured. The Illinois court had defended its holding on the grounds that otherwise the mother and her fetus would be “legal adversaries from the moment of conception until birth.” Obama commended the court for its “thoughtful approach” and wrote that the case “highlights the unsuitability of fetal-maternal tort suits as vehicles for promoting fetal health.” He said the suit “also indicates the dangers such causes of action present to women’s autonomy, and the need for a constitutional framework to constrain future attempts to expand ‘fetal rights,’” because “fetal-maternal tort suits affect even more fundamental interests of bodily integrity and privacy” on the part of women. He wrote that the state may have “a more compelling interest in ensuring that fetuses carried to term do not suffer from debilitating injuries than it does in ensuring that any particular fetus is born,” but again stressed the primacy of “women’s interests in autonomy and privacy.” Obama concluded the piece by recommending that “expanded access to prenatal education and health care facilities will far more likely serve the very real state interest in preventing increasing numbers of children from being born into lives of pain and despair.”<sup>24</sup>

Before fall classes ended on December 8, two Chicagoans visited the law school. Elvin Charity, a 1979 Harvard Law graduate who had worked for Harold Washington, was now one of two black partners at the Chicago law firm of Hopkins & Sutter. Charity was on his firm’s recruiting committee “to help to promote the hiring of African-American lawyers,” and Harvard was an annual target. Second-year students traditionally split their summers between a pair of firms, and although Barack would return to Sidley & Austin for part of the upcoming summer, Hopkins & Sutter was another attractive Chicago firm. To Charity, “Barack was particularly striking” in part because he showed up for his interview “pretty casually dressed,” rather than in a suit and tie. “He just seemed so nonchalant about the whole thing,” with “a calmness and a seeming maturity beyond his years.” Charity knew the significance of Barack’s Law Review membership, but Obama “did not seem to be full of himself” and an offer was quickly extended and accepted.

The second Chicago visitor was Michelle Robinson, who along with an Asian American colleague was there on behalf of Sidley to speak to minority 1Ls about job search techniques at an evening session sponsored by all three ethnic—black, Latino, and Asian—student groups. Several ’91 and ’92 BLSA women who had heard Barack talk about Michelle realized this would be a perfect opportunity to “go see who this person is,” and “we were very impressed with her,” Jan-Michele Lemon remembered. “She was very engaging and warm and friendly.”

Michelle’s Wednesday visit came just two days before the end of classes, and the next Monday Barack faced the first of three fall semester final exams. Upper-class exams took place in December, not mid-January, but Barack had Edley’s Ad Law and Tribe’s Con Law take-homes back-to-back on the first two days of exam period. Edley’s emphasized that “it is important to demonstrate that you have synthesized the assigned readings and course materials,” and students had to answer six out of nine questions, with responses limited to 150 to 500 words apiece.

Tribe’s open-book final posed just one essay question, with answers limited to 1,750 words. The hypothetical situation involved an abortion clinic employee who had been fired for telling a woman the sex of her fetus. The woman then aborted the fetus, citing avowedly religious reasons, because it was female. The fired employee had been denied unemployment benefits, and Tribe’s hypothetical played off a recently argued U.S. Supreme Court case, Employment Division v. Smith, which also involved a state’s refusal of unemployment benefits to a worker fired because of religion-based conduct. Tribe asked students to write their best decision of the case. Six days later, on December 18, Barack and Rob had their last fall exam, for Kraakman’s Corporations class. Then Barack was free to head to Honolulu, though upper-class students’ single winter session course would begin promptly on Tuesday, January 2.<sup>25</sup>

Barack’s introduction of Michelle Robinson to Ann, Toot, Gramps, and Maya signified, just like

Sheila's visit two Christmases earlier, how serious this six-month-old relationship was. After Michelle's early December visit to Harvard, "it was clear that they were 'a couple,'" her close Sidley friend Kelly Jo MacArthur recalled, and "the discussions turned fairly soon to whether they were going to get married or not." That clearly came up during their time together in Honolulu, because soon after they flew back to the mainland, Ann Dunham sent her close Indonesian friend Julia Suryakusuma a description of Michelle. "She is intelligent, very tall (6'1"), not beautiful but quite attractive. She did her BA at Princeton and her law degree at Harvard. But she has spent most of her life in Chicago," so she was "a little provincial and not as international as Barry. She is nice, though, and if he goes ahead and marries her after he finishes law school, I will have no objections."

Almost the first day he returned to Cambridge, Barack wrote to Sheila Jager, who two months earlier had returned to the U.S. from South Korea. Barack had written to Sheila regularly throughout her time abroad, once sending her a short story he had written and another time "an annotated copy of Tocqueville's Democracy in America." By the time she returned, Sheila had told Barack she had applied for and won a Harvard teaching fellowship in Asian Studies with the eminent scholar Ezra Vogel. Before the end of January, Sheila would be moving to Cambridge and renting an apartment at 5 Crawford Street. She recalled that "the job at Harvard had nothing to do with Barack being there, per se, although I can't rule out that I unconsciously applied to Harvard to be near him." But she also explained, "Then again, I wasn't going to turn down a job there simply because he was there," and during their time apart, she had begun a relationship with someone else.

In his January 2 letter, Barack told Sheila about Michelle and her Chicago roots at some length, but as he had in his 1989 letters, he also wrote about "his turmoil about our relationship" and his thoughts about "who he was and what he wanted to become." Sheila said that Barack described "his thoughts about his love for me, marriage, his 'destiny,' his race/identity, and how all this affected his relationship" with Michelle. But once Sheila arrived in Cambridge in early 1990, "we continued to see each other occasionally," despite the deepening of Barack's relationship with Michelle. Years later Barack would write that 1989–90 "was a difficult, transitional period in my life." Indeed it was, for it was a period characterized throughout by two powerful, overlapping relationships.<sup>26</sup>

For the 2 and 3Ls' three-week January winter term, Barack and Rob, along with Section III friends Gina Torielli and Jennifer Radding, took Evidence for three hours each weekday morning with Professor Charles R. Nesson, one of the law school's best-known faculty members. Problems, Cases, and Materials on Evidence, by Nesson and Eric Green, was the text for a course that introduced "what the trial system is about." Nesson's open-book exam took place on January 26, by which time Barack and Rob were already into their work for Tribe's upcoming seminar. They also jointly selected four additional courses for the spring semester that would begin January 31: Taxation, which was strongly recommended for all 2Ls, with Professor Alvin Warren; Local Government Law, with Professor Gerald Frug; Jurisprudence, with the world-renowned Roberto Mangabeira Unger; and Law and Political Economy, with Chris Edley, whom they had enjoyed so much in the fall.

By early January, the Law Review's 2L editors were focusing on the upcoming election of a new president, which would take place on the first Sunday in February, and then the subsequent selection of a new masthead and office cochairs. In the eyes of their colleagues, some 2L editors, like Julius Genachowski, a 1985 magna cum laude graduate of Columbia, had long seemed like all-but-certain presidential candidates. Others who had logged long hours of scut work at Gannett House, like David Goldberg and Christine Lee, were presumed to be natural contenders. But 2Ls who thought Peter Yu's style was far from ideal pondered who would be the Review's best leader, irrespective of who might be the smartest editor. In early January, Susan Freiwald, who had been so deeply offended by Yu's behavior toward Fran Olsen, asked Barack to have lunch with her at Au Bon Pain in Harvard Square. "I told him that I thought he ought to run for president" and offered to encourage others to support him if he did. Barack replied that "he was going to think about it," and he raised the question with David Rosenberg. "You're an idiot. It's a waste of time," Rosenberg remembered telling him, explaining that being president would preclude him from writing a note, which anyone headed toward academia should do. Neither of Barack's two closest non-Review friends, Rob and Cassandra, thought he had any interest in running for the position, nor did Michelle Robinson and her family.

In the previous year's election, all four African American editors—Crystal Nix, Frank Cooper, Jennifer Borum, and Ira Daves—spurred by earlier BLSA achievements, had tried to win top positions on the Review. Nix's selection as a supervising editor, a top-five post, and Cooper's role cochairing the Supreme Court office, left them strongly committed to see that success continue. Robert Granfield, the sociologist who had perceptively interviewed so many Harvard law students, was aware of a painful downside of the Review's publicly acknowledged affirmative action selection policy. A prior 3L African American editor had told Granfield that the policy created "a real stigma" that left black editors' status open to question. "Before law school, I achieved on my own abilities. On Law Review, I don't feel I get respect. I find myself working very hard and getting no respect." Ken Mack agreed. "Being on the Law Review was the most race-conscious experience of my life," he recounted. "Many of the white editors were, consciously or unconsciously, distrustful of the intellectual capacities of African American editors or authors."

Attaining leadership posts on the Review disproved any such derogatory attitudes, but Nix's SE position was the highest post a black editor had yet won. No African American had ever been president or treasurer, and the informal rule was that anyone aspiring to a masthead position needed to compete for the presidency as a way of demonstrating the seriousness of their interest.

Of the five African American 2Ls, Princeton graduate Monica Harris had spent little time in Gannett House, and young Christine Lee's outspokenness counterbalanced her demonstrated work ethic. Quiet Ken Mack, whose magna cum laude undergraduate degree from Drexel University was in electrical engineering, seemed an unlikely fit, but both Obama and Rebecca Haile, an Ethiopian-born 1988 Williams College graduate whose family had been forced to flee their homeland when she was ten years old, were well liked among their 2L colleagues. Nix, Cooper, Borum, and Daves pressed Lee, Mack, Obama, and Haile to try for masthead posts, but Barack continued to exhibit disinterest until the eve of the deadline when presidential contenders needed to file a one-page statement of candidacy.

That night the black HLR members and several African American 2L veterans of Section III gathered for dinner at Barack's apartment. Nix, Cooper, Borum, and Daves came with an agenda, even if others present were unaware of it: to convince Obama to join Mack, Lee, and Haile in running for the presidency. Crystal Nix, a former New York Times reporter, who had known Michelle Robinson at Princeton, was the leader. She "was extremely active in encouraging him to do it," Frank Cooper recalled. Jennifer Borum remembered "Barack sitting on the floor" as the conversation proceeded. Mack listened closely as the 3Ls stressed how there had never been an African American president of the Review, but they believed Barack could win.

John “Vince” Eagan, an older, generally quiet Section III veteran, was also there that night. Eagan knew that Barack was “one of the smarter guys around,” but he was surprised by some of the books on Barack’s shelves because “he didn’t really come off as a leftist in any sense.” As the 3Ls talked about Obama’s chances, “I just said ‘I think you should kick that door in.’ That’s all I remember saying. It was just like a throwaway comment.” Jennifer Borum recalled that before the evening was over, Barack had changed his mind. “I remember him saying, ‘I think I’m going to throw my hat into the ring.’” Of the black 2Ls, “he was the last one” to agree that all four should run. A few weeks later, Barack said that Vince Eagan’s comment had been decisive. “I said I was not planning to run, and he said ‘Yes you are, because that is a door that needs to be kicked down, and you can take it down.’” Shortly thereafter, Barack again recalled Eagan’s comment: “‘There’s a door to kick down,’ the friend argued, ‘and you’re in a position to kick it down.’”

An astonishing nineteen 2Ls—half of the 1991 class of editors—filed to run for president, and one evening at the end of January, a candidates’ forum took place in a tiered classroom. The contestants each made a personal statement, and then they responded, one by one, to questions from other 2Ls and interested 3Ls. One asked what leadership skills they had, another inquired which Supreme Court justice they would most like to clerk for. Sarah Eaton had started law school with the now-3L class and made law review before taking a year off, so her 2L classmates that fall were all new faces. She, along with Section III veteran Lisa Hay and Devo office 2L Julie Cohen, had agreed to run after noting the absence of interested women. Eaton barely knew Obama, but that evening “he was amazingly impressive,” she recalled. “He just blew everyone away.” Likewise, prior to the forum, Barack “was somebody that frankly I hadn’t really noticed,” 3L Jane Catler explained. “But on that day, wow,” she remembered. “He just leapt out of the pack. He was charismatic.”

Then a question was posed about whether affirmative action should remain a part of the Review’s selection process. Jim Chen, the most outspoken of the 2L conservatives and a summa cum laude graduate of Emory University whose family had immigrated to the U.S. from Taiwan almost empty-handed, forcefully advocated abolishing it. As some remember, Barack clearly supported affirmative action, but he also said he understood and appreciated the principled arguments against it and suggested that the policy be revisited in full after the new officers were selected. Ken Mack remembered that “that really made an impression on a lot of people,” and most especially “a huge impression on the conservatives” who comprised one-fifth or more of the 2L editors. Fellow candidate Julius Genachowski recalled that Barack “was really unique in being able to have other people believe that he understood their point of view.” Brad Berenson, a 1986 summa cum laude Yale graduate who was the informal leader of the 2L conservatives but not a presidential contender, had a further perspective. “Barack told at least me, and maybe others, that he had declined to identify his race on his Law Review application,” in what Berenson viewed “as a way of signaling, ‘Hey, I get why you might be opposed to affirmative action and why you might not even think it’s in the best interests of its supposed beneficiaries.’”

Prior to the election on Sunday, February 4, Barack did very little presidential campaigning: only 2L editor Kevin Downey recalled Barack directly asking for his support. “I was a little surprised,” because during the fall Kevin, like others, had sensed no interest in it from the “very mature” and “somewhat remote” Barack. “I can clearly remember him saying to me that he thought he’d like to be the president of the Law Review but if he didn’t get that, he wasn’t going to do anything else.” Instead of politicking, just three days before election, Barack and Rob gave Laurence Tribe a powerful critique of Tribe’s latest manuscript using physics for constitutional analysis. “We basically completely trashed his ideas,” Rob recalled. Tribe’s response indicated what a remarkably unique relationship had developed between the eminent professor and his two older but nonetheless precocious second-year students. “Oh my gosh,” Tribe wrote to them. “Your memo pretty much sweeps me off my feet. The trick will be to land on some place better than my back. I will count on the two of you for help. Would you consider a coauthored essay, perhaps with our names listed alphabetically? Who knows where it should appear but it deserves to be written.” Tribe signed his name simply “Larry.”

The presidential election proceedings commenced at 8:30 A.M. on February 4, in the Ropes-Gray Room in Pound Hall. In keeping with another Law Review tradition, the nineteen candidates were sequestered in the adjoining kitchen, where they prepared successive meals for the fifty-plus voters. Kevin Downey remembered his home phone ringing and managing editor Scott Collins telling him, “We really need your participation.” Another 2L, Michael Weinberger, who was already there, recalled his wife contacting him to say that their car had been stolen, but he stayed for the election.

Many 2Ls were surprised to see small boxes containing each candidate’s pool and editing work there in case anyone wanted to examine it. The 3Ls who had worked with each candidate offered introductory reports about them before the floor was opened for comments and questions. With nineteen contenders to consider, the entire morning was consumed by those discussions, during which informal lobbying took place, especially by 3Ls who favored a particular candidate. Who would win the presidency was not the only consideration, because the discussions of the candidates that day would rebound a week later when the rest of the masthead was selected and office cochairs were elected.

From the semiautonomous Devo office, 3L cochairs Debbie Brake and Audrey Wang sought to promote their 2Ls, particularly Julie Cohen and also Rebecca Haile and Jennifer Collins. Articles Office cochairs Andy Schapiro and Gordon Whitman were energetic proponents of David Goldberg, who was a top-notch contender. Frank Cooper recalls that he, Crystal Nix, and Jennifer Borum were “hyper-focused on Barack. . . . We all encouraged other African American editors to run because we felt like we needed that representation” on the masthead, “but the focus and the pressure was on getting Barack to win.” One by one, Crystal and Frank wooed fellow 3Ls to support Barack. “We felt like we had enough of a coalition that we had a chance to win. No one knew if we could actually pull it off, but we had a chance to win,” Cooper explains. “People were conscious of the fact that he would become the first African American president of the Harvard Law Review. No one really said it” and “for the most part it wasn’t talked about,” he adds. “We were also very conscious that we needed a group of people who were not African American on the Law Review to be vocal about it” and “we all kind of worked several people to see who would be open to it. We knew there were some people who were clearly in line with that right away” and who became “part of our coalition,” particularly 3Ls Radhika Rao, Dan Bromberg, and Micki Chen.

The descriptions and ensuing discussions of all nineteen candidates lasted until noon. Few participants recalled the initial voting process in precisely the same way, but with so many candidates, the first round of paper ballots called for voters to select five candidates. As a time-consuming tally took place, the atmosphere was decidedly relaxed, with some editors playing Scrabble, others reading the Sunday New York Times, and a trio of women calmly knitting. Once the 3L officers had cumulated the votes, there was a clear and substantial gap between the top numbers and the lower half. When no dissent was registered, ten of the nineteen were told that their cooking duties were over, and they were now voters rather than contenders as the second round of discussions commenced.

Three of the four African American candidates—Barack, Rebecca Haile, and Christine Lee—made the cut. So did two other women, Lisa Hay and conservative favorite Amy Folsom Kett, a 1984 Oberlin graduate who had gotten a Harvard music M.A. before law school. Until then, “I was pretty apolitical” and “pretty middle of the road,” Kett said, but the law school’s intense conflicts left her feeling like a conservative. The ten 2Ls who had been eliminated uneasily joined the larger group, and their presence swung the group away from the almost two-to-one imbalance in favor of the 3L class that had characterized the first round. Even with the slate of candidates cut in half, voters could still cast their ballots for multiple contenders, and the afternoon proceeded slowly as the nine remaining contenders were discussed and debated.

Shortly before dinnertime, ballots were again distributed, and after a lengthy tally, the individual totals showed a clear gap separating a top six from a lower trio. Tom Perrelli, Christine Lee, and Mike Froman, a 1985 Princeton graduate who had earned an Oxford doctorate before law school, left the kitchen and became voters. Of the six remaining semifinalists, three were women: Amy Kett, Lisa Hay, and Rebecca Haile, and two, Haile and Barack, were African Americans. With the field so reduced, the tenor of some comments shifted. Michael Cohen, a 2L, remembered that “at first people would speak for folks,” but as the day progressed “people would start speaking against someone.” Without naming anyone specifically, Mike Froman said the president should possess the best analytical skills and intellectual ability, rather than being selected because of “his charm and his poise.” Listeners thought Froman was speaking on behalf of David Goldberg, but they understood whom Froman was putting down. In contrast, Christine Lee, who had the most negative perspective on Obama’s editing contributions, put those feelings aside in the interest of African American advancement. Christine became “a very big and vocal backer of Barack,” 3L executive editor Tom Krause recalled.

Amy Kett’s image as a conservative and presumed opponent of affirmative action attracted criticism, and after the third round of balloting, she and Lisa Hay exited the competition. This left Obama, Rebecca Haile, David Goldberg, and Jean Manas, a 1987 summa cum laude Princeton graduate and joint degree student who had begun law school with the 3L class. Haile was pleasant and mild-mannered, and generated no intense feelings, but Manas, who had grown up overseas, was seen as an outspoken leftist and was much better known among 3Ls than by his 2L classmates. The perception that Manas was the 3Ls’ favorite, coupled with the conservatives’ belief that “he was just basically the Antichrist,” as Brad Berenson recalled, was a decisive combination. With everyone still able to cast multiple votes, and with a good many of David Goldberg’s most enthusiastic supporters also positively inclined toward Obama, first Haile and then Manas were eliminated.

After 9:00 P.M. the field was reduced to David Goldberg and Obama, and for the first time all day, the now seventy-plus voters each had a single vote. Frank Amanat, a 2L, remembered that “the feeling of drama in the room increased, in a way that I think was palpable to most of the people in the room.” Frank Cooper recalled that when it got to the final two “it was protracted. There were many, many discussions.

. . . Everyone in the room, at some point, weighed in and spoke.” For many of them, the issue was what the president should be, above and beyond who. In the 1989 election, tradition suggested that the president should be the best possible editor, someone who could earn the respect of the professorial authors whose work he would “P-read,” as well as HLR colleagues. John Parry, a 2L, knew that David Goldberg was “definitely seen as one of the intellectuals on the Law Review,” as well as being “well liked.” David Blank, the most outspokenly conservative 3L, championed the traditional view. “Blank was a strong proponent for Goldberg,” Frank Cooper remembered, and “it got heated” regarding Obama “because some people felt like he did not represent the traditional view of Harvard Law Review: academic rigor . . . that he was almost too worldly.” Some argued that a president with “a principled approach to the law” was more important than someone with “experience outside of academia.” But Barack’s performance in Section III, and in Tribe’s Con Law, left no doubt at all that he was “strong academically” as well as older and more mature.

Peter Yu’s presidency had suggested that intellect, editing prowess, and Bluebook skills were no sure recipe for success. “I think his presidency and his style paved the way for Barack,” Frank Cooper explained. Diane Ring, a 3L, saw it similarly. “They’re looking for something different next time around,” she thought, “someone with more people skills.” Jackie Scott, a 2L, concurred. “You needed someone who wasn’t just that academic person, who could bring the Review together. That was an overriding concern,” and one the conservatives shared. “David was regarded as a very political person, and Barack was not,” conservative quarterback Brad Berenson explained. Liberal 2L Scott Siff agreed that “Barack was perceived as less left than David,” but it was not only the conservatives who shifted decisively to Barack as the clock neared midnight.

“A lot of the conversations also happened in separate groups,” Frank Cooper explained, and as the evening progressed, both Cooper and Crystal Nix quietly mustered their forces. As an SE, Crystal had been a “kind of friend-mentor” toward nonpolitical 2L Anne Toker, and Toker remembered Nix “coming to talk to me and kind of making the pitch for Barack.” Crystal likewise lobbied 3L Mark Martins. In terms of leadership experience, no editor could trump Martins. Valedictorian of his West Point graduating class, Martins had gone to Oxford as a Rhodes Scholar before serving two years as a platoon leader in the 82nd Airborne Division. When Martins had drawn the only pool assignment more loathed than a sub-cite—cleaning Gannett House—classmates laughed when he brought his own vacuum cleaner. But Martins too agreed with Nix’s argument. “We’re not merely trying to pick the best editor, we’re trying to pick the best leader was how I saw it,” and Nix “mentioned the importance of that to me . . . before I voted.”

Along with Radhika Rao and Micki Chen, Frank Cooper was able to enlist both Dan Bromberg, his former roommate, as well as his present one, Jean Manas, following Manas’s elimination. “Toward the end, you could see it start to swing,” Cooper remembered. “People like Micki and Radhika and Dan, they were absolutely critical in swinging it because you really needed someone who was not African American to create momentum behind the fact that this person could be the right president of the Law Review for everybody on the Law Review.” Tom Perrelli saw it similarly. “What often moved that room was an unexpected person who hadn’t said anything stepping up and saying ‘You know, I really like’” someone of a different political stripe. Daniel Slifkin was audibly British and had arrived at Harvard with advanced standing after earning two First Class Honors undergraduate degrees at Oxford. Hours earlier Slifkin had summarized Tom Perrelli's work, but during the fall, Slifkin had observed that Obama "was a very exceptional person from the get-go: more mature, more poised, more articulate," as well as "very smart." In his distinctive voice, Slifkin now stated the case and declared, "we should make Barack Obama the president of the Law Review."

Earlier Amy Kett had been tarred as an opponent of affirmative action, but now she spoke up to say, "I think the obvious choice is Barack." Not knowing the context, Amy did not understand why Brad Berenson and fellow conservative Adam Charnes were nodding vigorously in approval as she softly declared, "I would love to be represented by Barack." The African American editors knew the symbolic importance of the approaching vote, but so did editors of every ethnicity. Jorge Ramírez, a 3L, had spent seven years in Cambridge, first as an undergraduate, and among the 3L editors "there was a core group that saw this as an historic opportunity." Tracy Higgins, a 3L who had known Crystal Nix as a fellow Princeton undergraduate, fully appreciated that "it would be a kind of historic moment for the Law Review." Pauline Wan agreed. "I think people wanted to elect a black president," for "that would be a coup for our year." To her "the personality of the man" loomed far larger than race, because Barack's "personality is capable of uniting a group of very disparate individuals who all think they're smarter than everybody else in the room. To be able to do that is a huge talent." Barbara Schneider, a 3L, agreed that "it was his personality" rather than race or politics that proved decisive, as did 3L Patrick O'Brien. "He had a gravitas and wisdom and maturity about him," and without question Barack "was a race-transcending guy."

Frank Cooper knew that "you had some people who were just torn" between the pair of finalists, but in the end, even David Goldberg's two most ardent backers voted for Barack. "We bailed on David because we wanted to elect the first black president of the Harvard Law Review. I don't think it's that complex a story," remembered Articles Office cochair Gordon Whitman. "It was a sense that I could be part of history. We knew we were breaking a big barrier, and that we'd be famous for it." Throughout the day Whitman had been snapping photos to capture the occasion, but "I've always felt bad for David." Andy Schapiro liked both finalists, and "I don't recall having to choose between Goldy and Barack until late," he recalled, using David's nickname. "Goldy was my best friend," but Schapiro too voted for Obama.

Dinner had ended hours earlier, and with the day's cooking complete, the finalists had retreated to the editor's lounge on the second floor of Gannett House to await the result. David Goldberg remembered that a bottle of vodka was there. "We drank shots of vodka," with Barack remarking, "Whatever doesn't kill you makes you stronger." They were alone except for undergraduate assistant Chad Oldfather, who would remember Peter Yu finally coming up the stairs to ask the two finalists to come with him to Pound Hall. It was now after midnight, and Oldfather left without knowing who had won.

In the Ropes-Gray Room, the weary electors knew the runner-up would enter the room first, and everyone applauded when David Goldberg entered. Goldberg had been "quite sure" for hours what the outcome would be, and so his weary smile—captured in one of Gordon Whitman's photos—was entirely heartfelt. Then Goldberg stood aside and Obama entered the room to even greater applause.

"I remember the look on his face," Jennifer Borum recalled. "It was like he was in shock." Ken Mack remembered that he was by the door, "and so I just sort of stepped forward, and Barack stepped forward, and we just spontaneously hugged. We hugged for a very long time." Mack knew when Goldberg had appeared first that Obama's victory would be an "immensely powerful symbolic breakthrough" for African Americans at the country's most famous university, but only during Ken's embrace did Barack grasp its meaning. "It was a hard hug and it lasted for a while," he recounted a few days later. "At that point I realized this was not just an individual thing" and "not about me," or at least "more than just about me. It was about us," about an African American for the first time attaining the pinnacle post at the world's top law school. As they hugged, "tears rolled down both of our faces," Mack remembered, and Gordon Whitman caught the moment in a dimly hued photo as Barack's two hands grasped the back of Ken's white shirt.

It had been "an exhausting, draining day," 3L Barbara Eyman explained, sixteen hours all told, and "it wasn't really until after the vote was over that we collectively felt the historic nature of the vote." Mack understood how "people really got emotional at that moment," with Christine Lee and the other African American editors erupting in joy. This jubilation was puzzling to any 2Ls who had not been aware that Obama's election would represent a pathbreaking step. Michael Weinberger "had not realized that this would have any kind of a racial meaning. It's just a law review." Only when he saw the African American editors "crying and running and hugging" did Weinberger recognize the moment's symbolic importance to them. "That just had not been part of my consciousness" when voting for Obama. "I was completely clueless."<sup>27</sup>

Derrick Bell awoke to his ringing telephone. The clock showed 12:50 A.M. It was Crystal Nix, calling to tell the law school's most outspoken black professor about their victory. "All of us knew that if we pulled it off, it would be big news," Frank Cooper realized. "It was such a moment of high for every African American on that campus," David Hill remembered. Frank Harper explained that everyone felt "a sense of pride and achievement," that a black student could attain such an eminent position. By the time that Obama finally strolled into Gannett House, well after 12:00 P.M. on Monday afternoon, editorial assistant Susan Higgins had been swamped for hours with press calls. She had arrived that morning wondering "Who's my new boss?" and was surprised it was Obama because "he was definitely not in the mold of everybody else" who wanted a masthead position as a springboard to appellate and then Supreme Court clerkships. Many editors were bemused as well as elated by the press calls, and joshing began around a cast list for "The Barack Obama Story, a Made-for-TV Movie, Starring Blair Underwood as Barack Obama."

One of Monday's callers was 1989 Law Review member Sheryll Cashin, who was clerking for Judge Abner Mikva, a former Chicago congressman who now sat on the prestigious U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Cashin and Crystal Nix were close friends, and though Nix had not awoken her in the middle of the night, she had called early that morning with the historic news. Cashin in turn told Mikva, who in his ten years on the court had become known as a "feeder" judge, someone whose law clerks often went on to work for Supreme Court justices such as William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall. Judicial guidelines prevented formal clerkship offers from being extended until later in the spring, but Mikva was immediately interested in hiring the Review's first African American president. Cashin knew Obama from the previous year, and the message Mikva asked her to convey was clear. "I was charged with letting him know that if he wanted a clerkship with him, he had it," she remembered.

Sometime Monday Cashin reached Obama. "I'm calling you because Judge Mikva's very interested in you” and “very much would like you to apply” to clerk for him come 1991. Barack’s response was immediate: “I’m flattered, but no thanks—I’m going back to Chicago.” Cashin paused. “I was shocked—this was unheard of,” for especially among Review officers, “nobody didn’t clerk.” Cashin tried to persuade Obama to at least apply, but he was adamant. “Tell the man thank you, but I’m going back to Chicago,” Barack reiterated. “I was just floored,” Sheryll recalled, especially because a clerkship with Mikva virtually guaranteed a subsequent Supreme Court clerkship, and large law firms were known to pay newly minted high court clerks a $35,000 bonus. Cashin remembered that Mikva reacted with “amused surprise” when she recounted the astonishing conversation.

In Chicago, Michelle Robinson reacted similarly when Barack called her. “You’re not going to clerk for them? You’re kidding me!” and “He’s like ‘No, that’s not why I went to law school. If you’re going to make change, you’re not going to do it as a Supreme Court clerk.’” When Mikva visited Harvard a few weeks later and met Obama, “I teased him about not interviewing with me.” Barack cited his desire to return to Chicago and made it “absolutely” explicit he intended to run for office. Obama mentioned Mikva’s offer to Laurence Tribe, seeking reassurance, and Tribe agreed, but Cashin and Michelle Robinson were far from alone in feeling baffled by his lack of interest in attaining a Supreme Court clerkship.

Obama spent the balance of Monday giving interviews, and by mid-evening the Associated Press had sent out a story headlined “First Black President of Harvard Law Review Elected” all across the country. Obama told the wire service, “I wouldn’t want people to see my election as a symbol that there aren’t problems out there with the situation of African-Americans in society,” with Roseland high schoolers clearly in mind. “From experience, I know that for every one of me there are a hundred, or thousand, black and minority students who are just as smart and just as talented and never get the opportunity.” He also stressed that his selection “sends a signal out that blacks can excel in competitive situations like scholarship.” Again alluding to his experience in Chicago, Obama added, “I want to get people involved in having a say in how their lives are run. More and more of that needs to be done.” The AP stated that Obama “has not ruled out a future in politics.”

Tuesday morning Obama’s election made news in the New York Times, the Boston Globe, and the Harvard Crimson, as well as in papers that ran the AP story. The Times’ story showed that Obama was a disciplined interviewee, for his comments echoed what he told the AP. Reporter Fox Butterfield wrote that “Mr. Obama said he planned to spend two or three years in private law practice and then return to Chicago to reenter community work, either in politics or in local organizing.” His quotes in the Globe also tracked his statements to the AP, but he told the Crimson that his election marked “a significant change from the Harvard Law School of the past,” and the paper reported that Obama “plans to continue working in the public sector when he graduates from law school, but is unsure what form that work would take. He said he will consider anything from running for elected office to setting up community service programs.”

One day late, the Chicago Tribune highlighted the hometown tie. “Over the long run, the way to improve the conditions in the cities and schools—to fight crime and drugs—is to work on the local level,” Obama stated. In an ironic segue, the Trib then quoted Johnnie Owens saying that while at DCP, Obama “honestly evaluated his performance and made up his mind to do better.” The Trib said Obama will “spend a couple of years practicing law after graduation next year and then it’s most likely back to community organizing, maybe politics.” But Obama emphasized that “I’ll definitely be coming back to Chicago,” which he called “a great town” and “an ideal laboratory.”

In far-off Honolulu, the Star-Bulletin headlined “Ex-Islander Gets Prestigious Harvard Post,” but a conversation a reporter at the newspaper had with Madelyn Dunham, now sixty-seven years old, produced a potpourri of misinformation. Obama Sr. had never been “Kenya’s finance minister,” Barack’s first job in New York was not as “a social worker,” and in Chicago he had not formed “a consulting firm to advise people who wanted to set up small businesses.”

Two student journalists at the law school’s own Harvard Law Record wrote a lengthy profile, speaking with Rob Fisher, Christine Lee, Cassandra Butts, and Laurence Tribe in addition to Obama, who again repeated almost verbatim what he had said to the AP and then the Times. But for the law school audience, he made other points too. “My election is a positive sign in that it shows people are ready to put in leadership positions black folks who have strong concerns about black issues,” he asserted. “What happens at Harvard really gets magnified,” he knew, “but there is so much more left to do in terms of hiring more minority faculty, in terms of dealing with the disaffection blacks feel in the university, and the need for more diverse career opportunities.”

Obama also thanked BLSA and a trio of black professors—Derrick Bell, Christopher Edley, and Charles Ogletree—as “ground breakers” who had paved the way for him to walk “through doors other folks broke down,” the same metaphor Vince Eagan had used two weeks earlier. Obama said BLSA and public interest advocates had helped create “an atmosphere that allows a person of my interests and perspectives to be in the mainstream. It means white conservatives can trust me,” and he called for the law school to “start thinking more about its relationship to the larger society and about the kind of commitment the school should make to assure kids like me get in these positions again.” Implicitly citing Chicago, he said that “those interested in public policy have to think about how the private sector can be harnessed to promote urban development.”

Laurence Tribe told the Record about Obama’s work on both his physics article and his forthcoming book Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes and expressed his hope that Obama would be “a future legal scholar.” The president of BLSA, 3L Tynia Richard, said Obama’s victory was “a momentous event,” and Chris Edley termed it a “milestone.” Christine Lee seemed to be attempting some misdirection by asserting that “race was not a factor” in the election and that “It was not strategized politically.” But 2L editor Frank Amanat accurately said that “the biggest thing he brings to the Review is his maturity. He’s had a lot of exposure to the outside world.” Most significant, the Record spoke with Rob Fisher, and introduced Rob’s comments about Barack by writing that “those who know him say his charisma and self-confidence are most at home in the political arena.” Rob explained, “I don’t think Barack sees this as a stepping-stone to the academic aspects of the law. But whatever he does, he is extraordinarily committed to making a contribution to the resolution of social problems in this country. There is no possibility that this will send him in a different direction.”

As the week progressed, multiple journalists prepared Obama profiles and even Time magazine reported on his election. Obama told the Boston Globe he would return to Chicago after graduation because “I have a certain mission to make sure that the gifts I’ve received are plowed back into the community.” The Globe called Johnnie Owens at DCP, who recounted thinking four years earlier that “This guy sounds like he’s president of the country already” when Barack first spoke to him. The Globe also contacted Maya, who had returned to Barnard for her third and final semester there. “He has been like this as long as I can remember,” she said about his seriousness. “I wish I could shed light on exactly what has made him so old at such a young age.”

In retrospect, Barack believed his election to the HLLR presidency was as much the result of his performance in Section III as anything else. “I had established a presence in the classroom and in other activities during my first year,” he recounted years later, incorrectly citing “actively campaigning on issues of diversity in faculty hiring” as among his 1L efforts. He also badly misremembered his less than six months on the Review preceding the election, imagining that “by the time I was elected . . . the peers who voted for me had worked with me in close quarters for over a year.”

One later commentator correctly noted that “Obama’s fame began precisely with this achievement.” That was well understood by his Harvard contemporaries, and the slew of media requests made that clear to everyone at the Review. A Philadelphia Inquirer profile had Barack claiming, “I know Philly, and I like it,” but he emphasized his resolve to return to Chicago and neighborhoods like Roseland. “There is a lot of talent there, and a lot of energy,” but “also a lot of sadness, a lot of young people whose dreams get crushed.” He cited the importance of major corporations “building plants in these areas,” but said, “I don’t think I’ll return to the Developing Communities Project.” Instead “I will try to get connected with some city-wide agency. I would also like to get involved in the political scene in Chicago.” As an activist, or as a candidate? “I don’t know. Either one, I guess. It all depends on where I can do the most good,” just as Rob had said.<sup>28</sup>

Before the week was out, Barack realized he had acquired a new, almost full-time job on top of a demanding course load. The first two Review tasks, scheduled for the next Sunday, involved only the 2L editors: the election of a new masthead and office chairs, and the completion of the transition to 2L management by re-adopting or altering a number of governing policies inherited from the now-sidelined 3Ls. Early on, following traditional form, Barack asked runner-up David Goldberg if he wanted to be treasurer, the ostensible number-two post. Goldberg quickly said no, as he knew from experience that he wanted to be in the Articles Office, which chose the Review’s premier content. Semifinalist Lisa Hay did want to be treasurer. The most crucial job was managing editor, because the ME oversaw the distribution of everyone’s work and made certain that issues went to press in time for delivery by the tenth day of the issue’s month. Meeting that date was Erwin Griswold’s top fixation. Exiting ME Scott Collins believed strongly that the 2L with the best skills to take on that demanding role was semifinalist Tom Perrelli, who was willing to accept.

Office cochairs were chosen by a simple vote of all 2Ls, with some positions contested and some not. The process was more complicated for the masthead’s supervising editors and executive editors. For SEs, as for treasurer and ME, 2L votes would be tallied, but the president could choose from among the top finishers. EE contenders had taken a Bluebook test, graded by the departing 3L EEs, but again the president was not bound by the rank order of the results. Executive editor was an impressive title to have on a résumé, but the actual work was essentially copyediting, with Bluebook proficiency being an EE’s stock-in-trade. Indeed, a new, updated fifteenth edition of The Bluebook needed to be produced. SEs, meanwhile, edited their fellow students’ work and worked more closely with their classmates than anyone on the Review.

On Sunday morning before the masthead and office elections began, a number of Review editors watched television as major news broke in South Africa. Barack, knowing that a difficult day lay ahead, began his introductory remarks with “Let’s try and keep this in perspective. Nelson Mandela was freed from prison, and what we’re doing is not that important.” Tallies to name Lisa Hay as treasurer and Tom Perrelli as ME proceeded without difficulty. The SE contenders presented Barack with a list that included presidential third-place finisher Jean Manas plus four hardworking women: Julie Cohen, Anne Toker, Rebecca Haile, and Christine Lee. Barack had asked Julie to take the EE test, but she had demurred, since “I really didn’t want to do it.” Yet the EE test results, as Barack had feared, presented a political problem because the top three finishers, Jim Chen, Adam Charnes, and Amy Kett, were all conservatives.

The office cochair results created no controversy: David Goldberg and Jackie Scott for Articles, conservative Brad Berenson and liberal John Parry for Supreme Court, Julius Genachowski and Jenny Collins for Notes, liberal Susan Freiwald and conservative Mike Guzman for Book Reviews and Commentaries, and Mike Cohen and Marisa Chun for Devo. Chun was also fourth on the EE list, and Barack had to decide if he would follow rank-order results and have three prominent conservatives in the coveted EE positions, as well as decide whom to choose from among the SE contenders. Manas’s third-place presidential finish created a certain presumption, but Anne Toker, unlike Christine Lee and Julie Cohen, had not run for president, as masthead aspirants had traditionally done. Christine, well known for her hard work as well as for her outspoken racial views, had also actively supported Obama’s candidacy. “I really, really thought I had it in the bag” for SE, Christine remembered, thus becoming a black female member of the masthead, like Crystal Nix a year earlier.

Before Barack would announce those choices, the 2L editors had to affirm or amend multiple policies. Some were trivial, but still generated debate, such as what time the lavish spread of free bagels and muffins should arrive. But the most explosive issue was the Review’s use of affirmative action in selecting new editors. Conservative leader Brad Berenson described it as “the deepest, darkest secret of the Review: how affirmative action was done, to what extent,” and each year only the president and two editors actually knew the truth. Amy Kett asked if the existing policy included women—it did not, because women in previous classes had opposed their inclusion—and 2L Dave Nahmias proposed expanding the categories to include “other people who’ve been disadvantaged,” whether natives of Appalachia or Vietnamese refugees. Nahmias was perceived as a conservative, so the self-identified progressives opposed his idea. When Jim Chen moved to end the policy completely, conservative and liberal editors alike found Chen’s deeply personal attack on affirmative action “eloquent,” “impassioned,” and “quite memorable.” Some recalled Chen citing common ethnic epithets and warning that “This is what affirmative action does—it calls people something.” Progressive Susan Freiwald remembered feeling torn as Chen pleaded that “I don’t want to be stigmatized, and you don’t know how many people are stigmatizing me.” But even hard-core conservatives like Adam Charnes realized that when someone was “saying we should abolish affirmative action, other people can construe that as an accusation that they shouldn’t be sitting in the room.”

Tom Perrelli recalled that Barack “was leading the discussion, but he wasn’t trying to impose his own perspective.” Then Shaun Martin, an impish, unpredictable character whom classmates viewed as a highly eccentric genius, quasi-seriously followed up on Chen’s motion to abolish affirmative action by moving to abolish the Review itself. Even that managed to engender debate, but in the end, the 2Ls voted to make no changes in the president’s discretionary power to use affirmative action when the next class of editors was selected.

Following the meeting, Barack mulled the difficult choices regarding the EE and SE positions. Tom Krause and the other 3L EEs told him that they believed the president should abide by the test results and not displace Chen or any of the other conservative top trio. “It was a tough decision for Barack to ratify,” Krause recalled, yet the EEs, even more than the SEs, “had virtually no substantive input” into the Review’s content, Amy Kett realized, only final stylistic authority over everything. The conservatives were elated when Obama ratified the exam outcome. “There was a strong push for Barack to use his power to go down the list,” Brad Berenson explained, and “the fact that he didn’t spoke volumes to the conservatives on the Review, earned him a tremendous amount of goodwill and respect, because it was seen as a loud and clear indication that no matter what else happened, the best interests of the Law Review were going to be the guiding principle.”

Traditionally there had been only two SEs, but Barack made two unexpected moves: first he named three SEs, and then he appointed an additional masthead member to oversee the Bluebook revision. But his choices—and whom he passed over—created an immediate firestorm. To the three SE positions he named Jean Manas, Julie Cohen, and Anne Toker, and as Bluebook editor, he named Ken Mack, his best friend among the 2L editors and fellow African American. When Obama provided the names to the Harvard Law Record, his appeared first, followed by Lisa Hay and Tom Perrelli. Then Mack’s name was fourth, above the SEs and EEs. The ten-person masthead thus included two black men, four white women, and Asian American Jim Chen. There were no African American women, even though Rebecca Haile and Christine Lee had been among the top nine contenders for the presidency. Both women were shattered, and “Christine felt extremely betrayed,” Tom Krause knew.

Barack’s siding with the conservatives on one major decision, and slighting black women on a second, while elevating Ken Mack, left even Barack embarrassed. African American 3L Jennifer Borum remembered Barack telling her “I guess you’re mad at me too,” and she told him he had violated the Review’s own traditions. Mack knew that there was “a lot of recrimination and criticism,” and Lee’s anger was visceral and verbal. She believed that “the quality of my work” merited an SE post, and “I felt betrayed, because I had worked so hard.” Looking back, she realized that she “saw everything in terms of race,” “didn’t play well with others,” and thus “had not earned it as far as the quality of my diplomacy with the other students.” Her relationships with some colleagues would have required channeling “certain people’s work to me and other people’s work” to other SEs, and that alone was “a valid reason to not give me the position.” Tom Krause, with whom Christine had become involved during their work on the Anthony Cook article, believed that her contemporaneous fury at Obama “was semi-justified” because he had failed badly at “rewarding loyalty.” But Krause also thought that given the politics of the Review, Barack’s treatment of Lee “as a pragmatic matter makes perfect sense.”<sup>29</sup>

The week after Obama’s election, Peter Yu wrote Erwin Griswold with the news. In his previous letter, Yu had described the Review as “a scholarly (rather than professional) publication,” while also telling Griswold that the Review’s royalty income from burgeoning full-text data services like Lexis was now more than $100,000 a year. February’s lead article had created a “huge fight” at the Review because of author Katharine Bartlett’s insistence on using first as well as last names of authors whom she cited, in violation of a Bluebook rule that barred the former. The Articles Office had sided with Bartlett, but the EEs vetoed that, and in protest Bartlett’s article featured a memorable initial footnote denouncing the ruling. “I had wanted to humanize and particularize the authors whose ideas I used in this Article by giving them first as well as last names. Unfortunately, the editors . . . insisted upon adhering to the ‘time-honored’ Bluebook convention. . . . In these rules, I see hierarchy, rigidity, and depersonalization, of the not altogether neutral variety. First names have been one dignified way in which women could distinguish themselves from their fathers and husbands. I apologize to the authors whose identities have been obscured in the apparently higher goals of Bluebook orthodoxy.”

Gordon Whitman, who had sided with Bartlett, recalled the Review’s “obsession about form over substance” and how often the editors’ behavior toward authors was “like the kindergartners running the preschool.” A similar controversy had occurred with a book review in the March issue, which was just going to press, the last number for which the departing 3Ls bore “complete responsibility.” Floyd Abrams, the country’s most distinguished First Amendment litigator, had been asked to review A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America, a posthumously published book written by the well-known scholar Harry Kalven Jr. Abrams had been astonished when the Review’s EEs told him The Bluebook prohibited the capitalization of “first amendment.” Like Bartlett, Abrams voiced his unhappiness in a first-page footnote, “objecting to the transformation in law reviews of what I understand to be the First Amendment to the ‘first amendment.’” Abrams cited another prominent scholar’s call that “Those who believe in freedom of speech should begin by rejecting the tyranny of the Uniform System of Citation.” Or, “to put it another way, since Kalven wrote about the First Amendment, why can’t I?”

Along with Bartlett, the February issue had also featured a twenty-five-page commentary by Kenneth Lasson that mocked the oversized role that law reviews had in American legal education. Lasson cited a number of recent articles in major law reviews which had hilariously impenetrable titles, such as “Epistemological Foundations and Meta-Hermeneutic Methods: The Search for a Theoretical Justification of the Coercive Force of Legal Interpretation.” Editor Brad Wiegmann, a 2L, remembered Lasson’s essay as “fabulous.” In a similar voice, the Review’s own March issue led off with Anthony Cook’s “Beyond Critical Legal Studies: The Reconstructive Theology of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.” An unhappy Erwin Griswold wrote Yu, “I wonder how many of your readers will actually ever read the leading article,” but he did think Floyd Abrams’s review was “very good.”<sup>30</sup>

The Monday when the media descended on Barack was also the start of the first full week of spring semester classes. Barack and Rob had signed up for a significantly heavier course load than they had had in the fall. They were familiar with the subject matters in Larry Tribe’s seminar and Chris Edley’s small class, which featured once-a-week sessions with a guest speaker, ranging from liberal Massachusetts congressman Barney Frank to conservative law professor Charles Fried, who was just back after serving as President Reagan’s solicitor general. But their three large courses—Taxation, Local Government Law, and Jurisprudence—were going to be demanding, especially for someone who had just taken on a burdensome new management position. Tax—i.e., federal income tax law—met four hours per week and was straightforward if highly technical. Alvin Warren was “a great Socratic professor,” Obama’s fellow Section III veteran David Smail believed, and Rob Fisher agreed, remembering Warren as “really excellent.”

Gerry Frug’s Local Government Law class used his 1,005-page casebook, which offered a wide array of multidisciplinary readings. Frug’s unifying theme was “The City and Democratic Theory,” and it examined the early origins of cities as legal entities. Frug’s underlying emphasis was on “the relative desirability of centralization and decentralization” in democratic government, and he made no secret of his strong belief that “decentralization, participatory democracy, and civic transformation” go hand in hand. Barack was once again the most talkative student in the class. Law Review colleague John Parry recalled some classes as being “almost these conversations” between Frug and Barack, and Frug remembered how he and Obama “had a lot of one-on-one discussions,” often stemming from Barack’s organizing experience, which was “a perspective that I hadn’t otherwise thought about.” Their exchanges played a “really prominent role” in class, and indeed were “the major thing that happened in the course.”

Barack and Rob also took Jurisprudence with Roberto Mangabeira Unger, a highly abstract thinker who rarely drew explicit links between his classroom lectures and the assigned readings. Unger viewed law as “the detailed expression of an institutionalized form of social life,” and his course focused on competing theories of law. In the introduction to his assigned readings, he warned that “These materials have an oblique relation to the argument of the course. My plan will not track closely the sequence of the readings, nor shall I discuss them in detail. Study of them is nonetheless important.” Radhika Rao, a 3L on the Law Review, found Jurisprudence to be “a weird class, because Unger would just speak in these incredibly long sentences and you didn’t understand what he was saying. He was impenetrable.” Law Review 2L Susan Freiwald found it challenging too, but she could see how Rob and Barack were “just so into it.” Everyone thought Rob was “a great guy,” but everyone was bemused by the intellectual intensity that he and Barack brought to so many of their classes. Rob thought Unger “was the most brilliant (and deepest) lecturer at HLS by far,” even if many students often could not fathom what was being discussed.

On February 15, Rob and Barack presented their critique of Larry Tribe’s constitutional paradigm at the third weekly meeting of Tribe’s fifteen-student seminar. A bevy of Law Review 3Ls were in it too—Crystal Nix, Andy Schapiro, and Jack Chorowsky—plus Tribe’s top 3L protégé, Michael Dorf. As with Unger, Tribe’s post-Newtonian analysis was not always clear. Peter Dolotta, a 3L, remembers “Tribe throwing stuff up against the wall and then seeing if it stuck.” Often it did not. “We were generally pretty skeptical,” Peter explains, and Rob Fisher concurs. “My sense of what he was talking about was that it wasn’t real coherent,” though it was still “a fun seminar.” Jack Chorowsky agrees. “It was a funky class. Frankly I’m not sure that anybody knew exactly what it was about, but it was fun to sit around and talk Con Law with Larry Tribe. That was the point.”

Rob took the lead in making his and Barack’s joint presentation. The headings on his outline captured its flavor: “Heuristic Analysis and the Constitution” . . . “The Constitution as Framework for Social Discovery” . . . “Heuristics, the Enlightenment and the Constitution Versus Positivism and the Administrative State.” When Rob finished, Barack spoke up, asking the seminar “My most important question to you: What’s interesting here and what’s boring and why?” Rob jotted notes as Barack continued. “How can a govt. of limited powers possibly succeed in modern vision?” The class discussed whether “In the law, do the arguments drive the words or do the words drive the arguments?” The conversation was not entirely disconnected from constitutional analysis, for as Rob noted on the back of their outline, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. had made a similar point in 1918: “A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged, it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used.”

Recalling that seminar, Michael Dorf explained how Rob and Barack “seemed sort of like a pair” and “I thought of them almost interchangeably.” One participant believed that “Barack wasn’t that impressed with Tribe,” that “he’s not really a deep thinker” like Unger or even David Rosenberg. Yet when Tribe and Dorf some months later published the much-refined results of Tribe’s project as a slender book titled On Reading the Constitution, they twice expressly thanked the duo: “Robert Fisher and Barack Obama have influenced our thinking on virtually every subject discussed in these pages,” the coauthors wrote in their acknowledgments, and a footnote stated that “We are grateful to Robert Fisher and Barack Obama for the metaphor of constitutional interpretation as conversation.”<sup>31</sup>

Interest in Barack by journalists continued, and Crystal Nix encouraged Tammerlin Drummond, a black female reporter friend who had just joined the Los Angeles Times, to come interview him. Drummond flew to Boston and spent two days with Barack at the Review. He told her about the tens of thousands of dollars of student loan debt he now had thanks to Harvard, but cheerfully said, “One of the luxuries of going to Harvard Law School is it means you can take risks in your life. You can try to do things to improve society and still land on your feet. That’s what a Harvard education should buy—enough confidence and security to pursue your dreams and give something back.” Drummond wrote that Obama envisioned spending “two years at a corporate law firm, then look for community work. Down the road, he plans to run for public office.”

Drummond also spoke with Christine Lee and reported that Obama “has come under the most criticism from fellow black students for being too conciliatory toward conservatives and not choosing more blacks to other top positions on the law review.” Christine complained that Obama is “willing to talk to” the conservatives and “has a grasp of where they are coming from,” neither of which was true for her. “His election was significant at the time, but now it’s meaningless because he’s becoming just like all the others.” Radhika Rao told Drummond that Obama is “very, very diplomatic” and “has a lot of experience in handling people, which stands him in good stead” at the Review. By far the most difficult challenge was Christine, who was “taking passive aggressive swipes” at him every chance she could get. “The tension between us was just so high,” she remembered. “I kind of felt like he was full of shit, and I could see exactly the ways in which he was full of shit.”

Lee recalled that one day Obama called her into his small top-floor office, and that “as soon as I got in there I started to cry.” Barack told her, “We have to fix this problem between us” so that they could work together on the Review. He made some reference to both of them being half-white, but Christine’s anger was so intense, she had no interest in ameliorating their situation. “I don’t care what our problem is. We’re not likely to resolve it, nor am I interested in resolving it.” Deeply depressed at how Review politics had denied her the masthead post her work had merited, Christine began seeing a campus counselor. “Half of our meetings were about Barack,” she recalled.

Before the end of February, Barack had to do his first “P-reads” on the contents of the forthcoming April issue: one article, five student notes, including one coauthored by Crystal Nix, Jean Manas, and a third editor, another one by Jim Chen, two book notes, including one by Susan Freiwald, and two recent cases similar to his own January piece. “He just did a great job,” Freiwald remembered, and most authors agreed with her about Barack’s “light touch” as an editor. Even Erwin Griswold was happy, praising the April issue as “extraordinarily fine” and stressing that “There is nothing in this issue which smacks of professors talking to themselves.”

When a young black journalist from American Lawyer magazine came to interview him, Obama readily voiced a Griswold-like critique of the journal he now headed. “Generally, law review articles are written to confuse rather than illuminate,” he said. “While some of that is due to the complexity of the law, some of it is just plain pretense. The average practitioner isn’t interested in wading through pages and pages of drivel.” Barack also told her he aspired to influence national issues, such as “whether money goes to the Stealth bomber or to needy schools.”

Obama was never more loquacious than when Allison Pugh, an Associated Press reporter, interviewed him in the “Hark,” the law school’s student center. Perhaps remembering his 1983 stay at Wahid Hamid’s Long Island apartment, he declared that he was “not interested in the suburbs. The suburbs bore me. And I’m not interested in isolating myself.” Instead, “I feel good when I’m engaged in what I think are the core issues of the society, and the core issues to me are what’s happening to poor folks in this society.” Referencing both Indonesia and Kenya, Barack noted that “I lived in a country where I saw extreme poverty at a very early age” and “my grandmother still lives in a mud-walled house with no running water or electricity.” He continued to stress that his election was not evidence of broader black progress and that people should not “point to a Barack Obama any more than you point to a Bill Cosby or a Michael Jordan and say ‘Well, things are hunky dory.’” Politically, “it’s critical at this stage for people who want to see genuine change to focus locally,” and in inner cities “it is crucial that we figure out how to rebuild the core of leadership and institutions in these communities.” Stating that “I’m interested in organizations, not movements, because movements dissipate and organizations don’t,” Barack believed that the U.S. needed “some new renewed sense of purpose and direction. . . . Hopefully, more and more people will begin to feel that their story is somehow part of this larger story of how we’re going to reshape America in a way that is less mean-spirited and more generous.” Pugh observed that Obama “radiates an oddly self-conscious sense of destiny,” and her story ended with him announcing that “I really hope to be part of a transformation of this country.” To another interviewer, Obama added that “if I go into politics it should grow out of work I’ve done on the local level, not because I’m some media creation.”<sup>32</sup>

Before his Review victory, Barack had agreed to join two 3Ls in organizing BLSA’s spring conference, the group’s big annual weekend event. “The New Decade: The Mission of Black Professionals in the 1990s” was this year’s theme. Two days of panel discussions and social events drew scores of African American alumni back to Cambridge and kicked off on Friday, March 9, with an employer forum featuring representatives from thirty-five major law firms. Evening receptions and speeches took place at Cambridge’s fanciest venue, the Charles Hotel. Obama’s newfound fame was threatening to overload his already jam-packed schedule. Thursday evening he moderated a debate about affirmative action at Harvard’s JFK School of Government featuring the eminent sociologist Nathan Glazer versus the university’s relevant policy coordinator. On Saturday afternoon at the BLSA conference, Barack moderated a panel discussion on economic development, and his much-heralded election led 3L BLSA president Tynia Richard to ask him to introduce that evening’s dinner speaker, NAACP Legal Defense Fund attorney Elaine Jones.

Barack’s role was intended to be modest, but even two decades later virtually everyone could recall and quote from his remarks. The Harvard Law Record said Obama “told the audience that despite the achievements blacks as individuals may realize, one must never forget where one came from or lose sight of the community goals. Obama stated that only when we acknowledge that one is part of a communal enterprise, can one hope to effect lasting change.” That summary omitted the clarion call phrase almost all listeners remember Obama invoking multiple times, as the words of Jeremiah Wright echoed through the luxury hotel's ballroom: "Don't let Harvard change you!"

Tynia Richard, who did not know Barack well, had expected him to sound like "a nerd," but instead found his speech "stunning." Another 3L, Alan Jenkins, remembered Obama warning that Harvard could change you in ways both bad and good. "It was a very, very striking moment," he thought, "not just the eloquence but the self-possession." To Jenkins, Barack's remarks were "the best speech I had ever heard in person at that time." Nicole Lamb, a 2L, found it "impressive and articulate," and could see that Barack "spoke without notes." His "Don't let Harvard change you!" refrain just "mesmerized the audience." Ken Mack recalled that Barack talked about being accepted by Harvard while working in Chicago, and that some older black man had given him that advice: "Don't let Harvard change you!" He "kept returning to the theme," and "the enthusiasm in the room keeps growing as he keeps coming back to that refrain." It was an "incredibly compelling speech," and "when he was done, people just broke out into wild applause." The law school's black faculty were there too. David Wilkins remembered Barack's remarks as "just mesmerizing" and Randall Kennedy recalled the "standing ovation" when it concluded.<sup>33</sup>

Review work and the bevy of requests flowing from his election left Barack increasingly stretched and strained. Throughout his first three semesters at Harvard his course attendance had been regular if not perfect, but now, especially with Tax, which met Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday mornings at 8:15 A.M., Obama began missing a heavy majority of classes. The presidency was "a grinding job," Mack could see, and by the third week of March, Barack was so exhausted that he jokingly remarked that if Review editors wanted to revolt, he was ready to be deposed.

Another day Ken remembered Barack saying, "I've got too much energy this morning. I actually got eight hours' sleep last night." Barack vented to Rob about Review problems, and Rob remembered repeatedly hearing about "a particular younger African American woman who really thought he was evil." Speaking requests included one from black graduate students at the Harvard Business School, and a listener from MIT was wowed. Barack's "ability to articulate . . . the issues" was "just head and shoulders above anyone else," Bernard Loyd thought. All the press coverage brought letters from both old friends, like Andy Roth, who was still in New York, and complete strangers. U.S. senator Paul Simon of Illinois wrote after seeing the Philadelphia Inquirer profile of Obama. "I was very interested to learn of your work with the Developing Communities Project in Chicago," Simon remarked, and "I was especially heartened to learn of your plans for a career in public service." Phone calls included a congratulatory one from organizing buddy Bruce Orenstein in Chicago plus one from a New York literary agent, Jane Dystel, who asked if Obama would consider writing a book. His response was "cool and reserved," Dystel remembered, but Barack agreed to speak with her when he was next in Manhattan to see his sister Maya.

All told, the six weeks following his HLR election were exhilarating, as his BLSA speech so powerfully reflected, but it was also debilitating. "I like to read novels, listen to Miles Davis," he told one interviewer. "I don't get to do that anymore." Law Review colleagues would recall hearing "Miles Davis on in the background" when they called Barack at his Somerville apartment, and Cassandra Butts remembered Barack playing a Wynton Marsalis album—the 1989 release The Majesty of the Blues—that also featured Rev. Jeremiah Wright, narrating a sixteen-minute track entitled "Premature Autopsies." "That's my pastor," Barack told Cassandra.<sup>34</sup>

The law school's spring break the last week of March gave Barack a much-needed respite and an opportunity to see Michelle Robinson in Chicago. Six months had passed since his last visit. The previous October, the first elections were held for the new Local School Councils (LSC) created by the 1988 school reform law. The New York Times quoted Obama's old Roseland colleague Salim Al Nurridin as insisting that those "are going to be more important to us than the election of Harold Washington," and UNO's Danny Solis proclaimed them "the largest experiment in grassroots democracy the country has ever seen."

More than 313,000 votes were cast in the school-by-school contests, and in Altgeld Gardens a trio of women who had worked with Barack were elected to Carver Primary School's council. Proponents were ecstatic, with UIC professor William Ayers, increasingly the city's leading voice for school reform, celebrating what he called "the most far-reaching change in governance ever envisioned in a modern big-city school system." In a New York Times op-ed, Ayers said he believed that "successful changes in schools tend to come from the bottom, not the top." Business leaders whose support for the reform law had been so crucial established a new organization, Leadership for Quality Education, to support its implementation, but Patrick Keleher, so central to the 1987–88 efforts, feared that more than a revolution in local school governance would be needed to solve "the public education disaster in this city."

One casualty of the LSCs' emergence was UNO, which had become a powerful network of Hispanic neighborhood groups. Greg Galluzzo and especially Mary Gonzales believed that church-based organizations could not in the long run emphasize public education issues, while Danny Solis and Phil Mullins emphatically disagreed. Personality clashes magnified an angry and ugly power struggle, one that ended with UNO and Gamaliel formally divorcing. Barack followed this from Cambridge, grilling Bruce Orenstein for details but firmly rebuffing Phil's effort to draw him to their side. DCP was troubled too. Johnnie Owens had passed through Boston for an evening and spent the night at Barack's apartment, where the two old friends talked into the early-morning hours. But Johnnie was also struggling. A state-funded evaluation team had been hired to work with DCP, but its leader, UIC professor James Kelly, found the assignment difficult to perform. "Six months," he wrote, were "devoted to establishing contact with" Owens. "That was no small or easy task. . . . Meetings were scheduled. John did not appear," a pattern that recurred at least four times.

Barack told Rob Fisher "that things weren't going that well for the organization" and "he was just trying to make sure things didn't fall apart," but there was little Barack could do from faraway Cambridge. Things were going vastly better for Mike Kruglik's SSAC in Cook County's south suburbs and for Jerry Kellman's growing LIFT in northwest Indiana. Joseph Cardinal Bernardin helped SSAC launch a multimillion-dollar effort to rehabilitate abandoned homes, and LIFT received over $1 million in grants to begin a similar program in Gary.<sup>35</sup>

Chicago politics, increasingly dominated by newly elected mayor Richard M. Daley, also included another challenge to South Side African American congressman Gus Savage by the tenacious Mel Reynolds. Nine months before the primary, Reynolds won the support of Al Johnson, the African American Cadillac dealer who had been Harold Washington's top fund-raiser. The Tribune described Johnson as "a major catch," but then Reynolds was accused of offering $6,000 to a twenty-year-old college student to have sex. The young woman had ties to another possible Savage challenger, and the charges were soon dismissed.

Seeking to highlight Savage's well-known erratic reputation, Reynolds called for all candidates to submit to multiple drug tests and then alleged that his campaign office had suffered a break-in. With national journalists interested in the race, The New Republic reported that Savage "is widely considered a buffoon" on Capitol Hill.

Amid claims that the Daley-controlled Democratic organization was quietly backing Reynolds, the former Rhodes Scholar told reporters, "I'm not an establishment guy. I have establishment credentials, but I'm a poor kid from a poor background." Al Johnson told the New York Times that "Mel is a sterling example of everything we ask our young people to be." In a lengthy Chicago Reader profile of Reynolds, Johnson praised Reynolds for returning "to the community to make a contribution" after attending Oxford and Harvard. A black pastor backing Reynolds praised him for having "not only a command of the needs of the district but also a broader perspective about the issues in the state and the nation." The Reader noted Savage's contention that Reynolds "is the candidate of the whites" and quoted a union leader decrying another anti-Reynolds theme: "The terrible thing in this campaign is that some people have tried to make a negative issue of Mel's education. . . . Some people are saying that he's an 'Oxfordian' and make it a negative." But Reader correspondent Florence Hamlish Levinsohn was ambivalent about Reynolds, writing that upstart challengers often "are egotists convinced of their ability to outshine the incumbent." She quoted an unnamed activist recounting how Reynolds had reacted when asked to run for alderman. "I'm not starting down at that level. I'm going to be President." Levinsohn concluded that "there is in Reynolds's seriousness, puritanism, and piety an ambition so overarching that it is a little bit frightening." She also saw him as "a highly educated man who is immensely proud of the moderation that his education has taught him."

On election day, Savage won a narrow 51 to 43 percent victory. That night he thanked Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan for his support and lambasted the "white racist press." Ninth Ward alderman Robert Shaw asserted that Reynolds "is identified with those people from Boston and with the elitists of this town" and warned that "black people will not permit the white establishment or the newspapers or electronic media to pick a congressman for them."

A Tribune recap stated that Savage's efforts to portray Reynolds "as an outsider bankrolled by sources unfriendly to blacks" came "perilously close to anti-Semitism." Reynolds said of Savage that "everyone who runs against him is not black enough," and a sidebar controversy ensued as Chicago's white progressives questioned why liberal black columnist Vernon Jarrett had insistently attacked Reynolds. Jarrett called Reynolds a "mysterious phony," who was "very ambitious to go to the top quickly." In Cambridge, Review 3L Andy Schapiro, who came from the district's southernmost reaches, had mentioned to Obama how excited he was to see Reynolds taking on Savage. Barack shook his head dismissively while replying, "I know Mel."<sup>36</sup>

Mid-April was an important time in the Law Review's annual calendar. All 1Ls interested in the end-of-semester writing competition were invited one evening to an "ice cream social and general information meeting," where the Review's selection process was explained. Among those attending was Lee Hwang, a 1989 magna cum laude graduate of Dartmouth, who remembered the "captivating presence" of the Review's "already famous" president. In subsequent weeks, there were three follow-up receptions—for women, African Americans, and political conservatives—hosted by respective editors.

Two nights after the initial 1L session, the Review's 103rd annual banquet took place at the Harvard Club in downtown Boston. Each year featured an eminent keynote speaker, and the 3Ls had secured famous Harvard economist John Kenneth Galbraith. But the real highlight was the distribution of the Harvard Law Revue, or “review-ee,” an acerbic and often stiletto-sharp compendium of jokes and insults presented in the form of a shortened issue of the Review. Editors and authors were targeted, and everyone found the twenty-to-thirty-page printed booklet on their chairs when the evening commenced.

The 1990 edition, written in significant part by Articles Office cochair Andy Schapiro, skewered disappointing or argumentative authors while humorously commending or embarrassing almost all student editors. A faux contents page had “Vermin Chemerinsky” “Wrapping Up a Five-Minute Foreword,” Fran Olsen required “Editing Miss Crazy,” and “Anthony Kook, ‘A Backhand Slice at Critical Legal Studies: Billie Jean King’s Philosophy of Love’” spoke for itself. Editors believed to have done good work on difficult pieces—Dan Bromberg, Jorge Ramírez, and Christine Lee for “COOKing Her Goose”—were commended, while others were teased: Crystal Nix for working all night, Brad Berenson for being “Right of Rehnquist,” David Goldberg for his addiction to Diet Pepsi.

Local celebrities were also targeted. “Laurence DiaTribe & Mike Dork, ‘Constitutionally Spaced Out: What Law Professors Can Steal from High School Science Textbooks’” teased Tribe’s November comment for being “Lost in Constitutional Space.” Obama received his share: “Barack Obama, The Semicolon Goes Where?, 666 Bluebooking’s Not Important for Celebrities L. J.” preceded a footnote invoking freedom of speech: “Even incredibly annoying speech and speech habits are protected by this guarantee. See, e.g., Obama, Why I Have a Constitutional Right to Say the Word ‘Folks’ in Every Sentence.”

Three pages labeled “Obamania” were devoted to Barack, with his night-before change of heart highlighted by “see Obama, I’m Not Going to Run for President, 103 About Face L. Rev.” Some jokes were well targeted: “As you folks all know, I am extraordinarily mature” was followed first by a reference to Chicago—“There I discovered I was black, and I have remained so ever since”—and then an election jab: “some folks may think I’m crazy for appointing a bunch of conservatives to the masthead, and others may think I’ve been co-opted.” His rationale appeared too: “Obama, But They Did the Best on the Test, in Democracy and Distrust (3d irasc. eds. 1990).”

Peter Yu was indicted for using “unintelligible jargon” and calling people “jerkface,” while Barack was teased with “Obama, Hey, How’s It Going, Folks?” with “folks” meaning “you still don’t have to learn their names.” He was complimented for “a series of articulate and startlingly mature interviews,” while Christine Lee was zinged with “see Lee, Bearing My Fangs, L.A. Times.” University of Chicago Law School professor Michael W. McConnell, author of the forthcoming May issue’s lead article on the “Free Exercise of Religion,” was criticized for “Freely Exercising His Vacation,” and other authors were mocked for either insistently rejecting or passively accepting all editorial changes. The Revue concluded with a back page “Doers’ Profile” of Barack, modeled on a well-known whiskey ad. Barack’s age was given as “extraordinarily mature” and his latest accomplishment was “Deflecting Persistent Questioning About Ring on Left Hand” that he had worn for years. “Quote: ‘Engage, empower, smoke Marlboro.’ Profile: Shy, awkward, insecure. Not interested in politics.”

At the banquet, Peter Yu and Barack offered remarks before turning the podium over to Professor Galbraith. Barack’s comments echoed his speech at the BLSA event six weeks earlier. He again said his election was not simply about him, and he mentioned sitting on Gannett House’s porch with a friend who was the son of a white southern sharecropper—Rob Fisher. Jorge Ramírez, a 3L, was astonished. “My jaw dropped on the ground—the guy spoke extemporaneously, absolutely no notes.” Treasurer Lisa Hay felt it was “an incredible, moving speech,” “just the most moving speech I’d heard from any speaker at that age.” Lisa’s boyfriend and husband-to-be Scott Smith was also there, and Lisa remembered that “after Barack’s done, he kicks me under the table and says in a loud whisper, ‘It’s a good thing you didn’t win!’” Lisa watched as the black waitstaff were “slowly picking things up so that they could listen” to Obama, and how they joined in the applause at the end, with one waiter going forward to shake his hand.<sup>37</sup>

While Barack was juggling his Review job and his course load, some students refocused on the fall’s political battles over faculty diversity and Dean Clark’s disregard for public interest lawyering. In February, when the school announced that a young African American male would join the faculty in 1991 after completing a clerkship with Justice Thurgood Marshall, Obama told the Crimson it was an “encouraging sign,” but BLSA president Tynia Richard pointed out that there were still “no black female professors.” The public interest controversy was equally intense, with Clark facing what the Crimson called “heated questioning” at an early-March forum with several hundred law students.

In early April, eighty protesters twice occupied the dean’s office in overnight sit-ins, and as student energies swelled, Derrick Bell said he was stepping down from active teaching until a black woman was named to the school’s permanent faculty. A front-page New York Times story reported Bell’s move on the same day that student protest leaders scheduled a noontime rally outside the Hark, where Bell would publicly announce his departure. Some participants noted “how not involved” the law school’s best-known minority student was, and Mark Kozlowski perceived “a certain degree of bitterness amongst black students who said Barack was not sufficiently black.” Ken Mack recalled that there was “huge criticism” of Barack for his absence from protests, but Ken understood Barack’s concern that protests over faculty diversity could “actually end up harming the people we’re trying to help” because professors might begrudge the calls for minority hiring.

Only in retrospect did protest leaders like 2L Linda Singer realize that “we were asking the law school to change something that they would never concede in the face of student demands.” Kozlowski believed Barack’s nonparticipation “quite frankly took not a small amount of courage at the time.” But with Bell’s announcement drawing national news coverage, protest leaders asked Cassandra Butts to help recruit Obama. Linda Singer and her colleagues wanted both “the power of his speaking” and “the symbolism of his role.” Barack offered “our little movement a star quality and a credibility that we didn’t have,” and BLSA president Tynia Richard agreed that they needed “the highest-profile guy to participate.” The diversity coalition included the law school’s nascent gay students group, and gay 2L Morris Ratner agreed with Singer about “the star power” Barack could bring. “He became more than an individual, he became a symbol, the minute he became president of the Harvard Law Review.”

Butts was successful, and as hundreds of law students gathered outside the Hark a little before noon on April 24, Paolo Di Rosa, who knew Obama from Section III, found himself standing next to Barack. In earlier times Obama and Di Rosa, whose dad had been tortured by Paraguayan dictator Alfredo Stroessner’s regime before going into exile, had “compared notes about our respective fathers,” but on this day, when Di Rosa turned and said he hadn’t seen Obama in the gym lately, Barack “didn’t really even respond.” That was unlike him, but Di Rosa realized “he was just in a zone,” and only when the proceedings got under way did Di Rosa see that Obama was going to speak and had been “preparing the speech in his head.”

A variety of protest signs dotted the crowd of seven hundred: “Where Are Our Tenured Black Women Professors?” “Is the United States 95% White and 91% Male? HLS Faculty Is.” “Come Out of the Ivory Tower.” “Harvard Law School on Strike for Diversity.” Derrick Bell arrived with BLSA president Tynia Richard and was greeted with light applause. As TV cameras recorded the scene, Obama, wearing a light blue dress shirt and tan pants, stepped forward to introduce Bell. He recalled the scene almost two years earlier, when “the black law students had organized an orientation for the first year students, and one of the persons who spoke at that orientation was Professor Bell, and I remember him sauntering up to the front and not giving us a lecture but engaging us in a conversation, and speaking the truth.” Barack went on to say he had carried Bell’s words “with me ever since. Now how did this one man do all this? How’s he accomplished all this? He hasn’t done it simply by his good looks and easy charm, although he has both in ample measure.” Richard and others laughed at Obama’s poetic praise. “He hasn’t done it simply because of the excellence of his scholarship, although his scholarship has opened up new vistas and new horizons, and changed the standards of what legal writing is about.” Applause began. “Open up your hearts and your minds to the words of Professor Derrick Bell.”

Bell stepped forward and the two men hugged. Years later, Bell recalled, “I was surprised he was there, I was surprised that he spoke,” because Obama had had almost no contact with Bell during his two years at Harvard. Bell began his own prepared remarks with a self-deprecating compliment. “It may be significant that the student stands here and delivers a mighty address without notes, while the teacher”—Bell paused as laughter built. Listeners agreed with Bell’s description. “It was a spectacular speech,” Paolo Di Rosa recalled, and made with “no notes whatsoever.” Like Bell, Law Review 3L Micki Chen was “so struck that the student was so much more eloquent” than a noted professor speaking from a text. “That day is really seared in my mind.”

Bell said he was “removing myself from the payroll as a sacrificial, financial fast” since “I cannot continue to urge students to take risks for what they believe if I do not practice my own precepts.” He noted that the law school had 107 black women students, yet not one African American female on the permanent faculty. Bell also declared that “the ends of diversity are not served by persons who look black and think white,” a remark that offended many listeners. Nathan Diament, Obama’s occasional basketball teammate, remembered “that was the moment when I said to myself, ‘This guy just lost me.’” Most of the crowd believed the insult was aimed at younger black law professor Randall Kennedy, who a year earlier had published a powerful, well-received critique of race-centered legal arguments including Bell’s recent work. Later that day a “visibly upset” Kennedy confronted Bell, who denied intending a personal insult. In the Crimson, a 3L said that Bell’s comment “represents intolerance in its purest form. It establishes an orthodoxy of thought, and Blacks must embrace it or else face excommunication for their ‘white’ views.” As the rally wound down, a letter from Dean Clark was read expressing respect for Bell but saying his departure was not “an appropriate or effective way to further the goal of increasing the number of minorities and women on the faculty.” The Boston Globe reported that “students hissed as the remarks were read,” and after the rally 150 students marched through the law school’s campus “yelling ‘Wake up, wake up, wake up, Dean Clark, wake up.’”

The next morning Bell and Tynia Richard appeared on CBS TV’s national news show, and Richard spoke of her experience attending Harvard as a black woman. “I had six professors in my first year, all of whom were white and all of whom were male.” As the year progressed, “none of the issues of race and gender or sexual orientation were being addressed in the classroom.” She poignantly added that “I take out $20,000 a year in loans. They make five times” that amount or more.

But Obama’s tender introduction of Bell marked the end of his involvement in the law school’s student protests. Two weeks later, when Jesse Jackson visited the law school to speak at a far smaller rally and meet briefly with a reluctant Clark, Barack was not visible in any of the television footage. As Rob Fisher knew, Barack had “just zero interest” in campus disputes. “He was interested in real politics with real people.”<sup>38</sup>

There was no let up in intensity at the Law Review as the spring semester neared its end on May 7. The June issue, the last of the academic year, was still in process, but a trio of decisions had to be made regarding content for the 1990–91 year. Each November’s Supreme Court issue featured both the prestigious foreword plus a faculty case comment, with the Articles Office taking the lead in selecting the former and the Supreme Court Office the latter. In addition, several highly problematic article submissions by untenured Harvard younger faculty were being worked on, with 2L Michael Weinberger having spent much of the spring dealing with a manuscript from African American professor David Wilkins. Some months earlier the Review had lost out on a submission “we loved” from Robin West, a 1979 graduate of the University of Maryland Law School who had joined the faculty there in 1986 after several years at the Cleveland-Marshall College of Law. The University of Chicago Law Review had beaten Harvard to the punch, and West’s highly regarded “Jurisprudence and Gender” had been their lead article, a signal honor, particularly for someone whose academic pedigree came from midrank public institutions rather than Harvard, Yale, or Chicago. New Articles cochair David Goldberg had rued that loss, and was now pressing for West to author the foreword for the upcoming November issue. Only once before had a woman, Harvard’s own Martha Minow, authored a foreword, and with some trepidation the 2L editors ratified Goldberg’s choice.

West received an unexpected phone call from Obama extending the Review’s offer, but West’s “first reaction was ‘Nope, can’t do it,’” because she had just had her first child. Barack was nonplussed. “People don’t really turn this down,” he told West, and gradually he convinced her to accept, telling her she could write anything she wanted. Review tradition meant that Obama, as president, would be her primary editor. West was intrigued by Václav Havel, the new president of Czechoslovakia. “I wanted to write about authenticity and personal responsibility for authenticity,” and Obama was entirely encouraging. West would have to submit her complete manuscript no later than August, but the upcoming volume’s most prominent commitment was now nailed down.

Far more difficult were manuscripts that had been submitted by two of the law school’s most popular young teachers, David Charny as well as Wilkins. David Goldberg’s 1L section had had both professors, and Charny in particular had impressed Goldberg as a “brilliant, brilliant guy” and “just an amazing teacher.” Neither manuscript was anywhere near as impressive as their authors, yet Review editors knew that refusal to publish either young scholar’s article could prove fatal to their hopes for promotion and tenure. “The articles process was supposed to be a blind process,” 3L Articles cochair Gordon Whitman had told Goldberg and other 2Ls, but Whitman fully appreciated how “the tension on Law Review is always what comes through the back door and what comes through the front door.” Goldberg and the 2Ls thus inherited “a significant issue” concerning the two “really problematic” Wilkins and Charny manuscripts. “The question was, ‘Is there a special rule for Harvard faculty?’” i.e., a lower bar than external submissions faced. Goldberg confronted the issue straightforwardly, and “that’s one of the few things I ever really talked about with Barack in a formal” way. “Based on what they were sending over to us, if they’d sent that out it wouldn’t have been accepted anywhere remotely comparable and it would have been really bad for them” both, Goldberg explained. “I felt we had to temper our principles for a little humanity,” especially because “both of them were people who I liked and respected.”

Obama did not object to Goldberg’s stance, but 2L Scott Siff took the lead in arguing that a double standard favoring Harvard professors over everyone else was untenable. Wilkins’s manuscript was the more problematic of the two, for “If this had come in over the transom, it wouldn’t be one that would meet our normal standards,” Siff recalled, and indeed “it wasn’t one that was even ‘Well, it’s kind of close to our normal standards.’” In addition, “it was a particularly charged thing because of his being African American,” and everyone on the Review agreed on the “need for more diversity on the faculty.” Supreme Court Office cochair John Parry remembered that “you could hear shouting through the door” during “impassioned” Articles Office meetings, but over the course of the spring, a consensus emerged that for Harvard junior faculty submissions, the question would be “Does it embarrass the Law Review?” That was “the standard we agreed on for faculty tenure pieces and nothing else,” Goldberg explained. “Don’t embarrass the Review.”

One week before spring classes ended, a controversy far more vitriolic exploded when a number of left-wing editors objected to the Supreme Court Office’s decision to invite former solicitor general Charles Fried to write the November issue’s faculty case comment. Office cochair Brad Berenson had championed Fried’s selection, and both well-liked liberal cochair John Parry plus other editors in the office had willingly agreed. But Jean Manas, Christine Lee, and Christine’s closest friend on the Review, Mike Froman, with support from David Goldberg, angrily protested giving this honored role to someone who had been the Reagan administration’s top Supreme Court advocate. Parry was summoned to Obama’s small office on the top floor of Gannett House, where he was confronted by Froman and Manas. “They were mad,” and “I was definitely blamed: ‘How could you let this happen?’” Parry remembered. “Mike in particular seemed really mad,” and “there was pressure brought to bear.” Barack’s role was “relatively passive,” but “I certainly felt like I was on the spot.”

Someone proposed that liberal Harvard professor Kathleen Sullivan be paired with Fried in a duo of comments, and Parry agreed to put that before the Supreme Court Office. That pairing would then be submitted to all the 2L editors for approval, but Berenson was furious at what he thought was an abuse of process. “There was no real precedent for the rest of the body second-guessing the major decisions that the offices made,” but even adding Sullivan was not enough to satisfy critics’ complaints. With thirty-seven voters, excluding Obama, eligible to cast paper ballots, an inconclusive tally resulted when six 2Ls did not participate. “The result was 18–13 against the proposal,” but due to “a presumption in favor of approving the proposal of the Supreme Court Office,” any nonvoters were “counted as yes votes,” resulting in a 19–18 outcome, a summary memo reported.

John Parry strongly recommended reopening the matter and inviting all interested 2L editors to offer suggestions. “We have to avoid blowing this into a controversy that will split both the office and the Review beyond working ability,” he told Berenson. Parry believed the balloting reflected “the uninspiring combination of Fried and Sullivan, and the question of voice inclusion,” and presciently observed, “I think that a different pairing of Fried with a person of color would satisfy the vast majority of 2Ls” and perhaps everyone.

The infuriated Berenson was also worried because the controversy was delaying the issuance of invitations to Fried and whomever else. Deeply frustrated, Berenson told Parry “to do whatever Jean & Christine want. The Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles could write for all I care.” On May 4, a resolution was reached to pair Charles Fried with Patricia Williams, an African American associate professor at the University of Wisconsin. Parry thought that Barack had remained “a bit detached” from the entire controversy, and both Fried and Williams accepted the invitations.

Like Parry, the graduating 3Ls likewise perceived a relative detachment by Obama during his first three months. Unlike some editors, he did not spend the better part of each weekday at Gannett House, and more people remember him out in front, smoking, because it was not allowed inside. “I thought he was incredibly cool,” Radhika Rao recalled. “He had a charisma to him,” and she remembered chatting with him and Rob Fisher on Gannett House’s porch. “He was often with Rob,” and he would use his small top-floor office mostly in the evenings. “I remember Barack being a late-night person,” Barbara Schneider recalled. “His feet would be up on the desk and he’d be smoking,” irrespective of Cambridge’s city ordinance. Debbie Brake thought Barack seemed “super-cool, super-collected. He had the aura of leadership about him.” Brian Bertha believed Barack had “an unusual level of gravitas” and seemed “very skilled at forging a consensus.” The day-to-day running of the Law Review was mainly in managing editor Tom Perrelli’s hands, and he was “a nice person and a hard worker,” Christine Lee recalled. “No one else had that combination.”

Erwin Griswold responded to Obama’s letter about the May issue by commending the Michael McConnell article as “very good” but, at 111 pages, “much too long.” Griswold praised the annual, five-student “Devo” on “Medical Technology and the Law” as “one of the best Developments in my memory,” but when Griswold saw the June issue, his normal dyspepsia returned. He liked neither the sole article nor an underwhelming five-contributor “Colloquy” responding to Randall Kennedy’s article a year earlier. “Sometimes I wonder how much of it is actually read and useful,” Griswold wrote Obama, “and whether they will be remembered even five years from now.” Indeed, the most striking item in the issue was an eight-page critique by Radhika Rao of former federal appellate judge Robert H. Bork’s jeremiad The Tempting of America, which savaged the U.S. Senate’s 1987 rejection of his nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. Obama’s “P-read” on Rao’s essay had been “cursory,” and rightly so, because a quarter century later it would remain a powerful and insightful appraisal. Noting the book’s “sanctimonious anger,” Rao chastised Bork for his “refusal to confront the political choices implicit in originalism” and emphasized how “Bork’s doctrine of selective stare decisis . . . marks the same kind of departure from objectivism that he decries in other contexts.” Her final line—“In a world where objectivity and neutrality are dead, the faith that Bork professes turns out to be hollow”—was followed by a footnote that represented a coda to the year’s entire eight issues: “Having begun with an essay heralding the rebirth of constitutional science”—Larry Tribe’s physics essay—“this volume of the Harvard Law Review ends, perhaps too appropriately, with a Book Note reaffirming the death of constitutional theology.” Erwin Griswold, no raving liberal, wrote to Obama that Rao’s piece was “fair and persuasive,” and two decades later Ken Mack remembered it as “the best thing in the volume.”<sup>39</sup>

Before heading to Chicago for the summer, Barack had to confront his end-of-semester exams.

Taxation was a looming problem. Dan Rabinovitz remembered that “Barack was so busy with Law Review he maybe went to one or two classes.” Dan knew Barack “was incredibly thoughtful about how he spent his time,” but this seemed risky, especially for someone who, like Rob Fisher, wanted to graduate magna cum laude. Rabinovitz had attended every class and “took copious notes . . . so at the end of the semester, I made a copy of my notes, and I gave them to Barack.” Alvin Warren’s three-hour in-class, open-book exam posed four questions, and Rabinovitz, sitting near Obama, had written perhaps one-third of an exam booklet when he saw that Obama, even with his tiny handwriting, had already filled almost an entire one. Dan appreciated that Barack was “extraordinarily intellectually gifted,” but only after grades were issued did that fully sink in. “He got an A in the class,” Rabinovitz learned. “I did not get an A in the class.”

Gerry Frug’s all-day Local Government Law take-home posed just one question, with answers limited to two thousand words. Frug’s question was utterly remarkable because it cited classroom comments made by one particular student: Barack Obama. Frug began: “In an article of mine entitled ‘The City as a Legal Concept,’ I argued as follows,” with six paragraphs reprinted. “In a recent article, Professor Richard Briffault has provided a very different picture” regarding suburbs, and Frug provided four paragraphs. “Write an essay critically discussing these contrasting views of local government law,” and analyze “a specific issue that will illuminate the extent of city and suburban power in America.” Students could choose most anything, “or you could discuss the following issue, one that was raised in a class discussion in March. In March, a member of the class”—Barack—“argued that there were two fundamentally different strategies that African-American communities now living in large American cities could adopt to better their social and economic conditions. On the one hand, he argued, members of the community could stay in the city, organize together to gain political control of the city government and, once this was achieved, mobilize city power and resources to begin to combat problems such as unemployment, crime, homelessness, and drug addiction. On the other hand, he said, community members could abandon the inner city, integrate suburbs and other prosperous areas, and thereby destroy the kind of inner-city environment that, some contend, fosters the kind of problems mentioned above. Given the arguments advanced by Professor Briffault and me, what impact does local government law have on these alternative strategies?”

Frug’s question told the students to discuss as many specific doctrines of local government law as possible, but anyone with experience in higher education can appreciate how astonishing it was for a student taking an exam to see his own classroom comments comprising a significant portion of the test. Frug recalled two decades later, “Never before and never again have I ever referred to a student in an exam. It was a real statement . . . of his impact on the course, that I did this.” Rob Fisher had prepared carefully for the exam, and followed his and Barack’s “rule that you find the three intellectual tricks the professor likes” and include them in your answer. “I also wrote the word ‘folks’ a lot, and I got a very high grade,” Rob explained. He got an A, as did Barack.

Before driving west to Chicago, Barack stopped in Manhattan to meet Jane Dystel, the literary agent who had telephoned him three months earlier. “We talked. He was attractive, charismatic, passionate about public service. I told him there was story interest” on the part of publishers, “but, despite liking the idea, he said, ‘I can’t even begin to write this until I graduate law school,’” Dystel later recounted. Barack’s recollection was that Dystel “really didn’t know anything about me” apart from his presidency of the Review. She hoped he could write “a memoir” that would be “a feel-good story” about his success at Harvard, but Barack downplayed the significance of his law school experience. “My life’s a little more complicated than maybe what you would anticipate,” he told her, but he agreed to draft a descriptive proposal over the summer. It would address “the theme that I’m interested in, which really doesn’t have too much to do with Harvard” and instead involved family and race. Dystel came away from their talk thinking that Barack “suggested three parts: childhood, law school, and the search for his father,” but Barack had little interest in writing about law school.<sup>40</sup>

The view from the Chicago Skyway in early June 1990 had changed little from five years earlier, but now Barack knew the landscape that whizzed past him. What had changed this time was that his destination was not Hyde Park, but Michelle Robinson’s family home at 7436 South Euclid Avenue in South Shore, where he would spend the summer with her and her parents. Fraser Robinson was still two months shy of his fifty-fifth birthday, but the ravages of multiple sclerosis left him dependent on two arm-fitted crutches at home and at work. Barack had envied the Robinson family’s stability and Chicago roots since first meeting them a year earlier, and he envied too that Michelle’s father was “a great family man,” in such huge contrast to his own father.

With Michelle at Sidley, where she was now overseeing the summer associate program, and Barack’s summer job at Hopkins & Sutter less than a block away, each weekday the young couple headed downtown to the Loop. Just as he had the previous summer, Barack also regularly drove down to 95th Street to see Jeremiah Wright. “When I went back during the summers, I’d go back and visit Trinity. The Rev and I, my pastor, became very close,” Barack later explained. Another day in mid-June, he drove out to suburban Oak Brook to speak as one of “McDonald’s Black History Makers of Tomorrow” at the food chain’s Hamburger University, along with twenty-five-year-old Jesse Jackson Jr., who was about to begin law school at the University of Illinois. Just a few days later, Michelle was devastated when her closest friend from Princeton, Suzanne “Suzy” Alele, died of cancer in suburban Washington at the age of twenty-six.

Like Sidley, Hopkins & Sutter was “very highly regarded,” Sidley’s Geraldine Alexis explained, and along with Sidley, it was one of Chicago’s top two large firms when it came to minority hiring. Hopkins had two African American partners, both 1979 Harvard Law School graduates: Elvin Charity, who had interviewed Barack six months earlier, and Albert Maule, who would die of cancer just five years later at age forty. Obama’s Review presidency meant he was now “a big deal” and indeed “a celebrity” at both Hopkins and Sidley, where he would return for a brief one- or two-week stint later that summer.

Sidley’s top partners were still exceptionally interested in luring him to the firm once he finished Harvard, and they strongly advised him to pursue a Supreme Court clerkship. But to both Newton Minow and Gerry Alexis, just as to Sheryll Cashin previously, Obama said, “I just don’t have the time to do that.” Alexis told him he was “crazy” not to clerk, and “we went back and forth on that” before Alexis gave up. “I wanted him to take the right career steps,” but in their conversations that summer Barack “made it clear he wanted to go into politics” and may have mentioned “becoming governor of Illinois.” Someone teased him that he was “not going to become a governor in Illinois unless you get an apostrophe after the O,” for an Irish O’Bama, but Alexis expressed dismay that someone with such illustrious career possibilities in law would instead choose politics. “He just looked me straight in the eye, and he said, ‘Well, Gerry, somebody has to do it.’ . . . I was very impressed by that.”

Early that summer the progressive Chicago Reporter conducted a survey of minority employment at the city's private law firms. Sidley and Hopkins & Sutter fared the best, and the Reporter interviewed Obama. He stressed the particular difficulties black students faced in a profession where many young lawyers were unhappy. "Because they don't have the support networks or because their abilities may be questioned due to racism," African Americans often feel "under the gun," but he also said, "It's a great time to be a young black law school graduate—if you're from Harvard and in the top quarter of your class. But the point is that there are a lot of talented young minorities who may not have been able to go to the top schools . . . due to financial constraints." Firms needed to look beyond "the most prestigious schools" and realize that students of color with "the intelligence and the energy to do terrific work" could be found at state law schools too. The Chicago Tribune reported on the survey results, and Obama made the same point there. "I think there are a lot of excellent minority law students who have families that can't incur a $25,000 debt for a law school education. So they don't go to nationally ranked schools."

At least once that summer, Barack did a training for Jerry Kellman in Gary, and Kellman met Michelle for the first time when he stopped by the Robinsons' home in South Shore. Some time that summer, Obama also had lunch with David Brint, a young housing developer who had called him at the Law Review after reading one of the profiles in which Obama said he wanted to pursue community development work in Chicago. Brint was one of three officers at Rezmar Inc., a year-old low-income housing development company, and at a second meeting, Brint introduced Barack to his two colleagues, Dan Mahru and Antoin "Tony" Rezko.

Rezko had an interesting life story. Born in Aleppo, Syria, in 1955, he had arrived in Chicago at age nineteen to study at the Illinois Institute of Technology. Even before completing a business management degree, Rezko began working for Crucial Concessions, a food service company owned by J. Herbert Muhammad, whose late father Elijah had been head of the Nation of Islam and who was well known as boxing champion Muhammad Ali's manager. In 1985 Crucial made Rezko general manager of the newly reopened South Shore Cultural Center (SSCC), a former country club that the Chicago Park District (CPD) had acquired a decade earlier.

A profile in the Hyde Park Herald described Rezko as "a gentle-mannered, soft-spoken gentleman" who "always is on hand to supply the menu and beverage lists" and who stressed that 60 percent of SSCC's employees and two-thirds of its patrons were black. The Herald soon questioned why a company with "no catering experience and no facilities to prepare or transport food" had won the food service contract at SSCC, and the CPD cited Herbert Muhammad's "good name in the black community" as reason enough. Crucial and Rezko were actually subcontracting out all of the SSCC's food service, and from 1987 through 1989, the Herald ran a trio of stories citing "frequent complaints about the service and quality of the food" as well as high prices. At SSCC, Rezko met Daniel Mahru, an attorney whose Automatic Ice company supplied both cubes and machines, and in 1989 they joined together to create Rezmar. Mahru saw Rezko as "a humble, hard-working immigrant success story," as did Brint, and while Rezko's connections would help Rezmar, nothing came of their summer 1990 conversation with Obama.

The Harvard 1Ls who wanted to join the Law Review had spent the first week of June completing the five-day writing competition. Treasurer Lisa Hay had organized the exercise, and its substantive portion asked contestants to analyze Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, in which the Supreme Court had upheld the constitutionality of a state statute prohibiting the use of company funds in political campaigns.

“Corporate wealth can unfairly influence elections,” Justice Thurgood Marshall had written on behalf of a six-justice majority including conservative chief justice William H. Rehnquist. At Gannett House, Susan Higgins had mailed out the 286 entries to 3L editors scattered around the country. As the 2Ls’ scores came back, Higgins also obtained the GPAs that would be used to determine which additional members of the 1991 class would be invited to join the Review as grade-ons.

By mid-July, Obama was telephoning his high-achieving classmates. Several accepted right away, but almost everyone had to weigh the loss of three weeks’ worth of summer pay. “I debated not doing it,” Darin McAtee recalled before accepting. But Leonard Feldman, whom Barack knew from 1L Section III together, politely refused the costly honor.

But the writing competition results for the 1992 class produced a troubling disparity: women as a group had scored significantly below men. While the thirty-six new 2L editors would include five African Americans, just as in the 1991 class, the gender breakdown showed twenty-seven men and only nine women. There was nothing that Lisa and Barack could do, and on July 23 three dozen invitation letters from Obama went out in the mail.

Almost every recipient had already received a phone call from Barack or a 3L editor they knew. Obama’s letter warned that the Review required “generally 30 to 40 hours a week” and would be “a big part of your life over the next two years.” He acknowledged the “financial sacrifices” imposed by “coming back early” but claimed that “Review work is more creative, and often more challenging, than second and third year classes.” He optimistically cited “the camaraderie that you develop with your classmates” and advertised Gannett House as “a friendly on-campus ‘base’ where you can relax, read newspapers, get breakfast.” Work on the upcoming November Supreme Court issue, which the Supreme Court Office editors had already outlined, would be “particularly interesting” given the Court’s 1989–90 decisions. New Review staffers “must arrive in Cambridge” by midday Wednesday, August 16, and should call Barack at either Sidley or the Robinsons’ home number immediately if they had not already conveyed their acceptance.

Before returning to Cambridge, Barack and Michelle went to Washington, D.C., to attend his brother Roy Abon’go’s early-August wedding to his second wife, Sheree Aleta Wood. Roy’s split with his first African American wife, Mary K. Cole, had occurred several years ago, but only in mid-July had he finally filed for divorce, and a judgment would not actually be entered until well over a year after his second wedding. But this wedding was the greatest Obama family gathering ever. Kezia flew from Nairobi to Washington, and Ann Dunham arrived from Honolulu.

Ann had been hurt and dismayed when the profiles of Barack six months earlier had omitted her almost entirely. Ann’s relationship with Made Suarjana remained a bright spot in her life, but she still struggled with her UH dissertation. This Washington gathering was the first time Barack Obama Sr.’s first two wives had ever met, and Barack’s sister Auma, who attended as well, was overjoyed at how the two women immediately bonded. “They were sitting close together, holding each other’s hands, reliving the wonderful times they had spent with our father and assuring each other what a great man he had been,” Auma recounted. “Two women who came from completely different worlds clearly still loved him even after so many years.” Barack stood up as Roy’s best man at the ceremony, and then much of the extended family followed Ann and Maya to New York City for a celebration of Maya’s twentieth birthday.<sup>41</sup>

Back in Cambridge, Barack presided as the 3L editors welcomed the new 2L members to the Review.

Work on the November Supreme Court issue was well under way, with most 3Ls assigned to author a case note on one or another of the 1989–90 rulings, but the May imbroglio over Charles Fried was far from forgotten. When Mike Froman and Christine Lee, two of the most vociferous complainants about Fried, arrived in Cambridge several days late, Supreme Court Office cochair Brad Berenson formally proposed that the Review remove or otherwise punish them. “Everyone else had had to leave their jobs early and come back and start working,” Berenson remembered, and only in highly unusual circumstances were exceptions allowed.

Jean Manas launched an angry rebuttal, and the newly arrived 2Ls watched as the 3Ls savaged and insulted each other. Carol Platt, the sole conservative among the nine 2L women, remembered “thinking ‘Okay, this is about them coming back late, but this is also about so much more . . . this is not really about this, it’s about things we don’t even know about.’” Lori-Christina Webb, a 1986 Bryn Mawr graduate who had taught for three years in the South Bronx before entering Harvard and becoming one of the five black 2Ls on the Review, immediately realized “there’s all these tensions.” Despite Obama’s sunny letter, she could see that the Review “was not a very welcoming environment,” and this leadoff debate set the tone. “The coming back late is not really about coming back late, but we don’t know what the subtext is because we’re brand new, but there’s always a subtext, and in the end the subtext is always political, it’s always us against them.” The tenor demonstrated that “there was a license to be disrespectful of one another . . . that was very shocking to me.”

Anger about the duo’s tardiness was not limited to the Review’s conservatives. Liberal Michael Cohen told Obama it was unfair, but Barack responded coolly, “Some people do the minimum, and others do more.” Cohen walked away thinking that Obama was “fifty years older than me in terms of his maturity and equanimity.” The meeting of all the editors to debate Berenson’s motion got quite heated, although Obama made no attempt to shut down the debate. Daniel Slifkin, a 3L, found it all “ridiculous,” especially when someone suggested fining Froman and Lee. “It all struck me as very, very silly,” as no one actually had any fining power, and Slifkin wondered why Obama let it go on well into the evening.

“We had no clue what was going on,” 2L Sean Lev recalled, and fellow new editor Charlie Robb quickly realized “how weirdly political and angry” the unpleasant exchanges were. “The meeting went on forever, and I had no idea where all this angry energy was coming from.” Robb was five years older than his classmates, and his friend Trent Norris, another new 2L, was also older, having taken three years off before law school. Norris recalled that Obama presided while “never disclosing his viewpoint on this—not a hint of it.” Robb also felt Obama manifested “a very cool demeanor,” even when the argument turned to a dispute about how the vote should be taken.

Bruce Spiva, an African American 2L, remembered that “there was this huge question of whether people should vote with their heads up or whether they should put their heads down.” A vote on that penultimate question favored semisecret heads down, and eventually Berenson’s final motion, to censure Froman and Lee rather than drop them, was defeated. Norris remembered “walking out of that meeting and thinking ‘God, what a mess. What have I gotten myself into?’” New 2L Howard Ullman recalled “a palpable sense of divisiveness and polarization,” with Gannett House often so tense that “various folks would not talk to other folks.” Michael Cohen remembered “Christine getting a lot of friction when she came back and feeling really unwelcome.” Lee could not believe Berenson had been serious, and “I was mad at Barack for even allowing it—he could have just squashed the whole thing,” or so she thought.

“After that, Froman and I just have nothing but contempt for Barack,” she recalled. “We hated Barack together.”<sup>42</sup>

Obama’s cool disinterest in his colleagues’ angry passions contrasted with his warmer one-on-one demeanor, even toward the Review’s undergraduate work-study students. Senior Paul Massari had worked at Gannett House ten hours per week, including summers, ever since his freshman year, but he was “just really struggling” that August because he had no idea what to do post-graduation. Sitting on Gannett House’s front steps one lunchtime looking miserable, Massari was joined by Obama, who “sat down and lit up a cigarette and just kind of talked to me and asked me what was going on.” Massari said he was embarrassed by feeling unready for graduate school, and Obama talked about how “he had taken a bunch of time off” and had done fine. “He was very kind to me” and having his validation “really helped me a lot.” Another undergraduate worker, Lois Leveen, also remembered Barack as “incredibly personable and engaging,” with an “ability to connect with people” and a “responsiveness that felt genuine,” even if he always did address any group of editors as “folks.”

In addition to the controversy over Froman and Lee arriving late, Obama had two health-related issues to confront. New 2L editor Jeff Hoberman had spent the summer in Caracas, Venezuela, and within two weeks of returning to Gannett House, Hoberman was diagnosed with hepatitis and sent home for a month. In an excess of caution, Obama decided that everyone at the Review had best receive painful gamma globulin injections at University Health Services. When Hoberman returned, he was repeatedly greeted with: “We got shot in the butt because of you.”

More problematic was how Patricia Williams had contracted Lyme disease while spending the summer on Martha’s Vineyard, leaving her unable to meet her deadline for the case comment that was to be paired with Charles Fried’s in the November issue. This reignited the warfare from months earlier, with Brad Berenson’s conservatives arguing that “she didn’t meet the deadline: she’s out,” while Williams’s proponents wanted to give her more time and include a note in the November issue that her response to Fried would appear in the next issue. That led to another “very acrimonious debate” about where in the November issue the reference to Williams would appear. Different participants came away with different feelings about Barack’s role in the process. Brad Berenson saw him as “a pretty honest broker, someone who genuinely understood and empathized with the views and perspectives of both sides.” He “gave everybody a fair hearing” and “tried to do something sensible, in the best interests of the publication” while “maintaining harmony among a very fractious group of editors.” Yet most of Berenson’s conservative allies viewed Obama “as essentially two-faced, as telling everybody what they wanted to hear, making everybody believe that he agreed with them” while in the end always coming down on the left.

Christine Lee was not the only liberal 3L who regretted supporting Barack for president. Masthead meetings took place at 8:00 P.M., and they could go on for hours, often featuring the same sort of bickering that had occurred over Williams. Liberal Susan Freiwald remembered being called by SE Jean Manas before one meeting and being warned that Obama was not going to be on their side. “You’ve got to watch out! Barack’s not going to be totally on our side!” Manas “was just up in arms. ‘This is terrible! I thought we won!’” Freiwald was more irritated by Barack’s infinite tolerance for his colleagues’ long-windedness. “Barack, I need to go home before midnight. It is not safe for me to walk home in the middle of the night. You need to limit people. . . . If this isn’t over at 11:00 P.M., I’m leaving no matter what. I’m not sacrificing my safety for these blowhards.”

Not having Williams’s comment was not the only problem with the November issue. Robin West, writing on a tight deadline while coping with her first infant, submitted her manuscript on time, although even she realized it was not as good as her previous article. At Gannett House, the 2Ls sub-citing her piece were dismayed. Bruce Spiva remembered one evening “Barack coming in to check on the new people . . . ‘How’s it going, folks?’” and Bruce vented about West’s manuscript. “This is in awful shape. We ought to tell these professors that they shouldn’t turn in stuff like this. This is just unacceptable. We’re having trouble finding what she’s talking about, and it’s poorly written.” Just as with Michael Cohen’s earlier complaint about the late arrivals, Barack downplayed the problem and told Bruce, “You just kind of have to get used to this” while “giving us a pep talk” about how they should not take the Review too seriously. “Don’t worry about it, Bruce. Nobody’s going to read it.”

West found Barack thoughtful and polite. “Every time he called,” she remembered, “he asked how the baby was doing” and was Robin getting enough sleep. Barack was “very sensitive,” a “quite unusual” trait in law review editors. Barack was “very gracious about the edits” and “knew this was burdensome” for her. “He did not have sort of typical left-progressive views on identity politics,” West realized, and while “he was always very formal on the phone,” eventually “he started calling me Robin.”

Before classes began, Obama spoke at a BLSA orientation event for African American 1Ls. Artur Davis, a magna cum laude graduate of Harvard College, remembered being struck by Barack’s “extreme sophistication” and thought “he was either going to be a Supreme Court justice or a political figure.” Tom Perrelli, who as managing editor was Barack’s closest Review coworker, believed Barack was “the most fully formed person I met” during three years of law school. “He seemed to be a pretty much fully formed grown-up,” SE Julie Cohen agreed, “and you would not have said that about most people” on the Review. 3L Devo cochair Marisa Chun likewise thought Barack “was a fully formed adult by the time he was on the Law Review,” someone whom others looked up to as “wiser, more mature, more worldly, because he was.” Sean Lev thought Barack was “extraordinarily impressive,” and fellow 2L editor Jonathan Putnam agreed that Barack was “incredibly impressive,” indeed “the most impressive person I had ever met in my life.” Conservative 2L Carol Platt believed Barack “did a good job at projecting this image of being the adult in the room,” and manifested “an absolutely preternatural self-confidence,” but he “was just never that invested in” the Review itself. “You just got a sense that he didn’t give a damn about too much.”<sup>43</sup>

For fall classes, Rob and Barack, like most of the 3L editors, enrolled in Charles Fried’s Federal Courts course. Fried used the traditional Harvard text, Henry M. Hart Jr. and Herbert Wechsler’s The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 3rd ed., and the course examined federal jurisdiction, habeas corpus, and civil rights actions that could be brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. §1983, which dated from the Reconstruction-era Enforcement Act of 1871. Obama’s basketball buddy David Hill remembered that Barack “enjoyed sparring with Fried, and Fried enjoyed sparring with him.” The students thought Fried was an excellent professor, and once it became clear that despite his service as Reagan’s solicitor general, he was no “Republican apparatchik,” the festering controversy about his Review comment quickly faded. The class met for two hours in the morning, twice a week, and Fried took a short break halfway through. Gannett House was close enough that Review editors could dash there and return with a bagel, donut, or muffin. The muffins were especially popular, and, as 3L editor Lourdes Lopez-Isa remembered, were “huge, like the size of your head.”

ME Tom Perrelli recalled that there was no question that “muffin flaunting” took place. A year earlier, when it had become known who had made Law Review and who had not, those results, even more than 1L grades, painfully challenged Harvard students’ “sense of shared eminence,” as Robert Granfield explained. There was no denying that Review membership elevated editors above their classmates, and access to these luscious goodies distinguished the super-elite from the also-rans. It was as if “the rest of us didn’t count,” recounted Section III veteran Michelle Jacobs. “The rest of us sat there” while the Review members returned with their pastries and munched away as class resumed. But one morning Fried asked, “Why do certain people have these muffin thingees? Where are all these lovely muffins coming from?” And, most memorably, “Can I have a lovely muffin? Who can bring me one?” By calling out “the chosen few who got the bagels and the muffins,” Christine Lee recalled, “he put it out in the open.”

Editor Dave Nahmias, a 3L, was in Fed Courts and wondered “why we were spending our money to buy breakfast for the Law Review.” Nahmias thought the law school’s “poisonous and elitist” atmosphere was not helped by the editors’ conspicuous consumption. “The Law Review people are not particularly popular with a lot of the other law students,” and their “lording of this benefit” over their classmates rubbed many people the wrong way. “There had been grumbling before,” 3L editor Chris Sipes remembered, “but it really reached a pitch after Fried commented on it.” The “bagel war erupted,” and “this was a riven issue,” Brad Berenson drily observed. A full-body meeting was called, with Obama presiding. Nahmias moved to eliminate the morning spread, though not the evening snacks, because at night editors were actually working on the Review. Only a few people sided with Nahmias, but at one point Barack unintentionally brought the discussion to a halt by using a word—“precatory”—that no one in the room understood. “C’mon, folks,” Barack responded, explaining its usage. “He always said folks,” 2L Sean Lev recounted. ME Tom Perrelli spoke up to encourage editors not to consume the fruits of their privilege in front of less fortunate classmates, and Nahmias’s motion was overwhelmingly defeated. “People liked the perk, and nobody cared if everybody else in the law school thought they were a bunch of elitist jerks,” Nahmias explained. But at least in Fed Courts, Perrelli’s advice was widely ignored. “Someone always had to bring donuts to Professor Fried,” Michelle Jacobs remembered. “He ended up with donuts every day.”

Barack and Rob debated taking Corporate Taxation before deciding against it. Rob’s economics background drew him to Antitrust, which Barack passed on so he could take a Kennedy School of Government course on persuasion and politics taught by the well-known political scientist Gary Orren. Barack and Rob also enrolled in a once-a-week seminar, Civil Society, that Mary Ann Glendon, whom they had had for Property, was offering in conjunction with Martha Minow and a third professor, Todd Rakoff. Much of the semester would be spent listening to guest speakers, but they could use the seminar as a basis for an additional two-credit independent writing project that would give them the opportunity to pursue an idea they had been discussing for more than a year: to coauthor an intensely analytical book examining several present-day policy problems and critiquing overly ideological approaches to them.

The Glendon-Minow-Rakoff seminar began with four weeks of readings. “They tried to teach us very quickly sociology,” 3L Eric Posner explained. They began with some of Thomas Hobbes’s Leviathan plus an excerpt from British philosopher Dorothy Emmet’s 1966 book Rules, Roles and Relations. Further readings from Émile Durkheim, Karl Marx, and Max Weber were followed by classes with Catholic labor activist Monsignor George Higgins; feminist ethicist Carol Gilligan, well known for her 1982 book In a Different Voice; social critic Alan Wolfe discussing Richard Rorty; and Anthony Cook speaking about liberation theology. Each week students prepared two-page papers reacting to the assigned readings, but Posner recalled that the course “didn’t work” and the three professors “understood it didn’t work.”<sup>44</sup>

The sudden retirement of Supreme Court justice William J. Brennan added additional work for the Review’s November issue. Traditionally, after every justice’s departure from the court, the Review published a series of brief appreciative tributes, and 2L Jennifer Collins took the lead in quickly commissioning a half-dozen such pieces. Justice Thurgood Marshall and Judge Abner Mikva led off the feature, which occupied the issue’s first thirty-nine pages. Two contents pages then detailed the Supreme Court material: West’s foreword, “Taking Freedom Seriously”; Fried’s comment, “Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC: Two Concepts of Equality”; and twenty-seven separate case notes of about ten pages apiece, each written by a different editor. At the bottom, in the smallest type possible, was the note “An additional Comment on Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, by Professor Patricia Williams, will appear in the December 1990 issue.”

A huge wall chart in the office shared by ME Tom Perrelli and the three executive editors tracked the editing process for the November pieces, and Barack actively shepherded many of the case comments. Kevin Downey was tackling Cruzan v. Director, a “right to die” case that had attracted great attention, and Downey’s long final footnote included a quotation from Leo Tolstoy’s The Death of Ivan Ilyich: “In fact, the most profound moments of Ivan’s life occur when others would prefer that he be relieved of his suffering.” Downey remembered that “Obama really wanted me to take it out,” and they wrestled over it for some time before Downey prevailed. Obama also took an active role in 3L Frank Amanat’s note on Rutan v. Republican Party, an Illinois case in which the Supreme Court had ruled forcefully against partisan political patronage in public sector hiring. Amanat believed it was “a great decision,” but a fellow 3L editor “had a real problem” with Amanat’s analysis and “I took umbrage.” Their disagreement became “an intractable problem” and “I took it to Barack,” who “asked me to work it out and asked Tom to mediate.” Perrelli persuaded Amanat to make some changes and got the other editor to back off. “That’s an example of Barack’s management style” as Review president, Amanat explained. “He always took a very problem-solving attitude.”<sup>45</sup>

Almost weekly that fall there were student protests over faculty hiring as well as charges that a large law firm that interviewed annually on campus had engaged in discriminatory behavior at another school. Cassandra Butts was again in the lead, but most students did not pay the protests much attention. “It’s gotten to the point where they’re protesting everything,” 3L Chris Lu told the Crimson. Then the Women’s Law Association, having learned that only nine of the Review’s thirty-six new 2L editors were women, called for the Review to expand its affirmative action policy. Obama told the Harvard Law Record that editors believed the imbalance was simply “an aberration,” and on the issue of expanding affirmative action, “I don’t have a clear sense of whether it’s needed or not.” Historically everything at Harvard was “somewhat discriminatory,” Barack said, but he encouraged more women to enter the writing competition, regardless of “this year’s blip.” The WLA pushed back, complaining that it was “even more deeply disturbing if the people running Law Review don’t care enough to correct it.”

Temperatures rose exponentially when Jim Chen, the most combustible of the Review’s 3L conservatives, wrote to the Record to lambaste the WLA's position. "The mere presence of affirmative action cheapens membership for every editor who falls within the existing groups," and advocating expansion simply "affirms the invidious belief that women and other 'beneficiaries' of affirmative action can't compete on a level field." Citing an experience when an interviewer asked him whether the Review's existing policy included Asians, Chen wrote that "I felt the stigma" of that question and called for everyone to "eliminate affirmative action root and branch."

WLA leaders declared they were "completely livid" at how the Record's initial story had simplified their views while also taking offense at Chen's remarks. Another full-body meeting was convened at the Review to discuss the situation, with the 3L editors' positions unchanged from nine months earlier. Affirmative action opponents were most angered by the Review's policy of operating in complete secrecy, with the president and two other editors exercising what Brad Berenson called "totally unchecked discretionary power."

At the Review, 3Ls and 2Ls recognized a consistent pattern in Barack's style as presiding officer, whether the argument was about editors' tardiness, muffins, or affirmative action. In Berenson's eyes, "Barack tended to treat those disputes with a certain air of detachment and amusement. The feeling was almost 'Come on, kids, can't we just behave here?'" Obama always seemed "a little bit separate and apart from the fray, observing events from a slight emotional and intellectual distance," Berenson believed. Even Jim Chen felt that Obama "was very savvy, a good listener," someone who "always left the impression that he heard you out." Michael Cohen thought that Barack "did have a real talent for conciliating these disputes," and Marisa Chun would recall "less about his own opinions than the fact that he was masterfully able to make sure everyone else spoke their piece." African American 2L Nancy McCullough said, "I can't think of a particular issue that I can remember him feeling strongly about" and reflected that she "actually would have been happier for him to say sometimes, 'This is how we're doing this, and shut up!'" rather than letting everyone argue for hours. Lourdes Lopez-Isa agreed that with Barack, "You would never know what he thought about things." Ken Mack recalled, "I never saw Barack lose his cool, get angry, have a fit of temper, raise his voice. . . . He was a very cool character, a very cool customer in all senses of that word."

On affirmative action, Obama wrote a letter to the Record, explaining that the writing competition entries were graded by at least three editors. The Review's policy simply said that the officers "may take race or physical handicap into account . . . if" they believe that will "enhance the representativeness of the incoming class," should the raw scores make that desirable. In response to Jim Chen, Obama described himself "as someone who has undoubtedly benefited from affirmative action programs during my academic career, and as someone who may have benefited from the Law Review's affirmative action policy when I was selected to join the Review last year." However, 2L Jonathan Putnam recalled that among fellow editors "it was a fact in wide circulation that Barack himself had not checked off the box on the application." But Barack wrote, "I have not personally felt stigmatized either within the broader law school community or as a staff member of the Review. Indeed, my election as President of the Review would seem to indicate that at least among Review staff . . . affirmative action in no way tarnishes the accomplishments of those who are members of historically underrepresented groups."<sup>46</sup>

Barack and Rob Fisher were still playing basketball regularly, and 3L editor Julius Genachowski recalled one day when Barack "showed up to Law Review with a broken nose," wearing "a pretty serious white bandage thing.” Rob remembered another time when some “really obnoxious guy . . . was right in my face yelling at me” and then “Barack was immediately in the middle, stopping it, calming everybody down.” On election night 1990, Barack invited a number of friends—Rob, Julius, and the outspokenly conservative Brad Berenson—to his Somerville apartment to watch the returns. That quartet often played poker together, with Rob explaining that Brad “was definitely a friend,” notwithstanding their differing political views.

Berenson remembered how “Barack was rooting very hard for Harvey Gantt” in a hotly contested North Carolina race, and photos from that night show Barack wearing a “Harvey Gantt for U.S. Senate T-shirt.” Gantt was a highly promising African American Democrat with a nationally touted future who was challenging incumbent Republican Jesse Helms, whose atrocious record on race included die-hard opposition to a federal holiday celebrating Martin Luther King Jr.’s birthday. But the evening ended badly, with Helms eking out a narrow 52 to 47 percent victory after investing heavily in a television ad that made an explicitly racist appeal to working-class whites: “You needed that job, and you were the best qualified. But they had to give it to a minority because of a racial quota.”<sup>47</sup>

Barack was so busy that fall he failed to send Erwin Griswold the traditional letter introducing the November issue. Even so, Griswold found it “very fine” and said it was “a marvelous performance.” He especially enjoyed the tributes to Justice Brennan and thought Robin West’s foreword was “interesting, though sometimes a little ethereal.” Griswold took a much dimmer view of the comment, writing that “Fried’s view is not only too rigid and mechanical, but represents such a narrow vision that it is quite unrealistic.” Even before Griswold weighed in on November, the December issue went to press, notwithstanding a late-night computer crash that led Barack to call 3L techie Frank Amanat to ask him to return to Gannett House. At “2:00 A.M., I finally get the system up and running,” Amanat remembered, and a trio of exceptionally difficult pieces—David Charny and David Wilkins’s articles, plus Patricia Williams’s comment—were finally off to the printers. Multiple Law Review colleagues recall Barack investing more time and energy in the Wilkins article than in any other piece to date, but Wilkins remembered interacting with Jim Chen, one of the EEs, not Barack. Obama took some interest in Williams’s comment, which Supreme Court Office cochair John Parry had to protect from critical comments inserted by Patrick Philbin, one of the 2Ls working on the edit. “Barack had to preside over all this bickering,” Parry recalled, and conservative EE Amy Kett was impressed by Barack’s P-read on the Williams piece. “He seemed to be very hardworking” and was also “a very good manager of people.” The December issue also included an eight-page case note by 2L Jonathan Putnam, who remembered that Barack spent “a whole weekend day, with him painstakingly, and painfully for me, going through line by line what I had written.” Putnam thought this was “a lot of his energy to expend on what in the scheme of things was a tiny part of the editorial product.”

Somewhat tardily, Obama sent several copies of the November issue to Justice Brennan, along with an unusual cover letter that described the impact Brennan’s 1987 NPR interview had had on him. “I recall harboring considerable doubts about leaving my grass-roots work to become a lawyer—I felt concerned that too often the law served the interests of the powerful, and not the powerless. In the midst of my internal debate, I was fortunate enough to hear your interview,” which “helped to convince me that legal practice could in fact be a worthwhile pursuit.” More recently, he wrote, as a law student he had read a “countless” number of Brennan opinions, and he had been impressed by the justice’s “unwavering commitment to ‘the little guy,’ the underdog, and the less fortunate. Your blend of ‘reason and passion’”—a phrase Brennan had championed in a well-known 1987 lecture—“has been a source of inspiration in the development of my own legal ideas.” Citing his status as “an African-American who a generation ago might not have even attended Harvard Law School, much less served as the President of its Law Review,” Barack acknowledged “the debt that many of us owe to you in helping America to live up to its ideals of opportunity for all its citizens.” Brennan replied that he was “most grateful to you for the kind comments,” and Barack not only kept Brennan’s letter to him but had it framed.

Obama was also involved in contract negotiations for the new edition of The Bluebook with the law journals at Columbia, Yale, and the University of Pennsylvania, which cosponsored publication of Law Review’s widely used cash cow. Harvard had a 40 percent interest in the enterprise and was performing an overwhelming majority of the work being done on the new edition. Ken Mack and Frank Amanat were leading the Review’s effort, but the Yale Law Journal had exercised its right to demand a new contract. The Law Review was a sizable business, with annual subscriptions bringing in approximately $300,000 a year. That alone produced a modest operating profit, but The Bluebook generated more than $500,000 annually, with a profit of close to $200,000. That paid for much of the salaries of office manager Dodie Hajra and circulation director Mary DiFelice, as well as those warm bagels and larger-than-life muffins. An arm’s-length quartet of external trustees—the law school’s dean plus two professors and an alumni “graduate treasurer”—formally oversaw the Harvard Law Review Association and received annual audit reports. The president traditionally delivered copies of each issue to the trustees, including Richard Parker, Barack’s 1L Crim Law teacher, who recalled no problems whatsoever arising during Obama’s presidency.<sup>48</sup>

In mid-November Barack and treasurer Lisa Hay went to New York City for a contentious renegotiation session that resulted in the other three journals using their 60 percent majority interest to insist upon a 7.5 percent reduction in the Review’s share of The Bluebook’s annual net profit. In Cambridge, some conservative editors grouched that Obama had been too pliant a negotiator, but Barack had something more personally significant on his mind during his trip to Manhattan. A month earlier, Jane Dystel, the literary agent whom he had met with in May, had agreed that the book proposal they had been crafting since midsummer was now ready to submit to publishing companies. Dystel, no shrinking violet, had been impressed by her exchanges with Barack. “I liked his authoritative voice,” she recalled years later. “He was so focused. Mature, really together, already sure of himself. Not your typical kid. No question whatsoever he was going someplace.”

The proposal, entitled “Journeys in Black and White,” self-confidently compared the story Obama would tell to no fewer than eight commercially successful books, most of which had been published in the early and mid-1980s. “The texture and spirit of the writing will derive from the tradition of the autobiographical narrative, typified by such works as Maya Angelou’s I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings, Maxine Hong Kingston’s The Woman Warrior, John Edgar Wideman’s Brothers and Keepers, Wole Soyinka’s Ake, Mark Mathabane’s Kaffir Boy, and Russell Baker’s Growing Up, as well as such travelogues as William Least Heat Moon’s Blue Highways and V. S. Naipaul’s Finding the Center. Such works take on the narrative force of fiction, and invite the reader to share in the hopes, dreams, disappointments and triumphs of individual characters, thereby soliciting a sense of empathy and universality that is absent in too many works on race in America.”

Among the editors to whom Dystel submitted the proposal was Elaine Pfefferblit at Simon & Schuster's Poseidon imprint, an editor Dystel often approached. Two months earlier, Pfefferblit had hired a new young assistant, Laura Demanski, and she was tasked with reading the proposal and a brief sample chapter and recommending whether it had merit. Demanski's October 25 report to Pfefferblit could not have been more enthusiastic: "This proposal is very impressive. Barack Obama is uniquely qualified to write what promises to be a big book about race issues, particularly black-white relations in America today. . . . His observations and reflections come from experiences both here and in Africa," as the book would recount Barack's 1988 trip to Kenya. "Obama has an unusually broad perspective," and "even better, he analyzes his experiences and presents his ideas unusually clear-headedly."

Demanski wrote that Barack "seems to work with feeling and intelligence" and said his "plans for the book are concrete and well-organized . . . the sample chapter demonstrates an impressive skill at weaving detailed personal narrative with reflective and analytic passages, at honing in on specific characters or incidents and then panning out gracefully to place these within the big picture." Demanski believed Obama was "clear about what he wants the book to avoid being—confined to the anecdotal and shying away from discussion of wider events, on the one hand, but also sacrificing intimacy and inadequately capturing the 'private demons and sources of inspiration that lie at the heart of the race issue.'"

Demanski's enthusiasm was soon shared by Pfefferblit, as well as by Poseidon's publisher, Ann Patty, a well-regarded book-business figure whose list of titles the New York Times praised as "funky, unpredictable, low on marquee authors, rich with new talent." By the time Barack stopped by Poseidon's offices in mid-November, both Patty and Pfefferblit very much wanted to sign up "Journeys in Black and White." In person, Barack was "very bright and very personable and very charming," and Demanski remembered that "we were all really impressed." In retrospect, Ann believed "there must have been other people bidding on it," and she remembers authorizing Pfefferblit to offer $125,000 to acquire the rights. "We did take risks like that," Patty explained, and that sum was much higher than what a twenty-nine-year-old first-time nonfiction author normally could hope to receive. With the initial payout of $40,000, Barack could take a full year after graduation to write the book. The balance, half payable on submission of a complete manuscript and the remainder upon publication, would more than cover the tens of thousands of dollars in student loans Obama had incurred while attending Harvard. Less than two weeks later, on November 28, Poseidon issued the contract. Barack's due date was June 15, 1992.

Back in Cambridge, Barack was visibly ecstatic about this news. Michael Weinberger, who had done yeoman work for months on the David Wilkins article, invited Barack home to have dinner one evening with him and his wife, to whom he had said, "this guy's going to be famous" as "an important politician." Dinner was nothing fancy—spaghetti with three sauces—but the normally circumspect Barack could barely stop burbling. "He had just gotten a book contract," Weinberger recalled, and "a lot of the talk had to do with the agent." All in all, Barack "was pretty excited about it."<sup>49</sup>

Before classes ended, the editors had to get the unusually thin January issue—only 150 pages—off to the printer. The sole article dealt with antitrust law; a twenty-page student note by Christine Lee, which Erwin Griswold found "stimulating," addressed employment discrimination against black men; and a review considered Chris Edley's new Yale University Press book, Administrative Law: Rethinking Judicial Control of Bureaucracy. With the semester about to end, Barack and Rob had to finish a detailed outline of the lengthy paper that was due to Martha Minow that spring and which they hoped could become a coauthored book.

“Transformative Politics,” or “Promises of Democracy: Hopeful Critiques of American Ideology” reflected remarkable aspirations and envisioned three major sections. The first would explicate a trio of topics: “How Has the American Left Failed?,” “How Has the American Right Failed?,” and “The Shared Assumptions of the Left and the Right.” The center of the book would be three analytical chapters. “Plant Closings—The Viability of the Regulated Market” would be followed by “Race—The Limits of Rights Rhetoric” and then “Public Education—Balancing Local Control With Quality Control.” Finally, their conclusion would discuss “The Importance of Democratic Dialogue.”

Barack and Rob’s outline was remarkably substantive and provides significant insight into how more than two years’ worth of almost daily debates had shaped their thinking about a great many social and political questions. The first chapter, on the failures of the American Left, cited a “Lost Faith in Democratic Discourse” and targeted “Rudderless Pragmatism—a refusal to articulate principles that can guide debate and create lasting coalitions.” Echoing John McKnight, it also indicted an “Expertist Ethos,” an excessive “belief that the judiciary is the principal arena for social change,” and an “insistence on bureaucratic centralization.” There was also “A Failure to Understand and Use the Market” as “a tool for decentralization of power” and as “a potential promoter of equality.”

The failures of the American Right began with its “lack of faith in collective action,” its belief that “we are all self-contained units,” and a “lack of faith in the possibility of progress for the masses.” An “institutional fetishism” led to a “failure to see the variety of ways that ‘civil’ society in fact acts to structure oppression, hegemony of the dominant culture, etc. (the classic example being the assumptions underpinning Plessy).” Third was a “Failure to Recognize the Market’s Destructive Power,” most especially “persistent underinvestment in . . . human capital.”

The first of their topical chapters, on plant closings, would confront how the “complete mobility of capital” could, as it had in Southeast Chicago, lead to the “destruction of community and family” while also emphasizing how “corporate managerialism cannot take into account these externalities.” Long-term solutions would require “worker participation and ownership” and “restructuring the corporate form” due to “the costs of defining corporations as persons under constitutional analysis.”

In the second chapter, on race, they would address “the limits of the assimilationist vision” that had reigned during “the Golden Days of Civil Rights.” It would acknowledge “the incompatibility of group redress with received constitutional understandings” and how “the language of rights” is “too blunt a tool to capture the complexity of social relations” because “rights don’t require compromise or mutual understanding.” It would also argue that “the equation of racial liberation with government centralization, bureaucracy, judicial intervention” means ignoring “the fundamental strengths of the black community—self-reliance, religious cohesion, community support, family.” This chapter would propose “Terms for the New Debate” that would shift “from rights to responsibilities” and also involve “a reexamination of integration.” A “potential restructuring of political dialogue around leveraging resources into black communities because they are poor” would not ignore how “industrial development that means jobs for blacks may also mean environmental problems that hit blacks hardest.”

The final topical chapter, on public education, would confront how “the legacy of racism and skewed resource distribution promotes [the] idea that only a single, unified school system run by bureaucratic experts and controlled from the top can ensure equality of opportunity.” The entire outline was informed by Barack’s experiences in Chicago, and in the education context, Barack and Rob rued the exit of the “wealthiest parents” and “the most informed, participatory parents and innovative teachers” from declining public school systems. A further threat was vouchers, because “having the best parents exit . . . further erodes [a] basic commitment to public education.” The way forward would entail “community ownership of schools” and “a recognition that schools are inseparable from communities.” It would also require “a consensus built around equalization of resources, not equalization of teaching.”

Barack and Rob seemed to have their conclusions already well in hand. “The rigid choice between individual and state has spawned a variety of false dichotomies that continue to plague the existing political debate,” with neither side “capturing the reality of the problems facing today’s society.” In addition, “the importance of democratic dialogue” would be “the critical medium through which this transformation will take place. The quality of our deliberation determines the extent to which we can simultaneously maintain our faith in individual development, idiosyncrasy, and our faith in our capacity to act collectively.” In a concluding note to Martha Minow, Barack and Rob added that “we are still in the process of making some choices about how to boil down the structure of the book idea into the paper. We suspect that . . . we may not be able to do everything outlined here. For example, we may deal with only two examples, rather than three.”<sup>50</sup>

On November 20, three deeply committed 2Ls took the lead in organizing the most audacious student protest yet when, in the name of the HLS Coalition for Civil Rights, they filed a lawsuit in state court alleging Harvard Law School had personally harmed them by not hiring a more diverse faculty. Almost simultaneously, Harvard-Radcliffe Alumni/ae Against Apartheid (HRAAA), a five-year-old group that had already elected four of its candidates, including world-famous South African archbishop Desmond Tutu, to six-year terms on the university’s Board of Overseers, tried to recruit three more well-known names to run in the upcoming 1991 alumni election. When several “famous people” declined, the group asked Obama to be a candidate, and after thinking about it for forty-eight hours, he agreed. Joining him on the HRAAA’s slate would be well-known free speech advocate Nadine Strossen and prominent education critic Jonathan Kozol.

On Friday morning, December 7, Barack’s 3L basketball buddy Frank Harper was on the Boston subway heading to Harvard Square when he saw a front-page Boston Globe headline: “Recent Parolee Is Charged in Assault-Weapon Killing.” The story reported that three people had been shot, one fatally, in Boston’s Dorchester neighborhood by a forty-year-old gunman wielding an AK-47 assault rifle. Just twenty-two days earlier, the killer had been released on parole after serving almost the entire previous fourteen years in Massachusetts state prisons, including Walpole. The slayer was Ronald A. X. Stokes, organizer of the Walpole All-Stars, against whom Frank and Barack had competed just a year earlier. Stokes's early 1990 assault on a prison guard—far from his first—should have blocked his release, but this time multiple convictions for the Dorchester shooting would keep him in prison until his death in 2010.

Barack faced only one in-class final exam, for Fried's Fed Courts course, before he flew to Honolulu, where Michelle Robinson again joined him for Christmas. But Barack had to return to Cambridge by New Year's Day because the law school's three-week winter term classes began on January 2. Most 3Ls met their "professional responsibility" requirement by taking a legal ethics course titled Legal Profession, and Barack, Rob, and Gina Torielli, their friend from Section III, enrolled in a winter term section of that course taught by Jeffrey Kobrick, a veteran Boston legal-services attorney who was now a full-time "visiting professor from practice." It met every weekday morning for three hours, and Kobrick used Andrew Kaufman's Problems in Professional Responsibility, 3rd ed., as his core text. Legal Profession addressed real-world "ethical and moral dilemmas" encountered by attorneys.

One centerpiece of Kobrick's class was an ABC News documentary, The Shooting of Big Man: Anatomy of a Criminal Case, first broadcast in 1979 and produced in part by a 1972 Harvard Law grad who had worked as a public defender in Seattle. The film had created a national controversy among public defenders because it showed attorney David Allen coaching his client Jack Jones on what he should say when he was testifying in his trial for the shooting of Raymond "Big Man" Collins in a Seattle flophouse. Jones was acquitted, but some fellow public defenders accused Allen of "unethical conduct." The film ended with Harvard professor Charles Nesson—whom Obama had had for Evidence a year earlier—saying Allen had not been "coaching" Jones, but simply helping his client testify "as effectively as he possibly can."

On the first day of class, Kobrick recognized Barack from earlier press coverage, and he was pleasantly surprised when the Review's president attended every single day. "He would not speak in every class, but when he spoke he had something to say," Kobrick recalled, and "everybody would listen." The day that Kobrick showed an excerpt from Big Man, Obama "spoke last. He spoke after everyone else," and "to a person, nobody defended the Seattle public defender" before Obama did. "They all thought he was coaching the witness too much, and then Barack spoke, very forcefully, in disagreement," and at some length. "I don't agree," Kobrick recounted Barack saying. "First of all, they got his story out of him initially without giving him any leading questions at all. They just asked him what happened.'"

Barack "was extremely specific," Kobrick recalled, arguing that Jones "did not speak the language of an all-white jury." Without Allen's firm instructions about how to describe what had happened, "the guy would have been toast," Obama stated. On the last Friday in January, Kobrick's two-part, eight-hour take-home exam limited each answer to sixteen hundred words. Kobrick's second question, concerning a welfare recipient living in public housing who faced a criminal charge that threatened both those benefits, must have sounded familiar to anyone who had spent time in Altgeld Gardens.<sup>51</sup>

Obama's term as president of the Law Review was almost over as Kobrick's class ended. By early January, the Review's February issue had gone to the printer, but its one article, "Fair Driving: Gender and Race Discrimination in Retail Car Negotiations," by Northwestern University law professor Ian Ayres, was already the subject of New York Times and Chicago Tribune stories plus a nationwide

Associated Press one. Within the Review, Ayres's work had been a topic of dispute because even its most enthusiastic Articles Office proponent, Scott Siff, acknowledged "there wasn't so much law in it" and "the methodology wasn't that good."

Siff had argued successfully that Ayres's "very interesting, provocative analysis" met his "New York Times test for the articles," and there was no question that the article was the Review's "highest-profile piece" during Barack's presidency. The Times headline—"White Men Get Better Deals on Cars, Study Finds"—attracted attention, but Ayres's broader argument, that federal civil rights laws still did not adequately protect people of color and women from discriminatory treatment, was actually based upon just 165 faux sales negotiations at Chicagoland automobile dealerships. Obama told Erwin Griswold that Ayres's article "is a nice change of pace from our more typical theoretical fare," but Griswold was decidedly underwhelmed, calling it "not . . . exactly a blockbuster." Griswold did praise the Review's overall content, telling Obama that "your volume has been an excellent one."

The Times also reported that an enterprising 3L had produced a 1991 "Black Men of Harvard Law School" calendar, archly noting that "so intense was the competition" for inclusion "that even Barack Obama," president of the Review, "did not make the cut," although his friends Ken Mack and David Hill did. Some classmates wondered whether Barack's virtual absence from student diversity protests explained his omission.

Inside the offices of the Review, Obama's final weeks were taken up by multiple controversies and a heavy editing load. One angry debate concerned who among the 3L editors would get the slots for individual notes in the year's four remaining issues. Obama had named Anne Toker to the masthead as a supervising editor without Anne's knowing the unwritten rule that SEs, as editors of their fellow students' work, were not supposed to publish notes, and a nasty editors' meeting took place before Toker's inclusion in the April issue was affirmed. Susan Freiwald remembered that as usual, "Barack was in the background," not taking any clear position, and he took the same stance at a subsequent full-body meeting that debated whether the word "black" would or would not be capitalized in an upcoming article.

Dorothy Roberts's manuscript on pregnant women who were drug abusers had originally used a capital B, but by January, tensions between the EEs and many colleagues were pervasive. Conservative EE Adam Charnes explained, "We viewed ourselves as the guardians of the traditions of the Review," and no one took that mission of rigid adherence to The Bluebook's rules more seriously than Jim Chen. "He loved The Bluebook the way evangelicals love the Bible," Brad Berenson explained. But Chen often altered passages that authors believed had been settled earlier in the editing process, "and some authors would go ballistic." In the case of "black," Lori-Christina Webb and Roberts's other editors had sent the article forward with an uppercase B, and then the EEs made the b lowercase. A lengthy Review-wide debate ensued. "The arguments were so abstract and passionate," Webb remembered, yet by this time in the year, a good many 3Ls and 2Ls were distancing themselves from the Review's endless controversies. To 3L Mike Guzman, "the combination of it being presumptuous and pointless" made "all the fighting" seem like a waste of everyone's time. Guzman viewed Barack as "a good conciliator," and during the most bitter arguments, "I don't remember him ever saying a word." In the argument over "black," Obama once again commented, "Just remember, folks. Nobody reads it."

Three years later, Barack cited the B-in-Black controversy as a notable law school memory. "One of the most frustrating things about student life was I guess what's called political correctness," he explained. “Young people tend to jump with both feet on a whole lot of symbolic issues,” and “when I was the manager of the Law Review at Harvard, I had a young black woman come in to me and complain vehemently about the fact that the word ‘black’ was not capitalized in an article.” A white editor said that since white was not capitalized, neither should black. The dispute was “a matter of symbols, not substance,” Barack explained, and thus had not interested him.

As Barack’s year as president came to an end, conservatives, leftists, and everyone agreed that managing editor Tom Perrelli had been the Review’s MVP. Perrelli was “the figure for us,” 2L Sean Lev remembered, and fellow 2L Jon Molot recalled that “everybody loved Tom.” EE Adam Charnes praised him as “the nicest guy in the world” as well as the person most responsible for keeping the Review on schedule. Perrelli remembered sitting in Barack’s “little cave of an office” going over edits, but most other editors knew that “if you wanted to go talk to Barack or hang around with Barack, you had to go out on the front porch, because he liked to smoke,” Mike Guzman recalled. “He was almost always on the stoop, smoking,” 2L Charlie Robb agreed. Lori-Christina Webb, one of the Review’s few other smokers, joined Barack “on the steps of Gannett House, smoking Marlboros. . . . That is, in my memory, where he’s fixed, not in the midst of these battles.”

Bruce Spiva recalled that Barack “tried to step back from a lot of the day-to-day rancor,” and 2L Howard Ullman felt Gannett House “was not a terribly pleasant place to be because it was so fractious.” Many editors used the exact same phrase—“above the fray”—to characterize Barack’s reaction to the Review’s battles. “He did not seem ever stressed,” Anne Toker remembered, and Adam Charnes thought Barack’s strategy was to “let people argue a lot and see if they work it out,” although if he had been more assertive, “it probably would have saved hours and hours” of time on multiple occasions. One EE recalled having a spirited disagreement with another editor. “We each independently went to Barack, and he said to me, ‘I agree with you,’ and he told the other guy, ‘I agree with you.’” Then the two continued their dispute and were “outside in front of Gannett House arguing when Barack came out. . . . We called him over and said, ‘You said.’” An embarrassed Obama realized he had been caught. As 2L Jeff Hoberman explained about another big argument, “everybody kind of thought Barack was on their side.”

Grade-on Chris Sipe, a 3L, believed “you really saw him gaining in confidence as the year went by,” that Barack “was much more confident at the end of the year than at the beginning.” By January, most 3Ls believed the 2L editors had made the Review even more contentious. Anne Toker felt that “the first year we were all on Review had a nicer feel to it for me than the second year.” Adam Charnes agreed: “There was more of a hard-edged tone on both sides than there was the previous year” and “it got pretty nasty at times.” Most editors thought this was due to the different temperaments of the 3L and 2L conservatives. Liberal Scott Siff thought the 3L conservatives were “a fairly impressive bunch,” while the 2L conservatives were “much more yappy.” With Brad Berenson being “the George Will of the group,” as Charlie Robb put it, the “more polished” 3Ls maintained the respect of those who opposed them. Liberal 3L Michael Cohen remembered “a lot of unpleasantness with the 2L class,” because the 2L conservatives were “an abrasive bunch” who could be “really loud and kind of mean-spirited,” particularly “in the way they talked to people.”

The overall assessment of Barack’s eight-issue year was that he did “a very able job as president” and put out “a very good volume of the Review,” as even Erwin Griswold agreed. Almost everything in the editorial pipeline for the March, April, and May issues came to Barack in the early weeks of 1991, starting with the lead article for March, an analysis of the constitutional implications of government funding of both religious schools and abortions, written by repeat author Michael W. McConnell. Articles Office cochair David Goldberg had championed the McConnell manuscript, notwithstanding some liberal discontent, and the primary editor for it, conservative 3L grade-on Darin McAtee, thought it was a “fantastic” piece of work. The Articles Office believed it could be reduced in length, but editor Kevin Downey quickly realized that “McConnell was not going to accept the article being reduced in size.”

McAtee knew Obama had batted away political objections to McConnell’s argument, and Downey was aware that Barack was investing more time in McConnell than in any other author except David Wilkins. Downey believed Barack “had a very vigorous back and forth” with McConnell that “was somewhat exasperating,” but McConnell came away impressed with what “an usually good editor” Obama was. “We had the opportunity of chatting quite a bit,” McConnell recalled, and Barack “helped me to make it a better article from the point of view of what I wanted it to be. He had some very intelligent organizational suggestions and was just very impressive.”

Student authors found that Obama’s editing touch remained light. Marisa Chun, whose note was running in the March issue, thought Barack was “a really good editor” who “did not overedit.” Scott Siff remembered that Obama “did a lot of work” and made a lot of written comments on his note on international law for April. When they met to discuss it, Barack warned Scott that “you’ve gone so far left you’re not going to be credible.” Instead, “the better way to do it is to take a much more balanced approach, present the ideas on both sides . . . and let the readers get there” on their own. “I thought it was a brilliant perspective,” Scott recalled. The May issue contained the five-part Developments in the Law package on international environmental law, and Obama met with all five 2L authors. Trent Norris’s contribution covered international organizations, and Barack “didn’t seem particularly interested in the topic,” Norris recalled. “I expected more searching comments from him than I got.” His manuscript “was loaded with acronyms,” and Barack asked, “Is there a way to make this look a little more like English?”<sup>52</sup>

The law school had a two-day break before spring classes began on January 30, and Barack flew to Atlanta to take part in the taping of a two-hour African American Summit for the '90s, which Turner Broadcasting would telecast in late February. Other participants on the ten-person panel included NAACP executive director Benjamin Hooks, former congresswoman Shirley Chisholm, and Southern Christian Leadership Conference president Rev. Joseph E. Lowery. Obama waited until the entire first hour had passed before speaking up.

“Whenever we blame society for everything, or blame white racism for everything, then inevitably we’re giving away our own power to some extent, the possibility that we can take responsibility and take action. At the same time, we can’t let the federal government off the hook or the judiciary system off the hook. I mean the fact of the matter is we can take individual responsibility but still mobilize as communities to make the kinds of structural changes that are going to be necessary.”

Eight minutes later, Barack stated that “someone who is using drugs is using drugs because they don’t have hope. They don’t have opportunities, they don’t have jobs, education, some sense of meaning in terms of what they’re going to be doing with their lives. It’s not enough . . . to tell these people to say ‘No’ to drugs, and what you need to be able to do is to tell them what to say ‘Yes’ to, what to affirm.” A moment later, Barack said, “it’s going to be impossible, I think, over the long term to deal with some of these issues until we do tie them to issues of employment, issues of education.” He worried that the Supreme Court might mandate “formally color blind” government policies, thereby ending affirmative action and “sending a signal . . . that enrollment of blacks in universities, colleges is less important, less of a priority for America.”

More than fifteen minutes passed before Barack responded to another panelist’s mention of self-esteem. “Buying in black stores is important, shopping in black areas is important, at some point we all have to make a commitment to live in these black areas. I think the fact of the matter is, and it’s already been mentioned, that middle-class folks have a tendency to move out and . . . that means we take the money out, means we shop in suburban malls, etc., etc., and young people my age, I know, have a great deal of difficulty committing themselves to moving back into these communities and dealing with a whole range of these issues, whether it be health, education, economic empowerment, etc. So one thing I think we do need to think about is geographically how are we living and are we making a commitment to these inner cities. That’s a hard thing to do. It’s a hard thing for us to experiment with sending our kids to public schools as opposed to taking them out and putting them in private schools, but at some point when we talk about leadership, that’s something that we are going to have to think about. That’s something that we are going to have to do.”

Barack quickly continued. “Right now what I hear around this table is the need for some sort of comprehensive political strategy or economic strategy that does get beyond the either/or approach. Two specifics that I keep on hearing is we still tend to be caught up in a division between either it’s-all-government’s-fault or it’s-our-fault. Either blame the victim or blame white racism. It’s clear that in our discussion both of those things are going to have to operate if we’re going to come up with a strategy.”

Barack paused only briefly before making his final contribution to the broadcast. “The second thing is, this whole issue of integration versus segregation to me seems to be a nonstarter. It’s clear that we can develop productive communities on our own. It is also clear to me that we’ve got a complex, interdependent economy, a complex, interdependent society that on the one hand we want to make sure that young black males have a lot of pride and see role models in the schools, at the same time they’re going to have to learn how to read and write and do the same mathematics that a Japanese child does or a white child does if they want to succeed economically. So if we can start getting beyond some of these divisions and look at the possibilities of crafting pragmatic, practical strategies that are focusing on what’s going to make it work and less about whether it fits into one ideological mold or another, I think that would be the most important thing on all these issues.”

Barack’s Summit comments, especially his final remarks, were a clear distillation of everything he and Rob Fisher had been debating since the beginning of their 1L year. “Crafting pragmatic, practical strategies” while ignoring ideological molds was the essence of their sweeping book outline, with echoes of John McKnight—“productive communities”—melding with David Rosenberg’s economic perspective and lessons Barack had learned in Roseland’s troubled high schools. While in Atlanta, Obama also taped a sixty-second Black History Month tribute to pioneering civil rights lawyer Charles Hamilton Houston. After cataloging Houston’s achievements, he ended the brief TV spot by saying, “I’m Barack Obama, remembering Charles Hamilton Houston and celebrating a great moment in our history.”

Back in Cambridge for the beginning of spring classes, Barack, Rob, Cassandra Butts, and Mark Kozlowski all attended the first session of Randall Kennedy’s Race, Racism, and American Law. “Barack entered the class with skepticism about whether it was a good idea,” Cassandra explained, because Kennedy's relentless independent-mindedness had made him something of a campus lightning rod, as Derrick Bell's public denigration of him a year earlier had so egregiously highlighted. Barack feared that the course "was going to be kind of a slugfest, and it took him one class to have that confirmed," Cassandra recalled. "You're just not going to get anything out of this," Barack told her. "They're not going to give Randy an opportunity to really explore the issues and have an interesting nuanced discussion." Rob and Mark stayed in the course, but Cassandra soon followed Barack in dropping it.

On Sunday, February 3, Obama's successor would be elected and his term as president would end. In preparation, the 2L editors discussed adopting a new set of bylaws to govern how decisions were made and "reduce the level of tension at body meetings that results from a free-flow, ad hoc form of procedure," as everyone had experienced. Just like a year earlier, a candidates' forum preceded the daylong election, and when Bruce Spiva asked Barack for pointers about running, his reply was "not to take yourself too seriously. 'Don't worry about it. Have a beer before you go to sleep.'" Carol Platt, one of several conservatives running, remembered that at the forum "the big debate question was, 'What would you do about affirmative action?'" Almost as many editors stood for president as had a year earlier, and with Obama presiding and Tom Perrelli tallying the paper ballots, Sunday's first round of voting reduced the number of contenders to eight. A second round halved that number as the conservatives sought to muster their votes behind the strongest candidates. One possibility, Patrick Philbin, was acerbically criticized by liberals, and in the end, the final choice came down to Bruce Spiva versus David Ellen, whom fellow 2Ls viewed as "very scholarly, very soft spoken, very intellectual." The question of whether the Review's president should be a leader or an editor "was definitely part of the debate," and when Ellen triumphed, more than a few 2Ls believed that "people are reacting to what was lacking in Barack."

Following tradition, Ellen and Spiva waited at Gannett House before Obama and David Goldberg came to get them. Then Goldberg escorted Spiva back to the full body, followed by Obama with David Ellen. Like Goldberg had, Spiva preferred to take on Articles, but when Ellen said he needed diversity at the top of the masthead, Spiva reluctantly agreed to become Treasurer. Carol Platt came in first for managing editor and rebuffed Ellen's request that she instead become an EE. On Monday, Obama had lunch with Ellen and told him not to take the Review too seriously and to keep things in perspective. On Tuesday, when the formal transition took place, exiting ME Tom Perrelli told his fellow 3Ls they needed to continue working on the Review, and before week's end, Obama wrote to Erwin Griswold and introduced Ellen as "a fine young man with an extraordinary combination of intellectual depth and attention to detail." Barack also thanked Griswold for his letters, which he said had "made a difficult job easier."<sup>53</sup>

With this time-consuming and often draining role behind him, Barack sat down for a long interview with the Harvard Law Record. "It's been a good year. I'm glad I did it," Obama said, while acknowledging that "at times it has been a bumpy road." Regarding his own election, "I think that I was part of a trend. I don't think that I was, necessarily, so exceptional. I happened to be there when the Law Review was already going through some changes," as with Crystal Nix and Peter Yu's roles on the previous masthead. "The elections this year prove that the trend continues. I'm heartened by how well minorities did in this year's elections, and how well women did," with Spiva, Platt, and a black female EE, especially given the small number of 2L women. "The elections show that women and minorities are afforded a great deal of respect, that their voices are listened to, that people recognize that they can do a good job, and that they are deserving of leadership positions.” Barack was echoing BLSA’s efforts three years earlier, and also his rebuttal of Jim Chen’s stigma alarum the previous fall, but he pursued his point further. “Our selection process works,” and “I don’t think there is anybody at the Review,” irrespective of their views on affirmative action, “who would question the fact that the editors this year were top-notch.” Privately, some did, but Barack stressed that “I tend to be very much a pragmatist.”

Asked if being president had changed him, Barack replied, “Certainly I have changed. It has been a terrific learning experience for me. The sheer volume of work . . . that you have to do forces you to be a better writer” and “forces you to learn actively rather than passively.” Regarding all the press interest, “the publicity has been instructive in that it forced me to articulate publicly things that I had been thinking about for a long time. . . . I like to think that I haven’t become more cautious in my opinions.” But Barack again downplayed the significance of it all, cautioning that “we are students and thus our ambitions for something like the Review, which has a long tradition, tend to be very modest.” He hoped his year had witnessed “a shift in tone” toward “making the Review a little less hierarchical, pulling in a larger group of editors into the decision-making process,” albeit through many hours of angry arguments. He also hoped editors were “taking ourselves a little less seriously,” and volunteered that “I am skeptical of the idea that it is somehow superior to other activities . . . or other student organizations.” He noted that “the Review has a very short institutional memory” and rued “the tremendous time commitments” it required. “I would have liked the luxury of being more strategic about my tenure” and “able to implement some management changes.”

Lastly, Barack was asked, “where do you see yourself” in five, ten, or twenty years? “Of course, I can’t project twenty years out,” but “I will be spending next year writing a book on issues of race, politics, and race relations in this country. It will be a series of reflections on where we are in terms of race relations . . . drawing on my experiences as an organizer in Chicago, the experiences of my family in Africa, as well as some of the work that I’ve done here at the law school. After that, I will work for three or four years as a lawyer. Eventually, I will return to the public sector, either in government or as an organizer. I’d like to address ways to redevelop inner cities, and how to get corporations to locate in low income areas.”

The Record also published an oddly misdirected critique of the Review, calling it “a profoundly bland, unimaginative, and conformist magazine” that made it “one of the least stimulating experiences available to the contemporary magazine browser.” An irritated Erwin Griswold wrote to Barack noting that the Record had made two glaring errors in its critique, but he praised Michael McConnell’s article on which Obama had worked as “an interesting and rather innovative analysis.” A few weeks later, Griswold likewise expressed great enthusiasm for the year’s “Devo,” saying he was “much impressed by its breadth and depth.”

The major challenge at the Review continued to be the revision of The Bluebook. By the time of the presidential transition, Ken Mack and Frank Amanat had made only modest headway, and Mack and his masthead successor, Trent Norris, alerted everyone to the extent of the forthcoming changes. The anger of the departing EEs over the planned modernizations—including authors’ first names and Floyd Abrams’s First Amendment—was so intense that Jim Chen began preparing a rebuttal, which he would publish in The University of Chicago Law Review, the Review’s archrival. Norris described the previous officers’ “failure to recognize the enormous responsibility we bear as publishers of The Bluebook,” especially considering that “the revenues from The Bluebook support everything else we do.” Chen’s resentful critique declared that “interest group appeasement dominated the revision,” but reviews in other top law journals particularly praised the addition of authors’ first names. “In this age of multiple Smiths, Joneses, and Dworkins, first names help,” especially when “there are more than forty law professors named Smith.”

Perrelli had stressed that 3L editors had to continue working on the Review, but one morning new ME Carol Platt discovered that 3L Monica Harris had taped over her mailbox and appended a note asking Platt to please speak to her before giving her any further work. Both women would remember being “very friendly with each other,” as Harris put it, ever since being fellow undergraduates at Princeton, but now Platt “tore the tape off from her box” and left Harris a note, giving her a proofread, the easiest possible assignment. Fellow editors knew Harris as “a very big personality” but also as someone who was rarely seen in Gannett House, notwithstanding how she had a note scheduled for publication in April. That Harris was African American exacerbated some editors’ unhappiness, since “she was kind of the poster child for the anti-affirmative action feeling that existed among” conservative editors, one 3L recalled.

Platt remembered that “I was nervous” after removing Harris’s tape-over, but Review work was “a zero sum game,” and if some editors did not contribute, the ME would be left with more assignments to distribute among everyone else. Before long, Platt saw Harris and 2L editor Nancy McCullough at the Review’s copy machine, not far from the ME and EEs’ office. “‘Why are you giving Monica work?’” Platt recalled McCullough asking. “Monica told you she didn’t want any more assignments.” Platt replied that if so, Harris should stop using the Review’s copy machine, stop eating free bagels, leave Gannett House, and remove the Review from her résumé. At that, Harris followed Platt into the ME’s office and “Monica kind of nudged me,” Platt recalled, telling her, “‘I don’t appreciate you speaking to me like that in public.’” Platt replied that “I wasn’t embarrassed by anything I was saying,” and then Harris “nudged me again and she said, ‘Let’s take this outside,’” Platt remembered.

While Harris was robust, Carol stood five foot one and barely topped a hundred pounds, but “we go down the stairs, we go outside in front” of Gannett House, and “Monica starts doing the dance of rage . . . and she’s got her finger in my face. ‘You had better take that fucking finger out of my face or I am going to rip it off,’” Platt remembered saying. Harris recalled the confrontation similarly. “I just remember her getting up in my face . . . almost like she was trying to get me to get physical with her. ‘Go ahead. You know you want to hit me,’” Harris remembered Platt saying. From inside Gannett House, both at the first-floor Legal Aid Bureau as well as upstairs, the cry went out: “Oh my god! It’s a catfight at the Law Review!” At the Bureau someone picked up a phone, and as the confrontation continued, “all of a sudden the Harvard police show up,” Platt remembered. “They handled it very nicely. They said, ‘Is there a problem here, ladies?’ Monica was still doing the dance of rage, and I said, ‘Well, yes, officers, actually there is. I am trying to deal with a recalcitrant pool worker.’” That of course meant nothing to the police. Looking back on this years later, Platt wondered, “What planet was I on? That’s what I said.”

Then two or three editors arrived, and Harris walked away. Platt told David Ellen, “If people aren’t going to do their work, I can’t do mine,” but the fracas was over. Then a few days later, Obama approached Platt. “What do you say we go out back and chat?” Barack “had never shown any particular interest in chatting with me” before, and Carol thought, “This is going to be interesting,” as they went to Gannett House’s back steps, which faced away from the law school. “How are things going?” Barack asked. Carol said fine. “You catch more flies with honey than with vinegar,” Barack remarked, and Carol replied, “Yes, but how do you get people to do their work?” Barack’s response sounded a familiar theme: “Why do you care? Why sweat it?” he told her. “It just struck me as so cynical,” and Barack’s demeanor seemed infinitely distant. “I’ve never met anyone who was more impenetrable,” Platt explained. Obama was “one of the most opaque people I’ve ever met.”<sup>54</sup>

One morning in early March, Michelle Robinson phoned Barack from Chicago. Her father Fraser, who recently had had kidney surgery, had collapsed on his way to work and was dead at age fifty-five. Barack quickly flew to Chicago, missing BLSA’s annual spring conference, during which Derrick Bell stunned the crowd by announcing he had accepted an appointment at New York University’s law school. Once Barack returned to Cambridge, he wrote Bell a fascinatingly odd thank-you note, voicing disappointment at Bell’s upcoming departure from Harvard. “Although my general feeling is that the loss will be Harvard’s, and not yours, I do worry that nobody will be able to fill the role of ‘Harvard’s conscience’ that you’ve served these years and that the educational experience of all students will be impoverished by your absence.” Then Barack’s note became even more fascinating:

I may have mentioned this to you before, but it was your presence here that in large part brought me to Harvard in the first place; in reading your treatise the year before I enrolled, I was inspired with the belief that at Harvard, I would meet people like yourself who had a commitment to the struggle for equality and the experience and erudition to translate broad goals into concrete practice. And for all the good fortune I’ve experienced at Harvard, my single regret is that I did not have the opportunity to take a class from you or work with you more closely. Nevertheless, I doubt that I could have maintained my moral compass over the past three years had I not had you there, speaking out and challenging the conventions that we all have a tendency to take for granted.

I’ve tended to take a backseat on some of the student activities surrounding diversity this year, in part because of my position at the Review, in part because of a desire to let the excellent student leadership that has emerged take the lead. Still, I will be working to support any efforts that the Coalition or BLSA plan for the coming months to both bring you back here and bring in more of the folks that need to be here. I assume that the student leaders are in contact with you to find out your feelings on the matter at this stage, but I hope that in the next two months you might find the time to have lunch with me and share some of your reflections on what has happened and what needs to happen in the future.

Years later, Bell would not remember a lunch date taking place, and he did not recall any contact with Barack, except for the younger man’s warm introductory remarks outside the Hark eleven months earlier. A few weeks earlier, a local Superior Court judge had dismissed the faculty diversity lawsuit filed by the Coalition for Civil Rights on the grounds that the law students lacked legal standing to sue, but Barack’s more than two years of distance from the protest efforts was of a piece with his up-till-now lack of interest in developing any relationship with Bell or Randall Kennedy, in the way that he had done with David Rosenberg, Larry Tribe, Chris Edley, and now, in his final semester before graduation, Roberto Mangabeira Unger.<sup>55</sup>

Roberto Unger’s intellectual breadth and depth was truly astonishing, even at Harvard. In 1987 alone,

Cambridge University Press had published a trio of books written by Unger, and their titles—Social Theory: Its Situation and Its Task, False Necessity: Anti-Necessitarian Social Theory in the Service of Radical Democracy, and Plasticity into Power: Comparative Historical Studies in the Institutional Conditions of Economic and Military Success—demonstrate Unger’s range as a critical social theorist. Barack and Rob had taken Jurisprudence with Unger a year earlier, and in spring 1991, they eagerly enrolled in his small and expressly political Reinventing Democracy. Unger said the course would have three themes: “the remaking of certain central institutions,” both governmental and economic; the relationship of that “program of social invention to theories of social change”; and “the significance of this program for the conception and allocation of legal rights.” Unger said his emphasis would be “programmatic rather than analytic, critical, or explanatory,” and that his overarching purpose was “to explore the long-term options open to progressive liberals and democratic socialists in the North-Atlantic democracies.”

Rob remembered that “Barack and I loved” Reinventing Democracy as “a terrific class” taught by “a powerful thinker” who was “intellectually far deeper” than any other professor. Unger “would take you step by step through an argument about the nature of law, the nature of society,” speaking in “these beautifully formed sentences that were almost Euclidian in their clarity.” Steve Ganis, a 2L, felt similarly. Reinventing Democracy was “a phenomenal course” taught by an “incredibly erudite” and “very powerful teacher” who was capable of “speaking in paragraphs.” Punahou graduate Ian Haney López, a 3L, found Unger “very impressive to listen to,” especially since Unger spoke entirely without notes throughout the two-hour, twice-a-week classes. Rob thought Unger was “profound” and “just absolutely brilliant,” although his “hyperanalytical” and “heavy post-Marxist style” made many students nervous and uncomfortable.

Halfway into the semester, two students spoke up and complained that while Unger preached about deconstructing hierarchies, his actual classroom practice placed students in a totally hierarchical relationship to himself. As Steve Ganis remembered, Unger said they made a “very good point,” and he offered to let students teach several class sessions if they were willing to do the work. Then “Obama spoke and said, ‘Well, I think I speak for a silent majority of us here who were okay with the way that the class was going. It’s unconventional, it’s not what we’re used to,’” because Unger lectured at great length rather than questioning students Socratically. “I think we’d like to keep going as this was. We thought that we knew what we were signing up for.” Ganis recalled too that Obama was among a handful of students who asked the most questions, and at times “he drew on his experience from being an organizer,” because in Unger’s class Barack “was the only guy who really had significant experience with the disempowered.”

Unger remembered that his intent with Reinventing Democracy was “to develop an argument as forcefully as I can and then to engage the students in confrontation about the argument” in the manner of a “zealot addressing the skeptics.” Unger recalled that another talkative student that semester, “who always chimed in with Obama,” was George Papandreou, a future prime minister of Greece. Obama “was very engaged,” “appreciative of ideas but cautious about them,” and “conventionally smart.” Steve Ganis believed that “Obama was very impressed by Unger,” and Rob recalled that he and Barack chatted “with Unger for long periods of time.” Unger remembered Barack as someone who combined “a cheerful, impersonal friendliness with an inner distance” and whose “guarded personality” made him seem “somewhat enigmatic and distant.”

Reflecting on Barack’s time at Harvard, Gerry Frug emphasized how “the fact that he took two courses from Roberto is a statement about what he was like as a student. That’s just a statement of where your intellect is.” Beyond Reinventing Democracy, Barack and Rob’s focus that spring was on completing the lengthy paper they owed Martha Minow. In the end, they gave Minow only two of the planned topical chapters in their grand book outline. “Plant Closings: Creative Destruction and the Viability of the Regulated Market” was a hefty 103 pages, and although the well-written paper was—and is—substantively dense and demanding, it unquestionably represented an analytical and political capstone of Barack and Rob’s three years of intellectually intense policy debates.

They might not have matched Roberto Unger’s analytical depth, but the breadth of their sources and citations was impressive. The first paragraph included references to Paul Kennedy’s The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers (1987), Allan Bloom’s The Closing of the American Mind (1987), Samuel Bowles et al.’s Beyond the Waste Land: A Democratic Alternative to Economic Decline (1983), and Barbara Ehrenreich’s The Worst Years of Our Lives (1990). Rob’s background as an economist was evident in their third paragraph’s mention of “a Kondratiev business cycle,” but their policy argument was straightforward:

The Reagan administration added more to the national debt than all previous administrations combined. The gullibility, or at least the wishful thinking, of the American people reached unprecedented heights as they embraced Ronald Reagan’s contradictory promises of more military spending, lower taxes, and a balanced budget. The eighties recovery benefited the “few” far more than the “many.” Distribution of income and wealth became dramatically more skewed.

They went on to cite “the virtual elimination of the progressivity of federal income taxes” as another factor in “the unsettling mixture of economic successes and failures of the eighties.” As they noted in their outline, “the issue of plant closings highlights the tension that arises within our current institutional framework between the desirability of community stability and the need for capital and labor mobility.” Promising a “broader discussion of the evolutionary nature of capitalism,” the paper examined plant closings from neoclassical, Keynesian, and Austrian school economic perspectives. “True experimentalism,” they wrote, “demands . . . that we experiment with the legal institutions that shape the economy,” and Rob later explained that “experimentalism” connoted the “blend of Schumpeter and Popperian epistemology with a progressive slant” that they deployed in their analysis. “The quest is to develop guidelines on how politically progressive movements can use the market mechanism to promote social goals,” they wrote.

Some of their analysis rebutted everything Frank Lumpkin and Jerry Kellman had once championed. “Those who myopically focus upon the destruction entailed by the closing of a plant avert their gaze from the creative half of the story. Plant closings occur because undesired products and outmoded techniques are driven from the market by innovative competitors.” They decried “the impoverished, feudal world we would inhabit if we lacked resource mobility” yet acknowledged that “the unfettered market may result in an ‘over-supply’ of plant closings.”

A clear stylistic shift from one coauthor to the other appeared at the top of page 30. “Capitalism cannot function unless peopled by folks who are honest and fair in their dealings, avoid overreaching, lend a helping hand when it's reasonable to do so, and follow the rules," they—or Barack in particular—wishfully imagined. After twice invoking "moral integument," a little-used phrase first coined in an 1892 magazine essay, they stated that "our moral well-being demands some sense of connection to community." They admitted that "the market does not provide a forum in which an appropriate value might be attributed to community stability" and recognized that "what starts as a snowball of unemployment ends as an avalanche of economic chaos and social despair" and can "cause a permanent capital and labor flight from a region."

Twice quoting Roberto Unger regarding the "non-innovative, risk-averse managerial class," they emphasized that an "overemphasis on the short-run bottom line is probably America's most serious systematic business problem," because in corporations "flatterers and artificers rise to the top. . . . As bold experimentation fades from American boards, others who combine daring investment philosophies with long-term agendas will surpass the United States in technological and organizational leadership." Their use of a quotation from law school dean Robert Clark seemed to belie any loyalty to the protest movement that had demonized him. Yet "there is no reason to believe that the legal status quo is the best in terms of either efficiency or fairness, and it behooves us as a society to continue the effort at improvement and innovation in the legal realm as well as in the realm of the purely economic."

Compared with mass production, "craft technologies have the positive externality of maintaining community." A reference to Youngstown led them to observe that "systemic governmental subsidies to large corporations tend to undermine community itself." Criticizing Joseph Schumpeter's celebration of entrepreneurs, "we reject this 'great man' theory of economic development." Contending that "a dual experimentalism of both economic and legal institutions is necessary," they moved to their twenty-page conclusion and endorsed legislation requiring advance notice of plant closings. Yet "the ultimate answer to plant closings . . . lies in making workers more flexible, and their human capital more transferable," and thus "policy makers should seek ways to increase the capacity of workers to move from one employment to another." Championing their theme that "experimentalism is the key to a healthy economy," they called for "a proliferation of legal forms in which to organize production." That would include ones that "allow for worker ownership and control," and in situations like Youngstown, "where there was massive support for an experiment, the government should be ready to step in and provide an infrastructure as well as ensure fair dealing by the corporation that is departing."

Barack and Rob's lengthy chapter certainly expressed progressive if not redistributive values. "While Yuppies can afford the expensive frivolities provided by The Sharper Image, others receive insufficient nutrition to allow their minds to develop properly." They proclaimed that "the political left should embrace markets as a weapon to wield in the best interests of the people," and Barack revisited his summer 1988 trip to Europe in an unusual riff on supply and demand. "Suppose that on an impulse, I fly to Paris. Having arrived in Paris, I find comfortable accommodation near the Eiffel Tower and have a fine dinner on the Rue Monge. Almost magically, these pleasures await my arrival even prior to my own knowledge that I will pursue them." Reiterating how markets "must be more consciously employed to serve the needs of the people," they warned that "if the American economic debate continues along its current lines with the right celebrating the market and the left resisting, the left's political marginalization will continue."

One unusual passage seemed unlikely to come from Rob Fisher. “The first step to radical consciousness is to realize that the world could be different and that we have the power to make it so. There is a great deal of wisdom in this idea, but also great danger. The wisdom is that it carries us beyond our own individual experience of isolation,” something Barack had long known well. “I envision a jungle-gym made of ropes on which I once played” was another clear personal throwback, but after a citation to Gerry Frug, the paper ended by again underscoring how the Left must fight on the field that was inevitable. “The market is perfectly consistent with greater participation by workers in management, worker ownership, progressive income taxation, state subsidized child care, national health insurance, high inheritance taxes, etc. . . . It is even consistent with governmental ownership of banks.” Their orientation was political, not legal. “The battle is over what kind of market we will have, not whether we will have one. If the Left”—now for the first time capitalized—“does not come to this realization they will be relegated to occasional footnotes in future histories—and properly so.”<sup>56</sup>

Sometime in April, Barack and Rob completed their second, even lengthier book chapter. “Race and Rights Rhetoric” was 144 highly polished pages, seemingly all written in one consistent voice, and not that of a trained economist. “This chapter evaluates the utility of rights rhetoric . . . as a vehicle for black liberation,” because the authors believed that such a focus “has impeded, rather than facilitated” the achievement of “black empowerment.” They observed that “it has become increasingly apparent that the strategies rooted in the Sixties have not led blacks to the promised land of genuine political, economic and social equality,” because once that decade was in the past, “political mobilization . . . ground to a halt as blacks became increasingly reliant on lawyers and professional civil rights leaders and organizations with only minimal institutional presence in local communities.”

Barack and Rob acknowledged how “racism against African Americans . . . continues to exist throughout American society,” which is “an admittedly racist culture.” Indeed, “race relations appear to have made a turn for the worse in recent years, with the growth of intolerance evident on both big city streets and ivy league campuses.” Their footnotes reflected a familiarity with well-known histories such as The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement, Bearing the Cross, and The FBI and Martin Luther King, Jr., and they wondered “whether liberty in America must be fundamentally redefined.” For example, “might we redefine ‘liberty’ under the due process clause to require government expenditures on enhancing the education black children receive in inner city schools,” because there was a “need to centralize public school financing to achieve redistribution on a state wide or national level.” Although “private property arrangements and resulting inequities in wealth and power do not devolve from divine providence,” it was inescapably true that Americans have “a continuing normative commitment to the ideals of individual freedom and mobility, values that extend far beyond the issue of race in the American mind. The depth of this commitment may be summarily dismissed as the unfounded optimism of the average American—I may not be Donald Trump now, but just you wait; if I don’t make it, my children will.”

But “those of us on the political left” often forget “the degree to which coalition and consensus-building among the American electorate has necessarily preceded any major federal program to reform or restructure America’s economic and political landscape.” Therefore African Americans needed to understand how “the indiscriminate use of rights rhetoric in conventional political battles only adds fuel to the suspicion of the average white that all claims of right are nothing more than hypocritical attempts on the part of blacks to disguise their pluralist self-interest in the language of prophesy.” Thus “rights rhetoric will be effective to the extent that it conforms to the aspirations of a color-blind society,” and African Americans should grasp the pragmatic need for “a shift away from rights rhetoric and towards the language of opportunity.” Underscoring the crux of their argument, Barack and Rob wrote that “the American commitment to equality of opportunity, mythical though it may be, offers the most powerful analytic framework for moving beyond the current stalemate. Pushing the logic of equality of opportunity as far as it can go” would best boost black advancement. “Precisely because America is a racist society . . . we cannot realistically expect white America to make special concessions towards blacks over the long haul,” they emphasized, while also acknowledging that “the greatest testimony to the force of racist ideology in American culture is that it infects not only the mind of whites, but the mind of blacks as well.” In the chapter’s concluding pages, Barack and Rob declared that “the energy for change in race relations in America will come from a bolder political vision . . . rather than a bolder legal theory.” That vision would require “framing the political debate in terms of opportunity,” for “the language of opportunity is better suited for the immediate tasks at hand, precisely because it better conforms to the underlying logic of American liberalism.”

The two friends had written a pragmatic call that realism should trump idealism, and Rob recalled how he and Barack had each “intensely edited all parts of the documents,” for it “was very much a product of both of our minds.” Reflecting on what was the most intellectually intense friendship Barack would ever have, Rob saw the two chapters as the culmination of their three years of almost daily interaction. “This belief in the power of rational discourse to find better answers, and the enjoyment we took in that process, was certainly a major foundation to our friendship.”

Martha Minow was very impressed. “This is going to be an important book/work,” she wrote Rob and Barack. While she found their argument “powerful and valuable,” she did have some smart suggestions on how they could improve their first chapter. She thought its organization was “perplexing,” as it needed “some more pronounced structure.” In an unusual thank-you from a law professor, Minow volunteered that “I enjoyed the chance to talk with you and work with you both.” She added that “as I told Rob, I have less to say now about the race section; perhaps we can get together for a meal or drink to talk about the ideas. I think parts of it are just beautiful.”

Minow remembered once going to Barack’s basement apartment for some small group discussion and informal dinner, and she knew that Barack “wanted to go into politics.” For Barack, there was a direct connection between his experiences in Roseland and the arguments he and Rob articulated in their manuscript, where they addressed “the same line of questioning that I had been engaging in as a community organizer: ‘How do we bring about a more just society? What are the institutional arrangements that would give people opportunity?’”

The other piece of writing Barack was focusing on that spring was “Journeys in Black and White.” Review classmate Scott Siff, who had tried writing a novel, remembered Barack giving him a fairly extensive manuscript to read. It was certainly not either of Barack and Rob’s two prospective book chapters, because, as Siff recalled, “it was this kind of memoir-ish thing,” although some parts “were more sociological commentary.” Yet “the social commentary was a little light” and “it didn’t hold together,” for “these long discursive . . . observations about society” did not work nearly as well as the more appealing memoir portions, but those “were much more limited.”

In order to expand those, Barack could draw from his journals from years past, and sometime that spring he asked Sheila Jager if she had kept the letters and postcards he had sent to her during his trip to Kenya almost three years earlier. Barack and Sheila had continued to see each other irregularly throughout the 1990–91 academic year, notwithstanding the deepening of Barack’s relationship with Michelle Robinson. “I always felt bad about it,” Sheila confessed more than two decades later.

That spring, Sheila met a thirty-three-year-old Korean American graduate student and U.S. Army officer, Jiyul Kim. A Boston native and 1981 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, Kim had spent five years as an intelligence officer before becoming an East Asia specialist who hoped to complete a Harvard Ph.D. Sheila’s relationship with Jiyul quickly began to blossom just as Barack’s final weeks of law school approached. “As much as I loved him, I was relieved when our paths finally parted,” Sheila explained, because “we went through many painful things together,” and “I really traveled to some dark places during that period of my life.”

When they saw each other for the final time late that spring, they parted “on the best of terms,” she recalled. She remembered Barack as “a profoundly lonely person at heart,” someone who “was and is truly unreachable,” but she always believed “that with me he was able to let go of all those masks of his.”<sup>57</sup>

The last week of March was the law school’s spring recess and gave Barack a chance to return to Chicago. The publishing contract for “Journeys in Black and White” gave him the funds necessary to postpone deciding whether or not to accept the job offer from Sidley that he had in hand. Even so, Sidley was happy to accommodate him that coming summer as he studied for Illinois’s moderately difficult bar exam. Kelly Jo MacArthur, Michelle Robinson’s close friend at Sidley, had “felt like they were very committed that year,” but as Barack’s graduation approached, “Michelle wanted to know what was going to happen” above and beyond Barack once again living with her and her mother Marian, at the Robinson family home in South Shore. “It all kind of came together at the end of his third year,” MacArthur remembered; “that’s about when things kind of locked in,” even though nothing expressly definitive had yet been said regarding marriage.

Two phone calls Barack had received from Chicago that spring also factored into his thinking. One had come as a direct result of how impressively he had performed his P-read edit on Michael McConnell’s Law Review article. McConnell had mentioned what an “impeccable editor” the Review’s president was to his University of Chicago Law School colleague Douglas Baird, who had already heard Obama’s name. Baird’s service as chairman of the university’s Library Board made him well acquainted with the senior librarian who for a quarter century had been overseeing the library’s increasing use of computer automation, Charles Payne—Madelyn Dunham’s younger brother. Some months earlier, law school librarian Judith Wright had asked Baird if he knew that Payne’s grandnephew was the Harvard Law Review’s first African American president, which Baird did not and at first believed was impossible.

Baird also chaired the law school’s Appointments Committee, and Chicago was actively interested in diversifying its virtually all-white faculty. So, with the consent of law school dean Geoffrey Stone, “I just made a cold call to the Harvard Law Review and asked to speak with Barack Obama,” Baird remembered. Baird asked Obama, “Do you have an interest in law teaching?” and Barack said no, that he had a contract to write a book on race-related issues such as voting rights and that he would be returning to Chicago to work on it. Baird then invited Obama to write his book at the U of C's law school, explaining that he could be a Law & Government Fellow, just as there previously had been Law & Economics Fellows. The appointment would be unsalaried, but it would give Barack a small office and word processor as well as access to the university's libraries. After a quick series of follow-up phone calls, Barack was assured of a quiet place to write just a fifteen-minute drive from the Robinson family's home.

The second call came from Judson Miner, who four years earlier had been Chicago's corporation counsel, Mayor Harold Washington's top lawyer. Miner had read one or another story about Obama, perhaps the Chicago Reporter one from some months earlier noting Obama's intent to practice law in Chicago, and Miner also called Obama at the Law Review to try to interest him in the small civil rights litigation firm Miner and Allison Davis had founded twenty years earlier, Davis, Miner, Barnhill & Galland. Obama mentioned his book contract but agreed to meet Miner for lunch once he arrived in Chicago, when Miner took him to the Thai Star Cafe on North State Street, just around the corner from the handsome West Erie Street town house that housed the firm's offices.

Rather than "talking about his coming to work here," Miner and Obama instead had "quite a comprehensive discussion that focused primarily on how gratifying did I find being a civil rights lawyer," Miner recalled. They agreed to keep in touch, and immediately after the two-hour conversation, Miner called his wife Linda and told her, "I just had lunch with the most impressive person I've ever met."<sup>58</sup>

Back at Harvard, the final five weeks of spring classes began with an array of protests mounted by the Coalition for Civil Rights, the student group that had unsuccessfully sued Harvard to try to advance faculty diversity. An April 4 student "strike" drew several hundred supporters, but a new tactic—quietly invading classes—angered and alienated many students. One band of poster-carrying CCR members silently encircled Kathleen Sullivan's 1L Crim Law classroom for twenty minutes and then returned to repeat the stunt for the class's final ten minutes. That evening BLSA mounted an overnight sit-in in Dean Clark's office, but called off the occupation when word arrived that Gerry Frug's wife Mary Joe, herself a law professor at the New England School of Law, had been brutally stabbed to death on a Cambridge sidewalk at 8:45 P.M. the previous evening. Frug's killer was never caught, and the following Wednesday CCR resumed its protests by physically blocking all access to the dean's office. CCR leader Keith Boykin called Clark "undemocratic, virtually authoritarian," and the dean responded to the blockade with a letter threatening administrative punishment for such actions. David Troutt termed that warning "Gestapo-like," while Clark told the Record that "certain behaviors can't be accepted" and confessed, "I see myself as being excessively nice." The Record's final issue of the year closed with one letter from Law School Republicans calling for Clark to discipline the protesters and another from a pair of BLSA members declaring that the Record was "beginning to resemble a fascist version of the National Enquirer."

Amid such cheery exchanges, the Law Review's editors assembled at Boston's Harvard Club for their annual banquet. Obama spoke briefly before David Ellen introduced Wayne Budd, the African American U.S. attorney for Massachusetts. Barack advised everyone to spend less time debating whether to capitalize the B in "black" and more on real-world issues. The Revue made fun of Barack's book advance, his use of "folks," and his work on Larry Tribe's abortion book. Charles Fried's request for a muffin was revisited, and problematic authors like Ian Ayres and Patricia Williams suffered send-ups, as did 3L editor Monica Harris. Ayres's treatment reflected a clear case of buyers' remorse: "Ian Errs, Taking the Revue for a Ride: Recriminations from Half-Baked Empirical Research,” and the Charny and Wilkins “Don’t Embarrass the Revue” standard was lampooned as well.

But Barack was a target throughout the longer-than-usual thirty-two-page booklet. “Obama, Supervised Reading & Research Is Hard Work, 1 Class a Week, Tops” reflected how undemanding his 3L course schedule had been, and quickly was followed by “Look on the bright side. At least you don’t have to worry about having to listen to me talk in any of your classes.” Barack’s avoidance of clear positions on tough issues was twice mocked—“Chief Justice Obama neither concurred, nor dissented, and gave no reasoning,” and “Barack quickly defused the situation by agreeing wholeheartedly with each of the competing people in turn”—as was his press attention: “International celebrity and bon vivant . . . mediocre bluebooker.” His and Rob’s plans were noted: “Await R. Fisher & B. Obama, Reinventing Democracy (forthcoming),” as was his relative absence from Gannett House: “Compare Ellen, Burning the Midnight Oil . . . with Obama, Is Gannett House Really Open All Night?, What a Waste of a Perfectly Good Office . . . (‘I work at home’).” But there was also clear praise: “Like me, you probably think that Barack has done a pretty decent job.”<sup>59</sup>

As the semester was ending, Barack looked back on his three years at Harvard in a brief piece for the law school’s upcoming Yearbook. Everyone should “question our assumptions, listen to other viewpoints, and articulate our values in a spirit of mutual respect and tolerance,” something that had been sorely lacking throughout that spring. He also sensed “a continuing struggle on the part of many of us to infuse our role as lawyers with a larger sense of meaning,” because “we all have a responsibility to use our legal training in ways that make this country work better.” He worried about “an increasing anxiety among students about prospects for employment and economic security,” but hoped that “idealism—a hard-headed, unromantic idealism that does not expect change overnight” would prevail. In another, expressly racial context, Barack remarked that “people like myself are learning a certain language of mainstream society, of power and decision making. We have an obligation to go back to the black community, to listen and learn and help give our people a voice.”

Fully two-thirds of Harvard Law School’s 1991 graduating class were heading into law firms, one-quarter had accepted judicial clerkships, and only 2.9 percent were taking public interest or legal services jobs. Section III classmate Jonathan King, an accomplished jazz pianist who was heading to a top Boston firm, remembered Barack telling him, “Don’t give up jazz,” and adding, “Do not let them squelch the poetry out of you.” Barack, like Rob, owed Roberto Unger a long paper for Reinventing Democracy, but with their coauthored work for Martha Minow complete, they would both graduate magna cum laude, just as they had long intended. On the official roster, his full name would appear as it never had before: “Barack Hussein Obama, 2d.”

Looking back on his standout academic success at Harvard, Barack credited his five-year age advantage over most of his classmates in addition to the seasoning and experience he had gleaned in Roseland. “As an older student,” he recalled a decade later, “I knew why I was there and what I wanted to get out of it.” Plus, in many classes, “I had great enthusiasm for the subject matter,” and “when you’re interested in something, you end up doing well on it.” But part of his success also stemmed from his having “learned as an organizer to be able to articulate a position and express myself in clear ways that served me well as a law student.” At the Developing Communities Project, “my whole job was persuading people to do things differently, but not being able to pay them,” which meant “I had to be pretty persuasive, and I think it taught me to be able to focus in on those issues that were important to people and be able to describe them in ways that people found compelling, and I think that probably had something to do with my success at law school.”

Barack’s decision to compete for membership on the Law Review was motivated in significant part by a desire to squelch any perception that his Harvard J.D. was proof of affirmative action at work, and Rob remembers the morning when he had stopped to answer his phone on his way out the door and was able to get Barack to the post office just in the nick of time. Otherwise, “he never would have been president of the Harvard Law Review.” Barack’s experiences on the Review had helped him become “enormously skilled at finding the center of the room,” one colleague believed, but neither Ken Mack nor Rob Fisher believed that either the Review, or indeed Harvard Law School, had significantly changed someone for whom they were his closest friends. “I actually think the Law Review was very peripheral” in Barack’s experience at Harvard, Rob said. “He focused on it as a management problem,” and “I don’t think it was near his heart in the least. I don’t think the various little controversies shaped him very much” at all. Ken, who, like Rob, had been friends with Barack since the beginning of their 1L year, agreed. “I don’t think he changed much in law school. I don’t think he reoriented himself and redirected himself in any way.”

Commencement was a full two weeks after the law school’s final exam period, and neither Barack nor Rob saw any reason for remaining in Cambridge to attend. All that Barack would miss was the news that he had lost his election bid to Harvard’s Board of Overseers. He gave notice to his landlord, who was disappointed to see a model tenant leave; had a mandatory exit interview with the financial aid office about “the $60,000 worth of loans” he had taken out over three years; and advertised a major yard sale. “I remember Barack selling everything in his apartment,” his bête noire Christine Lee recalled. “I bought his TV at graduation. It’s still the TV I watch in my bedroom,” incongruous as that seems. Over two decades later, “even the remote works.”

One morning in late May, Barack packed up his mustard yellow Toyota Tercel and headed west on the Mass Pike. He left Harvard “with a degree and a lifetime of debt,” he would say years later, but he also left with something else, just as Jeremiah Wright had told him almost three years earlier: “Don’t let Harvard change you!” “I went into Harvard with a certain set of values,” Barack recounted. “I promised myself that I would leave Harvard with those same values. And I did.” Chicago lay almost a thousand miles to the west, but this time Barack knew exactly where he was headed: 7436 South Euclid Avenue, Michelle Robinson’s family home.

Six summers earlier, on that July night at the Fairway Inn, Bob Elia’s monologue had left a homeless twenty-three-year-old feeling existential self-doubt he would never forget. His years in Roseland, in Altgeld, and in Hyde Park had stanchied those fears and replaced them with a deep and abiding sense of destiny. But now Sheila Jager, just like Harvard Law School, was entirely in the rearview mirror. This time, as the Ohio Turnpike gave way to the Indiana Toll Road and finally the Chicago Skyway, Barack Hussein Obama knew exactly where he was headed, to the place he knew was essential for the destiny that awaited him: he was heading west, west toward home.<sup>60</sup>

BUILDING A FUTURE

CHICAGO

JUNE 1991–AUGUST 1995

The Chicago Barack Obama returned to in late May 1991 was a significantly different city than the one he had left three summers earlier. South Shore, where he would now be living with Michelle Robinson and her mother Marian, was neither the leafy, university-dominated enclave of Hyde Park he knew so well from 1985 to 1988, nor struggling Roseland, where violent crime was increasing. “Upon my return,” Barack remembered, “I would find signs of decay accelerated throughout the South Side,” but solidly middle-class South Shore was generally tranquil.

Far more momentous—and depressing—were the changes that had overtaken Chicago politics. Less than two months earlier, Mayor Richard M. Daley had been reelected to a full, four-year term of office after crushing first West Side African American Cook County commissioner and former 29th Ward alderman Danny Davis 63 to 31 percent in the Democratic primary and then black former appellate judge R. Eugene Pincham 68 to 24 percent in the general election. In the wake of those two landslide victories over well-known opponents, one astute political observer wrote that “Richie” Daley had “totally captured political control of Chicago.” Harold Washington’s political legacy had been almost completely eviscerated.

In addition, 4th Ward alderman Tim Evans, who four years earlier had been anointed as Washington’s rightful successor by Chicago progressives, lost his seat by 109 votes to three-time challenger Toni Preckwinkle, a liberal teacher whom Evans charged was backed by gentrification-oriented developers. That race had been marred by a bizarre backfire when neighboring 5th Ward Democratic committeeman Alan Dobry, a Preckwinkle supporter, had been caught posting racist placards that he said the Evans campaign was distributing so as to turn voters against Preckwinkle, a black woman whose husband was white.

That attempt to embarrass Evans’s campaign set off a citywide controversy, with a pair of Chicago Sun-Times columnists, African American Vernon Jarrett and white Steve Neal, mounting a sustained but unsuccessful crusade to force Dobry’s resignation from his influential ward committeeman’s post. Dobry, a Hyde Park progressive independent whose role in local politics reached back more than two decades, stood his ground based upon his long record of sustained opposition to the Democratic machine. Two years earlier, when local state representative Carol Moseley Braun won election to a countywide post, Dobry had refused to concur in powerful 8th Ward committeeman John Stroger’s insistence that his organizational protégé Donne Trotter be appointed her successor. With the 5th Ward comprising 40 percent of the district, Dobry held the largest hand, but progressive 7th Ward committeeman Alice Palmer, who three years earlier had defeated machine loyalist William Beavers, nonetheless sided with Stroger. Their combined 60 percent share put Trotter in the state legislature, with Dobry casting his 40 percent for famed steelworkers leader Frank Lumpkin.

Less than two weeks after Preckwinkle's victory over Evans was confirmed, Hyde Park's sixty-seven-year-old African American state senator, Richard H. Newhouse Jr., who had held his seat for almost a quarter century, announced his departure from the legislature amid press reports that he was suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Newhouse had been a courageous pioneer in independent politics, defeating a machine loyalist at the height of the Chicago Freedom Movement's civil rights protests in mid-1966.

Newhouse played a decisive role in making his colleague Cecil Partee the first African American president of the Illinois Senate, and in 1975 Newhouse had been the first black candidate for mayor of Chicago, winning 8 percent of the vote in a protest campaign against longtime incumbent Richard J. Daley. When his friend Harold Washington won the mayor's seat eight years later, Newhouse stood beside him on the victory podium, holding their hands high, but throughout all those years, the unspoken question always remained "Why, after all this time, is Newhouse still in the first political office he ever sought?"

The answer was simple, and reflected one of the core truths of African American politics: "Newhouse has a white wife," Kathie, whom he had first met in 1954. Across the South Side, the word on the street was that Newhouse "talks black but he sleeps white," and one black nationalist explained that "the perception now is that an African American married to a white is unable to give 100 percent to the cause." Carol Moseley Braun, who for almost a decade had had a white husband, frankly confessed that "an interracial marriage really restricts your political options. The blind reaction of some people is just horrible." The Chicago Tribune celebrated Newhouse's "impressive record" and mourned how his retirement "marked the passing of an era for Chicago's black progressive political movement."

As with Moseley Braun's smaller former House seat, the committeemen whose wards made up Newhouse's Senate district would select his successor in a weighted vote. The 8th Ward's John Stroger aimed to elevate Trotter, but organization loyalists controlled only 47 percent of the district. Alan Dobry held 30 percent, and together Tim Evans, still 4th Ward committeeman, and the 7th Ward's Palmer had 23 percent.

Dobry and Evans had long respected Palmer, who had moved to Chicago at age thirty after completing her undergraduate degree at Indiana University and teaching high school English for three years in Indianapolis. With a father who was an MIT-trained architectural engineer, a mother who also was a teacher, and a grandfather who had been a prominent African American physician, Alice Roberts Robinson Palmer's interest in education had strong family roots. In Chicago she worked at several local colleges while finishing a master's degree at Roosevelt University. She also remarried, taking the surname of her second husband, Edward "Buzz" Palmer, a former Chicago police officer well known in the black community as one of the cofounders of the pioneering Afro-American Patrolmen's League.

In 1977 Alice became associate dean for African American student affairs at Northwestern University, and two years later she completed a Ph.D. in educational administration at Northwestern. Her dissertation, "Concepts and Trends in Work-Experience Education in the Soviet Union and the United States," was a sophisticated and erudite comparative analysis informed by Palmer's own research in the USSR as well as her readings of both Karl Marx and John Dewey. During the 1980s Alice and Buzz's travels included a visit to Grenada during the short reign of Marxist revolutionary Maurice Bishop plus multiple visits to Moscow, Prague, and other Soviet-bloc capitals. They founded a Chicago entity called the Black Press Institute, and Alice's membership in the U.S. Peace Council plus her active role in the International Organization of Journalists indisputably reflected pro-Soviet sympathies. In June 1986 the People's Daily World, the newspaper of the Communist Party USA, reported that she was "the only Black U.S. journalist to attend the 27th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union" three months earlier.

By the time of her election as 7th Ward committeeman in 1988, Palmer had left Northwestern for the Metropolitan YMCA, and by 1991 she was heading up the Chicago affiliate of Cities in Schools, a nationwide dropout-prevention program. Her international travels and affiliations attracted no attention or concern in Chicago, and she later said she had run for the 7th Ward post reluctantly, only because her well-known, outgoing husband had declined Harold Washington supporters' requests to do so. "I was the quiet one," she explained. "If the well-meaning citizens of Chicago don't go out and get their hands dirty in political action, then dirty politics will never be cleaned from the streets," she told her friend Vernon Jarrett, the Chicago Sun-Times columnist.

Alan Dobry and Tim Evans fully agreed that longtime independent Dick Newhouse's Hyde Park Senate seat could not be filled by someone allied with Stroger's black Democratic machine. They also concurred that Alice Palmer was the best available individual, and together they called her to make that case. An "initially reluctant" Palmer accepted, and the trio brushed aside Stroger's argument that they elevate Donne Trotter and name Palmer to his House seat. On Thursday evening, June 6, the committeemen assembled at Stroger's 8th Ward office. After brief remarks by both Trotter and Palmer, they voted 53 to 47 percent to make Palmer a new member of the Illinois state Senate before making the formal tally unanimous. Five days later, with the legislature's annual spring session running overtime into early summer, Palmer headed to Springfield and was immediately sworn into office. In the Sun-Times, Vernon Jarrett praised the new senator as "a role model for other individuals of her race who have attained high degrees" and declared that "there are fewer than a dozen individuals in the Illinois Legislature or the City Council who match her combination of academic attainment and commitment." The weekly Hyde Park Herald commended Palmer's selection, praising her independence as well as "her dedication to education." A week later another Sun-Times columnist reported that Palmer was already "getting high marks from legislative colleagues for her baptism of fire in Springfield. 'She's jumped right in and is having no difficulty staying in the fast lane,'" one unnamed observer stated. Before the month was out a clearly happy Palmer told the Herald that she "plans to make a career of the General Assembly."<sup>1</sup>

Like Hyde Park, Barack's new home base in South Shore sat squarely within the Newhouse-Palmer Senate district. But to whatever degree Barack noted Alice Palmer's emergence as a significant figure in South Side politics, his undisputed focus throughout all of June and July was on the Illinois bar exam, which would be administered on the last two days of July at Northwestern University's law school. Sidley & Austin had footed the tab for the intensive bar review class that Barack, like almost all other applicants, took in the run-up to the highly demanding, two-day test, and on weekdays Barack often accompanied Michelle downtown, studying at Sidley and attending review sessions. Sidley still hoped Barack would join the firm, but at one large summer dinner another guest mistook Barack for a waiter and asked, "Can I have more tea?"

On Barack's first Saturday back in Chicago, Michelle took him to the wedding of one of her best friends' younger brother at the family's Jackson Park Highlands home. To Barack, Jesse Jackson was the former presidential candidate for whom he had cheered back in 1984 in New York; to Michelle he was the father of her friend Santita, and someone she had met many times during her high school years. Twenty-six-year-old Jesse Jackson Jr. was marrying fellow University of Illinois law student Sandi Stevens, and a Jackson family videotape of the happy event captured a glimpse of Barack, whom Santita introduced to her brother.

Marriage was a subject that was also on Michelle Robinson's mind, but so was the fact that she was increasingly conscious of how unfulfilling she found her highly remunerative work at Sidley. Her close colleague Kelly Jo MacArthur remembered how the view from Michelle's office on the forty-something floor looked southward, and that unbroken perspective—"That's where I really come from"—helped fuel Michelle's "internal dissonance" about her life. "There was always some sense, from the first time that I met Michelle, that 'I'm not sure that I really belong in this corporate law firm,'" Kelly recounted, and notwithstanding how much relatively interesting work partners like Newton Minow, Charles Lomax, and Quincy White gave Michelle, including pro bono assignments, her dissatisfaction grew. "I couldn't give her something that would meet her sense of ambition to change the world," White recalled. Even before that summer, Michelle had quietly begun searching for a new job. One person she sought counsel from was Gwendolyn LaRoche Rogers, the effective stepmother of her brother Craig's best friend, fellow Princeton graduate John Rogers Jr., who, like Craig, was pursuing a career in finance. Eight years earlier Rogers had founded his own investment firm, Ariel Capital Management, with start-up funds from his mother and a Chicago couple who were lifelong family friends, James and Barbara Bowman.

Four years earlier Barack had approached Gwen LaRoche, the Chicago Urban League's education director, for help with his Career Education Network, and now Michelle Robinson sought advice too. "Michelle came to me and said that she was not happy at Sidley & Austin. She did not want to be working in a law firm. She wanted to do something for the people," Gwen LaRoche Rogers explained. Michelle remembered it similarly: "I wasn't happy" and wanted work with "a community-based feel" that would "benefit others." She asked Gwen if the Urban League could use her, but Gwen, knowing what Sidley paid, told Michelle that she would cry every night over what the League could afford. So Michelle continued her outreach, realizing that when she asked herself, "Can I get pumped up every day about coming to practice corporate law? The answer was simply 'no.'"

Barack also knew that even after devoting the next year to writing "Journeys in Black and White," practicing law at Sidley was not what he wanted to do either, no matter how well it paid. Michelle also was repeatedly raising the question of would they indeed commit to getting married, but throughout June and July, Barack kept putting it off. Then, with Barack's bar exam complete on Wednesday, July 31, the couple scheduled a celebratory dinner, and Barack chose the stylish, three-star Gordon at 500 North Clark Street, which the Chicago Tribune had praised as one of the city's best restaurants just weeks earlier and was best known for its flourless chocolate cake. Early in the meal Michelle mentioned marriage, and Barack once again parried. Then, after they ordered dessert, what appeared in front of Michelle was not chocolate cake but a small box. As she opened it and discovered an engagement ring, Barack asked, "Will you marry me?" and Michelle immediately replied, "Yes, yes," before being rendered otherwise speechless. "I was completely shocked," she later explained, because Barack's long-standing equivocation left her truly surprised by his proposal. Whatever Michelle had ordered for dessert was ignored. “I don’t think I even ate it. I was so shocked and sort of a little embarrassed because he did sort of shut me up” after weeks of persistent questioning.

In the immediate wake of Barack and Michelle’s engagement, events moved quickly. Almost simultaneous with their dinner, a copy of Michelle’s résumé made its way to assistant Chicago corporation counsel Susan Sher. Just weeks earlier Sher’s fellow assistant corporation counsel Valerie Jarrett, the thirty-five-year-old former daughter-in-law of columnist Vernon Jarrett and the daughter of James and Barbara Bowman, had been named Mayor Richard Daley’s new deputy chief of staff. Sher, highly impressed with Robinson’s Princeton and Harvard Law School credentials, passed Michelle’s résumé to Jarrett, who responded similarly and quickly scheduled an interview. In person, Robinson was just as impressive as on paper, and as their initial ninety-minute conversation ended, Jarrett spontaneously offered Michelle a job as assistant to the mayor without clearing it with either Daley or her boss, chief of staff David Mosen. Michelle bonded almost immediately with Jarrett—“She understood how I felt. It was difficult to find people who understood my desire to leave a high-paying corporate job”—but replied that she wanted to think it over. A few days later Michelle called Jarrett and asked, “Would you be willing to have dinner with my fiancé so that the three of us could talk about it?” Jarrett agreed, and an evening or two later, they met up at a seafood restaurant in the downtown Loop.

Valerie Bowman Jarrett’s background was almost as exotic as Barack’s. Five years his senior, Jarrett had been born in Shiraz, Iran, while her father, a pathologist who specialized in blood diseases and abhorred the racial discrimination he had experienced in U.S. medical institutions, was working there for six years. Jim Bowman had met and married Chicago native Barbara Taylor, whose father Robert was the first African American chairman of the Chicago Housing Authority, during a Chicago residency. From Iran, the small family moved to London for one year before returning to Chicago, where Bowman soon joined the University of Chicago’s medical faculty.

Valerie grew up in Hyde Park, completed her secondary education at the Northfield Mount Hermon School in Massachusetts, and graduated from Stanford University in 1978 before entering law school at the University of Michigan and receiving her J.D. in 1981. After six years in private practice with two Chicago law firms, Judson “Judd” Miner, Harold Washington’s corporation counsel, hired Jarrett, and she remained in that office as first Eugene Sawyer and then Richard Daley became mayor. Divorced in 1988 after a five-year marriage to a childhood friend, Vernon Jarrett’s son William, by 1991 Jarrett was a single parent raising a six-year-old daughter and experiencing what the Tribune called a “meteoric rise” in Mayor Daley’s inner circle.

At dinner that night, Barack and Michelle questioned Jarrett about the mayor’s office. “You know, I’ve never been interviewed by someone’s fiancé before,” Jarrett joked. “I’m the one who’s supposed to be doing the interviewing.” But much of their conversation was devoted to Barack and Valerie’s unusual early lives. “That night we talked about his childhood compared to my childhood,” Jarrett recalled. “We were comparing Indonesia to Iran.” Valerie also quickly realized that the fiancé was just as impressive as Michelle. “I remember that night, sitting across the table from him at dinner, and I thought to myself, ‘This is one extraordinary young man.’”

By mid-August, Barack as well as Michelle had a decision to make. Barack had had several more lunches with Judd Miner, and also spoke with Allison Davis, the other cofounder of Miner’s twenty-year-old, now twelve-attorney law firm. Unlike Sidley, whose roster of corporate clients meant the firm was often opposing employment discrimination claims, Davis, Miner, Barnhill & Galland (DMBG) combined civil and voting rights litigation with Davis's strong interest in housing development. With DMBG as a definite employment option once Journeys was complete, Barack felt entirely comfortable in telling Gerry Alexis, John Levi, and Newton Minow that he would not be accepting Sidley's job offer. "Gerry, I want to tell you that I've decided that I'm not going to come to Sidley after all," she remembered Barack telling her. Rob Fisher and his girlfriend Lisa recalled hearing about Michelle mulling whether to leave Sidley for the mayor's office, with Michelle's only hesitation being the "50 percent cut in pay." "I was going to walk away from a pretty huge salary," Michelle later recounted. But within a day or two of Barack's apology to Gerry Alexis, "Michelle came and told me that she was leaving and she was going to work in the mayor's office," Gerry remembered. John Levi recalled, "I thought I was going to have a coronary" upon hearing the double-barreled bad news. Newt Minow learned about the pair of departures when Barack came to his office to explain that he would not be joining Sidley because "'I think I'm going to go into politics.' I said, 'Well, that's good,'" Minow recounted. "'We'll try to help you.'" Knowing the other news he had to impart, Barack remarked half-jokingly that "I don't think you're going to want to help me when I tell you the rest of the story" and suggested they both sit down. "'You know Michelle?' I said, 'Of course I know Michelle.' He said, 'Well, I'm taking Michelle with me.'" Minow sputtered in dismay before Barack interjected, "'Hold it—we're going to get married.' I said, 'That's different,'" a relieved Minow remembered. Back at Davis Miner's town house office, Barack told Judd and Allison that he indeed would join the firm once his book was complete. "There's only one condition," Davis remembered Barack adding. "You've got to reimburse Sidley for the bar review fee."<sup>2</sup>

With the bar exam over, Barack could turn his full attention to "Journeys in Black and White." He took the time to register to vote at the Robinsons' home address, and one weekend he and Michelle drove out to Beverly Shores, near the Indiana Dunes on the shore of Lake Michigan, to see Jean Rudd, whom Michelle had met briefly two summers earlier, and her husband Lionel Bolin, who was black. Barack also had lunch one day with Douglas Baird, who had taken the lead in arranging his new appointment as a Fellow in Law and Government at the University of Chicago Law School (UCLS). Several other faculty members joined them, and Baird also took Barack to meet law school dean Geof Stone, who found him "very impressive." With only one single black male instructional staff member—clinical professor Randolph Stone—the law school was "looking to find diversity," Geof Stone explained, and "our goal was maybe this is somebody we should be thinking about for a faculty appointment" once Barack finished his book. Stone's secretary Charlotte Maffia shared her boss's reaction, remarking to Stone that "he's going to be governor of Illinois some day!"

By the beginning of September Barack had a small office, room 603, on the top floor of the law school's cubical, glass-sheathed main building, designed by famed architect Eero Saarinen in the late 1950s and significantly expanded in 1987. His appointment carried no salary or benefits, but the school's small cadre of black law students—no more than about a dozen in each of the three current classes—were pleased to hear about Barack's arrival, even if the law school's annual directory, The Glass Menagerie, erroneously stated that at Harvard, he had been president of BLSA, not the Law Review. Barack's biographical sketch accurately summarized his work at DCP and said he "will spend this year writing a book on issues of race and politics." Some weeks later, when Barack remarked to Douglas Baird that his book manuscript would be in part autobiographical, Baird was greatly perplexed by exactly what Barack was up to.<sup>3</sup>

Either just before or soon after Michelle began work in mid-September as a $60,000-per-year assistant to the mayor, Barack had a journey for them to take together. He wanted to introduce his new fiancé to his Kenyan family, and Barack arranged with his sister Auma, who was still living in Germany, to meet him and Michelle in Nairobi. From there, they traveled to the family homestead in Kogelo, where brother Roy, who had adopted Abon’go Malik as his given names instead of Roy Abon’go, was also visiting from the U.S. Barack and Michelle spent almost a week living at stepgrandmother Sarah’s humble home, which had no electricity or running water, yet Michelle adopted easily to traditional Luo customs such as eating with one’s hands, and Barack later joked that her ability to learn basic Luo words quickly surpassed his. Michelle was taken aback, however, when someone asked her, “‘Which one of your parents is white?’ which shocked her,” Barack later recounted. “‘Why would you think that one of my parents is white?’” an astonished Michelle replied. Her surprise at being asked that by a true African illuminated “how American African Americans are,” Barack realized.

Back in Nairobi, Aunt Zeituni loaned the trio the decrepit Volkswagen that Auma had driven three years earlier during Barack’s first visit to Kenya. One day a highway breakdown left them on the roadside until a pair of mechanics made repairs, with Barack jotting down observations in the notebook he carried throughout the trip. Michelle had to head back to the U.S. for work well before Barack did, and after two weeks in Nairobi Barack and Auma returned to Kogelo for another visit with granny Sarah as Barack recorded additional family details to use in “Journeys in Black and White.”<sup>4</sup>

Upon his return to Chicago, Barack learned that he had passed the Illinois bar exam. Much like Auma’s Beetle, Barack was still driving the rusty off-yellow Toyota Tercel that had carried him to and from Harvard, and which now, just like his previous car during his time at DCP, sported a floorboard hole large enough so that passengers could watch the ground go by. Early on November 1, Barack headed north to Racine, Wisconsin, for a three-day conference to which Jacky Grimshaw, whom the late Al Raby had introduced to him in 1987, had arranged an invitation. The National Center for Careers in Public Life was the brainchild of two young women, Vanessa Kirsch and Katrina Browne, who had met in Washington, D.C., and wanted “to create a national mechanism to recruit, place and train the next generation of issue leaders.” Browne, a 1990 graduate of Princeton University who was working for a newly founded, alumni-sponsored public interest endeavor, Princeton Project ’55, won support from the Johnson Foundation for her and Kirsch’s plan, and their kickoff gathering was taking place at Johnson’s lush Wingspread Conference Center.

Kirsch and Browne’s starting point was “the belief that a project for young people should be designed by young people,” but many of the four dozen attendees were, like Barack and Jacky, now past their thirtieth birthdays. His listing was simple indeed—“Barack Obama, Writer, 7436 South Euclid,” Chicago—and years later no other attendees would recall Barack speaking up during the Friday-Saturday-Sunday set of meetings. At the outset, Browne and Kirsch had a catchier name in mind for their new organization—“Public Allies,” playing off the well-known music group Public Enemy—and also had a seventeen-member board lined up, including Barack. The two women envisioned a regional structure for the group, with an initial arm in D.C. that would recruit, train, and place in public interest organizations several dozen young “allies” who would be mentored for a year with the explicit expectation that they would pursue careers in public service. Chicago, given its set of enthusiastic local backers, including John

McKnight and his Northwestern University colleague Jody Kretzmann as well as Jacky Grimshaw, was envisioned as Public Allies' second start-up a year or so hence.<sup>5</sup>

In addition to his Kenyan family, Barack had one particular piece of his Chicago life he wanted to introduce Michelle to: Jeremiah Wright's Trinity United Church of Christ. The Robinson family had never been regular church attendees during Michelle's childhood, and in black Chicago "church weddings are normally at the wife's church," Jerry Wright explained. With Michelle and Barack now thinking ahead toward their own wedding sometime in 1992, joining a church in order to have a church wedding was very much on their agenda. Trinity's growth had continued apace during Barack's three years at Harvard, and another capital campaign to build yet a larger new sanctuary was well under way.

Trinity required aspiring members to attend new members' classes "to teach you, 'What have I joined?'" Jerry explained, and he strongly encouraged them to enroll in one of Trinity's weekly, semester-long Bible classes. Aspirants also had to choose which of Trinity's many service ministries they would invest time in, such as the legal ministry, which dated to 1979: "Where do you want to work in this church?" Tithing was aspirational indeed, since at Trinity that meant not just 10 percent of a member's income "but 10 percent of your time," yet Wright understood full well that not everyone who joined Trinity did so in order to personally contribute to the church. "Some of the members of Ebenezer," Jerry explained, "belong to Ebenezer church because it's Ebenezer church in Atlanta," the home church of Martin Luther King Jr. and his family. "Same thing at Riverside, same thing at Abyssinian," upper Manhattan's two best-known churches, and similarly for Trinity on the South Side of Chicago.

A good many Trinity members, like Barack's friend Sokoni Karanja, were deeply devoted to the betterment of black Chicago, but just as many "were there when it's not golfing season," Jerry realized. New members were admitted at the evening service on the first Sunday of a month once they had completed new members' classes, and their chosen ministry would be announced as well, with contact information passed along to those leaders the next morning.

Barack later explained that for him, joining Trinity "wasn't an epiphany. . . . It was an emotional and spiritual progression, as well as an intellectual one. And it didn't happen overnight." Barack also would say, "What I love about Trinity is that everyone is involved in something—it's not just the pastor doing everything." Wright's preaching appealed to university professors as well as to activists like Karanja and public sector bureaucrats like former Chicago school superintendent Manford Byrd. Young University of Chicago theologian Dwight Hopkins, who had completed his Ph.D. at New York's Union Theological Seminary under the guidance of James H. Cone, the founder of black liberation theology, viewed Wright as a "humble and unassuming" pastor with "a remarkable grasp of the Bible." One perhaps jaded local black journalist believed Wright "provided kind of a vicarious militance for Chicago's black elites" such that "they could get a dose of militance on Sunday and go back home and feel pretty good about doing their part for the black movement." Yet Jim Cone had a far less cynical view: "I would regard Jeremiah Wright's church as the really contemporary embodiments of all the things I've tried to say."

Barack would state on multiple occasions over many years that he was first drawn to Wright's ministry by one particular sermon he heard Wright preach early in 1988, called "The Audacity of Hope." Yet Wright did not preach that sermon at Trinity in 1988; he had preached it there exactly three years earlier, on February 17, 1985, before Barack arrived in Chicago, and he would next preach it at Houston's Wheeler Avenue Baptist Church in January 1991. A tape of the 1985 rendition was available for purchase at Trinity, and the 1991 Texas version soon appeared in a collected edition of Wright's sermons, so Barack knew the sermon even though he had not heard Wright deliver it in person.

Years later critics who knew little about African American Christianity would claim that Trinity was "arguably the most radical black church in the country" when Barack and Michelle formally joined on Sunday evening, February 2, 1992, but anyone who knew Trinity and its congregation would all but laugh out loud at that assertion. Newly elected 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle later explained that Trinity "was a good church for an aspiring, upwardly mobile politician to join," and many people who knew Barack and viewed him as "a very pragmatic person" felt likewise. Barack later declared that he was "offended by the suggestion" that careerist considerations had played a significant role in his choice of Trinity, but among the people who had spent the most time with Barack in Chicago, that belief was widespread if not universal.

Barack was "an immensely pragmatic person," Greg Galluzzo realized, and his fundamental life choices in that vein dated back to when he had first told Sheila that his destiny would not allow them to marry no matter how deeply they loved each other. Galluzzo asked, rhetorically: "Did he leave her for pragmatic reasons? Did he go to Jeremiah's church for pragmatic reasons? Did he go to Harvard for pragmatic reasons?" He stopped before uttering the next, obvious question, remarking instead that Michelle was "the ideal person" with whom he could "start a base in the black community." Barack readily admitted that "settling in Chicago and marrying Michelle was a conscious decision to root myself." Many black Chicagoans agreed with Galluzzo, but Barack, confronted with such sentiments years later, would dismiss them as "pretty cynical" as well as "pretty offensive to me."

Marrying Michelle "was the single most important step that he was to make in his journey to define himself and reconcile his search for racial identity," one local African American scholar rightly thought, and he was far from alone in his conclusion. "Michelle is a representation of Barack Obama's choice to aggressively move toward blackness," a black female professor agreed. "He could have actively made a choice to move toward whiteness or something else." Indeed, a month after Barack and Michelle joined Trinity, they scheduled their wedding there for Saturday, October 3, and on March 9, Barack wrote to Sheila for the first time since they had last seen each other in Cambridge to tell her that he and Michelle were engaged and would marry in October.

Trinity members who remembered Barack from DCP, like Carolyn Wortham and Deloris Burnam, plus Patty Novick, the late Al Raby's girlfriend, recalled often seeing Barack and Michelle at the 11:00 A.M. Sunday service around the time that they first joined. Barack remembered similarly, but he and Michelle were not there the Sunday after they joined, because on the previous day Stanley Dunham had died at age seventy-three after a prolonged bout with prostate cancer. Barack and Michelle arrived in Honolulu before Stan expired, yet for Barack his passing represented the loss of the most sustained male presence he had known in his life, one far more akin to a real father than a grandfather. Indeed, as Barack's sister Maya said of Stan and Madelyn, "they raised him." For Madelyn, the loss was profound, for despite perceptions of her disappointment and at times unhappiness with Stan, her brother Charles had no doubt that they were not only "extremely attached" to each other but "dependent on each other." For Ann too, it was a grievous loss, for "clearly her stronger emotional bond was with her father" rather than her mother, one close friend explained.

Ann's oral defense of her now finally completed Ph.D. dissertation was just two weeks away, and for that she owed tremendous gratitude to her endlessly supportive mentor Alice Dewey, who had loaned her money as well as convinced Ann to narrow and trim the huge ethnographic study. The Internal Revenue Service was still seeking more than $17,000 from Ann thanks to her unpaid income taxes from twelve years earlier, but Ann was ecstatic to finally complete her long-sought doctorate. She dedicated the dissertation to Madelyn, Alice Dewey, “and to Barack and Maya, who seldom complained when their mother was in the field.” But among Ann’s closest friends, there was no mistaking how “she felt a little bit wistful or sad that Barack had essentially moved to Chicago and chosen to take on a really strongly identified black identity,” because that “had not really been a part of who he was when he was growing up.” Ann viewed it as “a professional choice” on Barack’s part, and although “it would be too strong to say that she felt rejection,” she certainly felt “that he was distancing himself from her.”<sup>6</sup>

In Chicago, the 1992 election year was well under way, with two serious primary challengers to incumbent Democratic U.S. senator Alan “Al the Pal” Dixon. Mel Reynolds was again challenging U.S. representative Gus Savage, but this time Reynolds’s odds of success looked much improved thanks to a redrawn, more suburban district following the 1990 Census. The South Side’s other black U.S. representative, Charlie Hayes, was facing a difficult reelection battle against alderman and former Black Panthers leader Bobby Rush. Senator Dixon’s first challenger was Cook County Recorder of Deeds Carol Moseley Braun, who had been outraged when Dixon in October 1991 voted in favor of U.S. Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas, who won confirmation by only a 52–48 margin. Moseley Braun’s effort was troubled by the behavior of her boyfriend and campaign manager, Kgosie Matthews, who had been accused of sexual harassment. While polls a week before the primary showed Dixon with a 20-point lead, Braun’s “engaging warmth” during a final televised debate won statewide praise. A final poll showed Dixon’s lead down to 12 points, while in the congressional primaries both Rush’s challenge against Hayes and Reynolds’s against Savage looked likely to prevail. The Chicago Tribune praised Reynolds as “bright, capable and promising,” and on the South Side Donne Trotter was poised to join Alice Palmer in the state Senate thanks to the new redistricting. The Hyde Park Herald endorsed Rush over Hayes and praised Palmer as an “extraordinary woman” who while “basically a novice . . . has done a fine job” during her first nine months in office.

Several weeks before the March 17 primary, Barack received a call from Sanford “Sandy” Newman, a Washington attorney who a decade earlier had founded a nationwide voter registration project called Project VOTE! The organization concentrated its efforts on major states in presidential election years; in 1984 Al Raby, then in exile from Harold Washington’s Chicago, had served as Newman’s codirector before becoming the group’s board chairman. Project VOTE! was overtly nonpartisan while focusing on the registration and turnout of minority citizens who were likely to become Democratic voters. In 1992 President George Bush was running for a second term, and in 1988 Bush had won Illinois’s twenty-four electoral votes after carrying the state by just ninety-five thousand votes out of over 4.5 million that were cast. Illinois was at the top of Newman’s list, and early in 1992 he asked Raby’s old friend Jacky Grimshaw who might best direct a Chicagoland effort that summer and fall. Grimshaw’s recommendation was the same she had made to the young Public Allies women, and Sandy claimed to have written the surname as “O’Bama” while insisting “I didn’t want to rule him out just because he was Irish.” When Sandy called, however, Barack immediately cited his book contract and its June 15 due date. He asked Newman if he could do it on a part-time basis, and Sandy said no, it would be more like sixty hours a week once the registration drive got under way. Barack declined, but by March 17 Newman had not hired anyone else.

That evening, as returns came in, Mel Reynolds easily defeated Gus Savage by a margin of 63 to 37 percent, and Bobby Rush similarly ousted Charlie Hayes by a much narrower 42 to 39 percent tally. But the big news was in the Senate primary, where Carol Moseley Braun won 38 percent of the vote in the three-candidate field and defeated Senator Dixon by more than fifty thousand votes. The Washington Post, the Chicago Sun-Times, and the Chicago Tribune all used the exact same phrase to describe Moseley Braun's victory: a "stunning upset." The Post further characterized it as a "political earthquake," and the Tribune called it "one of the most stupendous upsets in Illinois political history." Not only had a two-term U.S. senator been bested by a county officeholder, but a previously little-known African American woman was now on the verge of becoming the first black female senator in U.S. history.

As the historical significance of Moseley Braun's statewide win sank in, Sandy Newman again called Barack, and this time the answer was yes. Following Moseley Braun's victory, "I realized that this presented an opportunity in Illinois to enfranchise and engage a lot of African-American voters that previously had not been involved," Barack later explained, "and the work needed to be done." Sandy flew to Chicago to meet Barack before formally hiring him as Project VOTE!'s Illinois state director, and Sandy remembered that it was "as much him interviewing me as me interviewing him." Barack alerted Judd Miner and Allison Davis that this temporary job that would run through October meant that he could not join Davis Miner until late in the year. "Journeys in Black and White" would largely be put on hold too, yet rare indeed was it for a publishing house to hold an author strictly to a contract's due date.

At the suggestion of Bettylu Saltzman, a well-heeled Chicago Democratic activist who had formerly been U.S. senator Paul Simon's local chief of staff, Sandy already had lined up John R. Schmidt, a progressive, mainstream attorney who had served as Mayor Richie Daley's first chief of staff, to lead Project VOTE!'s Illinois fund-raising effort. Schmidt in turn had recruited John Rogers Jr., the young black investment executive, as his cochair. Once Barack was on board, Sandy quickly had him meet with Schmidt and Rogers, with whom he immediately meshed very well. "We wanted the state directors to be able to focus on organizing," Sandy said, so raising money would not be Barack's responsibility. In a savvy move to attract independent black political support in addition to Daley backers like Schmidt and Rogers, Newman recruited former mayoral challenger Joe Gardner to be Illinois Project VOTE!'s official chairman.

A raft of progressive grassroots groups would be ready to work with Project VOTE! if funding was available, and Barack quickly had to begin building a citywide organization to fully coordinate an enterprise that would be vastly larger than either DCP or the Harvard Law Review. Barack's own Chicago experience was limited to just some parts of the huge South Side, and equally important in black Chicago was the similarly spacious but economically weaker West Side. Far west 29th Ward alderman Sam Burrell's political organization was the West Side's best voter-outreach operation, and one day in early April Barack headed there to meet Burrell and his top staffer, Carol Harwell. Upon arrival, Barack apologized for being late. "I never realized Chicago was this big. I thought I was never going to stop driving."

Carol remembered Barack carrying two lightweight bags, one with Project VOTE! materials while saying of the second one that "this is my book," which he tinkered on when he could. Harwell was eager to pitch in, and quickly introduced Barack to another grassroots activist, Bruce Dixon. Given the size of Chicago, dividing the city up into sectors was mandatory. Carol would take the West Side, Bruce the North Side, and Brian Banks, a 1978 Harvard College graduate who had worked for more than a decade in the computer industry, would handle the South Side. With that trio of key staffers on board and office space on the fifth floor of 332 South Michigan Avenue provided by the Community Renewal Society (CRS), “we sat down and tried to hash out how we were actually doing to do this project,” Carol recalled. “Barack was big on community organizations,” and wanted to do as much registration work as possible through them, rather than get involved with committeemen’s ward organizations, which always paid a cash bounty to workers based upon the number of people they signed up. When Carol explained the traditional Chicago way, “Barack was appalled” and quickly said, “We’re not doing that.”<sup>7</sup>

Before the end of April, a letter cosigned by CRS executive director Yvonne Delk, Joe Gardner, and Barack went out to several dozen grassroots activists inviting them to an 8:30 A.M. meeting on Tuesday, May 5. Attendees would create a Cook County-wide steering committee for the Project VOTE! Chicago Coalition, whose goal would be to “register at least 130,000 new voters, primarily targeting low income and minority persons.” Some two dozen invitees attended, including some Barack already knew: Johnnie Owens from DCP in Roseland, Father Mike Pfleger from St. Sabina in Auburn-Gresham, Sokoni Karanja from the Centers for New Horizons in Bronzeville, and Alderman Burrell from the Far West Side. Others represented established community groups like the Kenwood-Oakland Community Organization, the Greater Grand Crossing Organizing Committee, the Woodlawn Organization, and Jesse Jackson’s Operation PUSH. Timuel “Tim” Black, a well-known black political sage and historian, had met Barack briefly during his Hyde Park years; Rev. Princeton McKinney of Christ Temple Community Baptist Church in Markham was a mainstay figure in Mike Kruglik’s flourishing South Suburban Action Coalition. The husband and wife team of Keith Kelleher and Madeline Talbott had launched ACORN in Chicago a decade earlier before Keith had begun organizing home health care workers into SEIU Local 880.

The May 5 “founding meeting” began with a CRS welcome, a brief statement of purpose from Joe Gardner, and then twenty minutes of remarks by Barack detailing his “Proposed Plan.” The “Target Goal” would be “150,000 new minority and low-income registrants statewide,” with 130,000 of them in Cook County. Project VOTE! would reach out to church congregations, who would be asked to register 100 percent of their members, to Chicago Housing Authority tenants’ councils, as some fifty thousand CHA residents were unregistered, and to forty public high schools before the school year ended. Activities would get under way in late May, with a goal of twenty thousand new registrants for June, thirty thousand during July, and forty thousand a month for both August and September. Community groups needed to train their volunteers as deputy registrars who were able to enroll new voters, and groups could apply to Project VOTE! for four-figure grants. Everyone’s expenses could be reimbursed, but no group could pay workers on a per-signature basis.

Before the steering committee’s second meeting on May 19, Barack obtained Jeremiah Wright’s agreement that Trinity members would actively participate. Barack also sought advice from retired state senator Dick Newhouse, who offered to buy him a meal, and Operation PUSH activist Jamillah Muhammad was recruited to help Brian Banks with Project VOTE!’s South Side work. In advance of a third meeting on June 3 where the grant-making process would be detailed, Barack drafted the group’s first press release, targeted for distribution at an upcoming press conference in Daley Plaza, Chicago’s premier outdoor space in the center of the downtown Loop.

In his statement, Barack addressed the Southern California urban disorders that had followed the April 29 acquittals of four police officers who had been videotaped assaulting black motorist Rodney King. “The Los Angeles riots reflect a deep distrust and disaffection with the existing power pattern in our society,” Barack wrote. “We must make political leadership in this country more responsive to the pressing issues,” and in order to do so “voter registration is a necessary, constructive first step.” In particular, “it’s critical that people on the bottom of the economic ladder participate in the process.”

That June press conference was not covered by any of Chicago’s newspapers, though Barack did win the enthusiastic cooperation of Marv Dyson, the general manager of WGCI, the city’s top black radio station, who “agreed to publicize our efforts and recruit the other black radio stations” to do likewise. That was all to the good because throughout the summer the Chicago Defender, the city’s premier black newspaper, made no mention of Project VOTE! Only in early August did two Sun-Times columnists mention the project, with Vernon Jarrett highlighting how Edward Gardner, owner of Soft Sheen Products, a large personal-care-products firm who had a long-standing interest in voter registration, had become a major contributor to Project VOTE!

Throughout June and July, new registration numbers ran about one-third below Barack’s initial, overly optimistic monthly targets. Some of the most successful allied groups, like Keith Kelleher’s Local 880 and Madeline Talbott’s ACORN, were buttressed with $500 apiece each week from Project VOTE! DCP, now headquartered on 95th Street, helped in Roseland, multiple members of both Trinity and St. Sabina churches worked as deputy registrars, and Operation PUSH volunteers did yeoman work. In the notorious Robert Taylor Homes, named for Michelle’s boss Valerie Jarrett’s grandfather, super-energetic Rita Whitfield knocked on every door in the sixteen-story towers. On the West Side, squeaky-clean 28th Ward alderman Ed Smith’s organization was the only Democratic Party arm Project VOTE! funded, and on the North Side, seventy-two-year-old retired machinist Lou Pardo, Chicago’s best-known voter registration volunteer, pitched in as usual. Pardo’s mentor, progressive state senator Miguel del Valle, recalled first hearing Barack’s name from Lou. “I just met this young man who is so impressive,” Pardo told him. “He’s gonna be big someday.”

Only once a week did Barack’s top staffers—Carol Harwell, Bruce Dixon, and Brian Banks—sit down with him in the office for a formal staff meeting. Otherwise everyone was out and about, shuttling volunteers to retail stores and other locations with large numbers of passersby. Uppermost in Barack’s mind were the weekly and monthly numerical targets he and Sandy Newman had agreed upon. “It was very competitive in the office, West Side versus North Side versus South Side,” Carol recalled, declaring that “the West Side won every week.” Barack was “managing to the number,” Brian explained, always emphasizing that “We’ve got these numbers to make.” Barack also continued to work on his Journeys manuscript when he could, and Carol remembered that “he wrote the first couple of chapters in longhand” and then asked her if she could type up the initial part. Carol agreed, even though Barack’s small, left-handed penmanship was difficult to read. Carol also offered punctuation and word-change suggestions, which Barack had no interest in hearing. “I didn’t ask you to read it, I asked you to type it,” she remembered him barking. “Gimme my book. I’ll type my own book.”

With Project VOTE! taking up most of his time, Barack’s presence at the University of Chicago Law School became very infrequent, but by midsummer one colleague he had first met months earlier had a request for him. Jim Holzhauser was a former Supreme Court clerk who had taught full-time at the law school for several years before moving to Mayer Brown, a top-ranked law firm, while continuing to teach several courses, including Current Issues in Racism and the Law. Chicago operated on a trimester schedule—Fall, Winter, and Spring quarters—and although Holzhauser had taught Racism six months earlier, in Winter 1992, a lengthy out-of-town trial was already on his calendar for early 1993. So “I asked Barack to take over the course,” and Barack agreed to do so for Spring 1993—well after he would have completed Journeys and begun practicing law at Davis Miner. With that would come a change in title from Fellow to Lecturer in Law, as UCLS politely called its adjunct instructors. Barack had to submit a course description before the 1992–93 academic year got under way, and he took Holzhauser’s catalog copy—“How have past and present legal approaches to racism fared?”—and expanded it significantly.

Has the continued emphasis on statutory solutions to racism impeded the development of potentially richer political, economic, and cultural approaches, and if so, can minorities afford to shift their emphasis given the continued prevalence of racism in society? Can, and should, the existing concepts of American jurisprudence provide racial minorities more than formal equality through the courts?

Holzhauser had said that “students will prepare papers” rather than take an exam, but Barack specified that the papers should “discuss the comparative merits of litigation, legislation and market solutions to problems of institutional racism.” Of course neither Rob Fisher nor David Rosenberg were mentioned, but the impact and legacy all of those Cambridge discussions were writ large in the first course description Barack had ever crafted.

At the same time, UCLS’s annual Glass Menagerie corrected Barack’s biographical sketch to note that he had been president of the Law Review. Barack, in thinking ahead to the fall, added that he was now “an associate at the firm of Davis, Miner, Barnhill & Galland” and had “recently completed a series of essays on race and politics that will be published this fall by Simon & Schuster.”

By early August, Project VOTE! was in strong financial shape, largely thanks to John Schmidt’s fund-raising efforts, but the project badly needed to raise its visibility throughout black Chicago, and especially among younger nonvoters, if it was to catch up to its numerical targets. Saturday, August 8, would witness the annual Bud Billiken Day Parade on the Near South Side, a six-decade summer tradition and “the biggest voter registration opportunity of the season” for Project VOTE! Ed Gardner of Soft Sheen had drawn his daughter Terri, who handled their company’s marketing and media efforts, into the campaign, and in tandem with Bruce Dixon, Terri designed a handsome black and yellow poster plus a button featuring a memorable slogan: “Register to Vote—It’s a POWER Thing!,” implicitly playing off of the then-current saying “It’s a black thing—you wouldn’t understand.”

The Billiken Day outing was a great success, with more than two thousand new registrants enrolled, and in its wake, the Sun-Times’ Vernon Jarrett devoted an entire column to Barack’s efforts. “There’s a lot of talk about ‘black power’ among the young but so little action,” Barack complained, highlighting how lack of interest among younger nonregistrants was why Project VOTE! was enrolling only seven thousand people a week rather than the hoped-for ten thousand. “We see hundreds of young blacks talking ‘black power’ and wearing Malcolm X T-shirts, but they don’t bother to register and vote. We remind them that Malcolm once made a speech titled ‘The Ballot or the Bullet,’ and that today we’ve got enough bullets in the street but not enough ballots.”

The key to Project VOTE!’s entire effort was the scores of unheralded volunteer deputy registrars, individuals like Rita Whitfield on the South Side and Lou Pardo’s multiethnic band of North Side regulars, five of whom would tally more than one thousand new registrants apiece before the rolls closed on October 5. On the last Wednesday in August, Project VOTE! hosted a “Deputy Registrar Appreciation Affair” with free food at a well-known center-city jazz venue, and by late summer the effort was getting significant boosts from labor unions like the United Auto Workers and District Council 31 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), which pledged $50,000 to the drive. By Labor Day weekend the confirmed Chicagoland registration tally was up to sixty-three thousand new registrants, and ten days later, with the Defender finally according Project VOTE! some much-needed coverage, the total was up to seventy-one thousand.

“There were some real tough times in terms of whether we were making those numbers or not,” Brian Banks recalled. Carol Harwell’s widespread contacts meant “she certainly was the political brains of it,” Brian believed, but Barack was the one answerable to Sandy Newman, and as they headed into their final four weeks, Barack would “smoke packs of cigarettes” each day. By mid-September they had their weekly tally up to about nine thousand, and an overall total of eighty-one thousand. Project VOTE!’s staff and volunteers regularly interacted with both Democratic presidential nominee Bill Clinton’s Illinois campaign, and even more so with Carol Moseley Braun’s Senate race workers, but everyone was fully schooled on how Moseley Braun’s workers had to be kept at arm’s length. Moseley Braun herself understood “there was every effort . . . to keep a firewall between Project VOTE! and the actual campaign,” for “we didn’t want to get in trouble.” Yet ACORN’s Madeline Talbott knew that “We were working to elect Carol . . . but that was never stated and we knew you couldn’t.” In later years, Talbott’s husband Keith Kelleher would write of how they and Project VOTE! had mounted “a large-scale voter registration program for U.S. Senator Carol Moseley Braun,” and on multiple occasions Barack too would later bluntly state that the purpose of Project VOTE! was “to get Bill Clinton and Carol Moseley Braun elected.”

On Sunday, September 20, Clinton and Moseley Braun appeared together at a late-night “voter registration rally” at the New Regal Theater on 79th Street. Project VOTE! chairman Joe Gardner proudly told the crowd that he knew of “85,000 reasons” why they would help elect Moseley Braun and Clinton. Gardner vowed to add more in the final two weeks, and Clinton then thanked the “packed house of approximately 1,000 supporters for registering more than 115,000 new voters,” Monday’s Defender reported. That 115,000 number represented Chicago’s total number of new registrants since mid-March, with eighty-five thousand of them submitted by Project VOTE!’s network. Six days later the Tribune stated that more than half of new registrants lived in predominantly black wards, and on Saturday, October 3, with forty-eight hours to go, the Sun-Times reported that “radio spots using the ‘Power Thing’ slogan have been blitzing stations serving predominantly black audiences.”<sup>8</sup>

October 3 had been set as the date of Barack and Michelle’s wedding weeks before he had agreed to direct Project VOTE! With Monday the 5th as the final registration day for November’s election, Barack had little time to devote to wedding preparations. He had called old friends like Mike Ramos and encouraged them to attend, and Michelle took the initiative to send Barack’s sister Auma a black bridesmaid’s dress for her role in the ceremony. Both a limousine and a tuxedo were rented, but at Project

VOTE!’s office, Carol Harwell had to keep reminding Barack of other necessary tasks. In particular, “he kept forgetting to go buy his shoes,” Carol remembered. ““Barack, you gotta go get shoes,”” and also ““You need to get this hair cut,”” she reminded him. “Barack didn’t buy his shoes until Friday night for the wedding on Saturday.”

By Friday a large raft of friends from every chapter of Barack’s life were gathering in Chicago. From Punahou came Mike, Greg Orme, and Bobby Titcomb; from Oxy came Hasan Chandoo, Wahid Hamid, Vinai Thummalapally, and Laurent Delaney, plus Beenu Mahmood of New York. From the world of organizing came Jerry Kellman, Greg Galluzzo, Mike Kruglik, David Kindler, Sokoni Karanja, Ken Rolling, and Jean Rudd; from DCP came Johnnie Owens, Loretta Augustine, Yvonne Lloyd, and Margaret Bagby. Rob Fisher, Mark Kozlowski, Dan Rabinovitz, Ken Mack, Tom Perrelli, and Jan-Michele Lemon represented Barack’s Harvard years, plus a number of Michelle’s women friends from the law school’s 1988 class. Mutual friends Gerry Alexis, Tom Reed, and Kelly Jo MacArthur came from Sidley, plus soon-to-be colleagues Allison Davis, Paul Strauss, and Laura Tilly from Davis Miner—“he must have invited the whole firm,” Laura said. From Project VOTE! came John Schmidt, Carol Harwell, and Brian Banks, and from among Michelle’s mayoral office colleagues there were Valerie Jarrett, Yvonne Davila, and Kevin Thompson. In addition to Auma, Abon’go came from D.C. and Ann, Madelyn, and Maya from Hawaii, where Maya had now resumed her undergraduate education at the U of H. Madelyn’s brother Charles Payne and his wife Melanie attended, as did Marian and Craig Robinson, Craig’s wife Janis, Michelle’s close high school friend Santita Jackson and her brother Jesse Jr., and Michelle’s Princeton friend Angela Kennedy.

On Friday night, Kelly Jo MacArthur took Maya, Auma, and the Punahou guys out to a jazz club in her red BMW; Hasan Chandoo played cards with some of the Oxy crowd and drank so much that the next day “at the ceremony I was so fucking hungover.” Auma stayed with Barack and Michelle at the Robinsons’ family home, and at midday on Saturday, family members gathered there prior to the late-afternoon ceremony at Trinity United Church of Christ on 95th Street.

Barack remembered noticing how uncomfortable Madelyn seemed, with her daughter Ann being the only other entirely white person present at the Robinsons’ house, until she realized how familiar all of Marian Robinson’s food dishes were. “There was an immediate connection there,” Barack wrote, because Marian’s “stoicism” toward life “reminds me very much of my grandmother.” At Trinity, Jeremiah Wright was joined in his office by Barack and his two best men, Abon’go and Johnnie Owens, a duo that many guests viewed with surprise. Barack had never grown close to his older brother, and his relationship with Johnnie was by now “pretty strained” given Johnnie’s ongoing personal struggles and the problems DCP was having as a result. Multiple guests recalled Reverend Wright speaking at considerable length, and his metaphor comparing the partners in a marriage to the pillars of Trinity’s sanctuary veered toward the phallic when Jeremiah described Barack as a fine pillar of African American manhood.

With the ceremony complete, a limousine drove Barack and Michelle to the South Shore Cultural Center, just north of 71st Street, where a large and eclectic crowd gathered to celebrate the Obamas’ marriage. Barack spoke briefly and movingly about how sad he was that the man who had raised him, Stanley Dunham, was not there with them. Carol Harwell remembered how good the champagne was, and how after multiple rounds of toasts to the new couple, she had offered one telling Michelle she should enjoy their two-week honeymoon in Northern California because she had married someone who was going to go far and whose name one day would be in lights. Michelle seemed less than thrilled by Carol's prediction, but to Laura Tilly the crowd at the reception seemed "like the who's who of African American Chicago and liberal Chicago." Craig Robinson's wife Janis remembered it as "one of the best weddings I've ever been to," yet to Laura it also "was kind of like a coronation: here's a man who was already designated by many people as somebody of huge potential."

Barack and Michelle had chosen Stevie Wonder's "You and I" as their wedding song, and as everyone milled about and sat down to eat, old friends who were strangers to each other mixed and mingled. Gerry Alexis was struck by "what a rainbow of people" were there and was especially happy to meet Ann Dunham. Barack and Michelle, Gerry said, "introduced me as the person that brought them together" three years earlier at Sidley. To Barack's Punahou friends the reception "seemed kind of formal," but Mike Ramos recalled that "we had a blast." Loretta, Yvonne, and Margaret were sitting together at Table 4—Yvonne saved her place setting—and Barack "came over to us and asked if there was anything we needed," Loretta recalled. "I just said 'Barack, all I want is a ticket to your inaugural presidential ball,'" and he laughingly replied, "You've got it."<sup>9</sup>

With Monday the final day for preelection registration, Project VOTE! deployed hundreds of deputy registrars at fast-food restaurants across Chicago and staged a midday event in the Loop to attract holdouts. Only then did Barack and Michelle fly to San Francisco to begin their honeymoon in the Napa Valley and along the California coast. In Barack's absence, Carol Harwell took charge of sending the final registration numbers to Sandy Newman in Washington, and the verified total—111,000—was so good that Newman had to be convinced that deputy registrars indeed had not been paid per-signature bounties. With Illinois fund-raising having reached $200,000, enough money remained for Carol to plan large-scale get-out-the-vote phone banking for the final days before the fall election. Each new registrant had supplied a phone number, and working largely from Soft Sheen's offices, Project VOTE! callers used a nonpartisan script while firmly asking, "You do plan to vote on Election Day, don't you?"

Some new registrants received multiple calls, and with Project VOTE!'s Illinois success matched by similar numbers in Pennsylvania and Michigan, top national political reporters like David Shribman and James Perry at the Wall Street Journal wrote front-page stories about how "surging registration" in big cities in battleground states would mean tens of thousands of new votes for Democrat Bill Clinton. In Project VOTE!'s own publicity materials, that 111,000 documented tally was supplemented by Barack and Joe Gardner's "estimate" that news of their effort had "produced an extra 40,000 registrations" through other channels, thus allowing Illinois Project VOTE! to claim that it had enrolled 150,000 new voters.

Everyone who had interacted with Barack during those six months came away impressed. John Schmidt, who soon took the Justice Department's third-ranked post in incoming president Bill Clinton's new administration, felt that Barack had a "remarkable presence" and "was extraordinary." AFSCME political director Bill Perkins found Barack "very impressive" and was struck by how utterly legitimate Illinois Project VOTE!'s registration numbers were. Twenty-ninth Ward alderman Sam Burrell told a local journalist that "the sky's the limit for Barack," and new 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle took note of him too. Chicago Reporter editor Laura Washington, whose office was also at CRS, thought Barack was a "young impressive guy." Father Mike Pfleger, whose St. Sabina Youth Organization had averaged 125 new registrants a week for Project VOTE!, was just as dazzled as he had been five years earlier.

Phil Mullins, still at UNO, realized Barack was “more detached” than he had been five years earlier, that “he had internalized something.” AFSCME’s Roberta Lynch felt “he was a different person” than the young organizer she had first met in 1986. At DCP new organizer Michael Evans found Barack “a regular guy” who took the time to “shoot hoops with us on a Friday night,” and Barack still regularly got to the UC’s gym as well. A black female U of C graduate student who was contemplating law school took note of an African American man whose “Real Men Marry Lawyers” sweatshirt indicated a connection to Harvard Law School. When she asked, he confirmed that his wife had gone there but said nothing about himself, and he told the younger woman that she too could succeed at Harvard. For Erika George it was a life-altering conversation because she followed the stranger’s advice and became a member of Harvard Law’s 1996 class. Only later would she realize who her self-effacing adviser was.

Bettylu Saltzman, who had first pointed Sandy Newman toward John Schmidt, remembered her first conversation with Barack that year. “I immediately thought, he’s going to be president some day.” Bettylu said exactly that first to her husband and then to several close friends, including Mayor Daley’s media consultant, David Axelrod, who like Saltzman had worked for U.S. senator Paul Simon. “I’ve just met the most remarkable young guy, and I think you ought to meet him,” Bettylu told Axelrod the next morning on the phone. “I know this is going to sound silly, but I think he could be the first black president.” Axelrod thought, “Well, that’s a little grandiose,” but he agreed to have lunch with Barack and remembered the thirty-one-year-old’s “earnest self-assurance.”

Other people who met Barack during Project VOTE!, including Kennedy-King community college math instructor Ron Davis, a black 1974 UC graduate who had played a significant role in Harold Washington’s 1987 reelection campaign, carried none of the national cachet of a major Democratic donor like Saltzman. But as grassroots organizers like DCP’s Michael Evans realized, Project VOTE!’s noteworthy success gave Barack “some significant political notoriety” among a wide range of Chicago political players. A journalist for Chicago Magazine asked Barack whether he would run for office sometime in the future. “Who knows?” he replied. “But probably not immediately,” though he hoped to have Journeys finished by January. “Was that a sufficiently politic ‘maybe’? My sincere answer is, I’ll run if I feel I can accomplish more that way than agitating from the outside. I don’t know if that’s true right now. Let’s wait and see what happens in 1993. If the politicians in place now at city and state levels respond to African-American voters’ needs, we’ll gladly work with and support them. If they don’t, we’ll work to replace them. That’s the message I want Project VOTE! to have sent.”

A few years later, Barack acknowledged that Project VOTE! was “really how I started to make a lot of connections with . . . political operatives and elected officials around the city” and how it had “immersed me . . . in the mechanics of the political process” for the first time. “It was a useful education for me in learning how politics worked.” Earlier, “when I was organizing, I was always pretty suspicious of politicians and politics,” but by 1992 Barack had come “to appreciate the need for a more effective political movement within the African American community, the need to mobilize around an agenda and not just individuals,” just as he had said three years earlier at that roundtable discussion of organizing. And that Chicago Magazine reporter had no doubts as to what Barack’s future would entail. Obama was “the political star the Mayor should perhaps be watching for” in a reprise of Harold Washington’s multiethnic reform triumph a decade earlier.<sup>10</sup>

Months earlier, Mayor Daley had promoted Valerie Jarrett from deputy chief of staff to commissioner of the newly conjoined departments of Planning and Economic Development. Shortly before the Obamas' wedding, Jarrett had offered Michelle the opportunity to join her as economic development coordinator, and Michelle readily accepted. She would be "the new point person responsible for monitoring the city's major business expansion and retention effort," the Sun-Times reported during the Obamas' Northern California honeymoon. When they returned, Michelle took up her new post, but for Barack their return home immediately presented him with truly disastrous news: on October 20, Simon & Schuster had canceled his book contract. Rather than the pleasant prospect of receiving the additional $85,000 of his advance once his manuscript was complete and then published, Barack now owed Simon & Schuster's Poseidon Books the initial $40,000 it had paid him two years earlier when he had signed the contract. Agent Jane Dystel reassured him that she almost certainly could resell the proposal, although not likely for the grand $125,000 figure Poseidon had offered in 1990. Barack now faced the grim fact that he needed to finish "Journeys in Black and White" if he hoped to recoup from a horrific financial disaster.

Prior to the end of Project VOTE!'s registration drive, Barack had sent a good chunk of manuscript to Poseidon's Elaine Pfefferblit, conscious that he ought to turn in as much as he could before too many months elapsed after his June 15 deadline. He also had made firm plans to turn his attention to the manuscript full-time once he and Michelle returned from their honeymoon. "He wanted to get away and write," Jean Rudd remembered, and Jean and her husband Lionel Bolin had a friendly neighbor out in Beverly Shores who went south each winter. "I told Barack that he could use her house," but Project VOTE! fund-raising chair John Schmidt and his brother shared an even more distant vacation house on Lake Geneva, in southern Wisconsin. "Barack had decided that he wanted an isolated place where he could go by himself and finish the book," Schmidt recounted. "He had the idea that he would get married, he'd come back from his honeymoon, and then he would go by himself up to Lake Geneva." Indeed, "my brother and I drove him up to Lake Geneva prior to the wedding to show him the house, and we gave him the key."

Barack's plan was to head up there for as long it took him to finish, and then he would begin work at Davis Miner. But the dire news from New York threw him for a loop. Most but not all of the fault for this turn of events was Barack's. What he tardily had submitted to Elaine Pfefferblit represented only about half of the promised manuscript, and the combination of personal storytelling and civil rights policy discussions left it bloated in some parts and dull in others. Both Elaine and her assistant Laura Demanski read it, and agreed that "it wasn't a publishable manuscript," Ann Patty was told. "It sort of read like it was phoned in."

Normally an incomplete manuscript that is three or four months late would not prove fatal, but Barack's failure to execute what his earlier proposal had promised came at a time when Poseidon's parent, Simon & Schuster, was actively seeking to reduce the number of titles published each year by a good 15 percent. A few months earlier a New York Times profile of Patty reported that "her bosses have reassured her that Poseidon is safe," yet not long after Barack's contract was canceled, Elaine Pfefferblit's job was eliminated, and a month later Patty left as well. Poseidon was no more.

Barack now had to rethink just what Journeys would be, and he turned to Rob Fisher for critical input. The two friends had continued to talk occasionally about the long-discussed policy book they had begun coauthoring back in Cambridge, and months earlier Rob had read the chapters of Journeys that Barack planned to send to Poseidon. Rob felt strongly that the personal parts read far better than the policy ones. “The best story here is about you. Make it about you,” Rob argued. “Those are the best chapters, those are the chapters that sing.” Rob realized that the book had become “a real struggle” for Barack, and “we talked about it endlessly, and I gave him a tremendous amount of editorial notes,” both “detailed line-by-line edits and big-picture edits.”

Rob’s law firm colleague Tom Reed, who had known Barack at Sidley, and Rob’s girlfriend Lisa both knew that Rob was “looking at drafts,” and Lisa heard enough about the process to realize that “it was a bunch of different books, and the struggle was to figure out which book it really was.” Rob had no doubt what the right answer was—“I edited it, and then gave it to him”—and in the wake of the cancellation, Barack acknowledged that he faced a forebodingly difficult challenge he had to overcome before he could begin work at Davis Miner.

Barack told an apologetic Sandy Newman what had happened while they were wrapping up Project VOTE!, but when he headed north to John Schmidt’s home on Lake Geneva, he quickly concluded that the setting actually would not be conducive. “He drove up there by himself, and he lasted one night,” Schmidt remembered. Just like Rob, Michelle’s boss Valerie Jarrett knew “how much he was struggling” with what the book should be. “I just can’t get it down on paper. I’d much rather hang out with Michelle than focus on this,” Barack confessed to Jarrett. “He wanted to be monkish—he wanted to be away,” Jean Rudd recalled, and “he wanted to get away from Michelle too.” From both his years in Indonesia and his friends in Hawaii, one perfect place beckoned, a place where his mother Ann had said she would be headed soon after attending the Chicago wedding: Bali.

Ann had been through there several times in the previous two years, as one of her closest friends, Bron Solyom, and her husband Garrett had been living there on Sanur Beach, next door to the Tandjung Sari Hotel, since 1991. Barack’s old choom gang friend Kenji Salz was there too, in Denpasar, and “Bobby Titcomb went to Bali all the time,” another Punahou friend explained, and shipped back furniture and whatever else to Honolulu. A few years later, Barack immediately said “Bali” when asked his favorite vacation place, and one late 1992 day Ann visited Bron and Garrett Solyom and told them that Barack “wanted to find a spot where he can just sit down and finish this book he’s writing.” So “we went up and down Sanur,” Bron recounted, between the Tandjung Sari to the south and the Bali Beach Hotel to the north, “and we looked at a few places and Ann found a place which she felt would be fine, not very far away from us, and so she rented it—I think it was to be for, say, two months.”

Barack mentioned his decision to several friends before informing his new wife. “What do you think Michelle’s going to say when I tell her I’ve got to go?” Valerie Jarrett recalled Barack asking her. Allison Davis had a similar memory: “I can’t finish this thing here. There are too many interruptions. I’m just going to take off so I can finish this.” Allison asked where he was going, and when Barack answered, he enthusiastically congratulated him—“My man!”—before asking, “What’s Michelle going to do?” Allison also wondered what Michelle would think about her husband choosing a locale where there would be “all these Balinese women floating around.” Barack responded, “She’s going to be angry. She’s going to be really pissed,” but when Barack finally told her what his mother had arranged, Michelle’s reaction was surprise—“Didn’t we just get married?”—but not anger. The book had become “the bane of their existence,” Michelle’s friends knew, and “he needed to go and get it done so that we could move on with our lives,” Michelle later explained.

Their closest family members agreed. “He felt it important to go away and just immerse himself in the writing,” Janis Robinson recalled. “He really could not do it here,” and “he went away so that he could really just focus on the book.” Years later Barack remarked, perhaps with Bali in mind, that “sometimes, particularly when we were early in our marriage, I wasn’t always thinking about the fact that my free-spirited ways might be having an impact on the person I’m with.”

So rather than spend all of December, January, and February braving winter in Chicago, or farther north on Lake Geneva, Barack instead flew westward across the Pacific. “Barack came, and we made some arrangements for him to bring his laundry—we had one household staff member who took care of everything,” Bron Solyom explained. “He’d bring the laundry,” and “so we’d see him on and off” when Barack stopped “for a drink and a chat.” But now Barack’s discipline was such that “we could never persuade him to sit and have a meal,” Bron recalled. “He was just totally thinking about what he was doing, he was totally focused, and I think that’s really all he did, and he was done with it faster than he thought.”

Rather than the full two months, he was done within “five or six weeks,” she and Garrett believed. “He had a pile of yellow notepads the one time we stopped by his house with Ann,” who was in Bali before moving to New York in late January 1993 to begin a new job at Women’s World Banking. Carrying his notepads, Barack also flew back to the U.S., and he stopped for several days in San Francisco before returning to Chicago. Barack had not seen his younger brother Mark in almost five years, not since they had first met in Nairobi in 1988, but Mark now lived in San Francisco, and he and Barack met for lunch one day. “He seemed humbler, less arrogant this time than he was back in Kenya,” Mark thought, “a different, warmer” person than he had been then.

Mark later realized that Barack’s sudden interest had no doubt been stimulated by Barack’s pondering over how to address the full story of his far-flung Kenyan family in the final part of his book manuscript. But now Barack was on the road to completion, and when late that winter he arrived back in Chicago, Michelle and his in-laws were happy to learn that the odd venture had proven entirely successful. “Being away was very beneficial . . . it definitely helped,” Janis Robinson remembered.<sup>11</sup>

Back in Chicago, Barack faced a trio of responsibilities: he could finally begin full-time work at Davis, Miner, Barnhill & Galland, he would continue to work on his book manuscript so that he would have something far better than what he had sent Poseidon for Jane Dystel to show to possible new publishers, and at the end of March, he would start teaching at the University of Chicago Law School (UCLS). As Davis Miner’s newest and most junior member, Barack inherited a narrow office on the second floor of the 14 West Erie Street town house. With Allison Davis focused on housing development work, third-rank partner Chuck Barnhill based in Madison, Wisconsin, and George Galland specializing in health law issues, Judd Miner and fellow associate Jeff Cummings, the firm’s other African American attorney, would be the colleagues with whom Barack would work the most.

Judd was litigating two major city council redistricting challenges, Barnett v. City of Chicago and a pair of cases in St. Louis. All three had highly complicated procedural postures stemming from the involvement of multiple attorneys and the filing of successive complaints, and both cities had petitioned the respective federal courts to dismiss the cases. As of March 1993, Judd was trying to stave off initial defeats in both cities, and Barack immediately was thrown into the thick of two difficult, complex challenges. Virtually all of his time was devoted to researching and drafting arguments for Judd's various motions and responses, and Judd later said that "Barack's work was enormously thoughtful and always well done."

With another associate, Mark Kende, leaving in April to become a law professor, Barack also inherited a federal district court case in which the firm was representing Ahmad Baravati, a stockbroker who had won a National Association of Securities Dealers arbitration award of $180,000 against the firm that previously had employed him and now was contesting that ruling. Additional filings were necessary because the firm, Josephthal, Lyon & Ross, was challenging a standard industry practice.

Barack also continued to devote as much time as he could to trimming and polishing "Journeys in Black and White." Allison Davis, whose spacious office adjoined Barack's narrow quarters, often saw him with his feet up on the desk and a keyboard in his lap, typing away on some part of the manuscript. George Galland, the most businesslike of the Chicago partners, sometimes expressed concern about Barack's priorities, but Barack's easy manner—"very self-assured, very directed, very bright, good sense of humor," Davis said—made for an easy transition to his primary new job. In addition, everyone at the firm seemed to realize that practicing law would occupy Barack for only so long. As young partner Laura Tilly put it, "from the first day he walked in, it was clear that this was not the end of his career." Everyone knew "this guy is not going to be here drafting loan documents in five years."<sup>12</sup>

UCLS's unusual eight-week quarters meant that Barack's Current Issues in Racism and the Law would meet once a week for two hours from late March to late May. Barack had been an occasional presence at the law school throughout the fall and winter, and Douglas Baird, the colleague who knew him best, recommended Barack to Jesse Ruiz, a first-year student who had grown up in Roseland and whose father had worked at Wisconsin Steel. Ruiz introduced himself to Barack, who mentioned his own Roseland background, and Ruiz realized that three years earlier he had read the Tribune story about Barack's Law Review presidency while he was considering law school. As word of the new instructor spread among UCLS's minority students, "we were excited about having a black professor," 2L Gabriel Gore recalled. That was unsurprising given a setting in which there were so "very few" black faces that "law students of color were questioned about whether they were in fact law students," 2L Jeanne Gills explained. A half-dozen African Americans were among the twelve or so law students who were joined by several social science graduate students who signed up for Barack's class.

Barack structured the course in two parts. For the first four weeks, he assigned a heavy load—some 550 pages total—of selected readings, what he called "a basic primer" surveying the role of race in American law from the colonial period and slavery to Reconstruction and then the twentieth century. Barack had retained a copy of Randall Kennedy's Harvard Law School syllabus for the Race, Racism, and American Law course he had briefly attended, and essays by well-known historical figures—Booker T. Washington, W. E. B. Du Bois, and Marcus Garvey—were followed by Brown v. Board of Education (1954), Martin Luther King Jr.'s "Letter from a Birmingham Jail" (1963), and a trio of well-known Supreme Court decisions from the 1970s: San Antonio v. Rodriguez (1973), Washington v. Davis (1976), and Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation. The readings ended with brief excerpts from contemporary race commentators like Derrick Bell and Shelby Steele, and most of the packet was made up of selections that Barack had previously read and annotated. A cover note said, "You'll see that much of the material has been marked up," but "my wife tells me that she wouldn't have minded getting the professor's notations on her reading material when she was in law school."

The final four weeks featured topical presentations by three- or four-student groups on a current issue of their choice. Barack's syllabus offered a dozen or so possibilities, such as racial reparations. "Do such proposals have any realistic chance of working their way through the political system?" he asked. University hate speech regulations was another. "Are such codes a reasonable measure to protect minorities from harassment, or is the cure worse than the disease?" A third was affirmative action and "the meaning of merit. . . . Do minorities gain or lose when fixed notions of merit give way to more flexible standards for allocating goods and privileges?" The presentations should "draw out the full spectrum of views on the issue you're dealing with" and do so with "rigor and specificity." Each student also would submit a paper of at least twelve pages, and Barack requested "a focused, tightly-crafted argument, and analytic rigor in working through the legal or policy problems raised by your topic." He also expected "a thorough examination of the diversity of opinion that exists on the issue or theme" and "a willingness . . . to take a stand and offer concrete proposals or approaches." The presentation and the paper each would count for 40 percent of a student's grade, with a fifteen-minute quiz on the last day of class constituting the other 20 percent. It would require identifying five or six quotations "whose sources will be obvious to anyone who has done the reading" and absorbed the presentations.

Julie Fernandes, a 2L, remembered the class as "a professor-led conversation that was very inclusive and very exploratory, very intellectual in a really good way." The readings were instructive for students who "weren't aware of the foundational nature of the race question" in American law. Brett Hart, another 2L, found it "much more conversational" than other courses and 2L Jeanne Gills remembered "very constructive conversations," particularly about race. Gabe Gore remembered that the social science grad students "would make comments that would make all of us law students kind of laugh," but Barack explored them and seemed to "find them relevant and interesting." Julie Fernandes thought it was "a great class" in part because Barack "didn't allow me to rest on my assumptions about the world," and 2L Julia Bronson said Barack was "very easygoing" with a "confident demeanor" yet "friendly and pleasant." Elaine Horn, another 2L, remembered that her paper argued against adding a new category for multiracial individuals to the U.S. Census, and only two years later did she learn that Barack was biracial.<sup>13</sup>

By April 1993 Michelle Obama had worked for the city of Chicago for eighteen months, but her shift the previous fall to Valerie Jarrett's Planning and Development department had failed to satisfy her need for truly fulfilling work. Leaving Sidley for the public sector "still wasn't enough, because city government is like a corporation in many ways," Michelle later explained. Like Barack, "we both wanted to effect the community on a larger scale than either of us could do individually," and "we wanted to do it outside of big corporations."

Barack's service on the national board of the nascent Public Allies network had entailed little in the sixteen months since the initial late 1991 conference in Wisconsin, but by early 1993, in part thanks to grants from the Woods Fund and the Joyce and MacArthur Foundations, Public Allies was about to supplement its first chapter in Washington, D.C., with a second one in Chicago that would debut in September. Field director Jason Scott, Public Allies' third national staffer after cofounders Katrina Browne and Vanessa Kirsch, "started going out to Chicago" by early fall 1992, relying primarily on John McKnight and his Northwestern colleague Jody Kretzmann, plus Jacky Grimshaw, to tell him whom to see.

Barack was high on the list, and Jason met him for coffee in a dreary basement cafeteria near Project VOTE!'s South Michigan Avenue office. Barack was "pretty impressive," but Public Allies' band of mid-twenties enthusiasts was having a difficult time selling their training and mentorship model to leaders whose organizations would host the young recruits—"allies"—who were eager to begin public service careers.

In February, Public Allies sublet a small office at 332 South Michigan—the same building from which Barack had run Project VOTE!—and lined up Tim Webb, a University of Chicago graduate student, to head the incipient Chicago project. Scores of eighteen-to-twenty-somethings eager to become "allies" were easily recruited, in part because the several dozen who eventually would be chosen would make $14,000 or more during their year of service, with the hope being that the host organizations would so love the highly motivated, well-mentored young people that they would add them to their permanent staff after the initial sponsored year ended. A kickoff event called "Tomorrow's Leaders Today" at which those young people would be introduced to potential organizational sponsors was scheduled for April 20. On the last day of March, the Chicago Tribune ran a feature story heralding the new effort. April's Chicago Magazine ran a brief profile of Webb, but behind the scenes, Barack told Jason Scott and Vanessa Kirsch that they should try to recruit an older, far-better-credentialed Chicago director than the twenty-four-year-old Webb, namely Barack's wife Michelle. So "Vanessa and I went to see Michelle" with that idea, and "she more or less threw us out of her office," Scott recalled. "I have this great job. Why would I leave? I can't believe Barack put you up to this."

At home on South Euclid, however, the newlyweds renewed their conversation about wanting to "affect the community on a larger scale." Barack now had a respectable monthly paycheck from Davis Miner, plus extra income from his UCLS teaching. Michelle was earning almost $67,000 at her city job; would Public Allies' foundation support allow her to avoid too great a reduction if she followed through on Barack's gambit? Jason Scott was the second if not the first to learn what she had decided. Michelle "literally called back two weeks later and took the job," which was doubly surprising because "we hadn't actually offered her the job," Jason recalled. "All I remember is like 'I'll take the job!'" The top trio's astonishment turned quickly to joy because "we were just so honored and excited to be able to hire her," Katrina Browne explained.

Things came together quickly thanks to support from Echoing Green, a nonprofit sponsor of social entrepreneurs that already was assisting Public Allies. Echoing Green agreed to cover Michelle's student loan payments, and the Chicago participants celebrated because "getting her was quite a coup." The five-year age gap between the twenty-nine-year-old Michelle and the recent college graduates seemed as large as Barack's age difference had at Harvard, but with Michelle on board, the long-scheduled April 20 kickoff event took on new significance and quickly acquired an all-star roster of speakers and attendees. Barack served as master of ceremonies, and keynote remarks were offered by Father Mike Pflieger and young Jesse Jackson Jr. Mayor Richard Daley and Illinois governor Jim Edgar were in attendance, and Barack introduced Daley's commissioner of planning and development, Valerie Jarrett, who then introduced Public Allies' new Chicago director. Only when Michelle Obama stepped forward did young participants like Bethann Hester discover who the new boss would be. Everyone was ecstatic to have her, and as national finance director Julian Posada explained, for all of Public Allies, "the bar when she walked in was raised, from day one."<sup>14</sup>

By late spring, thanks to both his own improved discipline and agent Jane Dystel's efforts, Barack had a brand-new lifeline for "Journeys in Black and White." The manuscript was still not complete, but all the work Barack had done in Bali and upon his return gave Dystel renewed confidence that a new publishing house would find the manuscript highly appealing. She telephoned Henry Ferris, a young editor at Times Books who earlier had worked at Simon & Schuster and then Houghton Mifflin. Dystel explained what had happened at Poseidon and raved about Barack's background and his now highly personal story. Ferris agreed to read it, and when he did, he was struck by Barack's "incredible gift for language and storytelling." The manuscript was still "quite raw" and much too long, even though Barack still had not completed the final section recounting his 1988 journey to meet his Kenyan relatives.

Thanks in significant part to Rob Fisher's insistent advocacy, Barack had "radically restructured" the book into a far more personal narrative than he initially had envisioned. "Originally it was going to be very much an academic book, focusing on civil rights law and civil rights policies," Barack explained a few months later. But "as I wrote it, it ended up becoming much more of a personal reflection on what it means for me to be an African American, and what my relationship is to this community as well as to Africa." Several years later Barack confessed that he had "sometimes thought 'Was it worth it for me to write the book?'" but Rob's encouragement, plus the $40,000 he owed Simon & Schuster, had helped force him to make the successful expedition to Bali to carry out the restructuring Rob had advocated. "In retrospect I can't imagine anything harder actually than writing a book," Barack later explained, "because it's very hard to feel confident consistently that what you have to say about your life is interesting in any way whatsoever."

But Henry Ferris's reaction made that self-doubt moot, and when Henry shared the manuscript with his immediate boss, Times Books publisher Peter Osnos, his response was similar. "I liked it, Henry liked it," and they told Dystel they would offer a $40,000 advance, but they wanted to meet Barack in person before issuing a contract. Sometime late that spring, Barack, and apparently Michelle, flew to New York so that Barack could introduce himself to Ferris and Osnos at Times Books' offices on East 50th Street. Their conversation was "spectacularly routine," Osnos later recounted, and "led fairly rapidly to the acquisition of the book, whereupon it moved into Henry's hands" to edit. By early summer Ferris was immersed in recommending condensation after condensation to Barack so as to shrink and tighten the oversized manuscript, and a formal contract was executed. Times Books would pay that $40,000 not to Barack, but directly to Simon & Schuster, thereby removing a huge load from the finances of a young couple who still faced substantial Harvard Law School loan debts. There had been no reason for Michelle to accompany Barack to Times Books' offices, but a most unlikely witness clearly remembered seeing them together on that visit.

"It was a sunny day," somewhere "in the 50s" on Manhattan's East Side. "I saw him walking down the street, Madison Avenue, and he was with a young African American woman . . . and they had shopping bags, and I was walking towards them," Alex McNear recalled, "and all of a sudden they crossed the street." Presumably Alex was a beautiful blond part of his past that Barack did not want to revisit, at least not with Michelle in tow, and Alex always remembered the sudden avoidance. "I can almost picture it."<sup>15</sup>

With their modest finances now in relatively good order, thanks primarily to Barack's $70,000 salary at Davis Miner, the young couple began to look for a home of their own as they approached the two-year anniversary of their co-occupancy of Marian Robinson's modest house in South Shore. They focused on

Hyde Park, and by midsummer, they were ready to close on a spacious, 2,200-square-foot, four-bedroom first-floor condominium in handsome East View Park. Built in the 1920s as a rental development and converted to condominiums in 1976, East View's eleven three-story brick and stone buildings each had six flats of side-by-side floor-through units that faced a handsome private park with convenient, resident-only roadway parking. From the entrance of the Obamas' unit, a living room with a beautiful green-tiled fireplace plus an adjoining front sun parlor preceded three private bedrooms and a pair of bathrooms. A spacious dining room led into the kitchen, off of which were a small maid's room, a half bath with laundry facilities, and a small outdoor rear porch.

The price was $277,500, and with a 40 percent down payment—$111,000—the Obamas obtained a good mortgage rate. Barack later said that his grandmother Madelyn “helped a little bit on the down payment,” which was likely quite an understatement: neither Barack nor Michelle had any significant savings, and a retired, now-widowed bank vice president who for the last quarter century had lived in a modest apartment may well have provided the entire $111,000. Barack later acknowledged that “our combined monthly student loan” payments were “more than our mortgage,” and although Michelle had a nice Saab, which Barack borrowed whenever he could, Barack was still driving the rusty, off-yellow Toyota Tercel that had carried him to Harvard in 1988 and offered passengers a clear view of the pavement below.

Before moving in, Barack and Michelle wanted to modernize some features, particularly the kitchen, and Barack's uncle Charles Payne, whose own Hyde Park home remodeling they much admired, gave them the names of his contractors. Some months later, when a prospective purchaser of another East View unit asked his realtor about the prospects of updating the apartment, the Obamas “graciously and politely” gave the agent and her client a tour of their home. “Their apartment was shown to us as an example of how you can take a dump and make a gorgeous pearl out of it. It was breathtakingly beautiful,” he recalled. “Most striking” of all was the Obamas' kitchen, which was “gorgeously renovated.”

The move to Hyde Park, where all manner of retail stores, casual restaurants, lakefront parkland, basketball courts, and even the law school were within comfortable walking distance, represented a significant quality-of-life upgrade from South Shore, whose principal shopping street, East 71st, was littered with countless tattered storefronts. The barbershop Barack had patronized since he first arrived in Hyde Park was just a few blocks away, and a wide variety of local men, from grad students to old Harvard acquaintances to UC security guards, remember Barack as a regular basketball player at the UC's gym, at a lakefront court a few blocks south, and at a small church across from Jesse Jackson Sr.'s Operation PUSH headquarters.

Soon after moving to East View, Barack also became a customer at the local movie rental store, Video Good Guys on East 55th Street. Owner Garland Cox noted that the new patron had the same first name as a friendly regular, to whom he mentioned the coincidence later that day. “We just had another Barack sign up today,” Cox told Barack Echols, whose mother, Sandra Hansen, twenty-six years earlier had named her son after the impressive friend who had helped her flee Nairobi and return home to Illinois. Echols had spent four years in the U.S. Army before resuming his undergraduate studies at the University of Chicago, and he had read about the younger Obama when Barack was elected Law Review president.

“Is it Barack Obama?” Echols asked Cox, who confirmed his guess. “I'm actually named after his father,” Echols explained, mentioning his mother's time in Kenya. Echols lived right across the street and told Cox to call him the next time Obama came in. A week or so later, Cox telephoned, and Echols ran across to introduce himself. “My name is Barack too,” he told an astonished Obama, and pulled out his driver’s license as proof. “I heard all these stories about ‘big Barack’ growing up,” he told Obama. “Wow, that’s really interesting. What an incredible story,” Obama replied. “‘We should talk again,’ which of course we never did,” Echols later recounted, for in truth Barack was no more interested in revisiting his father’s years in Kenya than he was in running into Alex McNear.

The move to East View put Barack and Michelle just a block from where her brother Craig and his wife Janis lived. Given their proximity, Janis recalled that Michelle “would come over all the time,” and Janis and Craig regularly visited Barack and Michelle’s “huge” apartment. Craig remembered that at one family gathering, Barack said that some day he might run for public office, and when Craig mentioned alderman, Barack demurred. “He said no—at some point he’d like to run for the U.S. Senate. And then he said, ‘Possibly even run for president at some point.’” Craig was puzzled. “President? President of what?” he asked. Barack made his intent clear, but Craig balked. “Don’t say that too loud. Someone might hear you and think you were nuts.”

Craig, as Michelle’s only sibling, and Maya Soetoro, as her brother’s closest relative, each believed that Barack and Michelle were very good for each other. Maya had just married a fellow University of Hawaii undergraduate, Gary Forth, a New Zealand-born rugby player four years her senior, and Barack later starkly regretted something he said to her about it. “The worst piece of advice that I have given to anybody was to my younger sister,” he replied to a questioner. “I once told her that she should—well no, actually, I probably shouldn’t tell that story . . . Let me pull back on that . . . I think it’s too personal.” By the next spring, Gary would file for an uncontested divorce, and the short-lived union formally dissolved some months later.

Maya viewed Michelle as “fiercely pragmatic,” and thus “much more like our grandmother” than their mother Ann. Craig believed it was “readily apparent” that Barack “could stand up to” Michelle’s outspoken demeanor, but he thought the real key to Barack and Michelle’s relationship was that Barack “knew how to manage my sister’s personality,” and Michelle’s startling move to Public Allies clearly reflected the impact of her husband’s counsel.<sup>16</sup>

Michelle now faced the challenge of running a start-up organization whose first class of twenty-seven Public Allies would be chosen and introduced to their organizational sponsors by early September. On many Sundays Barack and Michelle attended the 11:00 A.M. service at Trinity United Church of Christ, but neither of them became active in any of Trinity’s extensive range of volunteer ministries. An Ebony magazine survey of “The 15 Greatest Black Preachers” ranked fifty-two-year-old Jeremiah Wright as number two in the nation, and Trinity’s membership now approached eight thousand.

Barack also disdained any serious involvement in a new political venture that organizing veterans Keith Kelleher of SEIU Local 880 and Madeline Talbott of ACORN were trying to launch in Chicago. The “New Party” was the brainchild of two progressive electoral strategists, Danny Cantor and Joel Rogers, the latter of whom was married to Sarah Siskind, a Madison-based partner in the Davis Miner law firm. The founders initially envisioned the party as a left-wing “fusion” presence in New York State, where candidates could run for office on multiple parties’ ballot lines. They hoped to build an entity whose independent presence would encourage Democratic politicians to move leftward so as to secure supplementary support. In Illinois they would also launch a sibling group, “Progressive Chicago,” as a “support organization to . . . bring people into the New Party.”

Once again, Jacky Grimshaw told Kelleher to be sure to contact Barack, and at a late-July meeting, Keith explained both vehicles. They wanted to recruit signers for an initial introductory letter that would announce the creation of Progressive Chicago, and Kelleher noted that Barack is “more than happy to be involved” but was busy with Davis Miner’s work on the Chicago City Council redistricting case. Barack thought Chicago politicians would see value in the fusion concept—“some of those guys would love to get support outside [their] normal constituency”—but “will be cautious if it offends regular Democrats” and you “don’t want to have to force people into [the] New Party.” Barack recommended to Keith a number of people whom he had met during Project VOTE!—Sam Burrell and several other black aldermen, Carol Harwell, South Side political activist Ron Davis, and South Side state senator Alice Palmer. Barack wanted to see the initial Progressive Chicago letter his name would go on, and he said he “could make a mtg. but can’t put too much into it.”

Some weeks later the letter, featuring former Project VOTE! chairman Joe Gardner’s name atop a modest list of signers that also included Talbott, Kelleher, Harwell, and Davis, explained that the new group would “unite progressive activists and organizations for progressive, grassroots electoral activity in local elections” in “a renewal of the old Harold Washington coalition.” But national cofounder Joel Rogers, writing in the socialist weekly In These Times, emphasized far grander plans. Since “both major parties are dominated by big business interests” and offered only “permanent candidates” who are “literally addicted to the private money that regularly returns them to office,” the New Party hoped “one day to be the new majority party of the United States.” Repeated efforts by Kelleher, Talbott, and Rogers to interest Barack in the New Party fell on entirely deaf ears.<sup>17</sup>

Before summer’s end, Barack agreed to again teach Current Issues in Racism and the Law in the spring of 1994, and he updated his UCLS biographical sketch to indicate that his forthcoming book would be published by Random House—Times Books’ parent company—rather than Poseidon’s Simon & Schuster. Barack turned down an offer from Northwestern University law dean Robert Bennett, who five years earlier had been unable to convince him to accept that full-tuition scholarship, to pursue a full-time faculty post there, although Barack did “jokingly tell me that he had made a bad mistake” in not accepting the previous offer. On the first Saturday in September, Barack and Michelle drove out to Oak Park for his organizing colleague David Kindler’s wedding, and the organizers all ended up in the balcony of the Frank Lloyd Wright–designed Unity Temple.

“Very shortly after the wedding began, two doves began to procreate on the ledge of the rafters,” Kevin Jokisch recalled. “The doves were very active, feathers were flying,” and they were “very visible and close to us.” Barack “was one of the first to notice and point out the doves,” and stage-whispered that “this marriage is truly blessed.” Those around him tried to suppress their laughter as Michelle shooshed her husband and “told all of us to be quiet” and watch the proceedings, not the copulating birds.

Several weeks later Crain’s Chicago Business published a prototypical “40 Under Forty” feature, and cited Barack for having “galvanized Chicago’s political community as no seasoned politician had before” with Project VOTE!’s 1992 success. In a comment starkly illuminating his view of law practice, Barack told Crain’s, “it is an accomplishment to make a difference,” while “it’s no accomplishment to be a partner in a law firm.” When another interviewer asked about Barack’s political plans, his answer was similarly revealing:

My general view about politics and running for office is that if you end up being fortunate enough to have the opportunity to serve, it's because you've got a track record of service in the community, and I think right now I'm still building up that track record, and if it, a point comes where I think that I can do more good in a political office than I can doing the things I'm doing now, then I might think about it, but that time is certainly in the future.

Late that year, Barack accepted invitations to join two boards. The Center for Neighborhood Technology (CNT) had an eclectic interest in grassroots development initiatives and was now home base for both Jacky Grimshaw and the late Al Raby's closest friend Steve Perkins. Barack attended a few meetings, but never connected substantively with CNT's work. Barack's good friend Jean Rudd initiated a similar invite from the Woods Fund, which had just added a third professional staff member, Kaye Wilson, to direct a new grant program focusing on welfare-to-work policies that impacted poor families. "You don't decide to go on a foundation board. You get asked," Jean emphasized, noting how "it was quite an honor for someone of that age to be invited on."

On one snowy Friday that winter, Barack did a traditional Alinsky-style power analysis training for Michelle's first-year group of twenty-seven Public Allies. "He talked about what power meant," Michelle's assistant Julie Alfred remembered, "money or numbers." Michelle had spent countless hours obtaining organizational placements for her trainees, plus moving the group to better quarters and cadging secondhand furniture from McKinsey & Co.'s Chicago office thanks to old Harvard acquaintance Bernard Loyd, for whose recent home purchase Barack had done the legal work. Along with her top aide Julian Posada, Michelle also worked to assemble a local advisory board of interested civic figures. Foundation director Sunny Fischer was an early recruit, as were two executives from the investment firm William Blair & Co., which provided financial assistance as well. Posada also approached attorney Jan Anne Dubin, who was surprised when Michelle Obama turned out to be the former summer associate who had worked for her eight years earlier at Chadwell & Kayser as Michelle Robinson.

With her young staffers and trainees, Michelle's "demeanor was always tough love," Posada explained. She was "a great boss" but also "pretty tough," Julie Alfred agreed. Bethann Hester, a 1993–94 Ally who then went on staff, recalled how at 10:00 A.M. they often saw Barack reading the sports section at a Starbucks equidistant from both Public Allies' new office and Davis Miner. When writing legal briefs, Barack explained, "you have to relax your brain." Michelle regularly had her staffers over to East View, where Barack was working on his book, and Julie Alfred remembered being "really taken aback that he had a pack of Marlboro Reds there." Barack's heavy smoking—always heavier than he was willing to admit—was the subject of recurring objections from Michelle. "They were constantly making deals" about it, Bethann recalled. "He could smoke until he finished" the book, and "he had to go outside," on the wooden porch "in the back of the house."

Michelle's vices were limited primarily to television series like MTV's The Real World, which she told Public Allies colleagues counted as professional development work. When Barack's old friend Phil Boerner wrote in early March 1994 to announce the birth of his and his wife Karen's first child, Barack replied with an informative note that confirmed the Allies' impressions. "I must say that I'm thinking about a family of my own. In fact, I'm more than half-way there, since I got married last year," he told Phil while enclosing a picture of Michelle. Barack mentioned his law practice and his course at UCLS, and said, "I'm finishing up a book that will hopefully be published next year." Their old freshman roommate

Imad Husein “seems to be doing fine in Pakistan,” and Barack had lost touch with old friend Paul Carpenter. “I still have the nicotine habit, but Michelle has made me promise to quit as soon as the book is done. Otherwise, no babies!”<sup>18</sup>

At UCLS, Barack’s second iteration of Current Issues in Racism and the Law began on Tuesday afternoon, March 29. Given his heavy workload at Davis Miner, Barack otherwise spent little time in his law school office, now room 403, but his colleague David Strauss recalled Barack speaking about race at an early 1994 faculty workshop where someone asked him about journalist Ellis Cose’s new book The Rage of a Privileged Class, which addressed the anger felt by many black professionals over recurring experiences with discrimination. Barack acknowledged that Cose “has got a point,” although such books are “all a little whiny.” Strauss was struck by how “undogmatic” Barack was about race. “This guy’s playing it straight—he’s not striking a pose.”

Barack’s students from his first time teaching and now the second had a similar impression of him. One 2L who was among the fourteen students who enrolled asked a female classmate who had the course a year earlier what she thought of it. Instead she described Barack. “He’s so beautiful. He looks like food. It looks like someone made him.” Once she “got beyond how good-looking he was, she also described what a terrific teacher he was,” Adam Gross recalled.

Barack’s syllabus and readings were almost entirely unchanged from a year earlier—only a brief recent essay by Cornel West was added at the end. Gross found it to be a “really interesting and provocative reading list,” and Barack “would frequently show up wearing a suit,” coming straight from Davis Miner to their basement-level seminar room carrying a “battered satchel.” Susan Epstein, a 2L, realized he was “very bright” and an “excellent teacher,” and Adam Gross thought he was “this luminous guy” whom classmates viewed as “sort of a rock star.” One day that image took a serious hit when “his bag of stuff got sort of knocked over and a pack of cigarettes came out and people were like ‘Ugh!’ shattered,” Adam remembered.

Gross recalled how Barack’s “tie would always be off by the time the class started” and “he was really insistent, in every class and on every subject, that we clearly articulate all of the arguments on all sides.” Susan Epstein was struck by how it was “a very diverse class in an otherwise largely white school,” a class with “a real wide range of political perspectives.” Even with each session featuring what Adam remembered as “really hard discussions about incredibly complicated issues,” everyone was always “incredibly respectful” and Barack did “an amazing job” of “making certain we teased out all sides,” that “every angle and every nuance” was covered.

In sharp contrast to many Chicago professors, particularly the fiery and intense Richard Epstein, whose Socratic questioning never left any doubt as to what the right answer was, Barack’s approach was “incredibly refreshing.” Susan Epstein realized that Barack “never really said what his view was,” and 2L Rob Mahnke believed Barack “was very guarded about what he was thinking,” as if “he was masking his own views.” During the second half of the quarter, when the students’ group presentations took place, discussions were “very student-directed” and Barack “didn’t talk that much,” Adam remembered.

When Barack did speak up, he talked about “what policies could be enacted that would make a true difference,” Susan recalled. Barack “spent a fair amount of time talking about political rhetoric,” asking that “even if this might be a good policy, how would you get it enacted—what pragmatic steps would you need to take in the framing of it?” Yet despite eight weeks of persistent questioning by Barack, “I couldn’t tell you at the end of it what his views were.” That did not count against Barack when course evaluation forms were distributed at the end. On a ten-point scale, the students’ overall evaluation of Barack’s teaching performance was 9.1.<sup>19</sup>

At Davis Miner, the December 1993 hiring of another young associate, John Belcaster, a 1992 Yale Law School graduate, meant that Barack no longer was the firm’s most junior member. Barack also pressed his best friend Rob Fisher, who had been doing so much yeoman work on Barack’s book manuscript, to consider moving to Chicago in order to join the firm. Rob visited and formally interviewed, meeting and impressing everyone and immediately receiving an offer. Rob also was impressed with Barack and Michelle’s “beautiful” and “spacious” East View Park apartment, where old friend Ken Mack also stayed during a spring 1994 visit. But Rob finally decided that moving to Chicago would take him too far away from his southern Maryland family.

On Thursday, April 7, the U.S. Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals heard oral argument in Baravati v. Josephthal, Lyon & Ross, the arbitration award case Barack had inherited a year earlier. It was Barack’s first significant courtroom appearance, and his seventeen minutes of remarks and answers to a three-judge panel headed by prominent chief judge Richard A. Posner demonstrated that Barack was well prepared and fully conversant with the issues presented. He spoke clearly and responsively when Posner and his colleagues asked questions, and at the end Posner commended Barack and his opposing counsel for presenting “very good arguments.” Barack’s client, Ahmad Baravati, thought he was “a very smart, innovative, skilled, relentless advocate,” and less than three months later, the panel unanimously affirmed the district court’s award of $180,000 in both actual and punitive damages to Baravati.

A few weeks later, Barack joined Judd Miner as Judd sought to revive the firm’s case against the 1991 redistricting of Chicago’s city council before another three-judge panel also headed by Posner. But Barack spent almost all of his work hours at Davis Miner, not in Chicago courtrooms. That Barnett case was a recurring constant in Barack’s workday life, and Judd remembered one occasion when Barack was “really upset” and “unhappy” that one brief was not as good as he had hoped. Barack also “was spending as much, perhaps more” of his time “on the other side of our practice,” in the transactional work handled by Allison Davis, Bill Miceli, and Laura Tilly. Davis represented Bishop Arthur M. Brazier’s Woodlawn Preservation and Investment Corp., a major development presence in the struggling Woodlawn neighborhood just south of Hyde Park. Davis also was interested in development prospects in the deeply troubled Near North Cabrini-Green area. On one occasion, Davis remembered, “I asked Barack if he wanted to represent” one or another development entity there, “and he said ‘No, I don’t want to see poor people thrown out.’”

Barack felt no such qualms about Section 8 bond transactions for the Chicago Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation, loans for the nonprofit Local Initiative Support Corporation (LISC), or work for the Near North Health Service Corporation. Laura Tilly remembered that Barack “carried himself with such confidence and authority” and how he “was just terrific with clients. They just loved him.” Some days Barack, Jeff Cummings, Paul Strauss, and John Belcaster ate lunch in the firm’s basement conference room, with Barack reading the newspaper. On other days they went around the corner to Thai Star or across the street to PK’s Place, a small, family-owned Greek diner.

The four men talked about sports more often than legal issues or politics, but a regular presence in their lives were the residents of the adjoining single-room-occupancy Dana Hotel, at 666 North State Street. One fellow named Tony regularly drank in Davis Miner's small parking lot and enjoyed greeting Barack, but one day after lunch "right in the middle of State Street is this white-haired older fellow who we see every day," John Belcaster recounted, "wearing nothing but a shirt." "We all know him, he's a recognizable face," but "my initial reaction nonetheless is to move away from him," and ditto for Jeff and Paul. Yet Barack "takes this older white fellow by the elbow and walks him to the curb. He's the only one among us to literally extend the hand of human kindness to get this guy out of harm's way."

Mental impairment rather than drink was at issue, and as the men walked back to the law firm, Paul Strauss voiced a rhetorical question. "You know what's really sad about what we've just seen? What's sad is that that guy at one point was a youngster like our young kids who had parents who loved him, and now look what's happened to him." Barack disagreed. "No, Paul. You know what's really sad about this? That guy quite likely never had anybody at home who loved him. That's what's really sad."

Barack's childhood still offered him perspectives different from those of the offspring of nuclear families, but Davis Miner was a group of attorneys whose views of the legal profession were highly atypical, even among self-identified civil rights lawyers. "All of the folks at that firm had a certain ambivalence about the practice of law," John Belcaster explained, and indeed "a certain skepticism about . . . litigation in particular."

Barack's fundamental attitude, as John remembered it, was wholly in keeping with everything Barack and Rob Fisher had written back at Harvard. "The pathway to civil rights and justice in the past generation has been the courthouse. That in many ways has been where the battles have been won and fought," John recalled Barack saying. But "going forward, I don't see the battles being won and fought in the courthouse from this point forward." Instead, "from my vantage, the problems of our times are going to be solved not in the courthouses of America but in the statehouses of America. The problems of our time are going to be addressed by folks organizing, folks petitioning, folks legislating through problems."

"That stuck with me," Belcaster recounted, because "it's somewhat uncanny to hear that in a law firm context." Yet Judd Miner, who had been patiently litigating difficult and lengthy race discrimination and voting rights cases for several decades, was anything but romantic about lawyers' lives. "Practicing law is a pretty shitty job," he later explained. "You spend an enormous amount of time on keeping your head above water. There are just a million skirmishes that are unrelated to the end result. They're really tedious, it's irritating. It's not what anybody wants to do. I think it irritated Barack a lot," because "there was just a lot of this skirmishing that he didn't like. He didn't like just the game of lawyering," especially since "there's a certain combativeness that comes along with practicing law, and that's not Barack's instinct." As Barack similarly told Belcaster, "I joined this firm not to become some scorched-earth litigator," and Barack later bluntly declared that being a trial lawyer "was never attractive to me."<sup>20</sup>

In the late spring of 1994, Barack took off six weeks or so from Davis Miner to finish work on his book. Thanks in large part to the copies of his summer 1988 letters to Sheila Jager, the final portion of the manuscript, recounting his trip to Kenya and the stories of his African family, was now complete. Thanks to Henry Ferris's cutting and Rob Fisher's continued input, the earlier sections were no longer bloated, and the normally self-effacing Rob admitted, "I was deeply involved with helping him sort of shape it" and "had a big influence on" the final manuscript.

One particular issue Barack and Rob debated was how forthcoming the book should be about some of Barack's experiences before he first moved to Chicago. Rob knew that Barack "already had political ambitions” and that “the book was written with that in mind, no question about that,” so “we certainly struggled with the question of whether to include the fact that he had used illegal drugs.” Rob did not know the full extent of that, particularly from Barack’s post-Columbia years in New York, but “I was on the side of being honest about it,” and “there was no doubt that we wrestled with that, about what to put in and how much to put in.” Rob understood that Barack also had changed people’s names and melded some individuals into composite characters, but the manuscript now read more like a book than a series of journal entries from years past.

Michelle was ecstatic that the end of what was now a four-year-long struggle was finally in sight. “That book was very cathartic for him, and it was a hard book to write. It was very hard for him to get all the pieces and make sense of them.” Barack flew to New York to deliver his final revised typescript to Henry Ferris in a quick handoff in the elevator lobby outside Times Books’ offices. A few weeks later, after signing off on the final line edits, Henry called Barack to explain that in July he would be leaving Times Books, as well as getting married, and that another editor, Ruth Fecych, would shepherd the manuscript toward publication. Ruth read it herself, and remembered “suggesting cutting paragraphs he wanted to keep,” but by summer’s end the manuscript was in final copyediting and the end of Barack’s most difficult challenge in life was finally in sight.<sup>21</sup>

Barack was happy to tell colleagues like Keith Kelleher, who was striving to emulate Project VOTE!’s 1992 success with a 1994 voter drive, that his book was done. For the first time in four years, Barack could now consider other opportunities and involvements without having that burden looming over him. In his new role on the Woods Fund’s five-member board, Jean Rudd and Ken Rolling asked Barack to chair a special panel that would review Woods’s past decade of grants in support of organizing so as to inform how Woods could best aid “the Future of Organizing.” Barack was well acquainted with most of the other participants, who included Mary Gonzales, Jacky Grimshaw, Madeline Talbott, and Sokoni Karanja. That year alone Woods would allocate $105,000 to Madeline’s Chicago ACORN and $72,000 to Sokoni’s Centers for New Horizons, for “a new African-American leadership development institute,” plus another $20,000 to Public Allies Chicago.

The panel assembled for the first of four long discussions on Wednesday, June 29, with Ken Rolling and Barack describing the task ahead. Barack then posed three fundamental questions: “what is the definition of ‘community organizing’?,” “what is organizing effectiveness?,” and how effective is organizing in fostering leadership development? Barack “raised the concern that no one can name a leader in many community organizations, but everyone can name the lead organizer.” He pointedly asked, “have we built a cadre of community leaders, as the civil rights movement did?” Barack also questioned why local organizations were not more involved in policy arenas, and asserted that community organizing “has bought into three myths: 1) that self-interest needs to be small, ‘rinky-dink stuff’ . . . ; 2) that results need to be short-term to sustain interest by members and funders . . . a ‘quarterly report’ mentality; and 3) that leadership development ‘slows us down.’”

Ken Rolling acerbically noted that “the brains of some organizers are not as big as their egos,” and Barack agreed with Sokoni and Jacky that organizing tried too hard to fit leaders “into a mold rather than to tap their diverse talents.” When Barack asked, “do we have to manufacture conflict?” Sokoni said that he saw “seizing schools as the next real chapter in school reform.”

In advance of the second meeting, the panel’s secretary, Sandy O’Donnell, sent Ken and Barack some suggested topics, including whether organizing is “becoming strong enough to sustain quality career organizers? (or are they inevitably lost to downtown law firms & private foundations—just joking, you guys).” Barack sent panel members some agenda suggestions, including whether “organizing lacks the tactics to be effective in the policy arena,” and Barack focused their second discussion on “community organizing and public policy making.” Sandy’s notes recorded how “Barack challenged the group to think about a major problem with policy implications—overcrowding in the County Jail—and ask itself whether organizing would say ‘there’s no constituency (for change), so I won’t organize around it.’”

Responses were inchoate, so “Barack pushed further—citing health-care and welfare reform as two more examples of significant policy issues on which the voice of organizing has been silent. Why, he asked, especially when we know—having observed business roundtables & lobbying—how to be effective in the policy arena?” Again discussion faltered, so Barack asked “are there constraints in this (organizing) model that preclude longer term vision development?” and “whether lack of ambition is a problem.” Barack then expressly cited how in his own organizing experience, “despite his desire to get involved in the larger arena, ‘something was keeping me narrow’” and too locally oriented.

Barack began the group’s third session by asking: “is it the role of organizing to change the culture in a community?” Sokoni Karanja and veteran organizer Josh Hoyt said yes, and Barack noted how “this kind of goal—more specifically, having regular theological reflections on their work—was incorporated by community leaders early in his organizing career, but that it slipped off the agenda.” Barack acknowledged that “time constraints with leaders are intense,” but added that organizing has not “thus far been good at” framing “materialistic issues . . . in ways that build ‘internal capital—people having a sense of their importance’ in the civic sphere. Material issues can be used to overcome a ‘poverty of spirit.’” Barack asked whether issues should be chosen so as to optimize “the building of community spirit,” and Madeline Talbott observed that lots of attention was paid to “leadership development, but we don’t focus on membership development.”

The fourth and final discussion began with Madeline describing how ACORN recruited organizers from within their own neighborhoods, but Barack questioned whether such recruits “have staying power” and “strategy skills.” Madeline said “we’ve professionalized organizing to the point where we can’t make it a mass-based movement,” but Northwestern’s Jody Kretzmann wondered whether Woods and similar foundations could fund entry-level organizing jobs for “graduates of Public Allies.” Sokoni said he had “found supervising Public Allies enormously labor-intensive,” and Madeline stated that the fundamental problem was how difficult organizing was, not what it paid. The normally quiet Jean Rudd asked whether Woods should fund a “formal recruitment plan” for organizers, and Barack joined Madeline in demurring, saying “good recruiters must be good organizers. But good organizers think they have to be organizing all the time.”

Madeline noted how policy success depended upon talented specialists, like Don Moore in the field of school reform, and Barack suggested having organizers from all around Chicago meet monthly over dinner to discuss specific issues. Reflecting that a powerful five-part Chicago Sun-Times series had painfully detailed how Roseland, with 21 percent male unemployment, was “losing the war against gang intimidation and recruitment” as violent crime there “skyrocketed,” “Barack, Sokoni, and Madeline all thought that success in creating alternative structures to the gangs is highly dependent on moving the jobs issue.”

When Sandy O'Donnell wrote the panel's report, one strongly worded "finding" encapsulated Barack's sustained critique: "organizing has not been effective in many of the more fundamental scourges facing our low income communities" as economic change "eroded the jobs and wage bases" and "drugs, gangs, guns, crime," etc. increased. "The prevailing organizing model reinforces localized, short term thinking," and Woods resolved that organizing had to "move beyond individual neighborhood successes" and develop "links with broader coalitions." Barack's analysis had carried the day on all points, and the discussions repeatedly reflected strong continuities between the arguments he had articulated while at Harvard and his current political outlook.<sup>22</sup>

In the wider world of Chicago electoral politics, the spring Democratic primary had seen U.S. representative Mel Reynolds defeat state senator Bill Shaw and 17th Ward alderman Allan Streeter with a respectable but not overwhelming 56 percent of the vote. African American state attorney general Roland Burris lost the Democratic gubernatorial nomination to sixty-eight-year-old state comptroller Dawn Clark Netsch, who was now a decided underdog in the general election matchup against incumbent Republican governor Jim Edgar. Exiting Cook County Board president Richard Phelan had finished third in that gubernatorial primary, and in a major upset, African American 8th Ward committeeman and longtime county board member John Stroger won the nomination for the county board presidency, defeating two well-known female contenders.

A Chicago Sun-Times headline reported "Last-Minute Cash Netted Stroger Win" over a story detailing how two principal contributors were responsible for Stroger being able to mount a huge TV advertising blitz. Automobile dealer Al Johnson had been a crucial backer of the late Mayor Washington before becoming Mel Reynolds's finance chairman, and now John Stroger's. Johnson had given Stroger more than $50,000 and loaned his campaign another $5,000, but Stroger's largest contributor by far was Syrian-born housing developer Antoin "Tony" Rezko, who had contributed more than $69,000 and loaned Stroger an additional $98,500. Rezko also had emerged as the top contributor to 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle, who had received over $17,000 from a quintet of Rezko's entities.

City housing officials told the Hyde Park Herald that Rezko's Rezmar Corp., which had received more than $12.8 million in city funds to rehab hundreds of apartments, was a "top-notch" developer managing "some of the best-maintained buildings in the city." Preckwinkle said she was "grateful for the work he's done" in her Kenwood neighborhood, and later explained that affordable housing development "in my mind is God's work." That view was shared by Barack's colleagues at Davis Miner, who represented several nonprofit organizations that were partnering with Rezmar, which, as Laura Tilly remembered, "was a well-respected developer of affordable housing."

Looming over everything was the question of whether any truly credible candidate would step forward to challenge Mayor Richard Daley's upcoming spring 1995 reelection bid, and both Judd Miner and former Project VOTE! chairman Joe Gardner had prominent roles in a Chicago Tribune story headlined "Anti-Daley Forces Start to Beat Campaign Drums." State senator Alice Palmer, the Tribune said, has been "rumored for months to be a possible contender," just as the Sun-Times earlier had asserted that Palmer "could have sent Reynolds into early retirement" had she, rather than Shaw and Streeter, challenged the congressman in the Democratic primary.

Barack had met Preckwinkle and Palmer during Project VOTE!, and he had first met Tony Rezko four years earlier, in the summer of 1990, when David Brint had introduced Barack to his business partners.

By summer 1994, Rezko was talking up Obama to political friends like Fred Lebed, who had managed Attorney General Roland Burris's gubernatorial campaign before shifting into a similar role for John Stroger's general election race. At one 7:00 A.M. Stroger finance committee meeting, Rezko turned to Lebed and said, "I know someone you should meet. He reminds me a lot of you—a guy named Barack Obama. I want you to meet him—he's got political aspirations." Fred's reaction was what "a really goofy name," but Tony "sets up a meeting," and Lebed joined Obama at PK's Place, the Greek family diner just across from Davis Miner, at 8:30 A.M. on Tuesday, August 9. "Within five minutes, I'm blown away," Fred remembered, "just absolutely blown away."

Barack was interested in learning more about Chicagoland Democratic politics. Law firm colleague Paul Strauss remembered Barack talking about his interest in the congressional seat that Bobby Rush was challenging Charlie Hayes for back in 1992 when they ran into each other in Hyde Park, even before Barack joined Davis Miner, and George Galland thought Barack "was reasonably candid from the beginning that he had political ambitions." Project VOTE! fund-raiser John Schmidt was "pretty sure that in 1994 Barack talked to me about possibly running for the Cook County Board," which "I thought was a terrible idea" because "it wasn't a place that allowed any scope for talent." With a major donor like Tony Rezko talking up Barack to influential Democratic players like Fred Lebed, the purpose of their breakfast meeting "was to get to know each other," and step by step Barack began exploring the possibilities that Chicago politics offered.<sup>23</sup>

Just two days later South Side electoral politics were upended when Congressman Mel Reynolds held a "raucous press conference" at O'Hare Airport to denounce the Republican Cook County state's attorney for investigating allegations by a young woman that Reynolds had had sex with her two years earlier when she was sixteen years old. Reynolds sought to discredit her as a "homosexual lesbian" and an "emotionally disturbed nut case," and distributed copies of a sworn affidavit in which she recanted her story. Reynolds blasted the "racist justice system" for surveilling his telephone calls and told reporters, "this illustrates how . . . if you are an African American male, you are always vulnerable."

Two days later the Tribune reported that eighteen-year-old Beverly Heard was not Reynolds's only problem. Federal investigators had discovered that Reynolds had four campaign bank accounts, including one containing as much as $85,000, that he had failed to report to the Federal Election Commission. "Chicago's top business families, from the Pritzkers to the Crowns," the Tribune noted, have "poured money into Reynolds' coffers," and so long as the charges proved unfounded, the former Rhodes Scholar "has the potential to be an important figure in Washington," the Tribune editorialized.

Then, eight days after Reynolds's preemptive press conference, a Cook County grand jury indicted the congressman on twenty felony counts, ranging from sexual assault to obstruction of justice, involving his relationship with Beverly Heard. Tribune reporters expressed surprise at the "sweeping nature" of the charges, saying that "prosecutors have worried privately about the strength of the case and the veracity of" Heard. National coverage noted how Reynolds was "a rising star" who had been "the first black person from Illinois to win a Rhodes scholarship." Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal, who months earlier had praised state senator Alice Palmer as "among the brightest and most capable members of the Illinois General Assembly," soon reported that Palmer was "emerging as the leading candidate" to replace or challenge Reynolds, who would be unopposed on the November general election ballot.

Neal again commended Palmer as "one of the more intelligent, articulate, and productive members" of the state legislature, and the Tribune's John Kass highlighted how the prospect of Reynolds's congressional seat might dissuade Palmer from any further mayoral thoughts, even though she stood alone among black legislators in "never having sought an accommodation with Daley."<sup>24</sup>

Four days after Reynolds's indictment, the federal appeals court handed Judd Miner and his colleagues a major victory by unanimously reinstating the lawsuit challenging Chicago's existing city council districts. That would mean more voting rights work for Barack, but Barack also had an unusual paid speaking appearance coming up in Lincoln, Nebraska, as part of Nebraska Wesleyan's "University Forum." Barack's topic was "Community Revitalization," and he was identified as the author of the forthcoming book Mixing Blood: Stories of Inheritance. Barack began informally, acknowledging the importance of football in Nebraska, remarking, "I often don't trust Bill Clinton talking about values," and confessing that his wife enjoyed watching old TV reruns of The Dick Van Dyke Show and Ozzie and Harriet. But the subject Barack wanted to focus on was values. "It's easy to believe in civil rights and integration and busing if you send your kids to a private school," but "it's harder to believe in these values when you actually test them out." Barack's fundamental point was a challenging one: "it's not easy to live up to your ideals and your values. It requires sacrifice." He argued that point strongly:

If you don't live out those values, they don't mean much. And I think part of the cynicism we have about politics right now is a politics of symbolism that talks about values but does not live them out. And we all know that, and that's why people don't listen to politicians, and we don't get involved, because we know that we say one thing, and we do another thing, both personally and in the society. And so I would challenge you, first to think about what your values are, and think about whether you're living them out . . . whether you're contributing to the promotion of these values, or whether you're just giving lip service to them and not living them out.<sup>25</sup>

On October 7, Barack tardily updated his voter registration to reflect his move to East View Park from South Shore over a year earlier. A week or so later, ACORN formally retained him as its attorney in anticipation that Illinois Republican governor Jim Edgar's administration would fail to implement the new National Voter Registration Act, commonly called the motor voter law, which required states to offer the opportunity to register to vote to all citizens applying for or renewing a driver's license or public assistance and which would take effect on January 1.

An editor at National Public Radio's flagship program All Things Considered invited Barack to prepare a broadcast review of social scientists Richard J. Herrnstein and Charles Murray's brand-new book The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life, which was generating huge controversy over its discussion of the relationship between race and human intelligence. Barack was happy to sign on, but when he submitted his review, an NPR editor objected to his statement that race was not a biological construct, only a social one. She "wouldn't let him make the point," and "he was very offended," Rob Fisher recalled. Barack vented his dismay about "Some Things Considered" to Rob, but NPR did allow Barack, who was introduced as a "civil rights lawyer," to state that The Bell Curve featured "good old-fashioned racism" that was "artfully packaged." But Barack also said that the authors were right about the growing distance between the races. The violence and despair of the inner city are real. So's the problem of street crime. The longer we allow these problems to fester, the easier it becomes for white America to see all blacks as menacing and for black America to see all whites as racists. To close that gap . . . we're going to have to take concrete and deliberate action. For blacks, that means taking greater responsibility for the state of our own communities. Too many of us use white racism as an excuse for self-defeating behavior. Too many of our young people think education is a white thing, and that the values of hard work and discipline and self-respect are somehow outdated.

But at the same time, Barack went on, Americans must acknowledge “that we’ve never even come close to providing equal opportunity to the majority of black children,” such as having “well-funded and innovative public schools for all children” and jobs “at a living wage for everyone . . . jobs that can return some structure and dignity to people’s lives.” Such “ladders of opportunity,” Barack concluded, would be costly in the short term, but a wise investment in the long run, and a national failure to pursue them would reflect not “an intellectual deficit” but “a moral deficit.”<sup>26</sup>

With Mel Reynolds awaiting his upcoming criminal trial sometime in mid-1995, Alice Palmer on November 21 announced her all-but-official candidacy for Reynolds’s 2nd District congressional seat. Taking the high road, Palmer made no mention of Reynolds’s legal problems and instead said she was “very disappointed” with his voting record, particularly his support for the North American Free Trade Agreement. Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal proclaimed that Palmer had “preempted the field” of possible Reynolds challengers with her announcement. He also reported that Jesse Jackson Sr. had been “gently warned by South Side activists that he shouldn’t promote his son” Jesse Jr., who recently had bought a home in the district after finishing law school, “as an alternative to Palmer.” Once again praising Palmer as “probably the most intelligent member of the Illinois General Assembly,” Neal declared that Jackson Jr. “would be viewed as an interloper by the South Side black community” if he ran but that if “Jackson joins forces with Palmer,” he “could win Palmer’s seat in the Illinois Senate.” Palmer’s announcement sounded like a warning shot aimed at the twenty-nine-year-old Jackson: “I am not a newcomer to hard work . . . I am not a newcomer to coalition building . . . I am not a newcomer to independent politics . . . I am not a newcomer to the 2nd District.”

Ten days after Palmer’s announcement, Barack had a long conversation with his friend Ellen Schumer, a former UNO organizer with whom he had been speaking regularly for months as she began building a new organization of her own, Community Organizing and Family Issues (COFI). Schumer previously had worked for former congressman (and now judge) Abner Mikva and U.S. senator Paul Simon, so Ellen and Barack often talked about politics as well as COFI. Ellen’s notes from that conversation reflected that they “Spoke re: Election—B.O. interest in ‘organizing’ or politics. How to build or renew a movement—turn around Dem. party? B.O. not interested in Spfld [Springfield] or in running against Alice Palmer.”

Barack instead talked more about his discussions with Sokoni Karanja about a prospective leadership training and development project that the Bronzeville-based Karanja was calling the “Hope Center,” in honor of early-twentieth-century African American social reformer Lugenia Burns Hope. Eighteen months earlier Sokoni had been awarded a $320,000 MacArthur Foundation “genius grant” and the Woods Fund already had committed a further $72,000 toward his effort. Karanja wanted the Hope Center to rebuild the strength of the once-vibrant Bronzeville, the social center of black Chicago during the age of segregation.

“This community was literally vacuumed by the integration movement,” Sokoni had told a Washington Post reporter eighteen months earlier. “All of these people—the doctors, the lawyers, the business owners—moved out of here, and all they left were people.”

Barack was still doing a Friday training and offering other supportive input as Michelle, who that summer had shifted her law license to inactive status, shepherded her second-year class of forty Public Allies through their organizational placements. She also was busy building up an advisory board to help expand the program’s reach, one that included personal friends and former city colleagues Valerie Jarrett, Yvonne Davila, and Cindy Moelis, as well as early supporters such as Jacky Grimshaw and Sunny Fischer, young banker Ian Larkin, and youthful Morehouse College graduate Craig Huffman.

Barack’s range of acquaintances was growing too, and one of the most significant new ones was Deborah Leff, a 1977 University of Chicago Law School graduate who had become an award-winning producer at ABC News before being recruited as president of the Joyce Foundation in 1992. Thanks to a family timber fortune, Joyce for a quarter century had been a significant grant maker in the Great Lakes region that was its predominant focus. Several partners from Chicago’s Lord, Bissell & Brook law firm, including Harvard Law School graduate John T. “Jack” Anderson, and two Kennedy administration alumni, Richard K. Donahue and Charles U. Daly, Joyce’s president from 1978 to 1986, formed the core of the foundation’s board. Daly’s friend Lewis Butler, a former corporate lawyer greatly interested in the environment and health policy, and African American businessman Carlton Guthrie, a member of Trinity Church who, like Jack Anderson, had played high school basketball in Gary, Indiana, were also active mainstays, as was Paula Wolff, the president of south suburban Governors State University, who had a University of Chicago Ph.D. and strong ties to a trio of Republican Illinois governors.

Butler and Donahue shared Anderson and Guthrie’s passion for basketball, and Debbie Leff’s strong interest in adding diversity to Joyce’s board led her to University of Wisconsin labor law professor Carin Clauss and to Barack. Board members like Lew Butler thought that Debbie was an “extraordinary woman,” and when Leff recommended Barack to Jack Anderson as a desirable new board member, Anderson was duly impressed by his Law Review presidency and by Barack at an introductory breakfast. Barack’s election to Joyce’s board was announced just after Thanksgiving 1994.

Equally significant was Debbie Leff’s recommendation of Barack to a pair of fellow presidents of prominent Chicago foundations, Adele Smith Simmons at MacArthur and Patricia A. Graham at Spencer. One year earlier publishing billionaire Walter Annenberg had pledged $500 million from his personal fortune toward improving America’s public schools. Brown University and its president, Vartan Gregorian, would oversee how most of the money would be spent over a five-year period. Just months earlier, Wieboldt Foundation executive director Anne Hallett had left that post to create a new national network of urban school reformers, and University of Illinois at Chicago education professor Bill Ayers, one of the city’s most energetic reform advocates, immediately queried Hallett and new Joyce Foundation education program officer Warren Chapman about Annenberg’s potential for Chicago.

Over a meal at a Thai restaurant the trio discussed how local reformers could pursue some of the Annenberg funds. By May the Chicagoans had met with officials from Brown, and by late summer they submitted a draft proposal written by Hallett. The response from Brown’s Robert McCarthy was encouraging, and in early November, they submitted a final proposal to Gregorian requesting $49.2 million. The sum was not outlandish—proposals from New York, Philadelphia, and Los Angeles were requesting $50 to $53 million—and Annenberg would structure them all as challenge grants, with local recipients expected to raise two times as much in local matching funds. With that requirement looming and formal approval pending, Hallett and Ayers reached out to Patricia Graham at Spencer, a former dean of Harvard’s Graduate School of Education now at an education-focused foundation.

A Chicago entity would be needed to administer the Annenberg grant and raise the matching funds, and Graham in turn asked her fellow foundation presidents Adele Simmons and Debbie Leff to join her. The three women met for breakfast in mid-December, and then held several more meetings with Hallett and Ayers in early January, by which time the Annenberg commitment was firm and scheduled for public announcement two weeks hence. A local board for the new organization would have to be chosen, and Debbie strongly recommended Barack, whose name Pat recognized when Debbie cited his Harvard Law Review presidency. For board chair, “we did not want someone whose career was education,” Adele explained, yet they had to be “smart enough to understand what was going on and what the issues were.” Anne Hallett knew Barack well from when Wieboldt had funded DCP, “and all of us thought he was very impressive.” Pat Graham agreed to ask Barack, and invited him to meet her for a mid-February dinner at a well-known Italian restaurant, Avanzare.

During the first part of the evening, Barack spoke about his book, as prepublication galleys had arrived just days earlier from Times Books. He recounted the Poseidon cancellation and “talked about the perils of publishing this book,” Pat remembered. Barack also “had just learned that his mother had very serious ovarian cancer, and he was very concerned that the book was more about his father and should have included more about his mother.”

Six months earlier Ann Dunham had returned to Jakarta and a new job with her old employer Development Alternatives Inc. (DAI) after becoming deeply dissatisfied with her Women’s World Banking post in New York. In late January she had found herself in such serious pain that she had flown to Honolulu. Ann had felt increasingly unwell since her return to Indonesia, and a diagnosis of appendicitis and surgery to remove her appendix had not alleviated her discomfort. Only in Hawaii did an oncologist discover she had stage 3 uterine and ovarian cancer, and on February 14, she would undergo a total hysterectomy and begin recuperation under her mother’s care in the same small bedroom that for so many years had been her son’s. Maya had just returned to New York to start a master’s degree at NYU, and Ann would begin monthly chemotherapy treatment in an attempt to prevent her cancer from spreading further.

At dinner that night with Barack, Pat Graham “was so impressed with how articulate he was” and they talked long into the evening. “I’ve never closed a restaurant before,” Pat recalled. Toward the end, she finally popped the question, explaining how she, Debbie, and Adele all wanted him to chair the new Chicago Annenberg Challenge board. “I will if you’ll be the vice chair,” Barack responded. “Done,” Pat replied, and at another breakfast meeting, Pat, Debbie, and Anne introduced Barack and Bill Ayers to each other, the first time the two men had met. The fifty-year-old Ayers was well known in Chicago for the dedication to school reform he had demonstrated since he joined UIC’s education faculty in 1987. His father, Thomas G. Ayers, who was then eighty years old, had for years been one of the city’s most respected business titans as the longtime head of Commonwealth Edison, and Bill’s earlier life as a student radical had been chronicled in a 1990 Chicago Reader profile, while Barack was at Harvard, and in a 1993 Chicago Tribune story.

The Annenberg organizers would have to recruit “a board of Chicago worthies,” as Pat put it, a much “broader-based group” than Anne and Bill’s band of reformers. That group was already busily outlining how Chicago public schools would have to band together in small groups, and find a local organizational partner, before applying for Annenberg funds to support innovative new initiatives. That informal group, calling themselves the Chicago School Reform Collaborative, would design the entire Chicago Annenberg program prior to an actual executive director being selected.

In a coauthored Chicago Tribune essay, Ayers, Hallett, and Chapman highlighted “the unworkable size of large schools and classrooms” as a crucial problem. In a massive school system like Chicago’s, the Annenberg millions “will not produce miracles,” but “the reinvented schools we envision will be places that provide a personalized, more intense and flexible learning experience for students.” By mid-March a board that included retiring University of Illinois president Stanley Ikenberry, whom Bill Ayers had strongly pushed, and former Northwestern University president Arnold Weber was in place, and at its first meeting, Pat Graham’s motion to elect Barack as their chair was unanimously adopted.<sup>27</sup>

Beyond his new Joyce and Chicago Annenberg Challenge roles, Barack was immersed in four cases in his workday life at Davis Miner. He also needed to round up prepublication blurbs from well-known individuals for use on his book’s dust jacket and in whatever print advertising Times Books placed. Davis Miner senior partner Allison Davis took a few copies of the 564-page bound typescript and contacted his friends Vernon Jordan and Charlayne Hunter-Gault. Barack asked the well-known author Alex Kotlowitz, whom Davis Miner represented, to read one, and Barack mailed another copy to Derrick Bell along with an apologetic cover letter. “It’s been a long time since we last spoke,” but Barack had read Confronting Authority: Reflections of an Ardent Protester, which had appeared four months earlier. “I enjoyed your new book very much—inspiring, in fact.” Barack mentioned his Davis Miner work and his law school course, plus this “book that I’ve been writing, on again, off again, for the past two years. Originally, the book (called Dreams of My Father) was going to be a series of essays on issues of race and class, but as it has evolved, it’s become a memoir of my family and my experiences as an organizer.” Now it was “finally finished,” and Barack hoped Bell could read it and pen a brief endorsement. Six weeks later Bell did just that, and Barack again wrote him to say thank you “for the wonderful blurb. It’s both eloquent and generous.”

At Davis Miner, Barack in early January had filed suit in federal court against Illinois governor Jim Edgar on behalf of ACORN, over the state’s refusal to obey the new National Voter Registration Act. Three parallel actions—by the League of Women Voters, a trio of Hispanic groups, and the U.S. Justice Department—were also filed, and the district judge assigned the cases, Milton Shadur, wasted no time in dismissing Illinois’s argument as a “sleight of hand” and ruling that the “motor voter” mandate “plainly passes constitutional muster.” The state appealed, and the Seventh Circuit scheduled oral argument within weeks.

One party plaintiff remembered that “Barack was tremendously lazy on that case: half the time didn’t show up when he was supposed to, was never prepared on the briefs,” and that caused “a lot of frustration amongst the other attorneys.” At the appellate hearing, three plaintiff attorneys spoke—those representing the League, the Hispanic organizations, and the Justice Department, with ACORN relegated to fourth-place status. The appeals court quickly affirmed Judge Shadur’s ruling, and a month later at their annual Independents’ Day Dinner, Illinois’s top group of non-organization Democrats, the Independent Voters of Illinois–Independent Precinct Organization (IVI-IPO), gave their Legal Eagle Awards to four attorneys who had worked on the cases, including Barack. Senator Paul Simon and U.S. judge Abner Mikva were the guest speakers, and the plaintiff underwhelmed by Barack's previous contributions remembered the scene: "he's there for the press conferences!"

Judd Miner failed to win reinstatement of the first of the two St. Louis aldermanic redistricting challenges that Barack was helping him with. However, an employment discrimination case that Judd, Barack, and Jeff Cummings filed in federal court in late January against Comdisco, a highly profitable computer leasing company, on behalf of a black former employee was hugely successful within less than nine months. William Donnell had worked for more than a decade as the only black individual on Comdisco's 150-person sales force. The company was well known among business journalists for its "locker-room atmosphere," and Comdisco strenuously fought discovery requests to compel deposition answers from one executive who Donnell said knew how he had been racially targeted.

Forbes magazine reported that Donnell had identified Comdisco CEO Jack Slevin, whom one colleague called "an equal opportunity insulter," as a primary offender, and Forbes warned that "a trial could be embarrassing." Soon after, Judge Suzanne Conlon ordered that the deposition answers be given, because they may "provide evidence of Comdisco's racial animus and hostile work environment." Within a few weeks of that order, Comdisco agreed to settle the case under seal. Jeff Cummings recalled that the depositions documented "a very strong case of discrimination," and Barack later publicly recounted how Slevin in Donnell's presence had told a customer, "I don't have to worry about the EEOC, I've got my nigger in the window."

Judd Miner said the damages paid by Comdisco represented "a very successful settlement," and affirmed that Barack had carried "most of the load" on the case, "from the research and drafting of the initial complaint, through all phases of discovery." Barack ended up working almost six hundred hours on Donnell v. Comdisco Inc., and at Barack's billing rate of $165 an hour—an unremarkable number, as Judd's was $285—Comdisco paid almost $100,000 to Davis Miner for the time Barack spent suing them on behalf of William Donnell.

Judd, Jeff, and Barack also joined Chicago attorney Fay Clayton, who previously had worked at Davis Miner, in litigating a class action "redlining" suit against Citibank on behalf of almost eight hundred African American mortgage loan applicants. Federal district judge Ruben Castillo was unimpressed with Citibank's defense claims, writing in one order that "once again, Citibank misses the point" and ruling in another that "Citibank's contentions are meritless." He soon appointed a retired federal judge as a special master to handle the heavy burden of loan application evidence, and eventually this case too settled, with Citibank paying far more in plaintiffs' legal fees—$950,000—than in money damages—a total of $360,000—to the black loan applicants. Judge Castillo nonetheless termed the settlement "a significant legal victory," called the fees "eminently reasonable," and commended Miner, Clayton, and the other plaintiffs' attorneys for their "professionalism and sacrifice in this case."

Barack invested 138 hours of work in Buycks-Roberson v. Citibank, a modest $23,000 of Citibank's settlement tab, but by far the most memorable moment of that case or any other occurred during a deposition in which Barack and Jeff Cummings were participating by phone from Davis Miner's basement conference room. In addition to the SRO hotel and its unpredictable residents, Davis Miner's immediate neighbors also included a restaurant that "didn't tend to their garbage so well," Jeff explained, and the rodents who enjoyed that opportunity also burrowed into Davis Miner's basement, making rat traps a necessity in the modest conference room. Barack was holding the phone when one rat emerged into the light of day and “runs and jumps” onto Barack’s pants leg, briefly grabbing hold. Barack “calmly shook the rat off his leg” and “kept right on talking” as Jeff watched in amazement. No one on the call knew what had occurred, and there was no question Barack “always kept his cool,” Jeff commented.

Judd Miner was twenty years Barack’s senior, and although no one called their relationship paternal, there also was no question that Barack enjoyed favored son status in Judd’s eyes right from the moment he arrived at Davis Miner. Judd and the firm’s longtime data analyst, Whitman Soule, had for years played golf on Thursday afternoons, and Judd soon invited Barack to join them. “It was kind of a cheeky thing that he was playing golf with us,” Whit explained, given how junior Barack was, but Whit had heard Judd say that “this guy is special” even before first meeting him. Barack “wasn’t that good,” but “he knew how to play golf. He learned how to play golf from his grandfather.”

Madison-based partner Chuck Barnhill viewed Barack as “a mediocre golfer” but “a great trash talker,” and Barack’s proclivity for improving the lie of his balls would become what Whit termed “a subject of derision.” Barack also “always seemed to want a little action” on their games, small bets of a quarter on one or another shot. Whit worked with Barack on Donnell v. Comdisco, analyzing the company’s personnel records and sitting in when Barack deposed Comdisco officials.

It was immediately obvious that Barack did not enjoy litigation. “Barack had to go through one of these depositions, and you could just see this was so painful” for him, even though he was just posing the questions. Whit also served as the firm’s IT guru, visiting East View to set up Barack’s home computer, and he was repeatedly struck by how “preternaturally calm” Barack was, sometimes in a seemingly “lonely” way. “He always seemed alone, and he always seemed to be focused on the very long term.”

After every golf game, Barack would “smoke a cigarette or two,” which Whit found surprising. “I always thought it odd that somebody with this level of control was smoking cigarettes,” especially because Barack “was very aware that it was becoming unacceptable” to do so, as the reactions of Michelle’s young Public Allies colleagues and his UC law students also reflected.<sup>28</sup>

In late March 1995, Barack began teaching Current Issues in Racism and the Law for the third time. His now two years of experience as a practicing lawyer informed his classroom style, with students finding him “an engaging professor” who was “down to earth and practical.” His syllabus remained unchanged, with “a considerable amount of reading” across the first four weeks and group presentations during the last half of the eight-week spring quarter. Some students were excited to encounter “a real practitioner” who was “a practical and straightforward teacher who encouraged us to think about real world problems and scenarios,” including “some that perhaps could not be addressed by laws.”

Marni Willenson’s group tackled inequitable school funding, and even though Barack challenged students to consider all perspectives, “you would not have walked out knowing what his position” was on that or any other subject. “He was very respectful of our views, listened to all of our ideas,” but did not “share many of his own personal views on the topics we discussed,” Susannah Baruch agreed. Students wanted to hear “what this smart young lawyer from a civil rights boutique law firm had to say,” and many students found the discussions compelling. Tiffanie Cason, one of the few black women students at the law school, had been upset when her young Constitutional Law III professor, Elena Kagan, had asked Cason to address the question of whether affirmative action personally harmed its supposed beneficiaries. Dismayed by that classroom experience, “I wrote a paper about it in the Obama class,” Tiffanie recalled,

“how do we talk about race.” Marni Willenson remembered it as “a great class,” and course evaluation responses bore that out: on a 10 point scale, the twenty-one respondents gave Barack’s teaching a 9.38, up from 9.1 a year earlier, and their overall mark for the course was a resounding 9.71.<sup>29</sup>

In early April, the two trade periodicals that published advance reviews of forthcoming books both praised Barack’s. Since his letter to Derrick Bell two months earlier, however, one small but significant change had been made: the book was now titled Dreams From My Father. The initiative for this change had come, as had so many things, from Rob Fisher, who recalled “Barack going through a lot of different names for the book. He and I chatted about it quite a bit on the phone,” and in the end “he and I came up with the title” during “quite a long conversation” after Rob had seen the bound galley. Rob suggested “shifting from Dreams of My Father—which seems kind of trite to me—to Dreams From My Father, which better suited the story of him aspiring to construct his dad, and those dreams, from what he had.”

Otherwise, the final run-up to actual publication was uneventful. Ruth Fecych, who had inherited Barack from Henry Ferris yet never met him, remembered Barack as “accessible” and “articulate” on the phone. Jacket designer Robbin Schiff recalled Barack’s enthusiastic reaction to her idea of using a pair of old family photos on the book’s cover, one picturing young newlyweds Stan and Madelyn Dunham during World War II and the other showing a young Barack Sr. in the lap of his mother, Habiba Akumu. Times Books’ own catalog called Dreams a “compelling autobiography” of “startling emotional and intellectual clarity” and described Barack as “a thrilling new voice.” Production editor Benjamin Dreyer recalled that the lengthy manuscript “went through copyediting and proofreading virtually without incident.” Publishers Weekly, the industry bible, called Dreams “a resonant book,” while noting that “his mother is virtually absent.” Kirkus Reviews was even more enthusiastic, saying the “honest, often poetic memoir” was an “affecting study of self-definition” that “records his interior struggle with precision and clarity.”

The publication date for Dreams was still several months away, and in early April Chicago mayor Richard Daley was reelected to another four-year term. Daley’s increasing dominance of city politics easily smothered two conflicting black efforts to mount credible challenges against his new machine. Former Project VOTE! chairman Joe Gardner had launched a Democratic primary run, but exiting attorney general Roland Burris announced he would oppose Daley in the subsequent April 4 general election. The Tribune’s front-page story on Daley’s formal announcement that he was seeking reelection stated that “violent crime remains at epidemic proportions” across Chicago. Yet proof that neither challenger would gain any meaningful traction against the mayor came when U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun gave Daley’s candidacy “a ringing endorsement.”

Three years earlier, Joe Gardner had backed Moseley Braun in her primary challenge against incumbent Al Dixon, and civil rights lawyers led by Judd Miner were still in court challenging the Daley regime’s city council redistricting, but Moseley Braun’s embrace of Daley extended African American support for the mayor beyond his small band of early supporters like Valerie Jarrett and financier John Rogers Jr. Jesse Jackson Sr. campaigned for Gardner, but with Daley’s war chest at $4 million and Gardner’s at $171,000, mayoral media consultant David Axelrod had an easy campaign to oversee.

On primary Election Day, Daley swamped Gardner 66 to 33 percent amid “one of the lowest turnouts ever among Chicago voters” while winning about 25 percent of black voters. A month later Daley defeated the better-known Roland Burris 60 to 36 percent, and political historian William Grimshaw—Jacky’s husband—told the New York Times that Daley was indeed “rebuilding the machine” that a generation earlier had made his father mayor-for-life. As another knowledgeable observer explained, Daley's emboldened reign marked "a lessening of democracy and the centralizing of power in a new machine."<sup>30</sup>

Receiving almost as much coverage as the mayoral contest was the ongoing criminal prosecution of U.S. representative Mel Reynolds. In mid-January young accuser Beverly Heard again recanted her allegation that Reynolds had sex with her when she was just sixteen years old, and a Tribune editorial asked if Reynolds was "the victim of an overzealous, irresponsible prosecution." The morning after Daley's reelection, though, a Tribune headline announced, "Reynolds Accused of Sex with 2nd Teen," and the paper spoke of his political career in the past tense, saying he "had been a rising star in the Democratic party." As reports swirled that Reynolds may have paid Heard for her recantation, prosecutors filed additional charges and the congressman's trial was scheduled for July. News reports predicted that tape recordings of 1994 phone conversations between Heard and Reynolds would be a key part of the case.

Waiting quietly in the wings was state senator Alice Palmer, who would challenge Reynolds in the early 1996 Democratic primary if the congressman survived his legal shoals. Should Reynolds instead be convicted and forced to leave office, a special election could take place sooner. Palmer formed a federal campaign committee in late January but did little active fund-raising. Progressive women like Jean Rudd, Anne Hallett, Adele Simmons, Aurie Pennick, and Bettylu Saltzman, plus education researcher Fred Hess and local state representative Barbara Flynn Currie, all made modest, three-figure contributions. Less than a dozen people contributed as much as $1,000, including Palmer's campaign chairman, Hal Baron, and his wife, who knew Palmer and her husband Buzz from the Harold Washington era. At least half of Palmer's remaining four-figure contributions came from employees and relatives of developer Tony Rezko.

Rezko was actively promoting Barack's future prospects as well as boosting Alice Palmer's. Tony was an enthusiastic supporter of St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, the prominent institution founded by entertainer Danny Thomas, and each May a Chicago fund-raising dinner took place in the Drake Hotel's Gold Coast Ballroom overlooking Lake Michigan. Young Andy Foster was a top aide to Republican governor Jim Edgar, and several times during Edgar's 1994 reelection race, Rezko had called to offer support. Andy thought Tony "seems like a very nice guy," with a "very innocent" interest in politics, and a few months later, Foster happily accepted when Rezko said he had a full table of seats at the St. Jude dinner. Tony's wife Rita was there, as was Cook County Board president John Stroger, his top aide, Orlando Jones, and the wife of a young state representative who was about to run for Congress, Patti Blagojevich. Tony also introduced Andy to Barack and Michelle Obama, and Andy recalled that "Obama's embarrassed" as Tony told Andy what an important person Barack would become. Andy believed Tony had clearly taken "a shine to Barack," who was "very impressive," and "it was a delightful evening" even though "Patti was a little annoying."

Barack had first been introduced to Alice Palmer by his Project VOTE! deputy Brian Banks, and as Palmer started pulling together an informal steering committee in the late spring of 1995, Barack began taking part in it. If Palmer challenged Reynolds in next year's Democratic primary, she could not simultaneously run for reelection to the Senate, although in a special election, she could run for Congress while keeping her seat. In a pair of April and May conversations with his friend Ellen Schumer, Barack talked about his new Annenberg role and Alice Palmer as well as Ellen's COFI launch.

A May 1 lunch was rescheduled for May 11 because Barack had to prepare for a deposition, but Schumer's notes from that Thursday lunch document Barack's focus. Ellen jotted three large headings: "(1) COFI, (2) Annenberg, (3) Alice Palmer," but only blank space was under the first two. Under the third, she wrote: "Cong. seat—Senate seat??—What exactly are the boundaries—includes all—Support from A.P.—Toni Preckwinkle?," the 4th Ward alderman, and "Arenda Troutman," the 20th Ward alderman whose district encompassed Woodlawn. "Senate seat" and "Support from A.P." were more than suggestive, and then just four days later, law school debts and mortgage payments notwithstanding, Barack made his first political contribution, writing a check for $500 to Friends of Alice Palmer. A second for an additional $500 followed four weeks later.

As he thought about seeking Palmer's state Senate seat, Barack drove down to Springfield in Michelle's hand-me-down Saab, which had supplanted the rusty old Toyota as his regular car. For Senate Democrats, the 1995 spring session had proven exceptionally unpleasant, with Republican Senate president James "Pate" Philip and his caucus, who held a 33–26 majority, freezing the minority party out of any role in state budget decisions. Angry floor statements by normally mild-mannered progressive Democrats like Miguel del Valle, Jesus "Chuy" Garcia, and Palmer all testified to what a strained atmosphere characterized the Senate under Philip's resolute rule.

Barack later recalled, "I had gone down there to visit before I made the decision to run and had spent a couple of days down there," and a wide range of people remembered meeting Barack in Alice Palmer's company, either during the final days of that spring session that ended unusually early on May 26 or in the weeks immediately following. Down in Springfield, young representative Jeff Schoenberg, who had met Barack three years earlier during Project VOTE!, ran into him in the legislative office building that adjoined the handsome State Capitol, and recalls that Barack mentioned Palmer and explained that "he was working with her." African American lobbyist John Hooker, a onetime student of the late Al Raby, later Commonwealth Edison's liaison to Mayor Harold Washington, and by 1995 ComEd's director of governmental affairs, first met Barack when he "worked closely with" Palmer. Indeed, in Hooker's eyes, Barack was "a real close confidant and pal of Alice Palmer," and Hooker's ComEd colleague Frank Clark felt that Palmer "saw him more as a protégé." Likewise, African American AFSCME lobbyist Ray Harris knew that "she and Barack were close" and that Palmer indeed "mentored him to an extent."

As the summer began, Mel Reynolds's legal prospects looked increasingly dim. A long Tribune retrospective on Reynolds's career said "he was eloquent and cared deeply about the underprivileged and dispossessed," and the head of the Rhodes Scholarship program at the University of Oxford recalled Reynolds as "a very ambitious man who was determined to be a politician." A former pollster said that Reynolds "felt like he had to be in Congress. He almost felt he was chosen." The list of unpaid debts that Reynolds had accumulated, however, now approximated $145,000, and another former Rhodes Scholar who knew him well explained that "you were never quite sure who the real Mel was. You could never put your finger on whether he was a real operator or he was a genuine nice guy."

For Barack, the prospect of succeeding Palmer if and when she took Reynolds's place in Congress was one he mulled all throughout June. He mentioned the possibility to Allison Davis, who responded with astonishment. "You must be crazy. Have you ever been to Springfield?" In contrast, Judd Miner was supportive because he knew how Barack "was struggling with what he could do to have the greatest impact on things he cared about.”

Given Judd’s own deep ambivalence about litigation, he was also sympathetic to Barack’s view, as Barack later put it, that “the reason I got into politics was simply because I saw the law as being inadequate to the task” of achieving social change. “The idea of participating in the legislative process,” Barack recalled a few years later, “became more interesting the more I saw the limits of social change through the courts.” That was “something that I had been aware of when I had been studying law and legal history, but became much more apparent to me by the time that I was actually a practicing lawyer.” Issues like “providing adequate funding for education or creating job opportunities . . . weren’t really amenable to change through the courts.” Succeeding Palmer would be a “fairly attractive starting point,” Judd appreciated, because “it was the Senate as opposed to the House,” and “it wasn’t being alderman.”

Allison Davis remembered, “I saw Alice coming and going all the time” to Barack’s small office right next to his, and Steve Derks, a young health lobbyist for Lutheran General Health System, which Davis Miner represented, was asked to talk with Barack about the Senate. Derks recalled sitting in Barack’s “crummy little office” and saying that the number one thing he had learned in Springfield was “the enormous influence of money in electoral politics.” Steve suggested to Barack that “he might do better to stay in the private sector, focus on the things he cares about” and “create a difference that way.” Barack “ultimately asked if I would help him if he decided to go forward,” and Steve reluctantly agreed. But he still “tried to tell him not to do it,” as did Judd’s old friend Marilyn Katz, who had also worked for Harold Washington. “Don’t run for the Senate,” Marilyn told Barack, arguing that state senators were virtually invisible in Chicago. In rebuttal, Barack raised “the Harold Washington example,” describing how Washington had moved from the legislature to Congress and then to the mayor’s office.

Barack also discussed the idea with Jean Rudd and her husband Lionel Bolin, asking the politically experienced Lionel to be his campaign treasurer if he went ahead. Lionel agreed, and they invited Barack and Michelle over one night to meet their friend Larry Suffredin, an attorney and lobbyist. Suffredin was “so impressed” by Barack that “I thought this is a guy who could be the next mayor of Chicago,” and Larry invited Barack to lunch with his African American law partner Paul Williams, who had served three terms as a state representative after working for Harold Washington in Springfield. At lunch, “I tried to talk Barack out of running for the state Senate,” because “I didn’t see a mayor really coming from the general assembly,” especially given the Republican control of the state Senate. Williams was even more wary of Barack’s belief that he could inherit Palmer’s seat when she ran for Congress, warning him that if Palmer did not defeat Reynolds, she would want to retain her Senate seat. But neither man’s comments dissuaded Barack. “He was looking at should he run,” Larry recalled, and “he made it clear that he wanted to.”

Judd Miner had introduced Barack to his friend Matt Piers, a 1974 UC Law School graduate who had been Judd’s deputy corporation counsel in Harold Washington’s administration. Matt and his wife Maria Torres agreed to invite Barack and Michelle for dinner along with Chuy Garcia and his wife Evelyn so that Barack could meet another progressive state senator. Matt knew Barack was “much more interested in a political career than a legal career,” and that night at dinner, after “everybody had had a lot of very good red wine to drink,” the conversation turned to how “politics are really sleazy here.” That theme was music to Michelle’s ears, because when Barack had first broached the possibility of succeeding Palmer, Michelle’s reaction had been highly negative.

“I married you because you’re cute, and you’re smart, but this is the dumbest thing you could have ever asked,” Michelle later said she told Barack. “We would always have discussions about how do you create change,” debates that had stimulated her move from her city job to Public Allies, but “politics didn’t come into the discussion until the seat opened up,” Michelle later said. “I wasn’t a proponent of politics as a way you could make change,” and she believed “that politics is for dirty, nasty people who aren’t really trying to do much in the world.” So Michelle’s response had been “No, don’t do it,” an attitude also informed by her strong desire to have children and a strong belief that her offspring should enjoy the same sort of upbringing she and her brother Craig had had.

“They were a very, very close-knit family,” her sister-in-law Janis explained, “and Michelle really liked the idea that her parents were present for whatever she was involved in. So she had the same expectation for her husband, so she was conflicted because she knew that Barack was going to have some kind of job that would take him away” if he ran for a state office. “So she had a little bit of hesitation,” and that night at dinner, with Matt in particular kidding Barack about wanting to be a politician, Michelle enthusiastically chimed in.

“Barack was looking a little somber,” and when Matt went to the bathroom, Barack waylaid him before Matt could return to the dining room. He “grabbed me by my shirt and he pushed me into” another room “and he said ‘Listen, god damn it, Michelle doesn’t want me to get involved in politics, and I’ve already made the decision that I have, and now if I can’t count on my friends to help me with this, I’m really going to get nowhere, so I’d appreciate it if you would be quiet and stop everybody from talking about it.’” It was clear that “the wine was kind of talking,” yet Matt recalled, “I was quite shocked. . . . There was both an assertiveness and a familiarity” in Barack’s manner, and while he was “not angry,” there was no doubt that “he was real serious.” Michelle’s comments that night “made it clear she wanted him to get on a tenure track at UC Law School” and that “she was not at all interested in being a politician’s wife.”

Years later Michelle remembered, “I thought Barack would be a partner at a law firm or maybe teach or work in the community,” but by late June 1995, there was no question that Barack had his eyes firmly set on succeeding Alice Palmer in the Illinois state Senate if she gave up her seat to run for Congress. Barack later said that Michelle finally relented, telling him, “Why don’t you give it a chance?”

Just as Barack had told Ellen Schumer, thanks to Tony Rezko he won a warm introduction to 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle, who remembered Barack from Project VOTE! Preckwinkle told him that Palmer’s public endorsement was critical, and that he must also introduce himself to newly elected 5th Ward alderman Barbara Holt, whose district included most of Hyde Park and who also had succeeded Alan Dobry as 5th Ward committeeman. Holt remembered Alice Palmer telephoning, and “she asked me if I would meet with him.” Holt agreed, Barack visited her ward office, and “I decided that I would support him.” Similar outreach took place with Hyde Park state representative Barbara Flynn Currie, who knew Michelle from Public Allies, and Currie too agreed to back Barack because of Palmer’s endorsement.<sup>31</sup>

As Mel Reynolds’s criminal trial approached, political jockeying intensified. The Tribune reported that Gha-Is F. Askia, a Muslim employee of the state attorney general’s Chicago office who six years earlier had won election to a South Shore elementary school council, would run for Palmer’s Senate seat. In Hyde Park, rumors circulated that Janet Oliver-Hill, who that spring had lost the 5th Ward aldermanic race to Holt, might be interested, but she declined. Then, on June 25, a Sun-Times gossip columnist broke the news that Alice Palmer would formally announce her candidacy on June 27. At a Loop hotel, Palmer declared, “I am a hands-on, roll-up-your-sleeves legislator,” and she avoided bashing her ostensible opponent. “Pray for Mel Reynolds and vote for me!”

The Tribune’s story stated that Palmer “will be giving up her legislative seat to run for Congress,” as would be necessary if she ran in the 1996 primary, and the weekly Hyde Park Herald reported that “talk of who might replace Palmer, assuming she wins the race, has already begun. One front-runner might be Palmer supporter Barack Obama, an attorney with a background in community organization and voter registration efforts. Obama, who has lived ‘in and out’ of Hyde Park for 10 years, is currently serving as chairman of the board of directors of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge. Obama said that even though the election was a year away, ‘I am seriously exploring that campaign.’”

Less than forty-eight hours later, a Tribune gossip column predicted that “Barack Obama will announce he’s running for the state Senate seat occupied by Alice Palmer . . . Obama, who has worked with Palmer, is an attorney at Davis, Miner, Barnhill & Galland—and newly published author of Dreams From My Father,” although publication was still a few weeks away. The report was correct, and six days later, Barack received a check for $5,000 as a loan to cover campaign start-up expenses from prominent, just-retired seventy-five-year-old Cadillac dealer Al Johnson, who previously had been county board president John Stroger’s top contributor, Mel Reynolds’s finance chairman in his successful 1992 race, and one of the late Harold Washington’s closest supporters.

Johnson, whom friends would call “a dapper gentleman” and “the life of the party,” graduated from Lincoln University and earned a master’s degree in hospital administration from the University of Chicago. Johnson had begun working part-time as an automobile salesman in the early 1950s, when no black person, whether salesman or customer, was allowed on a dealership floor. In 1967, as the black freedom struggle crested, General Motors made Johnson its first African American franchise owner, and four years later, he switched from selling Oldsmobiles to offering Cadillacs. Al’s son Don remembered his dad as a man of “expensive tastes” who lived in a lakefront condominium in Chicago’s Gold Coast but “never wanted the limelight” despite his sustained commitment to black political advancement.

Progressive former congressman Abner Mikva explained how very few political donors like Johnson “were in it for the right reasons. He was one of them.” Don Johnson also remembered his dad remarking about the young attorney whom Tony Rezko had introduced him to some months earlier. “There’s something special about this guy,” Al told him. “This guy is going to go places.”

In mid-July, Barack attended a Chicago gathering of the nascent New Party, the progressive “fusion” venture Keith Kelleher and Madeline Talbott hoped to launch. The fifty attendees heard “appeals for NP support from four potential political candidates,” including a newly elected alderman who was there to express thanks. The other three included “Barack Obama, chief of staff for State Sen. Alice Palmer. Obama is running for Palmer’s vacant seat,” the meeting notes recorded, and Senator Miguel del Valle’s top aide, Willie Delgado, who also was there, remembered first encountering Barack as an “assistant” to Alice Palmer.<sup>32</sup>

In close tandem with Pat Graham, Barack also was pitching in on the actual launch of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge (CAC). He suggested to Pat that perhaps he should resign as board chairman if he ran for Palmer’s seat, and Pat immediately said the state Senate was not significant enough to merit that. Barack and Pat also experienced disagreement, and attendant delay, over whom to name as executive director of the CAC. At the end of May, the board officially asked Spencer, Joyce, MacArthur, and the Chicago Community Trust to pony up equal fourths of an initial $90,000 in operating funds because the first Annenberg money would not arrive until $500,000 in local matching funds was raised.

Those grants were quickly made, and an executive search consultant was retained. In the interim, “since there is no actual director,” board minutes noted, “Anne Hallett and Bill Ayers had worked diligently” to write the request for proposals that CAC made public in mid-June, with applications due by August 1. For an executive director, “what was most important to Barack, given the politics of the city of Chicago, was that this person be clean and honest,” Pat recalled, and Barack’s desire was to hire Ken Rolling, the Woods program officer whom he had known well for almost a decade. Pat wanted “someone who knew something about education,” and was uncomfortable about how clubby it seemed. “I thought that was a little too much old boy network for my taste,” and so “it took us a while to agree on Ken,” whom Pat quickly realized was “absolutely sterling.”

Ken would not start until September 1, and in the meantime the governance of Chicago’s public schools suddenly shifted in a truly astonishing way. The Republican triumph in Illinois’s November 1994 general election had included Republican capture of the state House of Representatives, which gave Republicans full control of both houses plus the governorship for the first time in a quarter century. Within days, both Republicans and business-oriented Chicago reformers like John Ayers, Bill’s younger brother, began discussing how a possible governance shake-up could kick-start the energies for reform that had largely abated in the five years since the seemingly landmark 1988 school legislation shifting authority to local school councils had taken effect in 1989. In late April 1995, Governor Jim Edgar debuted a bill that would hand direct control of Chicago’s schools to the city’s mayor, and a month later Republican lawmakers, joined by a handful of progressive white Democrats, passed the measure on what the Tribune called “a day of historic change for a system long mired in status-quo politics.”

Edgar quickly signed the bill into law, which charged Mayor Richard M. Daley with naming a new, five-member board of education and a new chief executive officer. As everyone waited for Daley to act, the Tribune publicized CAC’s request for innovation proposals from groups of Chicago schools. Barack emphasized, “If we’re really going to change things in this city, it’s going to start at the grass-roots level and with our children.” Six days later Daley named his chief of staff, Gery Chico, as president of the new board and highly respected city budget director Paul Vallas as CPS’s new CEO, supplanting the incumbent superintendent.

The new law would allow the hard-charging Vallas to terminate administrators and non-educational employees with just two weeks’ notice, and Vallas promised to eliminate the system’s yawning budget gap without any impact on classroom education. One school principal, a twenty-five-year veteran of the Chicago schools, told the Tribune that “this is the best news I’ve heard in all the years I’ve been in the system.” Less than three weeks later, Vallas announced that the budget deficit had indeed been eliminated, with more than $161 million saved by the termination of seventeen hundred non-instructional staffers. The Tribune’s African American education reporter Dion Haynes called the speed and scale of Vallas’s changes “miraculous” and remarked how “radical” it was for school leaders to be “putting students—not bureaucrats—first.” Editorially the Tribune praised Vallas for “a dazzling display” of “magic,” and highlighted how he also had set aside $206 million to fund “ambitious new educational initiatives.” That was exactly CAC’s mission too, and by the August 1 deadline, more than 170 proposals were submitted, a number that Hallett, Ayers, and their colleagues found astonishing. The Collaborative volunteers quickly winnowed that huge batch almost in half, and a mid-August board meeting ratified invitations asking the ninety strongest applicants to submit full proposals by October 13.<sup>33</sup>

On Saturday, July 22, Barack and Sokoni Karanja made opening remarks at the first small gathering aimed at finally launching their long-discussed Lugenia Burns Hope Center. For more than a year, they had been discussing “the need for an organizing institute on the South Side,” conversations that in part grew out of their joint service on the Woods Fund panel that had critiqued organizing’s shortcomings. Sandy O’Donnell, who had staffed the Woods panel, played the same role in the Hope Center planning, and she noted that Barack cited the “political disaffection of the African American community in the wake of Harold Washington’s death” and “the lack of an active voice among African Americans in various major policy debates—school reform, the Chicago Housing Authority, and the criminal justice system” as primary reasons for why the Hope Center was needed.

Barack explained that the center’s mission was to start “an organic process to duplicate leadership—to help people become actors rather than consumers,” language anyone familiar with John McKnight’s work would recognize. People manifested “lots of hunger for information, but outreach [was] sorely needed—especially to young black men.” Now the key would be to nail down the curriculum for the twelve-week training sessions they planned to begin at Sokoni’s Centers for New Horizons in Bronzeville in the months ahead. Barack “agreed that the African perspective has to be built into the idea of ‘centeredness,’” but the overall goal was that neighborhood residents who completed the training would “become organizers or even community leaders.”

On Monday, July 24, opening arguments took place in the Cook County Circuit Court trial of U.S. representative Mel Reynolds. Lead prosecutor Andrea Zopp, a 1981 graduate of Harvard Law School, was a black woman whose presence negated any claim that Reynolds was being persecuted for his sexual exploits by white racist prosecutors. Three days of jury selection, for a case that would take four weeks to try, yielded a jury of six men and six women, six black and six white. The Tribune observed that “regardless of what happens” when the jury reached a verdict, “Reynolds’ career is probably over.” The Tribune’s news coverage was so opinionated that it labeled Reynolds “an arrogant manipulator” while explaining that “a special election will be in order if he is convicted.” That was quickly followed by a statement that the only declared candidate was “the estimable State Sen. Alice Palmer.”

Jurors heard that Reynolds’s sexual relationship with then-sixteen-year-old Beverly Heard had begun in June 1992, and that one week after first meeting her, he took her to dinner at the tony East Bank Club, the favorite exercise and watering hole for upper-class black Chicagoans. Two years then passed before Heard told police about her underage involvement with the now-congressman. Reynolds did not take the stand until mid-August, but a Tribune reporter mocked a defense attorney’s assertion that Reynolds simply “has the most active libido in Cook County.” Thomas Hardy told readers that “Mel Reynolds makes me sick” and “doesn’t belong in public office.”

As Reynolds’s legal prospects darkened, Alice Palmer appeared to have competition for Reynolds’s congressional seat. Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal publicly named two potential candidates: state Senate minority leader Emil Jones Jr., with whom Barack had worked back in 1987–88 and whose 34th Ward Democratic organization, in tandem with other wards, guaranteed him black machine supporters, and thirty-year-old Jesse Jackson Jr., who had attended Barack and Michelle’s wedding, just as they had attended his because of Michelle's close friendship with his sister Santita. Neal, a huge fan of Palmer's, warned that "her prospects are uncertain if Jones or Jackson joins the race," and although the Tribune reported that Palmer already had raised $51,000, reporters presumed that Jackson, as the well-spoken namesake of America's best-known black political figure, could be a strong contender.

Behind the scenes, however, both Palmer and Jackson were facing significant hurdles. Barack's former Project VOTE! deputy Brian Banks had been recruited as Palmer's campaign manager, but even before the end of July, campaign chairman Hal Baron had pushed Banks out as internal disagreements roiled Palmer's small staff. Media consultant Kitty Kurth had recruited a D.C.-based friend, Darrel Thompson, as the campaign's finance director, and Thompson now took charge of Palmer's nascent campaign.

"You've got to meet this guy named Barack Obama," Alice Palmer told Darrel, who visited Barack at Davis Miner and found him to be "a really sharp guy." Kurth first met Barack at a campaign discussion in Palmer's kitchen, and Thompson remembered Barack being "involved but not overwhelmingly involved" as Palmer's campaign took shape. But despite being both a state senator and 7th Ward committeeman, Palmer had no political organization to speak of beyond her husband Buzz and son David.

Jackson and his closest friend, Marty King, plus Jesse's wife Sandi, had been discussing a potential congressional race ever since the young couple purposely had bought a home in the 2nd District. But Jesse Jr. faced strong opposition that no one except his wife and Marty knew about, namely from his father Jesse Sr. The elder Jackson had been serving for more than four years as a "shadow" U.S. senator for the District of Columbia, a symbolic, unpaid role as an elected lobbyist for D.C. statehood, and the father refused to embrace the prospect that his son could become a real, voting member of Congress.

Jesse Jr., Alice Palmer, and Palmer's campaign chairman Hal Baron all remember the summons the two congressional aspirants received from Jesse Sr. "As far as I could see, it was all green, and then we get this call to go to Jesse's house," Palmer recounted. "Junior is relegated to sit in a corner." Baron knew what Sr.'s intent was, but Jr. was caught by surprise. "I remember being to my father's house for a meeting," Jr. explained. "He said, 'Jesse, come to my house. I want to talk with you.' 'All right, Reverend, I'll be there in a few minutes.'"

The father-son relationship had become seriously strained more than a year earlier by an intense disagreement about how best to expand Sr.'s Rainbow Coalition. But with Jackson Sr. living primarily in Washington rather than in the family's Chicago home, tensions had abated. So "I get to my father's house and sitting in his living room is Alice Palmer," Jesse Jr. recalled. "I said, 'Hey, Dad, what's going on?' and he said, 'This is what I'm thinking. I'm thinking that we should support Alice Palmer for Congress, and I want her to consider supporting you for the state Senate seat.' And I said, 'I appreciate that, Dad, but I've not had this conversation with you before.'" Yet Junior immediately understood his father's message: "He's saying to himself that Congress is too much for his boy."

But Alice Palmer was not any more interested in Jackson Sr.'s idea than was his son. "Reverend Jackson, I am sorry, but I am not interested in your deal. I have committed my seat to Barack Obama should I be elected to Congress, so there is no chance I can support your idea," Junior recalled Palmer saying. "I looked at my father and said, 'See?'" Jesse Jr. added. "'Reverend, that's not going to happen. I'm not interested in that,'" and his father's attempt to sandbag a congressional race crystallized Jesse Jr. and Marty King's resolve to go ahead and run.<sup>34</sup>

On July 31, Barack received his first campaign contributions, two $1,000 checks from a pair of Tony Rezko's companies. One week later, Friends of Barack Obama was formally created, with Jean Rudd's husband Lionel Bolin as treasurer, and the checks deposited. David Brint, who had first introduced Tony to Barack five summers earlier, was no longer working with Rezko, yet "I liked him. Everybody liked him." Tony "was soft-spoken" and "I thought he was an okay guy." Cook County Board president John Stroger, Rezko's most important political patron, viewed him similarly. "Tony's the type of guy who is always helping host fund-raisers and getting his friends to get you money. But he's real upfront with you, and I've never known him to ask for favors, which is unusual in this business," Stroger explained.

With Barack's odds of an actual candidacy increasing, he called Carol Harwell, his former Project VOTE! deputy. "I was kind of shocked when he called," Carol remembered, both by Barack's news that Alice Palmer "wants me to take her place" and by his desire to do so. Barack also wanted her to be his campaign manager, and Carol agreed to come over to East View to discuss the district over a pasta salad that Michelle prepared. "She still wasn't quite on board," Carol recalled, but Barack's desire to forge ahead was crystal clear, and he also asked his sister-in-law Janis Robinson to work on his campaign. Both women agreed.<sup>35</sup>

But Barack had to devote his next eight days to something entirely different, because finished copies of Dreams From My Father were now in stores, and he was going on a book tour that would take him to New York, Washington, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. Times Books had printed seventy-five hundred hardback copies of the 403-page volume, priced at $23.00. Barack's debut appearance was about ten blocks from home, a Friday-evening book signing at Hyde Park's 57th Street Books. About thirty people showed up, including two of Barack's favorite former DCP leaders, Loretta Augustine and Yvonne Lloyd. He inscribed, signed, and dated their copies with an identical phrase—"To Loretta" and "To Yvonne, one of my favorite people in the whole, wide world!" Barack also called Dan Lee to say that he had a copy for him. Barack explained that in the book Dan's character had been given the pseudonym "Wilbur Milton," a play on Dan's middle name, Willard, and Dan laughingly objected: "Oooh, that is a crappy name!" Barack made up for it with a warm inscription: "To Dan, You have been an inspiration to me all these years. I know our paths will meet in the future for peace and justice."

Dreams From My Father featured pot-smoking deacon "Wilbur Milton," but when Dan read the book, he had no complaints. "That's not a fictitious person. That is me." The book was organized into three major sections of roughly equal length. "Origins" started with the 1982 news of Barack's father's death and then traced his own life up through his undergraduate years at Columbia. "Chicago" commenced with a brief account of his postcollege time in New York before moving to a story-filled account of his work at the Developing Communities Project. "Kenya" was an extremely detailed recounting of his summer 1988 visit there.

Times Books' jacket copy introduced the book as a "lyrical, unsentimental, and compelling memoir," one that was "filled with emotional insight and intellectual clarity." The two-sentence author bio highlighted how he "served as the president of the Harvard Law Review," and the back cover featured blurbs by a trio of well-known African Americans plus author Alex Kotlowitz. Marian Wright Edelman termed it "an exquisite, sensitive study of this wonderful young author's journey into adulthood" that was "perceptive and wise." Derrick Bell called it "a beautifully written chronicle of a gifted young man," a "soaring book" that taught how "survival demands resilience in the face of frustrated expectations."

Charlayne Hunter-Gault said it was “one of the most powerful books of self-discovery I’ve ever read,” “beautifully written, skillfully layered, and paced like a good novel.” Kotlowitz described it as “a book worth savoring” and “incisive.”

Dreams commenced with a biblical epigraph that even in later years attracted no comment at all: “For we are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers . . .,” from 1 Chronicles 29:15. In Dreams’ introduction, Barack noted how “Harvard Law School’s peculiar place in the American mythology” and his election as the first black president of the Review had led to an opportunity to write a book about “the current state of race relations.” He recounted how he initially had “strongly resisted” addressing instead his own life story, in part because “I learned long ago to distrust my childhood and the stories that shaped it.” He confessed to having weathered “the periodic impulse to abandon the entire project” and warned of the inevitability of “selective lapses of memory.” He explained that “although much of this book is based on contemporaneous journals or the oral histories of my family, the dialogue is necessarily an approximation of what was actually said” and stated that “for the sake of compression, some of the characters that appear are composites of people I’ve known, and some events appear out of precise chronology. With the exception of my family and a handful of public figures, the names of most characters have been changed for the sake of their privacy.” He thanked Jane Dystel “for her faith and tenacity,” Henry Ferris, Ruth Fecych, and “especially Robert Fisher” for their help with the manuscript, and Michelle and his family members for their support.

In “Origins,” Barack described how his own birth stemmed from “my mother’s predicament” and admitted that how his parents came to marry “remains an enduring puzzle to me,” with even the supposed facts “a bit murky.” He offered a decidedly uncharitable portrait of his grandfather, criticizing Stanley’s “often-violent temper” and “his crude, ham-fisted manners.” Ralph Dunham, Stan’s far from uncritical older brother, later spoke with dismay about Dreams, saying Barack “was a bit unfair with Stanley,” and a later critic lambasted Stan’s portrayal as “unmistakably ironic and patronizing.” Lolo Soetoro fared significantly better, with Barack citing his “imperturbable” temperament and writing that “I had never heard him talk about what he was feeling. I had never seen him really angry or sad.” Of his own father during his childhood, Barack wrote that “my father remained a myth to me,” and even after Obama Sr.’s 1971 visit he “remains opaque.” Once Barack’s narrative reached his high school years, an angry character modeled on an exaggerated version of Keith Kakugawa was given the pseudonym “Ray,” no doubt by an author fully aware that his senior yearbook entry had thanked “Ray”—Ray Boyer—for “all the good times.” Smoking “pot” was expressly acknowledged, as was “a little blow when you could afford it.”

Frank Marshall Davis figured in the book as “a poet named Frank,” although with no full identification, and one ostensible lesson of black male adolescence was that “you didn’t let anyone . . . see emotions . . . you didn’t want them to see.” His mother Ann appeared episodically, including once to complain that “one of your friends was just arrested for drug possession” and to demand “the details of Pablo’s arrest,” the character based on Bobby Titcomb. Barack wrote that Malcolm X’s autobiography affected him because Malcolm’s “repeated acts of self-creation spoke to me” given how they were “forged through sheer force of will.”

Dreams’ account of Barack’s time at Oxy featured his reprimand by “Regina,” and presenting “Regina” as a black Chicagoan allowed her to stimulate “a longing for place, and a fixed and definite history” that Barack indeed “envied” and finally attained once he moved to Chicago. “Strange how a single conversation can change you. Or maybe it only seemed that way in retrospect.”

Scholars would write that “identity may be as determined by events we believe happened to us as ones that did,” an insight that could also apply to Dreams’ account of the traumatic impact the magazine photos of a black person who wanted to be white had had on him at age nine. In Momentous Events, Vivid Memories, developmental psychologist David Pillemer writes that there can be no doubting the importance of a “person’s beliefs about what happened,” for “psychic reality is as important as historical truth” given how “memory is an active, reconstructive process” and not a fount of empirical facts. “Memories of personal life episodes are generally true to the original experiences, although specific details may be omitted or misremembered.”

Dreams’ presentation of Barack’s unforgettable 1985 conversation with Bob Elia in the lobby of the Fairway Inn that summer 1985 night on the road to Chicago was transmogrified into an exchange with “Ike, the gruff black security guard in the lobby” of BI’s office building at One Dag Hammarskjold Plaza. No one else at BI remembered any security guard, but that was subsidiary to how impactful Bob’s challenge was on the young man on the road to a new life in a place where he had really never been. “People frequently trace the beginning of a life path, or the birth of a set of enduring beliefs or attitudes, to a single momentous event. Memories of originating events need not carry an explicit, rule-structured directive,” Pillemer writes, because “they inspire rather than prescribe. The memories are a source of motivation and reorientation in the pursuit of life goals.”

Far more so than “Regina,” Barack’s conversation with Bob Elia was one he would recount not only in Dreams but for years afterward. “Memories of originating events convey a sense of enduring influence and even causality,” Pillemer explains. “The initiating episode is seen as the original motivating force behind a momentous decision. But it is possible,” as was true with Barack, “that the memory simply represents the first conscious acknowledgment of a gradually shifting life path. Yet another possibility is that originating events are identified and selected only retrospectively” as “a coherent and orderly life story is constructed in which past events are spuriously linked to known outcomes.”

But at a minimum, as with Barack’s experience in Hermitage, Pennsylvania, “an originating event is perceived as creating, or at least contributing to, a new life course.” Such a turning point “appears to alter or redirect the ongoing flow of the life,” and autobiographies like Dreams “frequently draw implicit or explicit causal connections between specific early episodes”—as with Bob Elia—“and the subsequent direction of the life course.” Northwestern University psychologist Dan P. McAdams stresses that someone’s life story “is more like a personal myth than an objective biography, even though the subject believes the story to be true.” As with Barack, “life stories provide modern men and women with narrative identities,” and although childhood experiences “provide material for the life story,” the “story itself does not begin to take shape until society demands that a person begin to formulate a meaningful and coherent life,” as Barack experienced during his young adulthood in Roseland. In Dreams, Barack created a life story that was a carefully crafted public version of a “developing person’s own internalized and evolving narrative of the self.”

In Dreams, Ike the security guard was just as fictional as the story of how at BI Barack had “my own secretary,” and how at NYPIRG his job had been “trying to convince the minority students at City College about the importance of recycling.” Yet when Dreams’ Part Two brought Barack to Roseland, its accuracy quotient soared, if not its chronology, which made a jumble of his actual work there, but with characters directly and mostly accurately modeled not just on Dan Lee but on Cathy Askew, Loretta Augustine, Yvonne Lloyd, Margaret Bagby, Eva Sturgies, Maury Richards, Salim Al Nurridin, and Alma Jones. Jerry Kellman, Mike Kruglik, and Greg Galluzzo would be melded into a single “Marty Kaufman” who was in large part Jerry, and Barack apologized to Mike for his absence from Dreams, explaining that editors had eliminated some characters. Similarly, although his sister Auma’s visit to Chicago was accurately rendered except for her mundane arrival by train from southern Illinois, and not at O’Hare Airport, Alex McNear, Genevieve Cook, and Sheila Jager were condensed into a single woman whose appearance in the book was fleeting indeed, and Mary Ellen Montes, a married Mexican American mother of three, did not appear at all.

Learning from Auma about how deeply tragic Obama Sr.’s later life was had transformed Barack’s relationship with his deceased father. “Where once I’d felt the need to live up to his expectations, I now felt as if I had to make up for all his mistakes,” he wrote in Dreams. The composite girlfriend “was a woman in New York that I loved. She was white. She had dark hair, and specks of green in her eyes. Her voice sounded like a wind chime. We saw each other for almost a year. On the weekends, mostly. Sometimes in her apartment, sometimes in mine,” living in their “own private world. Just two people, hidden and warm.” This was largely Genevieve, except the “specks of green” were in Sheila’s eyes, not Genevieve’s. “One weekend she invited me to her family’s country house,” and “I realized that our two worlds” were seemingly distant. “I knew that if we stayed together, I’d eventually live in hers,” and so “I pushed her away. We started to fight. We started thinking about the future, and it pressed in on our warm little world. One night I took her to see a new play by a black playwright,” and after it “we had a big fight, right in front of the theater. When we got back to the car, she started crying. She couldn’t be black, she said. She would if she could, but she couldn’t. She could only be herself, and wasn’t that enough.”

Barack and Genevieve had argued, but the “big fight” on the street had been with Sheila in Chicago, not in New York with Genevieve. The summary treatment of the unnamed New York girlfriend was unremarkable, as Dreams both overstated—as with BI—and mentioned not at all—e.g., the almost weekly “partying” with Hasan—major aspects of Barack’s postcollegiate years there. Yet apart from one passing reference to “someone staying over” one night, Dreams omitted entirely the existence of any girlfriend in Chicago, never mind one Barack had lived with for almost two full years.

“I am completely missing from” Dreams, Sheila observed, and “I never understood why he wrote it that way.” Dreams made quite clear how Barack had solidified his identity during those years in Chicago, yet she highlighted how “this transformation happened over the course of a very tumultuous love affair which, intriguingly, and paradoxically, Barack does not even mention in his memoir.” Sheila mused that perhaps she had just been edited out. “I wonder if the unedited Dreams is as inaccurate as the published version.”

“Johnnie”—Owens—and Jeremiah Wright appeared as true-to-life characters under their own names, yet Wright did not preach his “Audacity of Hope” sermon at Trinity any time in early 1988. Part Three, about Barack’s summer 1988 trip to Kenya, was the most detailed part of the book by far, as Sheila appreciated better than anyone when she read Dreams. “There are whole passages from the book that are essentially copies of his letters to me,” the ones Barack wrote during his trip and then sought copies of after he signed his first book contract. “I always found it ironic that he was using his love letters to me to write his book and then completely omitted me from the entire account.”

Dreams inaccurately had Ruth Baker Ndesandjo inviting Barack and Auma to her home, instead of them appearing unannounced, but the book did not shy from confronting how troubled were the relationships Obama Sr.’s life and legacy impacted. On the last page of Part Three, Barack noted “the sense of abandonment I’d felt as a boy,” but in the preceding several pages he reenvisioned both his grandfather’s and his father’s lives through the lens of his own. Onyango “will have to reinvent himself” and “through force of will, he will create a life.” Likewise, Barack Sr. “too, will have to invent himself” and when accepted by the University of Hawaii “he must have known . . . that he had been chosen” thanks to “the blessings of God.” Pierre-Marie Loizeau, an insightful literary scholar, would note that “this repetition is neither fortuitous nor arbitrary,” that “in fact, Obama might just be talking about himself” and that Dreams was “an exercise of self-invention” whereby “blackness . . . is something to be achieved and continuously reinvented.”

Dreams stated that Barack Sr.’s inability to acquire “a faith in other people” had been his fatal flaw, that “for lack of faith you clung to both too much and too little of your past,” that “for all your gifts . . . you could never forge yourself into a whole man” because of his failure to exhibit “loyalty” and “a strong, true love.” That was Barack’s closure with the “paternal ghost” who had “haunted his son’s life from childhood” right through to the final completion of his book. Likewise, perceptive philosopher Mitchell Aboulaifa would realize that the insistent advice that a Kenyan teacher who had known Barack’s father gives Barack in Dreams—“we must choose,” just as Barack had insisted to DCP’s Cathy Askew—was “actually Obama’s” own stance, and that Obama Sr.’s “failures could in large measure be attributed to his uncompromising commitment to principles, which undermined his ability to compromise and make choices.”

Only in Dreams’ last five pages did Barack write about life after August 1988. He downplayed his enjoyment of law school, calling it “disappointing at times, a matter of applying narrow rules and arcane procedure . . . a sort of glorified accounting.” His most recent years had been “a relatively quiet period, less a time of discovery than of consolidation,” and the book concluded with a two-page account of Barack and Michelle’s 1992 wedding. Much of it was devoted to praising Abon’go’s demeanor at the reception, and the narrative ended with Abon’go offering a toast, “To those who are not here with us.”<sup>36</sup>

Times Books had bought a third-of-a-page ad for Dreams in the Sunday New York Times Book Review, featuring the glowing endorsements by Charlayne Hunter-Gault, Derrick Bell, and Marian Wright Edelman plus Kirkus Review’s advance praise and a small, grainy photo of Barack. Ironically, the ad ran alongside a review of a book about John Dewey, father of Ann Dunham’s mentor Alice. Far more important, four pages earlier there also appeared a top-half-of-the-page review of Dreams entitled “A Promise of Redemption.” Written by a young white novelist, Paul Watkins, the review characterized Dreams as a “provocative” book that “persuasively describes” growing up amid “a bewildering combination of races, relatives and homelands.” Barack experienced “the pain of never feeling completely a part of one people or one place,” but when he moves to Chicago “he quickly becomes the pawn of professional organizers, intent on profiteering from money gouged out of the city budget.” Watkins obviously had not given Dreams a careful reading, and although he claimed that Barack’s “story bogs down in discussions of racial exploitation,” Watkins acknowledged that many scenes “are finely written.” He observed how “Obama is no more black than he is white,” yet Dreams offers “no emotional investigation into his other half, his ‘white side,’” only his African American one. Watkins wondered if he was right in thinking that Barack’s underlying argument was “that people of mixed backgrounds must choose only one culture in which to make a spiritual home” and “that it is not possible to be both black and white.”

Other early reviews called Dreams a “poignant, probing memoir,” a “lively autobiographical conversation,” and “a moving and articulate exploration of what it means to be a black American” by an “eloquent and thoughtful” writer. The adjective “compelling” appeared in multiple reviews, and a day after the New York Times review ran, there was another in the Los Angeles Times that praised Dreams for its “sharp eye” and “generous heart.” A Boston Globe column announced the book’s publication and reminded readers that the author “was a local celebrity of sorts five years ago” as president of the Review.

Barack’s modest book tour took him first to Manhattan and a Tuesday-night reading at a Barnes & Noble store on Astor Place. At least two familiar and friendly faces were present: Ann Dunham’s old friend Pete Vayda, whom Barack had met years earlier, plus his dear friend Hasan Chandoo. Barack inscribed and signed a copy “To my brother Hasan who helped me through some tough times with love and loyalty.” Barack’s next stop was Washington, where he was interviewed about how Dreams had become so personal a narrative. “What I realized . . . was that the starting point for any insights I might have really had to do with the story of my own family,” yet “I have not been completely comfortable with calling it an autobiography.” Barack later reiterated that point, remarking that Dreams “wasn’t really an autobiography,” yet he told journalist Bill Thompson that “probably the most difficult part of writing it” was recounting Stan and Madelyn’s argument about her fearful reaction to the aggressive black panhandler.

From Washington, Barack flew to San Francisco and a bookstore appearance way out near Golden Gate Park. Then he headed to Los Angeles and a pair of television interview tapings prior to another evening bookstore event. On Connie Martinson Talks Books, Barack claimed that “it was extraordinarily difficult to grow up in both Hawaii and then later in Indonesia where I was often the only person of African extraction there, and I did not have any male role models.” He acknowledged that his father “dies a very bitter and lonely man,” and when Martinson asked about Jeremiah Wright, Barack called him “a wonderful man” who “represents the best of what the black church has to offer.”

In a second, far longer interview with Marc Strassman for Book Channel, Barack spoke of “the importance of making choices” when confronted with family traditions, such as “the oppressive sexism which exists in Africa,” choices “about what traditions we want to cling to” and “which ones we’re willing to discard.” He mentioned his UC Law School class, although he mispronounced W. E. B. Du Bois’s surname, wrongly using a French enunciation, and spoke about the importance of “building up human capital.” Social progress would require “a grassroots mobilization . . . at the level of the street,” and black America had to “break loose of this either-or mentality” in arguing about what was responsible for black inequality. “Inner-city black males who are running around getting young ladies pregnant and then leaving them” was indeed a problem, for “values do matter” and “moral purpose does matter.”

Barack spoke expansively with Strassman, saying that in “my journey to understand who I was . . . it wasn’t until I moved to Chicago and became a community organizer that I think I really grew into myself in terms of my identity.” He admitted that “the accomplishments of my organizing were modest,” but “I connected in a very direct way with the African American community in Chicago.” That allowed him to “walk away with a sense of self-understanding and empowerment and connection.” But Barack had come to realize that “the kind of community organizing that I did” in Roseland “did not take into account the major structural barriers to change that exist in this society,” including “the international economy” and “the power of the media to shape reality.”

He believed that “American history moves in waves and cycles” and that “notions of common ground are the glue that hold our society together.” Strassman pressed him with a foreshadowing question: “You’re willing to stake your political career on there being a common ground?” Barack replied, “that’s the core of my faith.” Asked about being an author, Barack said his book tour had been “exhausting,” and that “I had a more romantic notion of the publishing and book tour process.” He quickly added that “the reception has been terrific,” but that evening at Eso Won Books, an African American shop in Leimert Park, only nine people, including one of the owners, attended Barack’s reading.<sup>37</sup>

On Saturday morning Barack flew back to Chicago, and that evening Valerie Jarrett was hosting a book party for him in the backyard of her parents’ spacious Hyde Park home. Michelle and Valerie’s good friend Susan Sher remembered that no more than ten people attended, though Valerie insisted it was closer to forty. Gwen LaRoche, Judd Miner, and 5th Ward alderman Barbara Holt were among those in attendance, and Barack soon did another signing at a bookstore at the Ford City Mall in Chicago’s West Lawn neighborhood owned by the family of Michelle’s Public Allies board member Craig Huffman.

Barack continued to try to win attention for the book, and Woods Fund program officer Kaye Wilson recommended he reach out to well-known Chicago editor Hermene Hartman to request a review in her N’Digo magazine. That came to naught, but Barack did score an hour-long morning “drive time” talk show appearance on WJJD-AM with an unlikely pair of interviewers: African American radio professional Ty Wansley and his “lightning rod” sidekick, former 10th Ward alderman and mayoral candidate Ed Vrdolyak. Barack already knew the show’s producer, Barack Echols, his father’s namesake whom he had met two years earlier at the Hyde Park video store. Wansley asked most of the questions, and one participant thought that the usually fiery Vrdolyak was “a little bit intimidated” by as erudite a guest as Barack. The weekly Hyde Park Herald also interviewed the neighborhood’s newest author. Barack said that visiting Kenya to learn more about his father was “a healing process,” and that “for all of his absences and faults, my father provided a positive image to live up to or disappoint. Have I made my peace with him? Yes, I think I have.”

Published reviews continued to be laudatory. A Philadelphia tabloid praised the book’s “mind-tingling prose” and the Boston Globe termed Dreams “a life-affirming, inspiring book.” Yet another paper called it “compelling,” and a prominent black monthly said Dreams was “wonderfully written in a bright, louvered style that indulges in a little too much detachment.” A southern daily paper said Barack “shows wisdom well beyond his years,” and the NAACP’s monthly magazine, The Crisis, lauded Dreams as “eloquent and thoughtful.” An accompanying interview quoted Barack as saying that “while I’m not advocating segregation, in segregated black communities, historically, there was a lot to be grateful for. There were black doctors, black lawyers. They didn’t leave the black community when they became successful, like so many successful blacks do today.”

While Dreams From My Father garnered heaps of praise from reviewers unacquainted with Barack, most people who had known him well during his life, particularly those from his time at Punahou, were astonished or disbelieving when they read Dreams' depiction of how racial anger and disaffection had dominated his school years. Both Greg Orme and Mike Ramos, Barack's two closest teenage companions, felt many passages, especially the account of their own supposedly acute racial discomfort at the mostly black Schofield Barracks party, were at best overstated exaggerations. "I never knew, until reading the book later, how much that night had upset him," Greg explained, because Barack "never verbalized any of that" racial anger which Dreams so forcefully dramatized. Bobby Titcomb agreed. "I didn't know that Barack was having those internal struggles until I read his book." Barack's Punahou basketball teammates agreed. "We had no clue," stated Alan Lum, and Tom Topolinski said, "I never heard or felt or sensed any kind of identity crisis." Kelli Furushima, the cute classmate with whom Barack flirted and whose yearbooks he warmly inscribed, said he "seemed to be a happy guy" and "gave no indication of feeling uncomfortable." Reading Dreams, Kelli found it "hard to imagine that he felt that way."

Former teammate Dan Hale explained that "the book was not, shall we say, highly thought of" among Punahou staff members because its portrayal of pot-smoking, beer-guzzling students "did not paint a very flattering picture of the school." More significant, teachers like Pal Eldredge, who knew "Barry" year upon year, and Eric Kusunoki, who saw him every morning throughout high school, agreed with Mike, Greg, Bobby, Kelli, and Barack's other fellow students about the book. Eldredge thought Dreams was "shocking" because "I had no clue he felt like that." Kusunoki reacted similarly. Bitter angst "never came out in his behavior. He never verbalized it, he never acted it out," and "I was totally unaware" of the disaffected attitude chronicled in Dreams.

When Barack's former coworkers at Business International Corporation first discovered Dreams a decade after its publication, they were astonished by how Barack described the company. Jeanne Reynolds Schmidt "immediately thought this was not the same place I worked! It was not a high-level consulting firm," and "it was hardly an upscale environment. And I laughed when I read in the book that he had his own secretary." Susan Arterian Chang agreed. "The BI that Barack describes in his memoirs is unrecognizable to me," and Cathy Lazere, Barack's immediate supervisor, called Dreams' portrayal of BI "fabricated."

Reactions of complete astonishment reached all the way to Barack's closest friends during law school. Cassandra Butts had seen an initial draft of the Kenya chapters, but when she read Dreams' account of Barack's pre-Chicago life, she realized that "that wasn't the person that we knew" at Harvard. "He was so far removed from that person and from that search when we knew him in law school, that was shocking, actually" to read. In subsequent years, few observers ever focused on just how glaring the contradiction was between everyone's memories of Barack, particularly from his Punahou years, and how Dreams portrayed a deeply troubled life. "The serene man his friends describe could not be more different from the person Obama himself describes in his memoir," Larissa MacFarquhar noted. Barack would stress that Dreams "was not journalism," and that "the main thing I was trying to do was just write a good enough book that I wasn't embarrassed." Yet MacFarquhar rightly observed that "the contrast between the Obama of the book and the Obama visible to the world is nonetheless so extreme as to be striking." In rebuttal, Barack insisted to her that "that angry character lasts from the time I was fifteen to the time I was twenty-one or so," but another journalist rightly wondered "how to interpret the fact that this turmoil was not evident even to his closest friends" at either Punahou or Oxy.

One careful reader concluded that "there's a very oddly detached quality to the book, almost as if he's describing somebody else.” But only Jonathan Raban, an experienced world traveler as well as a distinguished novelist, would accurately take Dreams’ full measure. The book “is less memoir than novel,” he realized, an insight that the historian David Greenberg later echoed in calling Dreams “semi-fictional.” In truth, as Barack’s actual life story from the 1960s to the 1990s would subsequently reveal, Dreams From My Father was neither an autobiography nor a memoir. A prescient reader like Raban would note how many characters are “composites with fictional names,” how Dreams’ “total-recall dialogue is as much imagined as remembered,” and how “its time sequences are intricately shuffled” while reflecting upon how novelistic Dreams actually was.

Less than a decade later one journalist rightly emphasized that Barack “was already weighing a political career when he wrote the book.” Keith Kakugawa, just like Mike and Greg, wondered why Dreams so dramatically magnified their teenage years’ racial tensions, but the explanation for their and others’ puzzlement about Dreams’ depiction of the Punahou years was transparently obvious if one realized how Barack’s embrace of his own blackness during his initial three years in Chicago, and then in Kenya, had retroactively led him to reshape his entire self-presentation of the first twenty-four years of his life.

As the multiracial author Gary Kamiya perceptively put it, in Dreams Barack “made himself black.” And, as Greg Galluzzo realized in comparing the Barack of Dreams to the young man with whom he had spent scores of hours, “his book could be called A Journey to Blackness.” Barack enthusiastically told one later questioner that “I love to write,” that “I love fiction, I love to read fiction, but I’m not sure I have enough talent to write fiction.” Yet for once in his life, if only for one sole time, Barack Obama sold himself short. Dreams From My Father was not a memoir or an autobiography; it was instead, in multitudinous ways, without any question a work of historical fiction. True to that genre, it featured many true-to-life figures and a bevy of accurately described events that indeed had occurred, but it employed the techniques and literary license of a novel, and its most important composite character was the narrator himself.<sup>38</sup>

Back in Chicago following his book tour, Barack had lunch with Jesse Ruiz, his former law student who had dutifully bought a copy of Dreams for Barack to sign. “Hey, you might be famous one day,” Jesse teased him, and Barack told him that soon he would be running for Palmer’s state Senate seat. “Guys like you can help me become mayor one day,” but Jesse responded dubiously: “Don’t be hanging your hat on mayor.”

The week of August 14 commenced with Mel Reynolds testifying in his own defense, insisting that the prosecution’s tape recordings of his 1994 phone calls with Beverly Heard proved only that he had engaged in phone sex with her, not that they had had a physical relationship when she was underage. In his fourth day on the stand, however, Reynolds “unraveled” during a prosecutor’s questioning, and “jurors shook their heads” during the congressman’s “rambling tirades,” the Tribune reported. Equally significant, by the middle of that week word began to spread that Jesse Jackson Jr. was definitely going to join Alice Palmer in running for Reynolds’s seat, which a conviction might leave vacant well before the 1996 Democratic primary.

Monday, August 21, featured closing arguments in Reynolds’s trial, with lead prosecutor Andrea Zorn mocking him as “Mr. Oxford law degree.” Later that day the case went to the jury, and the next evening the jurors returned guilty verdicts on every count. Reynolds faced a minimum of four years in prison, and while he could appeal, U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun joined the Tribune in calling for Reynolds's immediate resignation from Congress.

Attention quickly turned to the race to succeed him. State representative Monique Davis, a member of Trinity United Church, immediately declared her candidacy, and state senators Emil Jones Jr. and Bill Shaw, as well as 17th Ward alderman Allan Streeter, all mulled entering the race too. That Sunday's Chicago Sun-Times reported that "most strategists consider Palmer the early front-runner" but said Jones "would be the candidate to beat" if he entered the race. That afternoon Alice Palmer's campaign held a backyard barbecue in the Beverly neighborhood, and among the attendees was Republican state senator Steve Rauschenberger of Elgin, who already had given Palmer a $100 contribution two weeks earlier.

The thirty-eight-year-old Rauschenberger was one of the Illinois Republican Party's brightest stars, a top member of the so-called Fab Five of young senators who had joined the chamber after the 1992 election. Earlier that year GOP Senate president James "Pate" Philip had named Rauschenberger chair of the powerful Appropriations Committee, notwithstanding his lack of seniority, and Crain's Chicago Business said that Rauschenberger and other young Republicans, like thirty-four-year-old Palatine banker Peter Fitzgerald, "have transformed the Illinois Senate." Unquestionably one of the sharpest members of the body, Rauschenberger respected Alice Palmer as a "very bright" and "eloquent" colleague, someone whose congressional aspirations in a heavily Democratic district he had no hesitancy in supporting with another $100 check.

About 150 people attended the event, including Barack, and during the event Palmer spoke to the crowd and explained that Barack was her desired successor in the state Senate. Steve thought "that was the first time she publicly introduced Barack" and voiced her blessing. Progressive African American lobbyist William McNary remembered it too, as did Michael Lieteau, another experienced African American lobbyist who represented AT&T. Palmer's prospects seemed bright, for as former Harold Washington aide Tim Wright explained, "we all thought she was going to be congresswoman until Jesse" Jackson Jr. entered the race.

The next morning the Chicago Defender broke the news that Jackson would formally announce his candidacy on September 9 at a noontime rally at Salem Baptist Church. Other observers believed Emil Jones, not Jackson, might offer the stiffest competition. Sun-Times columnist Steve Neal, an outspoken fan, asserted that Palmer "is in the strongest position for a special election" following Reynolds's expected resignation, but other prognosticators noted that Palmer's 13th Senate District constituted only 7 percent of the 2nd Congressional District, far less than city wards like the 9th and 34th, whose Democratic organizations would support Jones.

A few days later Neal reported that Jones was definitely running and that former mayoral contender Joe Gardner would back him, which was ironic in light of reports that Mayor Daley, worried about Palmer as a potential citywide challenger should she win election to Congress, also supported Jones. Mel Reynolds appeared on Larry King Live to announce that he indeed would resign from Congress, effective October 1, and on September 11 Governor Jim Edgar set the primary election for Tuesday, November 28, with the pro forma general election to follow two weeks later.<sup>39</sup>

Barack and Carol Harwell had been busy setting up his campaign. Carol had wanted to rent an office on East 71st Street in South Shore that was already wired for multiple phone lines, but Michelle Obama insisted on a better-looking but unequipped space a few blocks west at 2152 East 71st. Barack rented computers and printers, and the Obamas provided a fancy coffee machine they had received as a wedding present to the humbly furnished storefront. The campaign also managed to secure a quite numerically appropriate phone number: 312-363-1996. Carol asked a friend to be office manager and recruited forty-three-year-old Ron Davis, the Kennedy King college math instructor whom she and Barack both knew from Project VOTE!, to be the campaign's field director.

Once Reynolds announced his resignation, guaranteeing a special election, Barack asked Palmer whether this scenario—where she now could run for Congress without having to surrender her Senate seat—meant that he should hold off on publicly announcing his own candidacy. “If you want to hedge your bets and wait and see if you win, then I’m comfortable with that, and I can sort of keep my campaign in a holding pattern until we see what happens,” Barack said he told her. “No, Barack,” Palmer responded. “I’m going to win this congressional race, and so you have my blessing and my go-ahead.”

Word of Palmer's commitment appeared in the Hyde Park Herald, which reported that “according to sources close to her campaign,” Palmer “has no plans to try and recapture her Senate seat if her bid is unsuccessful.” Years later, Palmer readily confirmed those reports: “I certainly did say that I wasn’t going to run. There’s no question about that.” The Herald identified Barack as a “neophyte” politician who replied “warily” to questions and hoped “grass roots folks” would back him. “Obama has the support of Palmer” and also was endorsed by state representative Barbara Flynn Currie, the Herald stated. Carol Harwell scheduled a formal announcement for September 19 at Hyde Park's Ramada Inn, known to many as the place where Harold Washington had launched his successful mayoral candidacy, and Alice Palmer readily agreed to introduce Barack and offer a ringing endorsement.

Then daunting news arrived from Hawaii: chemotherapy had not stopped the spread of Ann Dunham's cancer, and Ann and Madelyn were about to fly to New York so that Ann could be examined by an oncologist at the Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center. Maya, in grad school at NYU, met them at the airport, where Ann required a wheelchair. Over the summer Ann had kept Barack apprised about her disability insurance difficulties with Cigna, which was trying to deny her benefit claim, and within a day or two of Ann's arrival in New York, Barack and Michelle flew in from Chicago.

Ann had told at least one of her friends about her unhappiness over how her son had portrayed her in Dreams, particularly his rendition of the time in 1982 when he and Maya had accompanied her to the screening of Black Orpheus. But in New York, Ann made no mention of that, and one day Barack and Michelle joined her for lunch with her old friend Pete Vayda and his wife.

Barack also spent an hour speaking with broadcaster Bill Moyers, who at Debbie Leff's suggestion wanted to ask Barack to join the board of the Florence and John Schumann Foundation, of which Moyers was president. Then, on September 15, the oncologist informed Ann that her cancer was now stage 4 and her odds were poor, but he recommended a change to a different chemotherapy regime when she returned to Honolulu.<sup>40</sup>

Back in Chicago, Barack and Michelle were startled to learn that their good friend Valerie Jarrett had been bounced as Chicago's commissioner of planning and economic development. Jarrett would become executive vice president of a real estate management firm, the Habitat Co., and also take on a part-time role as chairman of the Chicago Transit Authority.

On the electoral front, state senator Emil Jones Jr. announced he soon would formally enter the congressional race. Alice Palmer supporters proclaimed that Jones was more valuable as Senate Democratic leader than he would be in Congress, and that Jesse Jackson Jr. was too inexperienced for such a post. As Barack's own Tuesday-evening announcement neared, Carol Harwell recruited former alderman Cliff Kelley, now a prominent radio host, to MC the event, and Tuesday's Chicago Defender publicized it with an unfortunately worded page 3 headline: "Harvard Lawyer Eyes Palmer Seat."

As the 6:00 P.M. affair got under way, "a standing-room-only audience of 200 supporters" packed the modest-sized room. Aldermen Toni Preckwinkle and Barbara Holt were present, as were Barack's old organizing colleague David Kindler and Robinson family friend John Rogers Jr. Alice Palmer had asked her most committed supporters to attend, and for longtime Hyde Park political activists Alan and Lois Dobry, it was their first opportunity to meet Barack. Kathy Stell, a young UC dean who previously had worked at the law school, had mentioned Barack and the kickoff to Will Burns, a twenty-two-year-old UC graduate who was interested in politics. When Burns arrived, field director Ron Davis was staffing a sign-in table replete with volunteer forms, and as Will filled one out, Ron asked him to specify "Field" rather than "Policy" as his preference.

Alice Palmer was the leadoff speaker, and she began by reminding the crowd that "In this room, Harold Washington announced for mayor. It looks different, but the spirit is still in the room." Then she offered her protégé a ringing endorsement. "Barack Obama carries on the tradition of independence in this district, a tradition that continued with me and most recently with Senator Newhouse. His candidacy is a passing of the torch, because he's the person that people have embraced and have lifted up as the person they want to represent this district."

Then Barack stepped to the podium and almost apologetically announced his candidacy. "Politicians are not held to highest esteem these days. They fall somewhere lower than lawyers," perhaps an implicit reference to Mel Reynolds's tattered legacy. But Barack promised to be better. "I want to inspire a renewal of morality in politics. I will work as hard as I can, as long as I can, on your behalf." John Rogers had never heard Barack speak, and he was impressed by his "total confidence" and his ability to "capture the audience the way he did."

Neither the Tribune, the Sun-Times, nor the Defender covered Barack's declaration of candidacy, and only a modest page-3 story in the weekly Hyde Park Herald chronicled the event: "Hyde Parker Announces Run for State Senate Seat." The next day, the newly declared thirty-four-year-old politician headed to the airport to fly to Boston for a Wednesday-night book reading, but on the way he stopped at the Chicago Board of Elections to perform his first act as a candidate for office. Four years earlier, when he registered to vote after returning from law school, Barack had signed his name "Barack H. Obama." On September 20, 1995, he amended that registration to read simply "Barack Obama." For a politician, having "Hussein" as your middle name clearly merited a calculated effort to minimize the odds of anyone potentially asking a worrisome question: "What's the 'H' stand for?"<sup>41</sup>

INTO THE ARENA

CHICAGO AND SPRINGFIELD

SEPTEMBER 1995–SEPTEMBER 1999

The newly declared candidate's trip to Boston featured two attractive speaking venues: a Wednesday-night reading at the Cambridge Public Library and a Thursday-night appearance at the nearby Concord Festival of Authors. Barack realized when he arrived that a far more prominent African American author was also in town promoting his brand-new autobiography. Former general and potential presidential candidate Colin Powell, who was signing his My American Journey at a downtown bookstore, attracted a midday crowd of two thousand.

That evening Barack drew several dozen interested listeners to a modest-sized room at the Cambridge library, where he told them that Dreams From My Father was “not so much a memoir, I think, as sort of a journey of discovery for me.” Barack read Dreams' exaggerated account of Mike Ramos and Greg Orme's supposedly intense racial discomfort at the mostly black Schofield Barracks party. “This sense of betrayal” that he felt from their uneasiness, Barack explained, mirrored his reaction to Stan and Madelyn's argument over the aggressive black panhandler: “I'm feeling that same sense of betrayal from my family.”

Barack also read Dreams' account of his subsequent conversation with his sole African American confidant, whom he named in full—“Frank Marshall Davis”—and described as “a close friend” of his grandfather, whom he expressly characterized as “poor white trash.” One questioner remarked that earlier that day he had heard Cornel West speak, and that West sounded very pessimistic compared to Obama.

“Cornel West has to go back to his Bible,” Barack responded. “You've got to have faith,” and the audience laughed as Barack quickly added, “I say that facetiously.” Returning to Dreams, he explained that “as I was writing, I really wanted this to be a work of the imagination,” and “I wanted it to read like a story and not a memoir.”

In Chicago, political eyes were fixed on the contest to replace Mel Reynolds, although Barack was momentarily distracted a day after returning when he received a $75 traffic ticket for failure to stop. Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal wrote that state Senate Democratic minority leader Emil Jones Jr. “has a fair chance to win” the November 28 primary, in part because state representative Monique Davis's long-shot candidacy might cut into Alice Palmer's presumed strength among women voters, thereby helping Jones. When Jones finally announced his candidacy on September 30, the Tribune reported that “he is widely viewed as the person to beat” and is “heavily favored to win,” especially because his Senate district comprised one-quarter of the congressional one.

Three days later, everyone's attention turned to California when a Los Angeles jury astonishingly acquitted former football star O. J. Simpson of murdering his former wife Nicole Brown Simpson and her friend Ronald Goldman, with many African Americans celebrating that verdict. Barack was crestfallen, later remarking that it “was pretty clear that O.J. was guilty, and I was ashamed for my own community to respond in that way.”

Alice Palmer’s congressional campaign bragged that it had raised more than $100,000, with major unions like the Service Employees (SEIU) contributing as much as $5,000, but Palmer booster Steve Neal was dismayed by the candidate’s poor performance during a televised debate, writing that Palmer “talked in slogans and was unresponsive to questions.” Far worse news for Palmer came from polling that all three major campaigns—hers, Jones’s, and young upstart Jesse Jackson Jr.’s—were conducting. Neal, privy to the results, reported that “Palmer has dropped to a distant third” as “voters seem to know a lot more about Jackson and Jones.” Palmer had been in the race longer than her opponents, but, Neal wrote, “after nearly a year of campaigning, she has failed to make much headway. . . . Jackson is known by 85 percent of probable Democratic voters in the 2nd District, and Jones is known by 67 percent,” while “Palmer’s poor performance is largely due to her lack of name identification.” Jones’s own polling showed Jackson with 24 percent, Jones with 20, and 29 percent of voters undecided. Still, Palmer told reporters she was not worried, citing a thirteen-thousand-piece mailing, ads on three radio stations, and the endorsement of the independent, anti-machine Independent Voters of Illinois–Independent Precinct Organization (IVI-IPO) coalition. A Sun-Times op-ed praised her “serious demeanor” and said she “clearly is the superior choice.”

For Barack, Michelle’s longtime friendship with Jesse Jackson Jr.’s sister Santita, plus their attendance at each other’s weddings, added tension to a relationship that was now outweighed by Barack’s and Alice Palmer’s public support of each other’s campaigns. Barack was “in a really difficult dilemma,” Jackson explained years later, and one of Michelle’s Public Allies alumni, Malik Nevels, who worked on Jackson’s campaign, was present when Barack told a sympathetic Jackson that he could not endorse him. Indeed, when Jackson’s best friend, Marty King, told one young woman that Jesse’s backers could not support someone who was not supporting them, Jr. was so displeased by Marty’s tone that he called the Obamas and had Marty apologize in person later that same day at a Hyde Park restaurant they all liked, Dixie Kitchen & Bait Shop. Jackson later explained that “we could think short term, or we could think long term, because we’ll be in Chicago together for a long time.”

As Alice Palmer’s campaign headed into its final month, friends and supporters more politically savvy than Palmer told her to reconsider the race. African American lobbyist Mike Lieteau, who had attended the late August barbecue at which Palmer had introduced Barack as her successor, told her that Jackson’s high-profile candidacy meant she should stand down. Research consultant Don Wiener and longtime progressive activist Don Rose both advised likewise. Fifth Ward activists Alan and Lois Dobry knew that Alice had “never built up a political base in the 7th Ward,” and African American AFSCME lobbyist Ray Harris believed that “Alice was really naive when it came to politics.” Her state Senate colleague Lou Viverito admired Palmer as “a very dignified lady,” but he spoke for many when he said she “was not the most astute political animal.” Campaign chairman Hal Baron realized that young, new-to-Chicago campaign manager Darrel Thompson had relatively little to work with given the skimpiness of Palmer’s own political base, plus Alice herself was “not good at organization.” Her most influential adviser was her husband Buzz, and despite a good number of upper-middle-class supporters both black and white, the actual Palmer campaign was not well organized. As much as Baron admired Alice Palmer, there was no denying that Buzz was just a classic Chicago street operator, Baron explained.

Some observers and Palmer backers were perplexed by her promise of her Senate seat to Barack when she had no need to surrender it. African American lobbyist and former state representative Paul Williams warned Barack that “there’s going to be a moment when she’s going to realize what she’s done,” and that “it made absolutely no sense” to give up her state post if Jones or Jackson won the congressional primary. Cook County Board member Danny Davis, the African American favorite for a West Side congressional seat from which the incumbent was retiring, bluntly said: “Who’s this Barack Obama? What plane did he come off of?”

On the South Side, the Hyde Park Herald reported that Gha-Is Askia, the African American Muslim who had announced his candidacy for Palmer’s state Senate seat four months earlier, was endorsed by boxer Muhammad Ali as well as by Emil Jones and black state representative Connie Howard. In addition, Marc Ewell, a thirty-year-old Howard University graduate who was the son of former state representative Raymond Ewell, a machine loyalist and sixteen-year legislative veteran whose surname was well known on the South Side, was also entering the race. In Barack’s modest campaign office on East 71st Street in South Shore, sister-in-law Janis Robinson, now mothering a three-year-old son, joined campaign manager Carol Harwell part-time to schedule more than a dozen small receptions in supporters’ homes. Barack also traveled to Washington, D.C., to attend the October 16 Million Man March that Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan had taken the lead in organizing. Some of the lesser-known speakers, such as Rev. Al Sampson and former congressman Gus Savage, were figures Barack was familiar with from Chicago. The historic gathering attracted widespread coverage even though only about four hundred thousand actually attended.<sup>1</sup>

Barack’s campaign account, Friends of Barack Obama, was in decent shape thanks to $2,000 apiece from enthusiastic backers Al Johnson and Tony Rezko, as well as $1,000 donations from other developers like William Moorehead and Leon Finney and from personal friends such as Judd Miner and Bernard Loyd, plus smaller contributions from a bevy of relatives and colleagues including maternal uncle Charles Payne, Father Mike Pflieger, and the Hope Center’s Sokoni Karanja. Michelle’s Public Allies board member Sunny Fischer hosted a fund-raiser up in Evanston that drew more than twenty people, Barack’s former law students Jesse Ruiz, Jeanne Gills, and Brett Hart hosted one at Ruiz’s girlfriend’s apartment that attracted about ten, and Davis Miner colleagues Jeff Cummings and John Belcaster, with Harvard basketball buddy Greg Dingens, cohosted a small late-October one at mutual friend Steve Derks’s River City apartment building, where the only guest Barack did not already know was Jeff’s friend Michael Parham.

Alice Palmer actively aided Barack’s efforts. Davis Miner’s Allison Davis remembered “her coming up to the office and asking if we would support Barack, give him money,” and former 4th Ward alderman Tim Evans likewise recalled that “at the time, one of his biggest boosters was Alice Palmer.” Palmer also called her fellow education advocate Bill Ayers to ask that he and his wife Bernardine Dohrn host a coffee where she could introduce Barack to Hyde Parkers who did not yet know him. Ayers had met Barack multiple times thanks to his lead role in staffing the Chicago School Reform Collaborative, whose evaluation committee played a far more consequential role in deciding which proposals the Chicago Annenberg Challenge would fund than did the CAC board of “Chicago worthies” that Barack chaired. Bill thought Barack was “enormously intelligent, bright, attractive,” and so “of course” they readily agreed.

Dohrn, a 1967 University of Chicago Law School graduate who had worked at Sidley & Austin from 1984 to 1988, had met Michelle there and from 1993 forward had supervised one of Michelle's young Public Allies at Northwestern University Law School's Children and Family Justice Center, which she directed. Bill's infamous role in the Weather Underground two decades earlier had not hindered his professorial status at the University of Illinois at Chicago nor his activism in Chicago school reform circles, but Bernardine's criminal record had prevented her admission to the Illinois State Bar. A lengthy 1993 profile in Chicago Magazine had described them as "a lively, thoughtful, loving couple" who host "high-profile dinner parties" and stated that all across the city there was "a widespread willingness to disregard" their radical pasts.

Bill and Bernardine invited twenty to thirty people to their town house on East 50th Street, which they had purchased a year earlier. "It was Alice's initiative to have the event," Bill explained, and Bernardine recalled that "the room was packed." Bernardine welcomed everyone and introduced Alice Palmer, who, as Bill remembered, "gave a little talk" saying that Barack's "a great guy. He's wonderful. Support him." Dr. Quentin Young, a progressive physician whose partner Dr. David Scheiner had been Barack's doctor since 1987, recalled Palmer saying that Barack was "a very promising young man who will serve the district well." Young thought Obama was "extremely impressive," but a young black woman whose husband had joined UC's English faculty four years earlier later wrote that Barack's "bright eyes and easy smile" struck her "as contrived and calculated."

This gathering led to several other similar Hyde Park events. Local activists Sam and Martha Ackerman hosted one in their Hyde Park condo. Martha was exceptionally impressed with Barack, telling her husband that she could imagine him as a future president of the United States. Rabbi Arnold Jacob Wolf, a civil rights supporter who had served as Yale University's Jewish chaplain before returning to Chicago in 1980 to lead KAM Isaiah Israel Temple, the city's oldest synagogue, hosted another one and was almost as impressed as Martha Ackerman. "I said to him, Mr. Obama, someday you will be vice president of the United States," and he remembered that Barack responded, "'Why vice president?'"

But running for a seat in the Illinois state legislature was a decidedly low-profile and mundane task. One crucial requirement was getting the signatures of at least 757 Democratic voters registered at addresses within the 13th Senate District in order to appear on the upcoming March 19 Democratic primary ballot. Chicago's Democratic machine was famous for disqualifying independent challengers whose petition circulators did not follow all the arcane rules while gathering these signatures at front doors and on street corners. But Ron Davis, whom Carol Harwell had recruited as field director and whom Barack had known since 1992's Project VOTE!, was a master of the intricacies of the nominating petition process.

Before the end of October, Barack reached out to the city's top progressive election lawyer, Tom Johnson, whom he also had first met during Project VOTE! Judd Miner and George Galland at Davis Miner knew Johnson well, because in the 1980s, Johnson had represented first Harold Washington and then Tim Evans during the political warfare of those years. Between Davis and Johnson, Barack's petition circulators were in golden hands, and by the end of October, Barack, plus young U of C graduate Will Burns, former law students like Brett Hart and Jesse Ruiz, and young U of C dean Kathryn Stell were going door to door collecting the best possible signatures, those of people who clearly lived at the addresses the petition circulators were visiting.

Also tagging along was journalist Hank DeZutter, whom the weekly Chicago Reader alternative newspaper had commissioned to write a long profile of Barack, as well as photographer Mark PoKempner. DeZutter sat in one day when Barack did a Hope Center training session for eight Bronzeville women, and PoKempner snapped photos of Barack, who wore a winter coat and scarf, holding a clipboard as a similarly attired middle-aged black woman signed his petition sheet. One weekday morning, PoKempner also photographed a pensive but relaxed Barack talking on the phone in his office at Davis Miner, a framed photograph of Harold Washington and a 1992 Project VOTE! "It's a POWER Thing" poster on the wall above his computer station.

Sometime early in November, ten or so of Alice Palmer's most devoted supporters, worried about her congressional prospects, summoned Barack to the Bronzeville home of state representative Lovana "Lou" Jones, Palmer's closest legislative colleague. Jones was "the senior person there," Timuel "Tim" Black, a highly respected teacher and historian, recalled, and "Lou was very anxious to have Alice back" in Springfield if indeed she lost. "We asked him if he would step aside" if that came to pass, and "we told him, 'Whatever else you run for, we will be with you.'" Black said that Jones laid out Palmer's superior merits. "Our rationale was she's got a reputation, she's got a record already, she's well known, you are not. We want her to stay there, and we will support you in anything else."

Barack listened patiently and said he would consider their points, but he would not withdraw. "I can't do that," Barack remembered replying. "I told them we were already far into the race," that his campaign had "spent a good deal of money," that "I've been having these conversations with her for quite some time now," and that Alice had never given any "indication she was going back on her commitment."

Black recalled Barack's response similarly: "He said he had already begun to organize, and he would not be able to do that." Barack "was matter-of-fact. He was not hostile," and "it wasn't argumentative. He was very firm." No extensive discussion ensued. "It was a very brief meeting," Black explained. However, Carol Harwell recalled Barack telling her "they talked to me like I was a kid." Carol realized that by trying "to bully Barack," the Jones group's effort had backfired and "had they gone at it a little differently," perhaps Barack might have agreed to stand aside. Instead their request strengthened his resolve to stand firm.<sup>2</sup>

On Tuesday evening, November 7, Maya called from Honolulu. A few days earlier, she had telephoned their mother, who was in a Honolulu hospital, from New York, where Maya was now in graduate school. When she realized just how weak Ann sounded, Maya flew immediately to Honolulu. Barack had spoken with his mother several days earlier and had also realized that her time was relatively short. Sidley's Gerry Alexis remembered Barack "calling me very anguished about his mother and that she had cancer and that she was dying," but Maya's call indicated that Ann's time frame was now a matter of hours, not days. Barack booked a flight out of Chicago for the next day, but even before he could leave for the airport, word came that Ann had died hours earlier at 11:00 P.M., Honolulu time, with Maya at her bedside.

That morning Barack left a message for his friend Ellen Schumer, telling her what had happened and saying he would be away from Chicago for the better part of two weeks. Years later, asked what had been the worst experience and biggest mistake in his life, Barack cited "the death of my mother" in answer to both questions. "The biggest mistake I made was not being at my mother's bedside when she died," because she died sooner than Barack expected. "I didn't get there in time." Ann's body was cremated, and her children, her mother, and her Honolulu friends held a memorial service in the Japanese garden at the U of H's East-West Center before taking her ashes to the rocky Halona lookout point near Hanauma Bay and Sandy Beach on Oahu's southeast shore. There Barack cast Ann's remains into the water after a huge wave washed over him and Maya.

Barack stayed in Honolulu for more than two weeks, helping Maya and Madelyn with Ann's difficult affairs. The federal lien of more than $17,000 in income taxes from 1979 and 1980 remained unpaid. Barack also felt guilty that Dreams From My Father had largely ignored her role in his life while portraying her as being clueless about her son's experience, and now identity, as a black man in America. Barack later wrote that she had died "with a brutal swiftness," and he recounted that she did not "comment on my characterizations of her" when she had seen drafts of Dreams but had been "quick to explain or defend the less flattering aspects of my father's character."

Barack would insist that "what is best in me I owe to her," and later expanded that posthumous sentiment to say, "Everything that I am I owe to her. She was the kindest, most generous person I ever met," and "when I am confronted with difficult choices, I have to ask myself, what would she expect of me?" He had never spoken so glowingly during Ann's lifetime of her impact on his life, but in the years following her death at age fifty-two, his memories of her became far warmer than they had ever been when she was alive.<sup>3</sup>

On November 21, Barack left another message for Ellen Schumer, telling her he would be back in Chicago by the end of Thanksgiving weekend. While he was away, the congressional race between Emil Jones Jr., young Jesse Jackson Jr., and Alice Palmer intensified as Election Day neared. Some anonymous "opposition research," almost certainly from Jones's camp, revealed that Jackson's salary at his father's Rainbow Coalition had come from the Hotel & Restaurant Employees International, or, as a Tribune headline put it, "Mob-Linked Union Paid Jackson." But Jackson was demonstrating that he was the most adept of the contenders. When he and Jones were on the radio together, and Jones cited his impressive state legislative record, Jackson immediately said, "That's why we need you to stay in Springfield." After another joint taping turned "raucous," Jackson's campaign quickly created a television ad, with Jackson saying "they're experienced politicians, but this is how they behave." Then Jones was heard remarking, "Jesus Christ," while Palmer uttered the phrase "sour grapes." Then Jackson says: "Instead of talking about the issues, they're talking about each other. Let's put an end to politics as usual. The people of the 2nd Congressional District deserve better."

The Tribune "warmly endorsed" Palmer, praising her "political independence and wisdom." The next day a Tribune profile cited her reputation "as one of the more intelligent, productive and respected members of the General Assembly," although it also noted that she could seem "dull and deliberate." In an audience vote after a candidates' forum at Palmer's church, Jackson outpolled her 43 to 26. A Tribune poll two weeks before the November 28 election confirmed that Jackson's name recognition had helped him jump out to a healthy 33 to 20 percent lead over Jones, with Palmer trailing badly at 8 percent. Ninety-seven percent of voters knew Jackson, but Jones and Palmer were known by only 69 and 61 percent, respectively.

Jones and Palmer appeared financially competitive with Jackson, and all three campaigns had raised more than $200,000. The Sun-Times endorsed Jones over Palmer, calling him "the most experienced and capable lawmaker" in the race. On the Sunday before Election Day, all three candidates visited dozens of churches, with Jackson attracting the most attention by invoking the language of Martin Luther King Jr. "I dream that one day the South Side and the south suburbs will look like the North Side and the north suburbs.” On election morning, the Sun-Times reported that “contributions to Palmer all but dried up during the past three weeks” after polls had shown her trailing. Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal wrote that “a close finish is anticipated” between Jones and Jackson, while Palmer and long-shot contender Monique Davis “have been left in the dust.” Neal, who had been a booster of Palmer’s, now underscored how Jesse Jackson Jr. had outshone his older, more experienced rivals, and he called Jackson “the most impressive newcomer on the local political scene.”<sup>4</sup>

Kitty Kurth, Palmer’s media consultant, later recalled how on election morning there were still more than a thousand Palmer yard signs sitting in the campaign office. Fifth Ward activist Alan Dobry realized that “Alice didn’t have enough people to cover the precincts” all across the district. Even worse, at a South Shore precinct in Palmer’s own Senate district that Dobry was manning, “people there didn’t know who Alice was. She had built no base there,” while “everybody knew Jesse.” A good many Democratic state Senate staffers had been working on Emil Jones’s congressional campaign during vacation time and available weekends, and on Election Day, they realized that Jackson had “an amazing organization” with “such a coalition of people” that it seemed like “they were everywhere,” young John Charles remembered. That morning Barack and his campaign manager, Carol Harwell, aiming to secure more good signatures on his own nominating petitions, “traveled around, and we actually went to Alice’s home precinct,” Carol recalled. Voter turnout there was very low, and they realized “This is not good” for Alice’s already dim prospects. Indeed, every precinct they visited had handfuls of older women all wearing Jackson buttons.

Jackson’s campaign had used a software program to identify every registered Democrat who had voted in both the 1994 and 1992 elections. Those fifty-eight thousand people, from forty-four thousand households, were concentrated in seventy-eight particular precincts, which Jackson’s campaign then targeted. In the final weeks, Jackson’s father also began actively supporting his campaign. One person privy to the family’s internal dynamics explained, “Jesse Jackson Jr. going to Congress is a problem for another Jesse Jackson, who doesn’t support us until late in the campaign when the momentum is so overwhelmingly on our side that he supports us.”

On Election Day afternoon, Barack chaired a meeting of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge (CAC)’s board of directors. The first actual grants to Chicago schools and their organizational partners were to be announced in three weeks, but board members plus executive director Ken Rolling were “all concerned about how things were proceeding,” the minutes noted. One concern was that “the Challenge may not be seeing new or different attempts at school reform.” Pat Graham emphasized how CAC’s top priority was “direct services to students,” and the board was “‘underwhelmed’ by the current proposals.” Although board members saw only summaries, and not the full applications, “they felt the proposals did not reflect much imagination or ‘breaking the mold’ in school reform efforts.”

That evening Barack, Carol Harwell, Ron Davis, and campaign volunteers like Jesse Ruiz monitored the returns in their campaign office before Barack went to Alice Palmer’s election-night gathering. The results were even more dramatic than preelection polls had suggested: Jesse Jackson Jr. triumphed with more than 48 percent of the vote, Emil Jones was second with a respectable 38 percent, and Palmer trailed badly, winning only 10 percent. Monique Davis received just 2 percent. Jones and Jackson had run neck and neck in the south suburban part of the district, but within Chicago, Jackson carried ten of eleven wards, and even in Jones's home ward, he prevailed by only 4,973 to 4,911. Jones accepted his opponent's argument that voters "didn't want to lose me in Springfield. That's what I think cost me the election."

Wednesday morning's Tribune reported that a "disappointed" Alice Palmer "told a small gathering at a Harvey hotel that she wouldn't seek reelection to the state Senate," and Barack was present to hear that. He told Hal Baron, Palmer's campaign chairman, that he definitely would remain in the race, but minutes later, Palmer's husband Buzz asked Baron for help in getting Alice to change her mind. Baron declined, but Buzz began recruiting other Palmer supporters who agreed that she should reclaim her seat: political science professors Robert Starks and Adolph Reed plus Alice's legislative friend Lou Jones, an outspoken woman who forcefully upbraided her, "Are you a damn fool? Are you crazy?" Palmer continued to refuse the entreaties, but radio host and former alderman Cliff Kelley, who had presided at Barack's announcement two months earlier, called Barack and asked him to step aside. Barack's two top aides, Carol Harwell and Ron Davis, plus Michelle Obama, all argued that he should reject the unfriendly invitation. As Carol remembered, "I really saw turmoil in his face," and Barack said, "we may think about not doing it." Old Southeast Side organizing friend Rev. Bob Klonowski recalled having breakfast with Barack one morning as he debated, "what do I do about this?" But Carol and Ron kept reminding him how much money the campaign had raised and spent, and that Palmer had repeatedly and publicly said she would surrender her state Senate seat even if she lost the congressional race. Michelle Obama, no matter how ambivalent she was about her husband's prospective political career, firmly agreed with Carol's argument: "She gave her word. . . . You don't let people just walk over you like that."

Many people in Chicago independent politics viewed stepping back in deference to someone senior as an almost automatic response. One progressive legislator said Barack's refusal to do so was "a mortal sin," and that, as Lou Jones had said a few weeks earlier, "your time will come." Former legislator Paul Williams explained how the black nationalists who were close to Palmer shared that view, for "under the nation concept, Barack maybe should have stepped back because for the sake of the nation: Alice had the seniority, Alice had the ability to do things." But savvy black onlookers believed that a decisive factor in why Barack did not do so was that he had not grown up black in a city like Chicago. "I think his attitude was different than a black man raised in black America," Tim Black reflected. "We grew up in black communities and black neighborhoods," so "we came up with self-imposed limits," Paul Williams explained. "Barack didn't have all those mental limitations that we had." Carol Harwell, a quintessential strong black woman, put it even more bluntly: "Barack doesn't know what it's like to be a black man," she recalled. "He grew up in a white world," not in "a neighborhood where he feared the police officers," she recounted. "He's an African and an American, not an African American," because "he doesn't understand the hurt that black men feel."

Political scientist Adolph Reed, who had attended the earlier Lou Jones meeting, remembered that Barack "struck me then as a vacuous opportunist, a good performer" mouthing "empty rhetoric." But more politically experienced Palmer backers, such as Lois and Allan Dobry, like Hal Baron, did not support her reentry into the Senate race and pulled back. Yet a small band of obstinate supporters—Professors Reed and Robert Starks, along with Lou Jones—continued to press Palmer to reclaim her seat. On Monday, December 4, they went public, and a story in the next morning's Chicago Defender was headlined "Draft Palmer Campaign Launched." Jones told the paper that "if she doesn't run for the Senate, the organization gets the seat. I'm asking Obama to release Palmer from her commitment. We need her in Springfield."

Robert Starks said, "If she doesn't run, that seat will go to a Daley supporter," which was possible because many in Hyde Park had seen an "Elect Marc EWELL" vote-mobile advertising the candidacy of someone whose surname clearly marked him as an organization loyalist. "We have asked her to reconsider not running," Starks explained, "because we don't think Obama can win. . . . He hasn't been in town long enough" and "nobody knows who he is." Anyone with a memory could recall how nine years earlier two little-known Democratic statewide primary candidates with unusual surnames, George Sangmeister and Aurelia Pucinski, had lost to Lyndon LaRouche supporters with Anglo-Saxon, plain vanilla names: Janice Hart and Mark Fairchild. Marc Ewell's familiar surname might serve him very well against Barack Obama.

Barack told reporter Chinta Strausberg he was meeting with Alice Palmer Tuesday morning, and he planned to file more than three thousand petition signatures in Springfield the following Monday. The next day Barack told his friend Ellen Schumer that he had met with Palmer, and years later Barack said this ending of his relationship with Palmer "left a little bit of a bitter taste in my mouth." He learned that "if you're going to be involved in this process that you end up having to play hardball and battle it out."

Palmer has no memory of that meeting, but three days later, she agreed to enter the race to retain her seat. Her closest Springfield friend, longtime Senate Democratic policy staffer Nia Odeoti-Hassan, said, "She did not want to renege," but Palmer bowed to her supporters' insistence. Asked if "you're never taking the initiative individually yourself?" Palmer replied "absolutely not." After the congressional loss, "I wasn't particularly engaged in this." Palmer's district aide, Constance Goosby, who supported the draft effort, attempted to justify Palmer's move by saying that Barack "was supposed to help Alice with the congressional race by recruiting workers," and "he didn't fulfill his obligation at all."<sup>5</sup>

The same day Palmer affirmed her desire to keep her seat, the weekly Chicago Reader published an eight-page profile of Barack, accompanied by a long excerpt from Dreams From My Father. Hank DeZutter's article offered a richly detailed portrayal of the first-time candidate's political views, and Barack's frank and revealing comments resonated with multiple echoes from his organizing days and from his years at Harvard. He also made clear how disappointed he was with Chicago electoral politics. "I am surprised at how many elected officials—even the good ones—spend so much time talking about the mechanics of politics and not matters of substance. They have . . . this overriding interest in retaining their seats or in moving their careers forward, and the business and game of politics, the political horse race, is all they talk about. Even those who are on the same page as me on the issues never seem to want to talk about them. Politics is regarded as little more than a career," and Barack wished officials instead would focus on "ways to use the political process to create jobs for our communities."

DeZutter had read Dreams in its entirety, and he commented that the book "reads more like a novel than a memoir." DeZutter also located Johnnie Owens, who was no longer at the Developing Communities Project, but who praised Barack effusively. "He's not about calling attention to himself. He's concerned with the work. It's as if it's his mission in life, his calling, to work for social justice. . . . I'm one of the most cynical people you want to see," Owens volunteered, "but I see nothing but integrity in this guy."

DeZutter also spoke with Jean Rudd at the Woods Fund and ACORN's Madeline Talbott. Jean described Barack as one of Woods's "most hard-nosed board members in wanting to see results. He wants to see our grants make change happen, not just pay salaries.” Madeline said that “Barack has proven himself among our members.” DeZutter recounted Barack conducting a Hope Center training: “We talk ‘they, they, they’ but don’t take the time to break it down. We don’t analyze. Our thinking is sloppy. And to the degree that it is, we’re not going to be able to have the impact we could have. We can’t afford to go out there blind, hollering and acting the fool, and get to the table and don’t know who it is we’re talking to—or what we’re going to ask them—whether it’s someone with real power or just a third-string flak catcher.”

One on one, Barack addressed what needed to change in black Chicago, echoing what he had told Mike Kruglik years earlier. “All these churches and all these pastors are going it alone. And what do we have? These magnificent palatial churches in the midst of the ruins of some of the most run-down neighborhoods we’ll ever see. All pastors go on thinking about how they are going to ‘build my church,’ without joining with others to try to influence the factors or forces that are destroying the neighborhoods. They start food pantries and community-service programs, but until they come together to build something more than an effective church, all the community-service programs, all the food pantries they start will barely take care of even a fraction of the community’s problems.”

Barack voiced a larger vision. “In America, we have this strong bias toward individual action . . . but individual actions, individual dreams, are not sufficient. We must unite in collective action, build collective institutions and organizations.” Indeed, “what we need in America, especially in the African-American community, is a moral agenda that is tied to a concrete agenda for building and rebuilding our communities. . . . We must invest our energy and resources in a massive rebuilding effort and invent new mechanisms to strengthen and hasten this community-building effort.” Wasted potential was a recurring theme. “In every church on Sunday in the African-American community, we have this moral fervor; we have energy to burn. But as soon as church lets out, the energy dissipates. We must find ways to channel all this energy into community building. The biggest failure of the civil rights movement was in failing to translate this energy, this moral fervor, into creating lasting institutions and organizational structures.”

Barack also addressed Harold Washington’s legacy, calling him “the best of the classic politicians . . . but he, like all politicians, was primarily interested in maintaining his power and working the levers of power. He was a classic charismatic leader, and when he died all of that dissipated. This potentially powerful collective spirit that went into supporting him was never translated into clear principles, or into an articulable agenda for community change. The only principle that came through was ‘getting our fair share.’ . . . When Harold died, everyone claimed the mantle of his vision and went off in different directions. All that power dissipated. Now an agenda for getting our fair share is vital. But to work, it can’t see voters or communities as consumers, as mere recipients or beneficiaries of this change,” a view that echoed John McKnight. People must be “producers of this change. The thrust of our organizing must be on how to make them productive, how to make them employable, how to build our human capital, how to create businesses, institutions, banks, safe public spaces—the whole agenda of creating productive communities,” just as McKnight had long argued.

Barack riffed onward. “What if a politician were to see his job as that of an organizer, as part teacher and part advocate, one who does not sell voters short but who educates them about the real choices before them? As an elected public official, for instance, I could bring church and community leaders together easier than I could as a community organizer or lawyer. We could come together to form concrete economic development strategies . . . and create bridges and bonds within all sectors of the community. We must form grassroots structures that would hold me and other elected officials accountable for their actions.”

Alluding to the pressure to defer to Palmer, Barack said, “I am also finding people equivocating on their support. I’m talking about progressive politicians who are on the same page with me on the issues but who warn me I may be too independent.” In his own campaign, “I want to do this as much as I can from the grassroots level,” relying on small contributors rather than large ones. “But to organize this district I must get known,” and “before I’m known . . . I’m going to have to rely on some contributions from wealthy people.” Apart from the early $2,000 each from Al Johnson and Tony Rezko, the sole contribution of more than $1,000 to Barack’s campaign had come in the name of Janet Gilboy, wife of Project VOTE! fund-raiser John Schmidt, now a top U.S. Department of Justice official. But “once elected, once I’m known, I won’t need that kind of money, just as Harold Washington . . . did not need to raise and spend money to get the black vote,” Barack said.

He concluded by critiquing the Million Man March. “What was lacking among march organizers was a positive agenda, a coherent agenda for change. Without this agenda a lot of this energy is going to dissipate” rather than be directed toward the top problem he had cited at the outset to DeZutter: “our unemployment catastrophe.”

In a shorter but no less revealing interview with a young white contributor to the weekly Hyde Park Citizen, Barack spoke more as the author of Dreams. “If I’m trying to pick up a cab in New York City, I can’t hold up a sign saying I’m multicultural,” Barack volunteered, but likewise “it’s damaging when blacks refuse to speak proper English or read correctly in an attempt to ‘out black’ each other. Some of our youth view education as white, and that’s damaging. We all need to get to the point where we can be diverse . . . we can listen to Mozart as well as Miles Davis, we can play chess as well as basketball.” Barack was especially disappointed with “youth who have opportunity yet try to adopt this . . . urban street gang mentality,” youth “trying to prove their blackness” who “reject the values of self-discipline, respect, and love which has been the glue that has kept the African-American community together.”

Yet ultimately, “it’s about power. My travels made me sensitive to the plight of those without power and the issues of class and inequalities as it relates to wealth and power. Anytime you have been overseas in these so-called third world countries, one thing you see is the vast disparity of wealth [between] those who are part of [the] power structure and those outside of it.” But in any “environment of scarcity, where the cost of living is rising, folks begin to get angry and bitter and look for scapegoats. Historically, instead of looking at the top five percent of the country that controls all the wealth, we turn towards each other, and the Republicans have added to the fire.”<sup>6</sup>

On Monday, December 11, one week before the final deadline, Barack filed more than four times the necessary 757 petition signatures in Springfield. Ron Davis “was a stickler for how to do petitions,” campaign volunteer Will Burns remembered, and two weeks earlier, attorney Tom Johnson had reminded Davis and Carol Harwell that “the Chicago Board of Elections did its biggest purge ever this year. As a result, lots of people who think they are registered are, in fact, not registered.” Tom, Ron, and Barack reviewed and blessed all of their petition pages, and only one other candidate, virtually unknown 17th Ward resident Ulmer D. Lynch, also filed early. The next day Jesse Jackson Jr. swamped a Republican opponent in the special general election, winning 76 percent of the vote, and less than forty-eight hours later he was sworn in as Mel Reynolds's congressional successor. The night before that ceremony, campaign consultant Delmarie Cobb joined Jackson and his wife Sandi for a quick meal at a D.C. café that doubled as a bookstore, and Jesse remarked that he needed to find a copy of Barack Obama's Dreams From My Father.

Barack's campaign scheduled a Saturday-afternoon Christmas party for December 16 at its headquarters, and more than two dozen attendees wrote out contribution checks for $150 or more. Friends like Elvin Charity and Bernard Loyd were joined by newer acquaintances like Robert Blackwell Jr., another young black professional, Dr. Quentin Young, and even Chicago Reader author Hank DeZutter, who had contributed $300 two weeks earlier. Then, as Carol Harwell remembered, "somebody came in and said, 'Alice Palmer's on the corner circulating petitions.'"

Harwell immediately went to have a look. "They weren't asking anything," she said of the people who were soliciting. "I didn't live in the district," but "I signed the sheet, gave them a bogus address. They never said anything, they never looked at it." With just a week before the submission deadline, the Palmer loyalists had only begun to collect the signatures necessary for Palmer to appear on the March 19 primary ballot. Palmer did not ask her Senate leader, fellow congressional also-ran Emil Jones, or Jones's chief of staff, Mike Hoffmann, for help with her petitions. Instead, Palmer's two secretaries, Beverly Criglar in Springfield and Constance Goosby in Chicago, informally asked several Senate Democratic staffers who had worked on Jones's congressional campaign to help out, but the actual on-the-street circulating fell to Goosby and a handful of neighborhood youngsters. Asked years later who had circulated her petitions, Palmer said, "I don't know," adding that whatever transpired was "pretty much removed from me."

On Monday morning, December 18, Palmer formally announced her entry into the race. Emil Jones and fellow state senators Donne Trotter and Art Berman all endorsed her, as did Lou Jones, Robert Starks, and 5th Ward alderman Barbara Holt. From there Palmer left directly for Springfield, where she submitted petition sheets containing 1,580 signatures. Barack told reporters that "my attitude is one of disappointment on a personal basis," since "I am disappointed that she's decided to go back on her word to me." He said Palmer's decision was "indicative of a political culture where self-preservation comes in rather than service," even by someone with "her reputation for integrity." Previously announced candidates Gha-Is Askia and Marc Ewell also filed their petitions, and Barack said, "I intend to run a positive campaign and win in the March 19 primary." At lunch on December 20, Ellen Schumer told Barack that "this is going to burn you," since in Chicago politics "You've got to pay your dues. I told him to back off and let Alice stay in office." But Barack's resolve, and what Ellen saw as his ambition, were fully crystallized, irrespective of what his prospects might be. Palmer booster Robert Starks told the Defender that "he's in and so is Alice and she will win." Even Emil Jones, citing Palmer's "courageous representation," stated that "I'm very pleased that she has decided to run again."

Palmer's decision to enter the race angered a number of people who admired both her and Barack. St. Sabina's Father Mike Pflieger made a "very painful" phone call to Alice to say, "You can't do this. . . . I think you're making a mistake. . . . You stepped out, and understand I'm going to stay with Barack." But Palmer faced a more serious problem, because Carol Harwell and Ron Davis knew how carelessly her petition signatures had been gathered. On the same day Palmer submitted her sheets, Davis went to Springfield to do what experienced political operatives always did: obtain photocopies of her petitions, as well as those submitted by Ewell, Askia, and Lynch, so that the Obama workers could review them to see if there were as many invalid signers as Harwell expected.

Harwell was waiting at the Chicago train station when Davis returned with the copies, and after a quick stop at Harold's Chicken, a famous Chicago chain, Carol and Ron began reviewing Palmer's filings. It did not take long to confirm that her sheets were "just pure garbage." Volunteers Will Burns, Kathy Stell, and Lois and Alan Dobry pitched in too, and it soon became clear that Ewell's and Lynch's petitions were almost as error strewn as Palmer's, leaving all three candidates, and perhaps Askia too, vulnerable to a formal challenge before the Cook County Electoral Board.

Barack was initially nonplussed when Ron and Carol told him that Palmer, and perhaps the other candidates, might be knocked off the March primary ballot. "I don't think he thought it was, you know, sporting," Will Burns remembered, although the veteran Davis "was more than happy to knock someone off the ballot." Once Barack saw how bad Palmer's petitions were, his discomfort gave way to acceptance. Even apparently good signatures were from voters whose residences were outside the boundaries of the 13th Senate District, and as the evidence of faulty signatories grew, Tom Johnson on Tuesday, December 26, filed the notarized declaration and objector's petitions that Ron Davis had executed four days earlier, asserting that all of Obama's potential opponents had fewer than the 757 valid signatures required to qualify for the primary ballot.

Tom Johnson remembered Davis (who died at age fifty-six in 2008) as a crucial figure in Barack's early political education. Ron "really knew election work" and was also "a link to a lot of the South Side I think that Barack did not know." Davis was "really his adviser" and "was very close to him—not just really petitions." Worries about Palmer's signatures spread when two of Emil Jones's Springfield Senate staffers learned of Johnson's filing and looked at copies of Palmer's sheets. "When you saw her submission, you knew she was in trouble," deputy chief of staff Dave Gross recounted.

After a break for the holidays, on Tuesday, January 2, the Cook County Electoral Board hearing on the Obama campaign's four petition challenges began with Alan and Lois Dobry, Kathy Stell, and longtime Hyde Park independent Saul Mendelson sometimes spelling Davis during the tedious, signature-by-signature review before hearing officer Lewis Powell that ran for five full days. West Side state senator Rickey Hendon happened to glance in on the proceedings, and he recognized the Dobrys as Palmer supporters who were now helping Barack in trying to have her thrown off the ballot.<sup>7</sup>

Also on January 2, the South Side's longest-running social tragedy came to a bittersweet end in a South Chicago meeting hall. Three weeks earlier, the last lawsuit over the shutdown of Wisconsin Steel more than fifteen years earlier had finally settled. In 1988, attorney Tom Geoghegan had won $14.8 million for the former Wisconsin steelworkers from Navistar, the successor corporation to International Harvester. In 1991, in Frank Lumpkin v. Envirodyne Industries, Geoghegan, along with fellow attorneys Tom Johnson and Leslie Jones, Johnson's wife, won a ruling from the U.S. Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals holding that the tiny firm that had bought Wisconsin Steel from Harvester was also liable for former workers' unpaid pensions.

Through it all, Frank Lumpkin's Save Our Jobs Committee (SOJC) had held annual gatherings to mark the anniversary of the 1980 closing that initiated the Southeast Side's decline. Richard Longworth of the Chicago Tribune also remained dedicated to the workers' struggle, writing in March 1995 about "the bitter nostalgia that still rules their lives" and then writing a long profile of the seventy-eight-year-old Frank Lumpkin. "There are people—other steelworkers, lawyers and politicians who have worked with him, reporters who have written about him—who consider Frank Lumpkin the best man in Chicago,” Longworth wrote. Months later, in early December 1995, Longworth finally was able to announce the last chapter in the long-running saga: “Wisconsin Steel Deal May End Ex-Workers’ Agony.”

Envirodyne would sign over nine hundred thousand shares of its own stock, valued at about $3.37 million, to the former workers. Envirodyne now was worth far less than when founder Ronald K. Linde had sold his stake six years earlier, walking away with $75 million, but the roughly $18.5 million in total recompense from Navistar and now Envirodyne was a victory for the aging former workers. “Altogether, from these two, they may have gotten back more than half of what they lost,” Geoghegan told Longworth. Individual workers would receive $3,000 to $6,000 apiece from the new settlement, but there were no complaints whatsoever at SOJC’s celebratory rally on the night of January 2 in South Chicago. “We sure got a whole lot more than anybody thought we were going to get in 1980,” Geoghegan remarked.<sup>8</sup>

Ron Davis and Carol Harwell gave Barack a nightly update on each day’s developments at the electoral board. Volunteer Saul Mendelson recalled that signatures were struck if they were obvious forgeries, if names were printed rather than signed, if the individual had listed an address outside the 13th Senate District, or if the individual was not registered at the specified address. A routine purge by the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners in 1995 had dropped 15,871 names from the 13th District’s rolls, which meant that many people who had been registered but had long failed to vote were no longer on the rolls. As the days passed, it became increasingly clear that Alice Palmer and Ulmer Lynch would fall well below the 757 minimum, and it was close for Marc Ewell and Gha-Is Askia. As the chances of striking all four from the ballot grew, Barack worried out loud to Ron and Carol about how “shotgunning” all of his opponents might look.

At Saturday’s IVI-IPO endorsement session, Northwestern political science professor Adolph Reed, who had just moved to South Shore, plus 5th Ward alderman Barbara Holt, likewise a relatively new member of the organization, argued that the group should endorse Alice Palmer rather than Barack. Saul Mendelson, who had worked on the petitions challenge and knew that many of Palmer’s signatures were faulty, expressed high regard for Palmer yet utter disdain for those who—like Reed—had dragooned her into the race but then left her victim to amateurish signature gathering. Afterward Reed wrote an op-ed piece for New York’s Village Voice in which he excoriated an unnamed candidate whose “vacuous-to-repressive neoliberal politics” included “his fundamentally bootstrap line” about the needs of black America. The allusion to Booker T. Washington was an academic’s way of calling Barack an Uncle Tom, one whose base is “mainly in the liberal foundation and development worlds,” and Reed rued how “I suspect that his ilk is the wave of the future in U.S. black politics.”<sup>9</sup>

On Sunday Barack completed an issues questionnaire from a group whose endorsement he sought. “Impact” was Illinois’s Gay and Lesbian Political Organization, and Barack hand-printed his responses. He said he supported domestic partnership legislation, and he was for outlawing discrimination based on sexual orientation. “I oppose restrictions on a woman’s right to choose, including various notification statutes, and support public funding of abortions.” He opposed any restrictions upon gay people as foster or adoptive parents and “I plan to set up a gay/lesbian task force in the district to identify and promote issues.” He also wrote that a state “should not interfere with same-gender couples who chose to marry” and “I would support such a resolution” allowing them to do so. In a subsequent letter to a gay newspaper, Barack wrote, “I favor legalizing same-sex marriages, and would fight efforts to prohibit such marriages.”

He also reiterated, “I support a woman’s right to choose an abortion, favor Medicaid funding of abortions for poor women, and oppose parental notification laws.”<sup>10</sup>

On Monday afternoon, Tom Johnson jotted notes as the Cook County Electoral Board hearings concluded. Of Alice Palmer’s 1,580 signatures, objections to 1,031 had been sustained, leaving her with 549 valid ones, and a recheck of the so-called “master file” had added back only 10 more, giving her a grand total of 559, 198 less than the 757 necessary to make the ballot. Ulmer Lynch had also fallen woefully short, while Marc Ewell was 86 shy of 757 and Gha-Is Askia 69. Wednesday’s Hyde Park Herald was first to report that the Senate race “may become no contest at all” because Obama’s opponents “may not have the required amount of valid nominating petition signatures.” The next morning a Sun-Times gossip columnist picked up the news: “Watch for state Sen. Alice Palmer to be knocked off the ballot in her re-election bid” as “she is going to be a couple of hundred short. Unbelievable.”

Later that day Barack met with another group whose backing he sought, Madeline Talbott and Keith Kelleher’s ACORN-based Chicago chapter of the nascent “New Party” progressive fusion group. The meeting’s minutes recorded that Barack made a statement and answered questions. He “signed the New Party ‘Candidate Contract’” and requested their endorsement. He “also joined the New Party.” One attendee later remembered that Barack “was blunt about his desire to move the Democratic Party off the cautious center where Bill Clinton had it wedged,” but another member recalled that he “seemed to measure every answer to questions put to him several times” before finally responding. Years later critics tried to make Barack’s “membership” in the New Party a matter of controversy, but neither Keith Kelleher, who tried multiple times to interest Barack, nor national cofounder Joel Rogers, whose wife Sarah Siskind was a Madison-based partner in the Davis Miner law firm, ever had succeeded in winning Barack’s cooperation. “I think Barack always was very strategic,” Keith’s wife Madeline Talbott explained, and “it was obvious that he was not going to participate in the New Party.”<sup>11</sup>

On January 17 the Hyde Park Herald reported that Alice Palmer would not be on the primary ballot unless her supporters produced at least 198 “signed and notarized affidavits from the registered voters who signed her nominating petitions.” Realizing how impossible that was, Palmer announced prior to the electoral board’s final review that she was withdrawing. Senate colleagues like Howard Carroll were “shocked” that such a “wonderful person” was now a lame duck, and Barack told the Defender, “I got involved in this race based on Alice’s original endorsement, and I continue to respect her” and the “significant contributions” she had made as a senator. Palmer’s former consultant Don Wiener noted that “Alice could have won if someone competent had handled her petitions,” and Robert Starks later confessed that “we were in too much of a rush and that leads to bad signatures.” As Palmer’s Senate colleague Rickey Hendon stressed, “no one thinks Barack could have ever beaten Alice Palmer” had she made it onto the March 19 primary ballot.

Like Palmer, Gha-Is Askia stood down, admitting he had paid his petition circulators $5 per sheet, and that “they round-tabled me,” signing most of the names themselves. By January 20, the electoral board’s review confirmed that Marc Ewell was short by eighty-six signatures, and on January 24, Ulmer Lynch filed a somewhat illiterate pro se lawsuit in federal district court against the state and city boards of election, as well as Tom Johnson and “Barak,” alleging that “Johnson, and Mr. Obama, used there political connections to influence some Board of Election Commissioner officers and employees, to tamper with authority to remove voter’s files out of board binders.” The board soon filed a motion to dismiss, which led Tom to tell Barack that they could “sit back and see what happens.”

Marc Ewell, represented by his father Ray, tried to argue that registrants whose names appeared on the prepurge, February 1995 list of voters should count as valid signatories, but on February 9 the board formally held that Ewell had submitted only 671 valid signatures. Four days later, Ray Ewell filed suit in federal court against the city election board, challenging its purge of previously registered voters and seeking an injunction to prohibit Marc’s name from being taken off the ballot. Ewell’s filing was a more professional effort than Lynch’s, but it referenced “Barach Obama,” and when the case was assigned to U.S. district judge Ruben Castillo, Ewell’s filings repeatedly cited “Judge Castillo.”<sup>12</sup>

Obama’s successful challenge against Palmer received public blowback in both the Hyde Park Herald and then the Chicago Sun-Times. An angry Adolph Reed denounced the challenge as “vicious and underhanded” and lambasted the IVI-IPO for failing to support “open access to the ballot.” Lois Dobry said that “the sad thing is that we’ve lost a person of this caliber” from elected office, and prominent black Chicago political commentator Salim Muwakkil authored a Sun-Times op-ed headlined “Candidate Not What He Seems, Foes Insist.” Muwakkil wrote that Robert Starks “says Obama is the tool of forces outside the black community,” and quoted Alice Palmer as saying of Obama that “I’ve since discovered that he’s not as progressive as I first thought.”

Palmer refused to say whether she would support Barack if he became the Democratic nominee, but she and Senate colleague Donne Trotter introduced SB 1554 to require that boards of elections publish the names of voters whom they purged from registration rolls. The bill went nowhere, but the animosity Palmer’s nationalist supporters felt toward Barack would endure for years. Barack’s Project VOTE! mentor John Schmidt remembered Barack mentioning how “the black nationalists were really going after him,” but that “he found it kind of liberating because he realized that he didn’t need them.”

The Chicago Annenberg Challenge board chairmanship continued to take a lot of Barack’s time, but whenever someone, like his friend Ellen Schumer, asked how applications should be crafted, he emphasized that proposals should focus solely on improving “student academic achievement in the classroom.” In late February Barack joined a Sunday-evening “town meeting” on “Economic Insecurity: Employment and Survival in Urban America” sponsored by the University of Chicago’s student chapter of DSA, the Democratic Socialists of America, whose parent Chicago-wide chapter had endorsed Barack’s state Senate candidacy.

Barack, or “Bracco Obama,” as the university’s student newspaper spelled his name, reminded the crowd of more than three hundred how “jobs, workers, and unions were at the front and center” of the civil rights movement’s famous 1963 March on Washington. Since then, “this emphasis on the centrality of jobs” had been lost. Barack stated that “resources, training and education . . . are the bare minimums of the American Dream . . . and right now these are not being provided.” Referencing the federal welfare reform proposal President Bill Clinton was backing, Barack criticized “welfare elimination and reduction under the guise of reform.” He argued that “it is not enough to maintain the status quo . . . it is not tolerable” and declared that “how jobs are allocated among respective geographic and ethnic communities” was a pressing issue.<sup>13</sup>

At a February 21 hearing, Judge Ruben Castillo expressed serious doubt as to whether Raymond Ewell’s challenge of the electoral board’s decision that his son was short eighty-six signatures should have been filed in federal as opposed to state court. James M. Scanlon, representing the board, and Tom

Johnson, for Obama, highlighted how Illinois state law expressly gave rejected candidates ten days to challenge such a decision in Cook County Circuit Court. Ewell belatedly filed suit there on February 23, albeit in an incorrect division, and failed to notify Scanlon and Johnson of the filing, but on March 4, Judge Castillo granted Scanlon and Johnson's motions for summary judgment and dismissed the Ewells' lawsuit.

Tom Johnson immediately faxed Castillo's ruling to Barack with a handwritten cover note declaring "Victory!" One week later, the federal judge handling Ulmer Lynch's case dismissed his claims, and the elections board moved to dismiss the Ewells' tardy state court suit as untimely. One South Side biweekly newspaper noted that a race that had looked like "a major task" for Barack now had him "running unopposed for his first elected job of many public service stops." Only a Saturday traffic ticket for an illegal U-turn, resulting in a $95 fine and four hours of mandatory attendance at traffic school, marred Barack's run-up to Election Day.

Barack deployed campaign volunteers to help get out the vote, telling the Defender that "It's important to let people know who I am." His Springfield agenda "will focus on public school financing, ensuring fairness if welfare and Medicaid are bloc-granted to a state level" by President Clinton's reform legislation, and "job creation and economic development."

Six months to the day after Barack first declared his candidacy, the election night tally showed him receiving 16,279 votes—100 percent of those cast. Barack owed his unanimous triumph both to the professionalism of his three top advisers—Carol Harwell, Ron Davis, and Tom Johnson, who never even billed him for all his work—and also to the sloppiness of Palmer's and Ewell's signature gatherers.<sup>14</sup>

With only pro-forma Republican opposition anticipated for November's general election, Barack now had almost ten months as a senator-elect prior to his actual swearing-in in January 1997. He shuttered his campaign office and turned his attention to his U of C teaching, as the fourth iteration of Current Issues in Racism and the Law got under way on March 25 with about two dozen students enrolled. Mary Ellen Callahan, a 2L, found it a "provocative class," with Barack ready to challenge "traditionally liberal assumptions." She found Barack "quite approachable," as did 2L Hisham Amin, who thought he was "very open, very genuine, very thoughtful." The syllabus remained the same as before, and when the quarter concluded on May 21, the students' evaluations gave the class a rating of 9.5 on UCLS's 10-point scale.

As soon as classes ended, Barack, Michelle, and Maya flew to Europe. He and Maya had talked about such a trip in the wake of their mother's death, and Bob Bennett, who had stepped down as Northwestern Law School's dean and was on leave for the year, invited the Obamas to spend a week with him and his wife Harriet Trop in the Italian countryside near Grassina, southeast of Florence. Starting in Paris, they took the train to Nice, staying with Barack's old Occidental friend Laurent Delanney at his home in Roquebrune-Cap-Martin, near Monaco, before continuing eastward to Florence. "He was a great big brother," Maya recalled, and the trip was a good tonic in the aftermath of Ann's painful demise.

Knowing that his state Senate role would require much of his time, Barack moved to recalibrate his two other main professional commitments. Judd Miner and everyone at Davis Miner had supported Barack's Senate race, envisioning that he could move to a flexible, part-time "Of Counsel" role. Barack had continued working on Judd's big municipal redistricting lawsuits concerning Chicago and St. Louis's city councils, and he also remained a secondary participant in the ongoing "motor voter" registration case that progressive groups including ACORN were successfully concluding against the recalcitrant Illinois governor, Jim Edgar. Only after another court order in May 1996 did state officials begin exhibiting “the kind of compliance with their duties that should have been forthcoming from the outset,” wrote U.S. district judge Milton Shadur. John Belcaster, George Galland, and Barack were also assisting a Peoria attorney with a sexual harassment lawsuit against a Mitsubishi auto plant in Normal, Illinois, and in April 1996 the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission joined the litigation with a class action suit of its own against Mitsubishi.

The University of Chicago Law School had always wanted more from Barack than his one-course-per-year adjunct lecturer role, and in the spring of 1996, Barack approached Douglas Baird, who had succeeded Geoffrey Stone as dean after Stone became university provost, and asked if they could have dinner. They met downtown at the Park Avenue Café, and Baird remembered that Barack wore an Armani tie and made a surprising proposal. Once in office, he would no longer draw his full Davis Miner salary, and the modest pay accorded a state senator would not make up the difference. Barack wanted to combine his new post with a larger law school teaching load, because “Michelle insisted on making the numbers work,” and “the whole point of the dinner is he has to figure out how to make the numbers work in order to become a state senator,” Baird recalled. “I’m frankly a bit skeptical,” and “I spend a lot of time during that dinner saying ‘okay, wait a second, what’s your schedule in Springfield going to be like? Are you going to have to cancel too many classes?’”

The Illinois Senate’s spring session began in January each year and expanded some during February and March before intensifying significantly in April and May. But until late each spring, the Senate usually met only Tuesday through Thursday, and each fall the Senate convened only for a brief six-day “veto session” to reconsider bills the governor had rejected. Given the law school’s schedule of fall, winter, and spring quarters, fall and winter classes, especially if timed to avoid midweek sessions, could comport quite nicely with a state senator’s schedule.

Satisfied that the timing might work, Baird raised two other issues. One was curricular. Racism and the Law, just like a small Voting Rights course Judd Miner was teaching, was a worthwhile elective, but in Baird’s eyes Barack would need to teach something central to the law school’s curriculum, not ancillary, in order to merit an expanded appointment. Unique among law schools, Chicago divided Constitutional Law into four distinct courses, one of which, Con Law III, covered the Fourteenth Amendment doctrinal issues of equal protection and substantive due process. For Baird, Barack’s agreeing to teach an annual section of Con Law III “was absolutely essential . . . because that’s a real course” where “he’s really holding down part of the curriculum.”

There was also the question of title, because as Geof Stone put it, “titles matter.” During dinner, Baird told Barack, “We can’t make you an assistant professor,” the normal title for a beginning appointment, “unless you do scholarship,” and Barack immediately responded, “That’s not me.” Baird would remember that Barack “was crystal clear” that any “idea that he was going to be a law scholar was just not him.” The law school did have one special title, senior lecturer, for instructors with significant teaching roles who were not full-time law faculty, but that august rank was held only by three members of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit—Richard A. Posner, Frank H. Easterbrook, and Diane P. Wood, all of whom had been on the faculty before becoming federal judges—and the distinguished legal historian Dennis J. Hutchinson, who held a joint appointment. Baird knew it would be “very unusual” to give Barack that title, along with a decent salary and faculty benefits not accorded mere lecturers, and “I talked about this extensively with Geof Stone,” who as provost “was completely supportive.”

Baird and Barack tussled over how long the initial appointment would be, and Baird “insisted on it being two years rather than four years because I was worried that he would simply be a touch-and-go lecturer and not really be involved.” But by late May 1996, the terms of Barack’s expanded new appointment as a senior lecturer were set, and that fall, he would teach Con Law III and Racism and the Law; in winter 1997, he would take on Voting Rights as his third regular course.<sup>15</sup>

While Barack was negotiating a new relationship with the university, so too was Michelle. In her three years as executive director, she had built Public Allies Chicago into a highly regarded internship and training program for young people interested in public service, and the Chicago chapter was “the most mature and advanced” Public Allies site of all. Chicago board chairman Ian Larkin knew the chapter was “this huge bright star” within the Public Allies network, and as a result Michelle had become the de facto leader of the chapter directors who pushed back against the excessive “top-down” behavior of D.C.-based cofounder Vanessa Kirsch. Michelle “was the leader of the cabal,” North Carolina executive director Jason Scott explained, and although Michelle “knew that she was basically unfireable,” the conflict between the five local chapters and the national office was “really stressful, and it took a lot out of you.”

In Chicago, Michelle had created a warm, yet challenging esprit de corps among her mid-twenties staffers, inviting them to East View for potluck dinners that sometimes involved Barack cooking the chicken dish he had learned from his Pakistani friends years earlier. Michelle was “paradoxically direct and warm,” Milwaukee director Paul Schmitz recalled, while Barack, who each year still did a training for Allies, was just a “somewhat aloof guy married to a colleague.” Larkin had a similar view, thinking Michelle’s “star was about a thousand times brighter than Barack’s.” In early 1996, Kirsch was replaced by Chuck Supple, who made “a pilgrimage to Chicago” to meet the best-regarded chapter director. He thought Michelle was “this wonderful mix of poise and professionalism and competency with an activist’s passion and desire to bring about change.”

For Michelle’s third year, 1995–96, she had forty-eight young Allies, and it was by far her most draining, primarily because of the sudden illness and all-too-fast death of Michelle’s beloved young assistant. Twenty-four-year-old Richard Blount was a highly active but largely closeted gay man who was “Michelle’s right hand” for much of her time at Public Allies. Richard’s illness became apparent in November 1995, right after Ann Dunham’s death, and Public Allies board member Jan Anne Dubin remembered that she and Michelle were “both sobbing on the phone” over Thanksgiving as they discussed Richard’s condition. Another of Michelle’s young protégés, Craig Huffman, recalled that time as “enormously stressful for her,” with financial worries on the home front also pressing in. Richard died on February 8, and Dubin described it as “like losing a child,” while emphasizing that Richard was equally close to Michelle. Richard’s funeral service was held at Trinity United Church of Christ, with Barack there and Michelle as one of the speakers.

Barack and Michelle’s attendance at Trinity’s 11:00 A.M. Sunday service had become less frequent, and neither had become active in any of Trinity’s vibrant service ministries. Michelle’s thoughts increasingly turned toward wanting to have her first child, and she believed that once she had a child, she could work only part-time, something that would be impossible as executive director of Public Allies Chicago. She hoped to find a position that offered financial security and was closer to home, and that spring the University of Chicago advertised for a new associate dean charged with maximizing student volunteer opportunities. Michelle applied, despite strong childhood memories of the university's total disconnect from the African American neighborhoods just to its south and west. "I grew up five minutes from the university and never once went on campus," Michelle recalled. "All the buildings have their backs to the community. The university didn't think kids like me existed, and I certainly didn't want anything to do with that place." For four years during Michelle's childhood, her mother Marian worked as a secretary at the U of C, but Michelle had continued to think of it as "a very foreign place" and one she "never knew anything about."

Ian Larkin "was surprised" when Michelle told him she was leaving Public Allies, but she did give three full months notice before her September 1 start date at the U of C. The university's press release quoted vice president Arthur Sussman as saying that "Michelle understands the Hyde Park community and the world of public service," and Public Allies gave her a friendly send-off with a farewell party at board member Sunny Fischer's Evanston home.

In late May, when Mariana Cook, a New York photographer working on a book about couples in America, visited Michelle and Barack at East View, the informally posed pictures as well as Michelle's interview comments portrayed a woman focused on defending her privacy from the uncertainties of the external world. Michelle's Public Allies colleague Craig Huffman had heard her say "very directly" that politics was too low a calling for her husband, and she voiced those feelings very strongly to Cook. "There is a strong possibility that Barack will pursue a political career," but "there is a little tension with that," because "I'm very wary of politics" and "I don't trust the people" in it. She believed "he's too much of a good guy for the kind of brutality" politics entails, and she worried that "when you are involved in politics, your life is an open book, and people can come in who don't necessarily have good intent. I'm pretty private," and "in politics you've got to open yourself to a lot of different people."

Michelle told Cook, "I want to have kids and travel," and she expressed a greater openness apart from politics: "it'll be interesting to see what life has to offer. In many ways, we are here for the ride, just sort of seeing what opportunities open themselves up." She was happy she was not at a law firm, and she was pleased that "Barack has helped me kind of loosen up and feel comfortable with taking risks and not doing things the traditional way" thanks to "how he grew up." Barack told Cook that "all my life, I have been stitching together a family, through stories or memories or friends," and "imagining what it would be like to have a stable, solid, secure family life" like the one Michelle had enjoyed during her upbringing.<sup>16</sup>

Once Barack's campaign obligations lessened after his primary win, he and Michelle could enjoy more leisurely evenings than they had during the months of his uncertain candidacy. Back in the early fall, Bill Ayers and Bernardine Dohrn had heeded Alice Palmer's request to introduce Barack to their friends, and after that gathering, Barack and Michelle began to see a great deal more of not only Bill and Bernardine but also their three closest friends, Rashid and Mona Khalidi and Carole Travis.

Just before Bill and Bernardine moved to Chicago from Manhattan in the summer of 1987, mutual friends had told them about the Khalidis, another New York couple moving to Hyde Park who were also raising three children. Rashid, a well-known historian of Palestine, had been named a professor in the U of C's Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations. "I proposed, the second or third week we were out here, that we have dinner once a week at each other's houses," Bernardine recalled, as the Khalidis lived just five blocks from Bill and Bernardine. The arrangement worked so well, thanks in part to Mona and Bill each being excellent cooks, that "we had dinner together ultimately almost every night," three evenings per week at each home.

By 1995 their regular dinners also included their friend Carole Travis, a former United Auto Workers local union president and law school graduate who was political director of the Service Employees International Union's Illinois state council. Carole had a great apartment on the top floor of 5300 South Shore Drive—the building where Harold Washington had lived—and she often hosted parties there. Carole and Bernardine had known each other as fellow political activists since the late 1960s, and while Carole appreciated that Bill and Bernardine had been "totally fucking crazy" during their years in the violent Weather Underground, in subsequent years Bill, like Bernardine, had "reinvented himself" as a well-respected educator.

Bill and Bernardine had quickly made many good friends in Hyde Park, including Michelle and Barack's friend Valerie Jarrett's parents the Bowmans. "Barbara and Jimmy were close friends of ours right away," Bernardine remembered. Bill still called himself "an unreconstructed lefty," and their prior affiliations were no secret, as a mid-April Chicago Tribune story on a joint speaking appearance at Lake Forest College highlighted. But their calls for renewed student activism—"What will your grandchildren remember you for?" Bernardine asked the undergraduates—were well within anyone's liberal mainstream.

Carole, Mona, and Rashid first met Barack and Michelle at Bill and Bernardine's dinner table, which most evenings also included the two couples' six children. Carole remembered one early dinner conversation at the height of the Alice Palmer contretemps. "Michelle didn't like him doing politics, but Michelle, in that instance, was 'I was there. She said, "You've got my endorsement," and we've begun working on it. . . . We're not giving up.' . . . Michelle was adamant on that." By the spring of 1996 Barack and Michelle were a regular presence at the two couples' "very informal" dinners. "I would invite them often," Mona recounted. "We used to do a lot of dinners together," and "they came to our house often."

Bernardine recalled an evening when Michelle was mulling her decision to leave Public Allies. "She wanted to be closer to home" and the shift "was definitely tied to having children" so that Michelle could have "more flexible hours." Carole remembered that "Mona and Rashid always had a big table, and there were tons of people who came through that table," which became an "intellectual center" of the Hyde Park community. "Bill and Bernardine's table was a political table," Carole added, but when Barack joined in "he was never ideological."

Scott Turow, the well-known writer and attorney, first met Barack and Michelle at a summer 1996 dinner party at Bill and Bernardine's just after Michelle had accepted her U of C job. He was seated next to Michelle, and "she just blew me away," offering a memorable account of how her grandmother, who died in 1988, had on her deathbed warned Michelle, "Don't you start the revolution with my great-grandchildren. I want them to go to Princeton too!" Scott thought Michelle was "an amazing person," and when dinner was over, she introduced Scott to Barack, who of course was familiar with Scott's famous first book. "He began talking to me about One L," and mentioned his own book. They spoke for twenty minutes about writing, and Barack seemed so "deeply interested in literature" that Scott was uncertain "whether his career was going to be in politics or in literature." Rashid Khalidi "came in after dinner," and “he and Barack clearly had a prior acquaintance, because they were kidding each other about something,” Scott recalled.

Carole Travis’s parties at her apartment were larger affairs, and “Barack was at a number of them,” although not Michelle. Tom Geoghegan, fresh from his successful resolution of the Wisconsin steelworkers’ fifteen-year legal struggle, recalled one crowded gathering at Carole’s where Jesse Jackson Sr. was among the guests. Tom spent much of the evening talking with Barack, whom he had met previously and who was familiar with Tom’s own reflective, 1991 memoir about his work as a labor lawyer, Which Side Are You On? Tom remembered how “he was such a pleasure to talk to.”<sup>17</sup>

Barack’s role as chairman of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge board continued to be a recurring drain on his time. He remained convinced that “the spirit of the Challenge is to fund more than the status quo,” and he agreed with executive director Ken Rolling’s view that the proposals funded so far were neither creative nor inventive. In mid-May, Brown University president Vartan Gregorian, the Annenberg effort’s top overseer, visited Chicago to have dinner with Barack, Pat Graham, and two other CAC board members to strengthen the link between the Chicago venture and the national program. For nine months the Chicago board had insisted that Rolling alone, aided hugely by the all-volunteer Chicago School Reform Collaborative, could administer the project, but at dinner Gregorian won the Chicago board leaders’ agreement to hire several support staffers. Gregorian, like Rolling, hoped for bolder proposals, and he pressed the Chicago board members to raise additional matching funds.

On the Joyce Foundation board, Barack’s first eighteen months left colleagues like Wisconsin law professor Carin Clauss quite aware of his strong interest in education policy. “His confidence, his sense of self” was readily apparent during the thrice-a-year all-day meetings, although another member explained that “the Joyce Board has a certain tenor and Barack came in without regard to the tenor. . . . Initially some people were taken aback” because Barack is “a pontificator.” By 1996 Barack had become “an excellent board member” with “a lot of outstanding insights,” yet a colleague like Clauss, who did not share the men’s great interest in basketball, was struck that “with the guys” Barack “was always talking basketball,” not policy issues.

Two wedding trips bracketed Barack and Michelle’s summer. In late May they traveled to southern Maryland for Rob Fisher’s marriage to his longtime girlfriend Lisa. In August, they flew to London for Barack’s sister Auma’s marriage to Ian Manners, a white British businessman. Madelyn Dunham came all the way from Honolulu to attend, so Barack was able to see much of his far-flung family. One evening prior to the wedding, Ian’s brother-in-law Brian took Barack and a few others on a pub crawl in Wokingham, a Berkshire market town west of London. Barack was unimpressed with English bitter, and bailed entirely when a female stripper showed up to entertain the all-male group.

Back in Chicago, Barack’s status as a senator-to-be was gradually becoming a part of his life. He checked with Emil Jones’s Springfield staff about the legislature’s 1997 schedule before setting his upcoming law school class times. Impressed with Cynthia Miller, a young black woman who was temping at the law school for the summer while finishing a graduate degree, Barack told her he was looking for a part-time district director to staff the empty 71st Street campaign office that in the fall would be his legislative office. As Alice Palmer and Dick Newhouse had done before him, Barack thought it was important to be in South Shore rather than Hyde Park, and Cynthia agreed to sign on as of October.

Senate Democrats invited Barack to join them on a Chicago boat cruise one evening, and powerful downstate senator Vince Demuzio warned his colleague Pat Welch that the new member was “a bomb thrower.” Welch, expecting someone in a dashiki, was pleasantly relieved upon meeting Barack. Over a midsummer lunch, Carole Travis introduced Barack to Michael McGann, SEIU’s Springfield lobbyist, and McGann recalled thinking that Barack “was already oozing ambition all over the place.” A group of four other lobbyists asked to see the incoming new senator at Davis Miner. Former Democratic Senate staffer Jeff Stauter explained that they did not know anything about him before that meeting, except that Barack had vanquished Alice Palmer in “a pretty bold and cold move.” After introducing themselves to Barack in the firm’s basement conference room, “we spent quite a bit of time there,” Stauter recalled, and “right away there was a recognition among all of us that this guy was going somewhere.”

Earlier in the year, Carol Harwell had told Barack that as an Illinois legislator “you can’t drive a foreign car,” as Barack was still using Michelle’s hand-me-down Saab. “He was pissy about that,” Carol remembered, but Barack acquired a black Jeep Cherokee, while remaining reluctant to get rid of the Saab. But Malik Nevels, the ’94–’95 Public Ally who had worked on the Jackson congressional race, needed to buy a car before starting law school at Urbana-Champaign. He called Barack, who invited him to East View for a test drive. The Saab was in “great condition” and had only sixty thousand miles on it, but Malik, with only $2,500 available, thought it was outside his price range. Barack asked how much he had. “Okay, we’ve got a deal,” Barack responded, and he drafted a handwritten sales contract for the car, the title for which was still in Michelle Robinson’s name. Malik eagerly signed, but tried to hand the keys back to Barack because he could see the car was “a complete mess,” with “food underneath the seat” and cigarette butts and scraps of paper scattered everywhere. “Aren’t you going to clean it up first?” Malik asked. Barack replied, “You’re on your way to law school, right?” Malik nodded. “Let me give you your first lesson in contract law,” Barack went on, pointing out the words “as is” in the handwritten document. A happy but chagrined Malik cleaned the Saab himself.<sup>18</sup>

Barack also remained engaged with the slow-moving development of the Hope Center. An energetic full-time organizer, Tracy Leary, a two-year veteran of Gamaliel’s work in Gary, had been hired in early 1996, and the small initial group of trainees Barack had worked with the previous fall completed their training that spring. By April classes for a second, larger group were under way, and in mid-June Rev. Jeremiah Wright and civil rights organizer Bob Moses each conducted workshops for the group. Tracy had first met Barack in early 1995 through Gamaliel, and by fall 1995, Barack was also informally mentoring another young, somewhat unhappy black Gamaliel organizer, John Eason, whom Hope Center cofounder Sokoni Karanja introduced to Barack. Sokoni and Barack remained committed to “developing African-American leaders who can transform extremely low-income urban communities” where disinvestment had led to “an erosion of hope” that was magnified by “the lack of organization . . . in the African-American community.” That community needed “parents who restore standards of civility to the streets and who insist on quality education for their children,” but the duo believed that “the current palette of organizing tactics” gave short shrift to “uniquely African-American values and culture.” As Barack had articulated previously, “existing schools of organizing have limited visions about leadership identification, community power building, and ‘winnable’ issue cutting that tend to generate ‘big ego’ leaders, turfing and divisiveness, and small localized victories.” Their hope remained that the Hope Center could “generate a cadre of people who will understand that we can transform deeply impoverished communities if we have persistence, creativity, and the ability to mobilize a critical mass of people.”

That summer 1996 program summary stated that “Obama has devoted about 10 percent of his time to the Center,” as compared to 25 percent for Sokoni, with Barack doing a two-hour “power analysis” training as one of the twelve weekly sessions for each group of Hope Center “initiates.” At a mid-July planning meeting, Barack observed that “we haven’t really figured out what our niche is” and “there has to be an organizing organization” to “plug” the trainees into. “Somebody has to be the organizer of this process” by providing such a group. Tracy Leary persuaded Barack to lead a five-hour workshop on the last Saturday of the month on “Building a Collective Organizing Strategy for Greater Grand Boulevard,” the more formal neighborhood name for Bronzeville. Tracy’s invitation letter explained how the Hope Center sought “new cadres of citizen leaders who are committed to transforming our community” as well as “transforming extremely low income people.”

Barack’s interest in the Hope Center reached back to his intense conversations years earlier with first Jeremiah Wright and then Mike Kruglik in which he had envisioned building “a very broad-based, African-American-led black church power base” that could transform Chicago politics citywide. It had a “spiritual dimension to it” yet was “ultimately very pragmatic,” and although he had more recently cited the untapped power of unified black churches, as he was entering public office, his political focus shifted to the pitfalls of the electoral system. In early August, the Cleveland Plain Dealer published a long, interview-based profile of Barack three weeks before the 1996 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Barack was decidedly unenthusiastic about both the Republican and Democratic presidential candidates. “Bob Dole seems to me to be a classic example of somebody who had no reason to run,” Barack opined. “You’re 73 years old, you’re already the third-most powerful man in the country. So why? He seems to be drawn by some psychological compulsion. And it’s too bad because in a lot of ways, he’s an admirable person.” President Bill Clinton’s campaign was “disturbing to someone who cares about certain issues,” and Barack remained just as outspokenly disappointed about Chicago politics as he had been in the Reader nine months earlier. “The realization that politics is a business . . . an activity that’s designed to advance one’s career, accumulate resources and help one’s friends,” as “opposed to a mission,” was “fascinating and disturbing,” he said. The upcoming Democratic gathering promised even worse, because “the convention’s for sale,” Barack realized. “You got these $10,000 a plate dinners and Golden Circle Clubs. I think when the average voter looks at that, they rightly feel they’re locked out of the process. They can’t attend a $10,000 breakfast, and they know that those who can are going to get the kind of access they can’t imagine.”<sup>19</sup>

In August 1996, Dreams From My Father was published as a $15 paperback, with a new cover featuring a photo of a beaming Barack seated next to Granny Sarah in Kogelo. Random House had been disappointed by the hardcover sales and eager to sell the paperback rights, which Deborah Baker, an editor at Kodansha Globe, had bought under a standard seven-year license for just $4,000. Baker spoke with Barack by phone about the jacket copy and cover design, which used a portion of the Marian Wright Edelman blurb on the front and brief excerpts from newspaper reviews on the back. Baker asked Barack whether he intended to write a second book, and he said that while he might, it could be a novel, just as Scott Turow had shifted to fiction following his memoir. The paperback reprint attracted little attention, although one new reviewer observed that Dreams “suffers at times from hints that this public-minded man writes too self-consciously before a reading public.”<sup>20</sup>

Labor Day marked the beginning of Barack’s pro forma general election campaign. He would face

Rosette Caldwell Peyton, a teacher at Hyde Park's Kozminski Academy, the Republican nominee, plus third-party contender David Whitehead. Barack completed another questionnaire for Impact, writing, "I would support passage of a domestic partnership law," and a week later he met with thirteen IVI-IPO members at his supporters Lois and Alan Dobry's home to receive their unanimous endorsement. Barack completed a lengthy IVI-IPO questionnaire, saying that he wanted to "mobilize residents in the district" and that "my top priority is ensuring that our young people are nurtured and supported through fully-funded public schools." The full questionnaire also confronted Barack with thirty-five sometimes multipart specific-issue queries. Number 22 asked, "Will you support a single-payer health plan for Illinois?" and Barack replied, "Yes, with Medicaid incorporated into a single, graduated system of services," though he added that "such a program will probably have to be instituted at a federal level" and that in the interim states "can move more aggressively to expand coverage to the currently uninsured." To question 26, regarding welfare and how the federal reform bill President Clinton had signed into law two weeks earlier would provide block grants to states to fund time-limited assistance in place of the previous Aid to Families with Dependent Children program, Barack responded, "I oppose arbitrary time limit or work requirements that fail to take into account the lack of entry-level jobs." To the final three queries, Barack gave succinct, one word answers: "No" to both "Do you support electronic eavesdropping?" and "Do you support capital punishment?" and "Yes" to "Do you support legislation to (a) ban the manufacture, sale and possession of handguns?" as well as assault weapons.<sup>21</sup>

On the last day of September, Barack began teaching Con Law III as well as Current Issues in Racism and the Law. At a 1L welcoming reception Barack recognized one face: his paternal namesake Barack Echols, one of only two black men in the law school's class of 1999. The race seminar's syllabus remained unchanged, but the twenty-two students were impressed with "how thoughtful his choices" were, 2L African American Felton Newell said. Chapin Cimino, a 3L, remembered him "talking a lot about W. E. B. Du Bois . . . I came away from that course thinking of both Obama and Du Bois as middle-grounders: neither radical nor passivist, neither accommodationist nor separatist." She recalled it as a "very engaged group," and Barack "would play devil's advocate" to ensure that all views were aired.

Liberal and especially minority students sometimes felt uncomfortable in U of C classrooms, both because there were so many conservative students and also because many senior faculty members, personified most outspokenly by law and economics proponent Richard Epstein, never shied from propounding their own views. Epstein was "the defining presence" at the law school in the mid-1990s, his colleagues knew, yet he was far from alone. Prominent federal appellate judge Frank Easterbrook was "so intentionally intimidating" in another seminar that the atmosphere was "horrible" and "hostile." In contrast, Barack was a "great" teacher" and one whose respectful and open-minded demeanor was "refreshing" when compared to the general "lack of politeness at Chicago." Chapin Cimino recalled Barack responding with bemusement when she, an outspoken liberal, said that conservative justice Antonin Scalia was correct about the irrelevance of legislative history to judicial decision-making. Her paper for Barack on the hollowness of class-based affirmative action programs would become her published note in the U of C Law Review.

In Con Law III, Barack assigned the new third edition of Geof Stone's Constitutional Law casebook, an eighteen-hundred-page behemoth that was used in all of the law school's Con Law courses, to his thirty-seven students. Triste Lieteau, a 3L medical school graduate whose lobbyist dad Mike had met

Barack during Alice Palmer's congressional campaign, thought Barack was "a great professor" and "very down to earth." At such "a conservative bastion," liberal professors were often challenged in class by outspoken conservative students, and Triste remembered that Barack handled one such incident "very well." As an African American student, "you do feel this strong sense of isolation and that you're really not fully a part" of the school, she explained. In that context, 3L Hisham Amin welcomed Barack as a black professor who exuded "confidence, presence, and knowledge." At the end of the quarter, the students' evaluations of Barack's teaching registered 9.35 out of 10 for Racism and the Law and 8.71 out of 10 for Con Law III.<sup>22</sup>

On the first Thursday in October, Barack's campaign held a $100-per-person fund-raiser at a West African art gallery. Sponsors included attorneys Jeff Cummings, Allison Davis, Linzey Jones, and Elvin Charity; old Gamaliel colleague David Kindler; former students Jesse Ruiz, Brett Hart, and Jeanne Gills; and family friends Valerie Jarrett, Craig Huffman, and Kathy Stell. The invitation offered attendees the chance to meet "one of the nation's most promising young leaders" and said the proceeds "will help Barack conduct voter registration and outreach efforts to constituents." The next week Barack conducted "an intense discussion on power and self-interest" for the Hope Center, but there was a tension between Sokoni Karanja and Tracy Leary's focus on energizing Bronzeville residents and Barack's vision of a citywide network. "We had some differences of opinion around what it should look like," Sokoni remembered, as Barack "wanted it to be less focused on Bronzeville and more of a citywide thing," perhaps because "I always thought he wanted to be mayor." Given the "dearth of leadership in Bronzeville, I thought this was the place to focus initially and then begin to build out from there," Sokoni explained, while Barack "wanted to take it much more broadly." Sandy O'Donnell and Tracy Leary observed many of their conversations, and young Gamaliel organizer John Eason, who knew how Sokoni and Barack "were thick as thieves," came to realize "how much they differed in terms of how they think about community organizing and building community." Jean Rudd, who knew them both as Woods Fund board members, understood how Barack "became frustrated with the limits of it, that it was going to be limited to a very restricted idea of what leadership development was about and that it was not going to become what he had hoped it would be."

Woods itself, where former UNO Southeast Chicago organizer Todd Dietterle had succeeded Ken Rolling when he became CAC executive director, had moved to make welfare-to-work policies a coequal priority along with the fund's long-standing commitment to organizing. Woods appreciated "how the availability of child care and transportation to work sites affects employment prospects," and with the passage of President Clinton's welfare reform bill, state legislatures would have to devote significant attention to such policies in 1997. Woods, Wieboldt, and MacArthur all cohosted a fall 1996 "Community Organizing Award" ceremony, and Barack's keynote address captured the evolution of his thinking about organizing toward a larger focus. Organizing taught that "we have a collective responsibility to make a better world" and anyone who identified as a victim was "disempowering" themselves. But the focus should not be on "getting concessions out of some power out there," in what John McKnight had called consumer-driven organizing, but upon generating new productivity, just as McKnight had emphasized a decade earlier. "We have to start thinking on a bigger scale," and "organizing on a big scale requires coalition building," Barack argued. "The core idea of organizing—the notion of mutual regard, and mutual responsibility, and collective action," meant that "our individual salvation is tied to our collective salvation” and that “our individual stories are part of a larger story,” language Barack would directly echo to a vastly larger audience eight years later.<sup>23</sup>

By mid-October, Michelle was well into her new job at the U of C, organizing an annual volunteerism summit that featured as a speaker her brother Craig’s good friend John Rogers Jr. With the general election only three weeks away, Barack had no need to campaign because, as the Hyde Park Herald noted, his two opponents “are nowhere to be found.” Neither responded to a League of Women Voters invitation to a Saturday candidates’ forum, and Barack won some goodwill with a possible new state Senate colleague, Debbie Halvorson, by campaigning for her in the south suburban district where she was challenging longtime Republican incumbent Aldo DeAngelis. Senate Democratic leader Emil Jones Jr., facing a 33–26 Republican majority, hoped to pick up the four seats needed to win control of the chamber. Jones had assigned the Senate Democrats’ best staffer, 1987 Georgetown University graduate and former UPI newsman Dan Shomon, to run Halvorson’s campaign, and one weekend day, a somewhat overdressed Barack, with Ron Davis and Will Burns in tow, showed up to go door to door for Halvorson.

Both the Tribune and the Sun-Times endorsed Barack, with the Trib calling him “a worthy successor” to Palmer and someone who “has potential as a political leader.” Downstate U.S. congressman Dick Durbin, the Democratic candidate to succeed retiring U.S. senator Paul Simon, told reporters he was enjoying reading Dreams From My Father, but the only preelection interview request Barack fielded was from the U of C Law School’s student newspaper. He said his top priority would be implementing the state’s new role under the federal welfare reform measure, and also “the challenge of constructing non-traditional alliances with suburban and downstate legislators.”

On Election Day, Barack triumphed with more than 82 percent of the vote, but the overall results were a defeat, because even though Halvorson defeated DeAngelis and Democrat Terry Link picked up another previously Republican seat in Waukegan, Senate Democrats came up two seats short of capturing the majority. The Republicans’ reduced margin of 31 to 28 was especially disheartening because two relatively inexperienced Republican candidates, Christine Radogno and recent appointee Dave Luechtefeld, had eked out very narrow victories. Had Emil Jones’s campaign staffers turned out another 214 Democratic votes in those two districts, Barack would have been a freshman member of the Senate’s majority rather than minority party.

Democrats regained control of the state House of Representatives, 60–58, picking up six seats as part of President Clinton’s landslide victory in Illinois that also ensured Dick Durbin’s election to the U.S. Senate. The Senate Democrats’ narrow failure led to talk about a challenge to Jones’s leadership on the part of unhappy colleagues like Quad Cities senator Denny Jacobs, but when Barack went to Springfield for new-members’ orientation during the legislature’s brief mid-November veto session, his most poignant lesson was how personally popular the departing Alice Palmer was with colleagues, staffers, and progressive lobbyists. “I loved Alice Palmer,” assistant staff director Cindy Huebner explained, and although she was prepared to dislike Barack, he was “very nice, very down to earth” once he realized he needed to “mend those fences.”<sup>24</sup>

In Chicago, Barack spoke at Jesse Jackson Sr.’s weekly Saturday-morning PUSH rally, brimming with optimism about his new role as a state senator. “If we can rally the community around education, welfare reform, health care, jobs and job training, then we can create a progressive state coalition that can serve not only Chicago’s interests but those who lack opportunity everywhere.” He said he was creating an issues committee, and he invited district residents to join, calling it a “vehicle for getting people more involved in the political process.” Interested citizens should call Cynthia Miller at the soon-to-be senator’s district office. “There are big pockets in this district that are underserved,” Barack stated, which was very true given how the 13th Senate District, which reached from 47th Street on the north to 81st Street on the south, encompassing Hyde Park and South Shore, also stretched more than five miles westward, encompassing parts of the Englewood, Chicago Lawn, and Marquette Park neighborhoods in a narrow finger between Marquette Road—67th Street—on the north and 75th Street on the south. The district was 20 percent white—largely Hyde Park—and more than 70 percent African American, but that western part of the district, especially Englewood, was a world away from the leafy blocks surrounding the university.

“We plan to organize monthly town hall meetings at rotating locations around the district,” Barack announced, and he told the law school’s student newspaper that “hopefully I’ll be a voice that helps nudge the legislature towards a welfare system that not only recognizes the importance of moving people out of welfare and into work, but also recognizes that there are many barriers to that process,” such as the day care and transportation hurdles the Woods Fund’s work was highlighting. “We have to address those failures of the market and provide structures of support in those areas,” Barack explained, recalling the manuscript he and Rob Fisher had written while at Harvard. He also distinguished himself from his party’s president: “on the national level bipartisanship usually means Democrats ignore the needs of the poor and abandon the idea that government can play a role in issues of poverty, race discrimination, sex discrimination, or environmental protection.”

Ten days before Christmas Barack got his third traffic ticket in fifteen months when he was pulled over and fined $50 for going sixty-two miles per hour in a forty-five-mile-per-hour zone. His Springfield inauguration would take place on Wednesday, January 8, 1997, but first he had to grade his Con Law III exams and prepare himself to teach Voting Rights and the Democratic Process for the first time when winter quarter began on January 6. Barack knew that an upcoming visiting professor at the law school, Rick Pildes from the University of Michigan, was working on a voting rights casebook along with two other election law scholars, and well before January, Barack had asked Pildes for a copy of their manuscript. Barack’s advance description of his course made clear that he would bring to this new class the same relentlessly open-minded style students had experienced in his Racism class. “Does the Voting Rights Act, as amended, promote minority voices, or simply segregate them from the larger political discourse?” he suggestively asked in questioning the overall political utility of so-called minority-majority districts. Indeed, Barack’s description asked, “does voting even matter in a complex, modern society where campaigns are dominated by money and issues are framed by lobbyists?”

Barack sounded a similar note regarding districting when the Associated Press asked him to comment on a Supreme Court order returning a challenge to Illinois’s oddly drawn, Hispanic-majority 4th Congressional District to the original trial court for reconsideration, a case he knew well because Davis Miner had represented some of the intervenors who were defending that district and three others with black majorities. “It’s fair to say that in all these congressional remap cases, the Supreme Court has not yet come up with a clear, manageable, comprehensive approach to determining whether or not a minority-majority district is permissible.” Barack again demonstrated a less than worshipful view of the high court in a twelve-page, single-space memo to his Con Law III students, explaining the best type of answers when he returned their mid-December exams. He had posed two questions, one involving a lesbian couple's public employee benefits coverage, the second concerning municipal affirmative action programs, and he limited their answers to a total of fifteen typed double-spaced pages.

For the first question, he cited "the remarkable opacity of Justice Kennedy's opinion" in Romer v. Evans, a landmark antidiscrimination decision handed down seven months earlier. On the second, he pointed out how "the type of program at issue in" Adarand Constructors v. Peña, an important 1995 affirmative action ruling that applied highly demanding "strict scrutiny" to the federal government's use of explicitly racial classifications, included an "irrebuttable presumption that any contractor who was a member of a minority group fell into this economically disadvantaged category."

Rick Pildes and Barack had dinner one night in Hyde Park, and Pildes got a sense of Barack's approach to law teaching, which was "very different from most" young law professors because of "how independent-minded he was about the issues." Barack "was much deeper and more reflective" than most legal academics. Regarding voting rights, Barack was "open-minded" and "very interested in the facts on the ground, how this stuff was really playing out, rather than ideology." He was such "a wonderful presence" that Rick thought to himself, "I could see this guy as mayor of Chicago."

But another visiting colleague, John R. Lott Jr., had a different sense of Barack. In August 1996, Lott and a graduate student coauthor had presented an evidence-packed paper contending that increased possession of private firearms resulted in less violent crime. That seemingly counterintuitive argument outraged gun control advocates, who responded with angry denunciations of Lott's work. Later that fall, Lott sought to introduce himself to Barack at the law school. "Oh, you're the gun guy," Barack responded coolly. "Yes, I guess so," Lott replied, and he recalled Barack responding, "I don't believe that people should be able to own guns." Lott offered to talk about the issue, but Barack "simply grimaced and turned away, ending the conversation."

Lott's recounting of that exchange matched Barack's frank statement about handguns on his September VI-IPO questionnaire, but Barack's personal disdain for Lott, exhibited on several subsequent occasions, differed from the warm and approachable professor Barack's twenty-five students encountered in Voting Rights. He assigned photocopied readings from Pildes's manuscript that began with "some early 19th century cases about the denial of the franchise" and continued up through current-day redistricting and campaign finance cases. Adam Bonin, a 3L, recalled that "we learned the law, but we also learned it on the level of real-world impact." David Franklin, also a 3L, remembered that Barack "wasn't interested in high theory at all," and he emphasized that further when students wrote the lengthy papers that were the primary coursework. Bonin addressed racial gerrymandering, and Barack "made me look at this as a real-world issue, and not as a theoretical construct."

Bonin remembered that Barack would push a contrary view if it "wasn't being expressed or students were too complacent in their liberal views." Molly Garhart, another 3L, recalled Barack as "so calm, so level-headed, so fair and so equitable in his treatment of all of us and listening to everyone's ideas." African American 3L Carl Patten had met Barack months earlier in the gym and had lost a one-on-one game to him. In class, Patten was "very impressed" with how Barack "created an environment where people felt free to speak from their viewpoints whether or not they were perceived to be aligned with his." When Carl had seen Barack at the law school after that one-on-one loss, he joshingly remarked, "Next time I'm going to get you." Barack's facial expression immediately said, "This is not the place for me to respond.” Patten realized “he’s very calculating, extremely calculating,” yet “calculating while being genuine.” When the quarter ended, the students gave Barack’s teaching an 8.71 score on the law school’s 10-point scale.<sup>25</sup>

On Wednesday morning, January 8, Barack was sworn into office, signed his oath of office form for his two-year term, and began his true initiation into the world of the handsome Illinois State Capitol building. As a minority party freshman, Barack was assigned to one of the least desirable offices, 105D, a narrow, high-ceilinged ground-floor box in the capitol’s north wing. His political home in Springfield would be the Senate’s Democratic caucus, an uneasy assemblage whose twenty-eight members included several highly volatile personalities. Democratic leader Emil Jones Jr.’s only meaningful power was hiring staff members and assembling a caucus leadership team to support his role as minority leader. But there were three much more consequential figures in Springfield’s political world: newly reinstated Democratic House Speaker Michael J. Madigan, a lifelong politico from Chicago’s Southwest Side who had become 13th Ward committeeman at age twenty-seven in 1969 and entered the legislature in 1971; moderate, second-term Republican governor Jim Edgar, who had grown up in the small town of Charleston in eastern Illinois; and Senate Republican president James Peyton “Pate” Philip, from suburban DuPage County.

To outsiders unfamiliar with Springfield, and especially with the capitol’s unusual lingo, a description of the city as a land of horseshoes, mushrooms, and lobsters might sound strange. A Springfield “horseshoe” was an often grotesque open-faced sandwich in which a piece of meat was covered first with french fries and then with a cheeselike sauce. Visitors knowledgeable enough to avoid the local delicacy felt rightfully proud. The statement that Springfield was a city of “bad hotels and worse food” was perhaps apocryphal, but there was no shortage of bars, because drinking was state politicians’ top recreational activity. Card playing came second, and golf was perhaps third, because the local courses were an everyman’s bargain compared to Chicago. But there was little doubt what ranked fourth, as one female lobbyist explained: “there’s a lot of people who fucked in Springfield. What else is there to do?”

“Mushrooms” was the name given to rank-and-file members of Mike Madigan’s House Democratic caucus, as Madigan’s life mission was maintaining a viselike control over legislative decision-making. Madigan was a fervent admirer of former Chicago mayor Richard J. Daley, and his description of Daley was one that fit Madigan himself: “every day of his life, he was about politics.” To say that House Democrats were “kept in the dark and fed shit” might slightly exaggerate their experience, but the disdain that senators of both parties exhibited toward their House colleagues was Illinois bipartisanship at its strongest. “We like to think of ourselves as the House of Lords,” African American Chicago senator Donne Trotter explained, and state representatives were political inferiors. “We talk about them like dogs, and we don’t really work together.” The two chambers sat just yards apart on the Capitol’s third floor, separated by a glorious open rotunda that gave the building much of its cathedral-like beauty, but in the capitol’s daily life, the two bodies were “very separate worlds,” with members interacting almost exclusively with colleagues from their own chamber.

There were, of course, no real lobsters in the nearby Sangamon River, but the capitol’s notable “lobsters”—lobbyists—were most often found on “the rail,” the brass ring that encircled the rotunda in a building where seats were in short supply. More than legislators, more than legislative staffers, these lobbyists were the crucial players in a state government world where campaign cash and those who could provide it were always the top priority of legislative leaders. Many lobbyists were former legislators who had parlayed their knowledge and personal relationships into far more remunerative work than public service. The most experienced lobbyists often enjoyed a decisive advantage over part-time legislators, who were often not the sharpest tools in the shed. “Stupid people need representation too, and they’re very well represented in the Illinois legislature,” one corporate lobbyist acerbically declared. The centrality of lobbyists in Illinois politics was inseparable from the centrality of money in Illinois politics, and in Springfield most of the money flowed to the legislative caucus leaders, “The Four Tops,” who hired the staff members and funded the campaigns of those members who, unlike Barack, represented competitive districts.

The power held by the Four Tops, particularly the Senate president and the House Speaker, was the single most defining factor in Illinois politics. Life in the statehouse had changed only in degree, not in kind, from the world that U.S. senator Paul Simon had described three decades earlier in an infamous Harper’s Magazine essay and that was best personified by Simon’s longtime rival, Illinois secretary of state Paul Powell, who died in 1970. Both men were from far downstate Illinois. Powell entered the Illinois House in 1935, at age thirty-three, and Simon in 1953, at age twenty-five. Powell served as Speaker of the House from 1949 to 1951 and again from 1959 to 1963, while Simon moved to the state Senate in 1963. His 1964 article, “The Illinois Legislature: A Study in Corruption,” stated that “one third of the members accept payoffs.” He quoted one lobbyist recounting that a legislator had said “it will cost you two hundred to five hundred dollars to get the bill out of committee” and another who was told that “for $7,500 I can get you nine votes” from legislative colleagues. Simon never mentioned Powell by name, but he did cite rumors that “under-the-table transactions provide an income of $100,000 a session for one prominent Representative when his party is in power.” Simon emphasized that “there are no controls on lobbyists in Springfield . . . they can hand out any amount of money to influence legislators,” and “legislators in turn need not account for campaign contributions or disclose their sources.”

A year later, Simon wrote a brief follow-up piece, reporting that at the biennial Senate dinner, “I was presented with a ‘Benedict Arnold Award.’ Previous winners, they said, were Judas Iscariot and Aaron Burr.” In 1964, Paul Powell was elected Illinois secretary of state, and he was reelected four years later. In Springfield, he lived at the St. Nicholas Hotel, and when he died at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, in October 1970, at age sixty-eight, his suite at the St. Nicholas contained $800,000 in cash.

Powell’s biographer later contended that some of that money represented “large amounts of dividend income from race-track investments.” Even if true, Powell’s career in Illinois politics was an indelible lesson in the realities of Springfield: as Barack already sensed, state politics was more concerned with money than it was with the betterment of the lives of Illinois citizens. Of the few people actively interested in changing that state of affairs, Barack already knew the most important one: Joyce Foundation vice president Larry Hansen, a fifty-six-year-old native of Elgin and a former Democratic political operative. At the Joyce board's most recent meeting, Hansen's Money & Politics effort had been elevated to a full-fledged program. But even before that, Hansen had supported University of Illinois at Springfield political science professor Kent Redfield, a former Democratic House staffer, in throwing new light on Cash Clout at the Illinois statehouse.

Redfield's 1995 monograph emphasized that "there are no limits on how much an individual, public official, political party, interest group, or corporate entity can contribute to a candidate or spend on behalf of a candidate," even though a 1974 law did require candidates to report most contributions. Redfield noted how "putting campaign reports in an electronic database and making that database easily accessible to everyone would go a long way toward making the law operate as a sunshine law." But Redfield stressed that equally if not more important was "the tremendous growth in the power of the legislative leaders. Their control over both the agenda and the content of policy outcomes has become almost absolute," and went hand in hand with the dominant role they played in the campaigns of many of their caucus members.

In an insightful subsequent essay, "What Keeps the Four Tops on Top?," Redfield wrote that "the power of individual members has continued to decline" as the legislature "has become even more dominated by the legislative leaders." Their "near monopolies on campaign fundraising and the mobilization of legislative staff efforts" allow them "to control the legislative process when the legislature comes into session." Individual members "lack the personal and policy staff necessary to establish political and substantive autonomy apart from the leaders." In Springfield Barack would have one personal secretary—Beverly Criglar, whom he was inheriting from Alice Palmer—and one-fifth of the time of one of the Democratic caucus's Communications and Research staffers, who wrote press releases and such. Barack also had $47,000 to pay for his district office expenses, including Cynthia Miller's part-time salary. As Redfield explained, "strong leaders and relatively weak members . . . mean that interest groups concentrate their campaign contributions on the leaders."

The dominance of the Four Tops and their close relationships with the best-heeled interest groups determined many statehouse decisions. "The 1990s have seen a wholesale retrenchment of the power and autonomy of individual members in the legislative process," Redfield explained, as the Four Tops "control the legislative agenda and determine most of the outcomes." Other observers agreed with Redfield's analysis. "The extraordinary extent to which the Assembly's staff is under the control of party leaders," a University of Illinois report observed, "limits the information available to backbenchers, which forces many of them to look to interest groups for information or cues about policy." With most staffers hired for their "political rather than their policy skills," committees "are to a great degree under leadership control," thus further magnifying "the loss of power by individual legislators."<sup>26</sup>

Those systemic factors would have a huge impact on Barack's experiences as a freshman senator, but equally important, he had entered a body controlled day in, day out by one single man: as one lobbyist put it, in 1997 the Illinois state Senate "was Pate Philip's world." Philip, then sixty-six, was a former marine who never graduated from college and had begun his work life driving a Pepperidge Farm bread truck. Active in the DuPage County Republican Party by his mid-twenties, Philip was elected to the state House in 1966 and moved up to the state Senate in 1974. Seven years later he became the Republican minority leader, and when his party won majority control in 1992, Philip became Senate president. Philip was more than just the Republican Senate leader: since 1970 he had chaired DuPage County's Republican Party, where more than one-third of the 630 precinct committeemen were on public payrolls. That made him the boss of what Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal called “the most effective political unit in the state,” and one that in 1988 had single-handedly won Illinois for Republican presidential candidate George H. W. Bush: he carried the state by just 95,000 votes while winning DuPage by more than 123,000.

But Philip was best known for his undisciplined mouth. Neal wrote that “niggers” and “hooknoses” were parts of Philip’s regular vocabulary, and in October 1994, he set off a public controversy by telling a suburban newspaper’s editorial board that some black state employees at the Department of Children and Family Services “don’t have the same work ethics that we have.” African American state senator Donne Trotter responded that “these are the kind of comments you expect from the Grand Dragon of the KKK, not the president of the Illinois Senate,” and the Sun-Times condemned Philip’s “racist comments.”

Inside the Illinois statehouse, it was universally known that Philip had little respect for Emil Jones Jr., a very dark-skinned African American. Some said that was Philip’s partisan nature, but Philip had had an entirely cordial relationship with Phil Rock, Jones’s white predecessor. One member of Philip’s Republican caucus who tussled with the leader more than most said he was “kind of like a teddy bear” who “said whatever was on his mind,” and multiple Republicans cited the amount of authority Philip gave his best committee chairmen, like Steve Rauschenberger on Appropriations and Harvard Law School graduate Carl Hawkinson on Judiciary. One of Philip’s deputies acknowledged that the Senate president “was Mr. Politically Incorrect,” but the conservative chairman of Public Health and Welfare put it bluntly: Pate Philip was “just an old white racist marine,” a view shared by black Democrats.

Philip’s counterpart, Emil Jones Jr., grew up in Chicago’s Morgan Park neighborhood and got interested in politics at age twenty-five while watching John F. Kennedy’s first television debate against Richard M. Nixon. After volunteering in that 1960 presidential race, he became principal aide to 34th Ward alderman Wilson Frost, and in 1972 Jones won election to the state House. A father of four, Jones and his wife Patricia also from 1980 onward raised his war-damaged brother’s young son. In 1982 Jones was elevated to the state Senate, and the next year, like most organization loyalists, he backed Jane Byrne for mayor rather than Harold Washington. Jones’s husky, guttural voice led many people to seriously underestimate him, because as Governor Jim Edgar later stressed, Emil Jones is “much smarter than he sounds.”

Jones recalled that entering the legislature had been an eye-opener. “One of the biggest surprises I found is that outside the city of Chicago, there’s a place called Illinois,” which “was an entirely different world altogether.” Jones said the two books that had had the greatest impact on him were Niccolò Machiavelli’s The Prince—“government as it is,” Jones remarked—and Sun Tzu’s The Art of War. The legislative process, Jones explained, “is constant war,” and he quoted from memory a rough translation of one of Sun Tzu’s principles: “do not depend on the enemy not coming, but rather be prepared for the enemy when he does come.” When highly popular Senate president Phil Rock retired after Senate Democrats lost their majority in 1992, Jones worked hard to succeed him as Democratic leader. With all seven African American senators and the two Hispanic members in his corner, Jones had nine of the fourteen necessary votes, but only after Chicago mayor Richard M. Daley intervened did Jones win the support of North Side contender Howard Carroll and downstate powerhouse Vince Demuzio. Several Democratic senators remained displeased, most notably Denny Jacobs from Quad Cities, and by early

1997 Jones had served four rocky years as Senate Democratic leader. The narrow 1996 failure to recapture majority control was a huge disappointment to colleagues, and it made them doubt Jones's skills.<sup>27</sup>

If Pate Philip had a distant relationship with Jones, his rapport with his fellow Republican governor Jim Edgar was not much better. "Pate and I were different people," Edgar later recalled. "We were just different cultures, different backgrounds . . . completely different." As everyone in Springfield knew, Jim Edgar was a teetotaler, and he "rarely bothered to develop personal relationships with legislators" in a building that "thrives on personal contact." Philip ran the Senate so that most days ended at 5:00 P.M., and the members adjourned to play cards, smoke a cigar, have a drink or two, and indulge in a little off-color humor. In contrast, the straitlaced governor stayed home with his wife and rarely socialized with fellow politicians. At the time, the outspoken Philip said "that sorry son of a bitch hasn't got a friend in the world," but years later Philip acknowledged that "Jim Edgar was a very good Governor—not much personality," yet a fiscal conservative whose views often but not always matched Philip's.

Edgar realized that Philip was most often influenced by the last person he had spoken with, but Philip was far more attuned to his conservative caucus than he was to the state's moderate Republican governor. Philip's chief of staff, Carter Hendren, who had been Edgar's campaign manager, was usually the glue that held things together. "Carter helped a lot with Pate," Edgar later recalled, and in the eyes of Edgar's top staffers, Hendren was an invaluable presence at the unpredictable Philip's side: "he saved Pate from himself so many times," deputy chief of staff Andy Foster explained. Disappointment was widespread among savvy Democrats like Senate Appropriations spokesman Donne Trotter that Edgar was not a more forceful counterbalance to Philip. Trotter saw Edgar as "an absentee governor" who "acquiesced his power to Pate Philip," who "took full advantage of that."

It was not surprising, then, that Philip's closest political partnership was sometimes with the utterly nonideological House Speaker, Mike Madigan. Famous throughout Illinois politics as a man of few words who rarely volunteered his thoughts, Madigan was known as someone whose word was reliable once he finally gave it. Philip and Edgar both remembered Madigan positively, but Emil Jones was the odd man out in Madigan's good working relationship with the two top Republicans. When the Speaker came to the Senate floor to see Philip, members and staffers took note of how Madigan ignored Jones just as Philip did. Jones understandably resented that lack of respect, creating a long-term rift. Donne Trotter recalled that Jones used to acerbically joke that House Democrats carried "a chip in their head" implanted by the Speaker, "and all Madigan had to do was push a button." The Senate's "lack of respect for House members . . . was in a lot of cases perpetuated by our own leader because he didn't have a real good working relationship with Mike Madigan," Trotter explained. The lack of comity within their chamber and their party left Senate Democrats marginalized in more ways than one.<sup>28</sup>

Four weeks passed between the January 8 swearing-in ceremony and the commencement of legislative business on February 5. On the second weekend in January, Barack held a "community swearing-in" at Kennedy-King College in the Englewood part of his district. He told a weekly newspaper reporter he intended to put "principles before self-interest" in Springfield and that his two top priorities were improving education in Chicago's public schools and job training programs. "We can't just wait on legislation to cause some of the changes," he said. "I'm hoping to participate as part of a broad leadership with political officials, community organizations and ordinary folks to change some of the values that are blocking us from achieving the way we may achieve. Though we may be lobbying for more school funding, it's also important for us to bring education into the homes and ensure parents are checking children's homework, turning off the television, teaching common courtesy and how not to throw trash out windows." Barack said older legislators had advised him to "be quiet and start slow," but he believed that "if you work harder than others, you can still move legislation. I'm going to be the hardest working Senator down in Springfield."

In his annual State of the State address on January 22, Governor Jim Edgar renewed his call for education funding reform and called for expanded campaign contribution disclosures. One week later, the Joyce Foundation-funded Illinois Campaign Finance Project released a two-year study, largely written by Kent Redfield, which aimed "to elevate campaign finance reform onto the legislative agenda." The group's marquee members, cochaired by retiring U.S. senator Paul Simon and former governor William Stratton, also included Barack's Joyce Foundation board colleague Paula Wolff and his longtime proponent and former Harold Washington aide Jacky Grimshaw. The group declared that contrary to what Illinois law still allowed, "campaign funds should be used exclusively for campaign purposes, and not for personal use . . . officials should not be allowed to take campaign contributions with them for personal use after they leave office," and legislators should be prohibited from holding fund-raisers in the Springfield area while the legislature was in session. They stressed that the power of the Four Tops was the crux of the problem: "there is intense pressure to contribute to the leaders, and failure to do so is perceived by many players as a grave mistake," since "not giving money places individuals and groups at a distinct disadvantage."

On the first three days of substantive Senate business, February 5 through 7, Barack introduced seventeen different bills. They addressed the redevelopment of blighted areas, fairer credit reporting, better computer technology in public schools, additional job training programs, and the creation of a state Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC) equal to 20 percent of a taxpayer's federal EITC. One called for an additional $50 million for minority business enterprise loans, three dealt with different aspects of welfare reform, and another authorized community colleges to distribute a directory of their graduating students to potential employers. Only three of the seventeen would receive committee consideration in the weeks ahead, but this certainly attested to Barack's claim to be the "hardest working Senator."

So too did remarks Barack offered at a legislative conference convened by AFSCME, the large public employees union. AFSCME lobbyists Ray Harris and Bill Perkins had met Barack in 1992 during Project VOTE!, and at an opening workshop, Harris stressed to new legislators how leadership-dominated the statehouse really was. Barack said that had not been part of the formal orientation, and Perkins remembered being blown away by Barack's lunchtime remarks that elected officials like himself ideally should be answerable to an organized base of voters. Another labor lobbyist, Dan Burkhalter of the Illinois Education Association, one of the state's two major teachers' unions, had dinner with Barack one evening to apologize for how the IEA had ignored him when it seemed Barack would be facing Alice Palmer in an actual primary. "He's nobody's guy," Burkhalter said, invoking a famous old Chicago political saying—"We don't want nobody nobody sent"—so Barack "was a hard guy to figure out." But Barack forthrightly explained his attitude toward the teachers' unions: "Dan, here's the deal. I'll be with you guys. I can be your guy. I'll vote for tax increases, I'll vote for more money for schools, but here's the thing: we've got to figure out how to get bad teachers out of the classroom. You guys should be a part of that instead of blocking it, and if you'll work with me to be a part of it, I'm with you. If you won't, I'm not."

During that first week, Barack also went to Emil Jones Jr. to volunteer for whatever Jones could give him. "You know me," Barack said, alluding to their acquaintance a decade earlier in Roseland. "'You know I like to work hard, so feel free to give me any tough assignments,'" Jones recounted. "I suggested to him that to be successful in this body, you get to know the members, especially those who are not from Chicago," particularly those from downstate Illinois. "Get to know them well" and "Don't hang around with the guys from Chicago. . . . It'll serve you well in this body, and you'll be able to get more things accomplished."

In addition, that week Barack called Judd Miner in Chicago. Both men expected Barack to shift to some part-time role with the firm, but still receiving a regular salary. Allison Davis was transitioning from being a partner in the firm he had cofounded to full-time housing development work in conjunction with Tony Rezko's Rezmar Corp., and by February 1997 both Barack's and Allison's status at the newly named Miner, Barnhill & Galland changed to "Of Counsel," a common law firm title. "We were going to set him up in Springfield," Judd recalled, but Barack quickly realized that would be impossible. "Judd, this is unfair to you guys. It's full-time," so "I don't want to take a draw," Barack explained. "I'm going to be putting in a lot more time than I thought," so "I prefer not to be salaried." George Galland remembered being impressed by how "unusually straightforward" Barack was about the situation, and going forward Barack would be paid only when he could devote time to actual casework.

In early February, Barack summed up his first month's impressions of Springfield in a column for the weekly Hyde Park Herald, just as Alice Palmer had during her term. Remarking that he was "somewhat awed by the challenges that lie ahead," Barack confessed that "friends and associates have (only half jokingly) questioned my sanity in entering politics, and warned me of all the corrupting influences lurking in Springfield." But he had run because of "my desire to restore a sense of mission and service to state government," something he believed Illinois's governor lacked. Jim Edgar, he wrote, is "a pleasant enough man who appears incapable of mustering the kind of energy and vision needed to mobilize support around" substantive issues. "But perhaps the biggest impediment to change in Springfield is the lack of meaningful engagement in the process among ordinary citizens, and particularly those persons most vulnerable to government action—or inaction."

The legislature's most "daunting task," Barack wrote, would be coping with the state-level changes required by federal welfare reform. Barack cited the multiple bills he had introduced to "significantly increase and revamp the state's job training and retention services targeted towards unskilled workers" plus support services to help people transition from welfare to work. "It's people power that lifts up issues and frames the debate in new ways," and so he was "organizing citizens' committees" to address "education, economic development, health care, and public safety" issues. "I am extremely humble about what I can accomplish working alone. But I am supremely confident of what we can accomplish together, and look forward to serving you in the years to come."<sup>29</sup>

Barack's organizing experience clearly informed his view of elective office, and it also directly influenced a presentation he delivered on a mid-February Friday morning to Chicago's Local Initiatives Support Corporation (LISC), a well-funded, fifteen-year-old community development organization whose roots lay in a national Ford Foundation effort to revitalize distressed neighborhoods. LISC had created a “Futures Committee” to reshape its ongoing efforts, and several leading members, including Aurie Pennick from the MacArthur Foundation and Howard Stanback, formerly one of Harold Washington’s top aides, had known Barack a decade earlier.

Barack shaped his remarks around what he called “eight principles of healthy communities,” beginning with “a sound economic base” that offered living-wage jobs and opportunities for advancement. Continuing to echo John McKnight’s teachings, his second principle was the need to “organize around production, not consumption.” Then came “primacy of the family,” inclusively defined, the “central importance of education,” an “accessible and transparent public square,” emphasizing commonality, “inclusive civic associations and political structures,” strong “mediating institutions” such as churches and unions, and lastly a “shared mentality” that values the past while embracing the future. “We must recognize the major tensions that exist in all communities,” Barack conceded, but “a healthy community combines a recognition of individuality with a well-defined public sensibility, and emphasizes both personal and collective responsibility.” Eight months later, when LISC Chicago ratified its “Futures Committee” findings in a paper entitled “Changing the Way We Do Things,” it credited Barack’s “incisive observations” as a decisive influence on LISC’s conclusions.

Similarly, the Rockefeller Foundation had created a Next Generation Network Program with a half-million dollars a year allotted to “create a corps of 21st-century American leaders with a sense of common purpose and the capability required to build a society committed to fairness and democratic principles, and with the confidence and skills to bring together others in pursuit of those goals.” Barack’s name came to their attention, and Barack asked Newton Minow at Sidley & Austin to write a recommendation letter. Minow told Rockefeller that Barack “is one of the truly outstanding young men of his generation,” as demonstrated by his achievements at Harvard, his authorship of Dreams From My Father, and his chairing of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge’s board. Minow humorously noted his disappointment that neither Barack nor Michelle had remained at Sidley, but he emphasized that the state Senate was just the start of Barack’s public service career. “This is only the beginning for him because I believe one day he will be either Mayor of our City or Governor of our State or a United States Senator. He is going to the top.”

Barack’s district aide, Cynthia Miller, recalled reading Minow’s letter before forwarding it to New York. Rockefeller failed to select Barack, but Cynthia knew Barack’s aspirations reached at least as high as Minow’s trio of predictions. So did his sister-in-law Janis Robinson, who now was raising two young children while working as the part-time executive director of ABLE, the Alliance of Business Leaders and Entrepreneurs, a small Chicago black executives’ group. She and Craig lived within a block of Barack and Michelle, and by 1997 “Michelle and I were very close,” Janis recalled. Once Barack was in the state Senate, “Michelle told me at one point that he definitely felt that he could be president,” Janis recounted. Michelle had said that Barack “has pretty lofty aspirations,” and when Janis asked, “Like what?” Michelle answered frankly: “Like president.”

Barack was selected for a somewhat less august program than Rockefeller’s, a Harvard “social capital” discussion symposium called the Saguaro Seminar that also included law professor Martha Minow and Washington Post columnist E. J. Dionne. Barack’s Annenberg involvement continued, even though he often had to participate by phone from Springfield. At one point, Annenberg’s efforts were publicly attacked by old ally Patrick Keleher, who after years of intense commitment to Chicago school reform concluded that such efforts were benefiting the reformers more than students. “A decade of waste—waste of public and private resources” had channeled hundreds of thousands of dollars to reform groups, while parents had been left “marginalized and largely voiceless,” Keleher argued. “Very little really happens from one wave of Chicago school reform to the next,” yet “reformers will fight to the death against giving direct financial control of education to parents” by way of vouchers. In a Sun-Times op-ed, Keleher castigated Annenberg’s role, and the Sun-Times devoted two news stories to how “School Reform Pioneer Decries ‘Lost Decade.’”<sup>30</sup>

Barack’s principal focus remained the state Senate, and by early March the pace of legislative business picked up appreciably. Judiciary Committee chairman Carl Hawkinson, a 1973 Harvard Law School graduate who had made Law Review, was “immediately impressed” when he learned Barack had been president of the Review. Fellow Republican Frank Watson remembered standing with Hawkinson on the Senate floor when Barack came up to introduce himself, saying he understood Watson was interested in education. “I’m Barack Obama, and I want to do good things for kids.” Watson replied that he would be happy to work together, then expressed amazement once Barack stepped away. “Can you believe that?” Watson remarked about Barack’s brimming self-confidence. “That was kind of unique. I’d been around a long time, and that had never happened to me before.”

Appropriations chairman Steve Rauschenberger, one of the so-called Fab Five group of reform-minded young Republicans who had entered the Senate together four years earlier, was very intrigued with Barack. “When he first arrived, I thought he was exceptional. He was an intellectual Democrat of color who would engage on public policy.” Deno Perdiou, Jim Edgar’s Senate lobbyist, gave the governor a similar report: “There’s a really bright new African American senator from Chicago who’s really good,” Edgar remembered being told. Walter Dudycz, Chicago’s only Republican senator and a veteran police detective, found Barack “very personable and pleasant,” and North Side Democrat Howard Carroll thought Barack was “very impressive.” In identical language, both men also saw that he was “very bright.” Far downstate Democrat Evelyn Bowles “liked him right off the spot,” but both of Chicago’s progressive Hispanic senators, Miguel del Valle and Jesus “Chuy” Garcia, thought Barack got a decidedly cool reception from a number of Democrats because of both his University of Chicago affiliation and also because of how he had taken out the much-loved Alice Palmer. On the Senate floor, Barack remained quiet well into March, impressing del Valle as “cautious and careful and very thoughtful.” But in Senate Democrats’ private caucuses, he spoke up from the outset, often invoking his legal expertise. “He always had something to say,” Debbie Halvorson remembered, and older members found Barack’s professorial statements a bit much for a newcomer. Southwest Side senator Bobby Molaro, one of the legislature’s funniest and most outspoken members, never hesitated to put the overly talkative freshman in his place. “‘Barack, shut the fuck up and sit down, you son of a bitch! Who wants to hear from you?’ That would happen a lot,” Molaro smilingly remembered.

Barack’s biggest concern was less his colleagues’ reactions than his huge disappointment with the support staff. Initially, as a black Chicago Democrat in a safe seat, he was given a Chicago rather than Springfield-based communications staffer, David Wilson, but Barack quickly asked for a change, and staff director Lori Joyce Cullen gave him Jimmy Treadwell in Springfield. By the beginning of March, Barack again expressed his dissatisfaction, noting that fellow freshman Debbie Halvorson, who had won a competitive seat in the south suburbs, was being staffed by her former campaign manager, Dan Shomon, a thirty-two-year-old Georgetown graduate and former newsman whom everyone regarded as highly energetic and skillful.

Barack had already gone out for a drink with Democratic chief of staff Mike Hoffmann, making clear that “I have ambitions” beyond the Senate, Hoffmann recalled. “He talked about running statewide as a black man with a name like Obama,” but “I think he was probably sizing me up as much as anything.” Yet in the wake of being doubly disappointed, Barack phoned Hoffmann with a specific request: “‘I want Dan Shomon.’ I said, ‘No way. Shomon’s our best guy. We need him for our targeted candidates to make sure they get profile. I can’t give him to a safe senator. I just can’t afford that.’” Then, “over the course of what seemed to me a half hour’s conversation, he wore me down,” Hoffmann recounted. Barack claimed it would be “‘a light load, just a little extra,’ so I finally acquiesced, and I called Shomon.”

Dan Shomon had first come to Springfield eight years earlier as United Press International’s bureau chief before moving into state government, eventually working for Illinois treasurer Pat Quinn and then shifting to the Senate Democratic staff in early 1995. With Debbie Halvorson’s office in the same four-senator suite as his, Barack could easily see how much effort Dan was putting into assisting Debbie. When Hoffmann called to say, “I need you to staff Obama,” Shomon responded, “You’re kidding. I don’t have time for Obama. I don’t even know if I like Obama. He wants to change the world in five minutes. I have a lot of other things to do.” Hoffmann sweet-talked Shomon, just as Barack had persuaded him. “He just needs a little strategic advice, he doesn’t really need you to do any work. He does his own writing. He just needs you to help with strategy.”

Soon after Hoffmann’s call, Barack caught up with Dan. “I’m overloaded,” Shomon insisted, but Barack said, “Let me take you out to dinner,” and a night or two later, they met up at Sebastian’s, one of Springfield’s best restaurants. Barack reiterated Mike’s line—“I just want some strategic help. I just want you to give me some advice”—and in the course of dinner, Dan decided, “This is a really nice guy” and agreed to staff Barack.<sup>31</sup>

Soon after the swearing-in, Barack received his committee assignments: Judiciary, following directly from his Harvard and U of C law school pedigree; Public Health and Welfare, which he had specifically requested; and State Government Operations, which was minor in comparison. Senate Judiciary was the least partisan committee in the General Assembly, primarily because independent-minded Republican Carl Hawkinson of Galesburg, who had been chairman since 1993, brought to it an even-handed style. Hawkinson had a good friendship with ranking Democrat John Cullerton, a Loyola Law School graduate who had spent five years as a Cook County public defender. Cullerton, like everyone else, viewed Hawkinson as “very fair, very thoughtful,” and “real bright.” Judiciary handled both criminal and civil law issues, and lobbyists, such as Illinois Sheriffs Association executive director Greg Sullivan, viewed Hawkinson as “very, very well respected” throughout state government. Other Republican members included razor-sharp former Will County state’s attorney Ed Petka, whom a Joliet reporter had nicknamed “Electric Ed” for the number of murderers he had sent to death row.

Dan Cronin and Kirk Dillard were two younger, suburban Republicans. Cronin, a true moderate, saw Judiciary as “a heady committee” with “a nice collegiality” and “a rather significant workload.” Dillard, whose warm demeanor masked resolutely conservative views like all-out opposition to abortion, had worked in Jim Edgar’s administration before entering the Senate as a protégé of Pate Philip. Among committee Democrats, live wire Bobby Molaro was “a funny guy” who one colleague said provided “a little comic relief,” while George Shadid had served twenty-four years as a Peoria police officer before overcoming voter discomfort with his Lebanese ancestry to win election as Peoria County sheriff. After seventeen years, he had entered the Senate in 1993.

Judiciary was significantly better staffed than most committees, with two young attorneys from each caucus assigned to its work: Democrats Gideon Baum and Mike Marrs, and Republicans Matt Jones and John Nicolay, handled the criminal and civil legislation, respectively. Baum realized immediately that Barack was “very smart, very political, very pragmatic,” and Nicolay immediately pegged Barack as an “absolutely political, ambitious animal,” “one of the most political people I’ve ever met, from day one.” Marrs was impressed when Barack wanted to go over bills prior to the committee’s first meeting. But watching Barack on the Senate floor during one of the first days, Marrs thought “he seemed a little bit crestfallen at seeing the process and the fact that there’s not these weighty substantive debates going on,” that what transpired was “very politically driven and not issue driven.” Barack “seemed visibly sort of like ‘Is this all there is?’” Marrs remembered. One evening early in the session, “before he really knew anybody,” Marrs ran into Barack at a reception. “What’s the story on that guy over there?” Barack asked. “Tell me about that person.” It was readily apparent that Barack wanted to “soak it all up.” Republican Matt Jones had spent four years as a prosecutor in Peoria County before going on Senate staff, and he saw Barack as “trying to fit in and figure things out” in committee. John Nicolay agreed that Barack “was still finding his feet” and “knew his place in the world,” yet “from day one” it was clear he was “extremely impressive, very smooth, very bright.”

Barack’s second committee, Public Health and Welfare, was sometimes called “Nia’s committee,” because over the previous sixteen years Democratic staffer Nia Odeoti-Hassan had acquired an unequalled reputation for her policy expertise. A Muslim woman who had taught for six years at a small Iowa college before arriving in Springfield in 1981, Nia had become close to Margaret Smith, the aging black Chicago Democrat who was the committee’s ranking minority member, as well as Alice Palmer. Nia knew Barack had requested the committee, and with Smith’s failing memory, Emil Jones quietly told Nia “to make sure that everything that she knew as minority spokesman that Barack knew too.”

At one point, Smith asked Nia, “Why are you down in that young man’s office all the time?” but staffers and lobbyists noted that Barack treated Smith with unerring deference and respect. “She had earned her stripes,” Republican committee staffer Debbie Lounsberry explained. Barack “was actually functioning as the co-minority spokesman,” Nia explained, and while some staffers found Barack’s Harvard and U of C credentials intimidating, Nia, who often advised progressive lobbyists like John Bouman and Doug Dobmeyer on how best to handle things, was happy to have such a bright African American senator, one who reminded her of “Dick Newhouse in his early years.”

Public Health and Welfare’s chairman was Rockford conservative Dave Syverson, who entered the Senate in 1993 as one of the Republicans’ Fab Five. Syverson had the committee meet on Tuesday at 8:00 A.M., which meant Barack had to make the more-than-three-hour drive to Springfield on Monday evenings rather than Tuesday mornings, as he had hoped. As Lounsberry could see, Barack was “not an early morning person, and he was not happy” with the unpleasant schedule. But with Margaret Smith effectively sidelined, Syverson and Barack met “before committee so there wasn’t any blindsiding the other person,” Syverson recalled, and, according to Lounsberry, they quickly developed “a very cordial professional working relationship.” Barack was “pretty quiet when he first started out,” she remembered, but gradually he emerged as “the voice of the committee,” asking “a lot of questions of the witnesses” when testimony was being heard for and against various bills. But Lounsberry believed the committee was well functioning and collegial because Nia Odeoti-Hassan “knew the issues inside and out.”

The chairman of the State Government Operations committee was young Republican Fab Five banker Peter Fitzgerald, who readily admitted that its “housekeeping” tasks made it “one of the least desirable committees” to chair. Barack was the Democratic spokesman, but Fitzgerald, who was distracted by trying to win the 1998 Republican nomination to challenge Democratic U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun, found Barack overly diligent. “He would make it take up more time than I thought it should,” carefully scrutinizing bills even though “there was no partisan material or issues involved.” Fitzgerald believed that Barack had “a degree of suspiciousness that I thought was excessive,” although he recognized that Barack was “very bright” and “very gifted.”<sup>32</sup>

By early March, Emil Jones Jr. and his staff had a clearer sense of how Barack was adjusting. Jones believed “he was naive, totally naive,” and communications director Lori Joyce Cullen thought Barack was visibly “pie in the sky: ‘I’m going to change the world.’” Her deputy Cindy Huebner remembered that Barack “was really, really wanting to get things done,” and Dan Shomon saw that Barack could rub people the wrong way because “he wanted to fix the process too quickly.” Citizen Action lobbyist John Cameron thought Barack was “pretentious” and “insufferably ambitious,” and recalled how he would “sit in committee and roll his eyes if he thought the testimony was below him.”

Dave Gross, Jones’s deputy chief of staff, knew that “there were very few opportunities for Democrats to actually participate” in crafting legislation given Pate Philip’s control. Shomon’s communications colleague Adelmo Marchiori explained that Democrats “had to spend some time eyeing some of the Republicans’ bills” to find attractive legislation to cosponsor and claim credit for if it won enactment. Most Democrats’ bills were relegated to the Senate’s Rules Committee, chaired by Philip’s top lieutenant, Urbana undertaker Stan Weaver, where they would quietly die. Mike Hoffmann appreciated that Barack “was quick to understand that in the minority you weren’t going to get anything done unless you could partner up with somebody on the other side.” Barack spoke frequently with Hoffmann, “probably more so than just about any other member,” and clearly understood that his initial months in the capitol were “a learning experience, and he didn’t say a lot. I think he tried to keep his ambitions in check,” even if others like John Cameron felt otherwise.

A few months later, Barack recounted that “when I first arrived, I anticipated my caucus would meet and discuss what issues we really wanted to focus on and then structure bills for the problems we identified.” Instead, he quickly realized that “every legislator is somewhat of an independent contractor, searching out issues that will play well in the district.” That produced “a lot of duplicative bills and bills that really hadn’t been thought through or thoroughly researched. That was discouraging,” yet most Springfield veterans “are resigned to the fact that the work of the legislature is piecemeal and sporadic. I don’t think it has to be that way.” A few years later, Barack explained that he had been most disappointed by “the degree of control that leadership exerted over the process,” which gave Pate Philip, “the original paleoconservative,” really “exclusive power to control the flow of legislation and to control the debate.” With progressive bills held in the Rules Committee, “you wouldn’t even get a debate, much less get a vote,” and “that was disappointing and frustrating for someone like myself who was down there to work and discovered that most of my bills were going to get killed before they had even been debated . . . that is not something that I anticipated.”

Barack shared his disappointment with Michelle and friends back in Chicago, who could contrast Barack’s reaction to the political realities of the capitol with the high expectations for policy innovation he had voiced months before. “He was naive about it,” Michelle’s young protégé Craig Huffman recalled. “He thought he was getting into the AP class, and he’d really been admitted to the Special Ed class . . . I think it was eye-opening.”<sup>33</sup>

On Tuesday, March 4, Barack cast his first notable vote when he and John Cullerton both opposed SB 230, a “partial-birth” abortion ban measure that the Senate Judiciary Committee sent to the floor by a 7–2 margin. The meeting witnessed “spirited testimony from activists but little discussion by lawmakers,” with Barack telling reporters that the bill’s lack of a health exception meant it was “clearly unconstitutional.” Barack remained far more interested in the upcoming welfare law changes that would remove the “safety net” of Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and on March 11 the Public Health and Welfare Committee approved Barack’s SB 755, which mandated a study of the impact of those changes on Illinois recipients of public assistance.

The next day, Senate Judiciary approved Barack’s SB 574, authorizing administrative hearings for alleged violations of municipal ordinances, but Thursday, March 13, was Barack’s rookie debut on the Senate floor, as his SB 837, authorizing the directory of graduating Chicago city college students, came up for passage. The Senate had a long tradition of “roasting” new members when they rose to request passage of their first bill, but Barack suffered a far rougher debut than most. This was due in part to how he had knocked Alice Palmer off the 1996 primary ballot, but to a far greater degree it illustrated the stark dislike several Chicago African American senators had for their new young upstart colleague.

“I come humbly before you on this extremely humble bill,” Barack began, explaining that it “authorizes the community colleges to develop and distribute a directory of graduating vocational and technical school students,” an idea that someone at Kennedy-King College had suggested to Barack.

Rickey Hendon, a forty-three-year-old West Sider who had entered the Senate four years earlier after serving as 27th Ward alderman, was quick on the attack. “Senator, could you correctly pronounce your name for me? I’m having a little trouble with it,” perhaps because Hendon and his buddy Donne Trotter had under their breaths already been mouthing a variety of insulting quips like “Yo Mama,” targeting the visibly self-confident, or arrogant, new hotshot.

After Barack answered, Hendon said, “Is that Irish?”

“It will be when I run countywide,” Barack replied.

“That was a good joke, but this bill’s still going to die. This directory, would that have those 1-800 sex line numbers in this directory?” Hendon queried.

Walter Dudycz, often the presiding officer, called on Barack to answer Hendon’s question, and Barack replied, “I apologize. I wasn’t paying Senator Hendon any attention.”

Hendon responded, “Well, clearly, as poorly as this legislation is drafted, you didn’t pay it much attention, either. My question was: Are the 1-800 sex line numbers going to be in this directory?”

Barack stumbled, citing where the idea came from and declaring that those numbers would not be included.

Hendon proceeded. “I seem to recall a very lovely senator by the name of Palmer—much easier to pronounce than Obama—and she always had cookies and nice things to say, and you don't have anything to give us around your desk. How do you expect to get votes? And you don't even wear nice perfume like Senator Palmer did.”

Minutes earlier, fellow freshman Debbie Halvorson had presented her first bill, and Hendon had alluded then to how he missed the man she had ousted. Now Hendon said, “The same day that I'm missing Senator Aldo DeAngelis, now I'm missing Senator Palmer because of these weak replacements with these tired bills that make absolutely no sense. I definitely urge a No vote. Whatever your name is.”

Friendlier colleagues like Republican Brad Burzynski immediately came to Barack's aid. “First of all, Senator Obama, I'd like to thank you for not wearing perfume that Senator Hendon likes.” He continued with a series of gently needling questions, joined by veteran Democrats Denny Jacobs and Howie Carroll. Then fellow Harvard Law School graduate Carl Hawkinson asked Barack, “How do the quality of these questions compare with those that you received from Professors Dershowitz, Tribe, or Nesson?”

Now Barack was in the spirit. “I must say that they compare very favorably. In fact, this is the toughest grilling that I've ever received. If I survive this event, I will be eternally grateful and consider this a highlight of my legal and legislative career.”

Downstate warhorse Vince Demuzio joined in. “Let's not forget, his name ends in a vowel. Senator Obama, let me congratulate you on your first bill. I was sitting here, and as Rickey Hendon was asking you those questions and making those statements, I recalled back to Rickey's first bill. I closed my eyes; I held my nose; I couldn't find the right switch so the staff had to vote me. This time I will keep my eyes open and vote in the affirmative.”

Moderate senior Republican Adeline Geo-Karis spoke similarly. “I certainly commend him for his fortitude today, because if you had fortitude at Harvard, you don't know this body yet. But I want to commend you for trying, because you have Mr. Hendon, who never ceases to attack you.”

SB 837 then passed unanimously, and five months later Governor Edgar signed it into law.<sup>34</sup>

Hendon's hostility was readily apparent, and the “Yo Mama” comments were “audible” very early on, according to secretary of the Senate Linda Hawker, who remembered Donne Trotter joining in with Hendon. Years later, Hendon cited his “true love for” Alice Palmer to explain his animus, but black lobbyist and former House member Paul Williams was one of many who said the reasons for Hendon and Trotter's performance had deeper and more complex roots. “Everybody wasn't thrilled about Mr. Goody Two-Shoes coming in here and imposing all his great ideas on how we need change, when nobody was begging for it,” Williams recalled. “Barack's trying to find his way,” but “Barack's a little bit arrogant.” Williams believed Barack exhibited an “I'm-smarter-than-these-guys” demeanor, and he recalled that once that spring, Barack told him, “You know, Paul, this forum's a little small for me.” Williams thought Barack was “overly intellectual” in an institution that had what another lobbyist called “a very anti-intellectual culture.” But to Williams, even more crucial was how “Barack doesn't have the same community experience we do” as black men who had grown up in Chicago.

Early on, Williams introduced Barack to the Senate's only African American member from outside Chicago, thirty-three-year-old James Clayborne, who was from “Metro East,” the heavily minority area in southwest Illinois just across the Mississippi River from St. Louis. Williams thought Barack and Clayborne, an attorney who had entered the Senate two years earlier, “had a lot in common,” but Clayborne's downstate roots gave him a worldview that was very different from black Chicagoans'. "I can remember specifically Donne Trotter, more so than anybody," Clayborne recalled, "expressing some reluctance, I guess, on the part of accepting Barack and saying that—I'll never forget this—Donne Trotter said to me, 'Can you believe . . . this guy's thirty-some years old [and] he's already written a book about himself?'"

Resentment and jealousy were significant factors, especially toward someone who "had never paid his dues" and who sometimes reminded people of Mel Reynolds. Hyde Park state representative Barbara Flynn Currie recalled that "there was a lot of anger about Mel Reynolds," as well as "a concern that Barack was going to lord it over them in the same kind of way" that the onetime Rhodes Scholar turned convicted felon had. "Here comes another outsider who's got the class and the smarts and the polish that a lot of the rest of us don't," Currie explained. African American AFSCME lobbyist Ray Harris knew Barack "was looking ahead almost from the moment he stepped into the capitol," and he was aware of how Hendon and Trotter "were just senseless in their dislike for the man, because he was everything that they wished they could be." On the Senate floor or off, "they made it their mission in life to make certain people knew that they hated this guy." Southwest Side senator Lou Viverito agreed that for someone so focused on "moving so rapidly," Barack was seen as "an up-and-coming guy that didn't earn his way." Not only was he "more of an outsider," it was also clear "they didn't consider him black enough." Fellow freshman Terry Link, whose office adjoined Barack's and who also sat in the back row in the Senate chamber, agreed that it came down to origins. "Barack wasn't born and raised in Chicago" so "he was considered an outsider more than anything else. . . . There's the part that was more of the problem than anything else."<sup>35</sup>

On March 19 and 20 the Senate passed Barack's administrative hearings bill and then his welfare-study one. Later that day the "partial-birth" abortion ban measure Barack had voted against in committee came to the floor, and Barack remained silent while John Cullerton explained why it was clearly unconstitutional. Then, when the bill received forty-four yes votes and seven nos, Barack joined four other colleagues—Bobby Molaro, Miguel del Valle, Chuy Garcia, and Margaret Smith—in voting "present." Illinois senators actually had three buttons on their desks: red, yellow, and green—and a "present" vote was understood as a no, but it offered senators political cover from criticism that they truly had voted against the measure in question. "What it did was give cover to moderate Democrats who wanted to vote with us but were afraid to do so," Planned Parenthood lobbyist Pam Sutherland explained, and she was happy that Barack chose that option rather than a no. "If you vote 'present,' we're going to pick up 'present' votes," she reassured him, "which we did."

From mid-March to mid-April, the Senate met in only perfunctory sessions. That gave Barack a respite from spending three nights a week in Springfield, where he stayed at the Renaissance Hotel, six blocks from the capitol. Early on Wednesday and Thursday mornings Barack played pickup basketball at the Springfield YMCA. "He had a decent shot, and he liked to talk trash, and he'd throw plenty of elbows," African American lobbyist Vince Williams remembered. "He liked to push and shove," but most of the other regular players, including African American House members Calvin Giles and Art Turner, gave better than they got. Returning to his hotel in sweatclothes, Barack had a cigarette outdoors and got tea, bananas, cereal, and milk from the breakfast buffet to take up to his room before showering and dressing for the day.<sup>36</sup>

Speaking with reporters, Barack willingly voiced disappointment with the Senate. “What I’m surprised at is the lack of an overarching issues strategy” in a legislature where leaders “exert control without a clear road map.” Eager to show he was not just a “brainiac,” Barack boasted that he could “knock down scotch and tell a dirty joke with the best of them.” But he remained focused on the harms that might come from President Clinton’s federal welfare reform. “We have to make sure that the families are intact and have some order. If the parents don’t have their lives together, a lot of times they’ll take it out on their kids.” When Aid to Families of Dependent Children ended, “we’re going to have real problems placing these folks into jobs,” particularly ones that paid a living wage, because “there aren’t enough jobs out there.”

In late March Barack was shocked to see hundreds of young African American men protesting outside the Dirksen Federal Building in downtown Chicago chanting, “Free Larry.” They were supporters of Gangster Disciples leader Larry Hoover, a convicted felon who was again on trial in federal court. In one of his occasional columns for the Hyde Park Herald Barack wrote, “Something is terribly wrong” when “an ever growing percentage of our inner-city youth are alienated from mainstream values and institutions, and regard gangs as the sole source of income, protection and community feeling.” He realized that “a large proportion are functionally illiterate,” thanks to the sorry state of most Chicago public high schools, and since it was mainly “the drug trade that supports the gangs,” prosecutors were “locking up these youth in record numbers.” Post-incarceration, their chance for gainful employment was “even slimmer than it was when they went in.” Barack asserted that “we need to send a strong message to our youth that poverty is never an excuse for violence, individuals are responsible for their behavior, and there are consequences to criminal activity.” But, he argued, Illinois needed to revise its “juvenile justice code so as to balance incarceration with prevention.”

In mid-April, Barack flew to Boston for the first meeting of Harvard professor Robert Putnam’s thirty-person Saguaro Seminar. Then he was back in Springfield for the final five weeks of the spring session, which would be the busiest, although more for Senate Republicans than for minority party backbenchers. “Springfield is 80 percent after-hours,” one experienced female lobbyist explained, but, as progressive Chicago representative Tom Dart recounted, nightlife regulars realized that Barack “definitely was not in the night crowd.” African American Commonwealth Edison lobbyist Frank Clark and even Senate president Pate Philip used almost identical phrases: “You didn’t see him at night.”

The 1997 session was an unusually light one, and the unofficial mayor of Springfield’s late-night scene, political newsletter publisher Rich Miller, whose Capitol Fax was the weekday bible for state politicians, reported that “Senators spent more time at Springfield’s eating and drinking establishments . . . than they did conducting actual business.” Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, when everyone was in town, usually featured one or more early-evening receptions that might go on until as late as 8:30 P.M., after which most legislators adjourned to one or another of downtown’s many late-night watering holes. Young Democratic Senate staffer John Corrigan described Barack’s approach: “I would see him out at these events, and he would squeeze every bit out of Springfield that was good and legitimate for his career. So he would go out, and he’d network, and he would work real hard, and he’d be at all these events. . . . But then, around nine thirty or ten o’clock, you couldn’t find him. He was gone.”

Corrigan explained that “you can get a bad reputation quickly in Springfield” and “Obama understood that.” The small world of the statehouse was “a big gossip thing,” and Barack “knew that it doesn’t matter if he is completely innocent: if it's midnight, and he's talking to a twenty-six-year-old staffer at a bar where everybody's swilling beer, that those kinds of rumors were going to go around about him." Democratic staffer Cindy Huebner had the same view of Barack: "when you would hear the stories from the night before, you never heard any about him."

One progressive female lobbyist was disappointed that Barack "was never at the places," but given how some women lobbyists viewed Barack, that was perhaps wise. "I can clearly remember the first time I saw him," Planned Parenthood's Pam Sutherland recalled. "He's walking down the big stairs" in the capitol. "'Oh my god! He's gorgeous,'" she exclaimed to a female colleague. Barack was "engaging and friendly . . . one of those guys you can't help but like," plus "he's a very attractive man. He had a presence about him . . . his swagger," and "we hit it off right off the bat." One female Republican senator called it "an air of self-confidence, a certain swagger." League of Women Voters lobbyist Cindi Canary put it more bluntly: "women thought Barack was hot." SEIU's Carole Travis, who already knew Barack from their dinners with Bill Ayers, Bernardine Dohrn, and Mona and Rashid Khalidi, saw the same thing: "a lot of women found Barack attractive and were after Barack." But "there was never any sense at all that he was cheating," Carole explained, and it was "very unusual," as one lobbyist euphemistically put it, that Barack "did not participate in Springfield activities."<sup>37</sup>

One Wednesday night in mid-April a trio of business lobbyists—Phil Lackman from the Independent Insurance Agents of Illinois, Dave Manning of the Community Bankers Association, and African American Mike Lieteau of AT&T—invited Barack and fellow freshman Terry Link, plus newly arrived senator Larry Walsh, the Will County Democratic chairman, to join them for dinner, followed by poker at Panther Creek Country Club. Walsh, a lifelong farmer, had arrived in Springfield just a week earlier after appointing himself to a newly vacant seat whose prior occupant had resigned to take a judgeship. Walsh already knew Lake County party chairman Link, a rare legislative teetotaler, and outgoing lobbyists like Lackman and Manning, both of whom were Panther Creek members, were always looking to get to know new senators. Playing cards in the country club's bar, with the Chicago Bulls game against the Miami Heat on the large-screen TV, the group of six was an ideal size for poker, and they had "a great time" until about midnight. They agreed to reconvene the next week, and for the balance of the spring session each Wednesday night they gathered out at Panther Creek.

"There was no shop talk allowed" at these gatherings, Link explained; "nobody talked about their jobs or politics." They played "low-stakes poker: a dollar stake, three-dollar top raise." Someone might win or lose $25 or $30 over the course of a night, but "on the whole it was a thousand laughs," Dave Manning recalled. Smoking was definitely allowed, but teasing humor was the center of the weekly gatherings. Barack was a cautious and careful card player "and would study and study" before making a move. "Barack, it's two bucks. Call, fold, or raise," Phil Lackman would tell him. "Barack enjoyed a couple of beers, he enjoyed a couple of Marlboro Reds," Phil remembered, and that Barack and Mike Lieteau were black was no issue. Lieteau, fourteen years Barack's senior at age fifty, had grown up in Englewood in a family of eight children, attending Catholic schools and then Northern Illinois University. Married to an African American psychiatrist and the father of two daughters, Lieteau lived in South Shore's Jackson Park Highlands enclave. He had begun lobbying for AT&T seven years earlier, and by May 1997 younger daughter Triste, already a graduate of Harvard Medical School, was about to join her sister Michelle as a fellow graduate of the University of Chicago Law School, where she had taken Racism and the Law and Con Law III with Barack.

“It seemed like we were accepted because we were more white” than other statehouse African Americans, Mike Lieteau said in explaining the easygoing biracial poker games. “Barack talked the King’s English,” as could Mike, but Barack “was never ghetto like me, ’cause I speak Ebonics too.” Lieteau had watched all spring as “Trotter and Hendon would just endlessly say, ‘yo mama’” to Barack, until eventually Mike asked, “Why don’t you say something?” and Barack replied, “I would be stooping to their level if I responded.”

Lieteau thought “they resented him because he was a very bright, intelligent person” who “brought his points across objectively rather than emotionally.” Barack “was more of an intellectual” and “was more comfortable with people who were of the same intellectual level” as himself. “It was a difference in culture,” for Barack “did not fit the stereotype of the typical African American legislator,” i.e., a lifelong Chicagoan. “They thought he was arrogant,” but Mike believed Barack “was not arrogant, he was confident,” even though at times it did appear as if Barack was asking himself, “Why am I here with these idiots?”

Lieteau “felt that Barack was more comfortable with Caucasians, or white people, than he was with ghetto black people,” but Lieteau quickly developed an ease of interaction with Barack that was unrivaled not only in Springfield but also with any other black friend. Mike recalled that during the Wednesday-night poker sessions, he humorously sought to knock the other players off their games. “I would try and disturb all of them,” he recounted, either by insisting that they “explain the game” when they shifted to some exotic type of poker or simply by holding his cards to irritate them. Barack would demand, “Either call or fold,” and Mike responded with ersatz anger: “I’ll playing my fucking game and you play yours!” His two favorite targets for teasing were Walsh and Obama. To Larry, “I would make comments about farmers,” such as saying “their first experience with sex was with an animal.” As expected, “Larry just got very, very angry,” declaring that “I’ve never fucked a chicken!” to which Mike replied, “Larry, anybody who responds like that had to fuck a chicken!” With Barack, the obvious target was his ears, which are “like Spock’s.” Barack “never cursed,” and “would never use bad language,” but one night Lieteau got him sufficiently riled that Barack called Mike an “anvil head motherfucker,” which Mike said was accurate because “my head was like an anvil.” But Mike replied, “Barack, you can’t even say motherfucker right. . . . You sound just like a fuckin’ white boy!”

Mike and Barack’s easy friendship had understandable limits. With Lieteau representing AT&T, and with Barack being “very consumer-oriented,” he seldom voted with Lieteau. Barack was also a stickler for refusing to accept anything of value from lobbyists. “You couldn’t buy him a Coke,” one progressive lobbyist recalled, and the first time Barack had dinner with Mike, he asked, “What do I owe you?” Lieteau responded, “You don’t owe me anything,” but Barack objected, knowing that lobbyists filed comprehensive expenditure reports with the secretary of state’s office. “You can’t report me. What do I owe you? What is my share?” Mike also recalled Barack asking, “How much was that?” even if Mike handed him a can of soda. “This is how bad he was,” Mike recounted, but ten years later Barack would boast on national television, “I was famous in Springfield for not letting lobbyists even buy me lunch.”<sup>38</sup>

Black lobbyist Ray Harris had warned Barack that as a Democratic rookie, “you’re going to have a lot of time on your hands” even during the Senate’s busiest weeks, given Republicans’ legislative dominance. Many afternoons the day’s work, whether in committee or on the floor, was over by 2:30 P.M.

Terry Link was “an avid golfer,” and Barack already appreciated that in Illinois politics “an awful lot happens on the golf course,” as he told his friend Jean Rudd. Springfield offered The Rail, an eighteen-hole public course just north of town that had been designed by the famous Robert Trent Jones Sr., and on weekday afternoons, the fee was just $19 for all you could play, fellow black Democrat James Clayborne remembered. Barack was happy to skip out along with Link, but “when he first started, you couldn’t call him a golfer. He left a lot to be desired,” Terry recalled. Clayborne and lobbyist Dave Manning sometimes joined them, and Barack also played with Poverty Law Project lobbyist John Bouman, Illinois progressives’ lead representative on the federally mandated welfare law changes Barack was so concerned about. He was “pretty much a beginner,” Bouman recalled, but by late spring Barack had also recruited Dan Shomon, the high-energy staffer whose assistance he had lobbied for, to take up golf as well.

Shomon’s savvy paid off almost immediately when he asked his next-door neighbor, Dave Heckelman, a reporter for the Chicago Daily Law Bulletin, the newspaper read by most of the city’s lawyers, to write a profile of Barack. Heckelman asked Barack about Dreams From My Father and his father, and Barack said, “I suspect that part of my interest in politics, and a particular brand of politics, can be traced back to who he was and what he wanted.” For example, Barack believed the tribal rivalries that hindered his father’s career in Kenya illustrated that “race and ethnicity can be a destructive force in politics.” Barack also said he was very interested in juvenile justice issues, and that tax credits for investors who developed low-income housing, something he had worked on at Miner Barnhill, was “an example of a smart policy.” Rejecting the notion that all politics is dirty, Barack mistakenly asserted that “I would argue that Martin Luther King was essentially a politician.”

Heckelman asked two of Barack’s Judiciary Committee Republican colleagues about him, and both praised him. “He asks very intelligent questions, he has an in-depth understanding of the law, and I think he’s going to make a top-notch senator,” chairman Carl Hawkinson said. Barack had made “an extremely positive” impression, Kirk Dillard added, and “is a tremendous addition to the Judiciary Committee and to the Senate as a whole.” Longtime booster Newton Minow predicted that “he’s going places.”

Shomon was understandably proud of the story and tried to introduce Barack more widely around town. Ed Wojcicki, the publisher of Illinois Issues, a monthly politics and public policy magazine that was a must-read for state politicians, talked with Barack about life in the capitol. “I was expecting to come down here to Springfield and engage in serious debates about the big issues of the day . . .,” Ed recounted Barack complaining to him. “But those discussions aren’t happening around here, and nobody seems interested. Am I missing something, or is this just the way it is?” Barack was also exasperated that statehouse reporters displayed little interest in major policy issues. “Ed, why don’t we organize a meeting for all the reporters who work down here, and I just want to talk to them about why they’re not covering my issues,” Barack suggested. Wojcicki replied, “If you try to set up a meeting like that, they’re not going to come. They’re not going to have that conversation with a public official like you. It’s just not what they do.” Barack found that “very frustrating,” just like he reluctantly grasped Wojcicki’s argument that “with leadership like Pate Philip,” being in the minority meant “you don’t really have much of a chance” to advance any meaningful priorities.

Friends far and wide sensed Barack’s disappointment. Democratic campaign consultant Eric Adelstein, who had first met Barack during Project VOTE!, remembered seeing Barack “coming back to the Renaissance” one night looking like “a guy who was not wanting to be in Springfield.” Even with legislative license plates, the drive between Chicago and Springfield was a boring three hours plus, and although cell phone coverage was spotty in places, Barack called his district office staffer Cynthia Miller and friends like Rob Fisher, Tom Johnson, and Scott Turow during his Thursday drives back to Chicago and vented about the statehouse. “He was very disappointed,” Cynthia recalled, especially with “the in-house fighting and the jealousies” he was encountering from colleagues like Hendon and Trotter. Rob remembered Barack explaining that 90 percent of state politics involved fairly technical issues of interest to some small group but to no one else. To Tom, Barack joked about another senator’s suggestion about what kind of extracurricular nightlife he might enjoy. Turow recalled Barack saying that the Senate “is different than I thought it would be,” and it was clear that “he was having a hard time adjusting to Springfield.”<sup>39</sup>

The legislature’s annual House-Senate softball game took place on Tuesday evening, April 29. Senate announcer Adeline Geo-Karis said Barack “was fleet of foot, and he looked good in uniform,” but other colleagues recalled that Barack’s skills on the diamond were minimal, with Senate team manager Frank Watson saying “he was terrible.” Back on the floor, the Senate unanimously passed a House bill about drug counseling for which Barack was the lead sponsor, and when another “partial-birth” abortion ban measure returned to the Senate floor, Barack again voted “present,” just as he had in committee a week earlier.

That evening Chicago mayor Richard Daley, who was in Springfield to join Republican governor Jim Edgar in seeking more state funding for public schools despite Senate Republicans’ reluctance to raise taxes, sponsored a “Taste of Chicago” reception featuring rib sandwiches, ice cream, and cheesecake plus the Lonnie Brooks Blues Band. A line of people gathered to meet and greet Mayor Daley, and Democratic Judiciary Committee staffer Mike Marrs remembered Barack being right behind him. “He introduced himself and posed for a picture with the mayor. I remember hanging back to watch,” since Barack indicated he had not previously met Daley.

In the spring session’s final days, Barack reluctantly supported a bill authorizing civil commitment hearings for sex offenders whose prison terms were ending. He spoke in favor of a measure allowing state candidates’ campaign disclosure reports to be put on the Internet. “There has been a lot of talk about campaign finance reform during the course of this session,” with Senate Republicans naming a task force to study the issue rather than take up meaningful House-passed bills, but this “modest” measure, by making the reports “easily accessible,” would help “restore people’s confidence that in fact we are doing the people’s business and not simply the lobbyists’ business.” Governor Edgar’s education funding proposal passed the House and was supported in the Senate by Democrats plus a small handful of Republicans, but with a majority of his Republican caucus firmly opposed to a 25 percent state income tax increase, Pate Philip refused to call the bill for a floor vote.

On Saturday, May 31, the session’s final day, the Senate finally moved toward passage of the state-level welfare reform proposal that Edgar had put forward in late April in response to the soon-to-be-implemented changes in federal law. Public Health and Welfare Committee chairman Dave Syverson rose to introduce a lengthy agreed-upon amendment and to “thank Senator Obama for the hours of time that he spent with us in trying to work out a plan that is acceptable and workable.” Barack’s biggest success was a $30 million increase, to $100 million, in new state funding for subsidized day care, though he failed to win similar support for job training programs. Barack then spoke at greater length than he had at any time that spring. HB 204 was “a huge bill that hasn’t received too much attention,” but “this may be as important a bill as we pass in this session. It will affect a huge number of people.” Barack said “I probably would not have supported the federal legislation” that President Clinton had signed into law nine months earlier, and HB 204 was not a complete response. “I want to emphasize that I continue to have concerns, and I think that those concerns are going to have to be dealt with over the coming months and the coming years.” Uppermost was the availability of job training for people lacking employment skills, and a close second was the Illinois program’s exclusion of legal immigrants. “I don’t like the notion that those people who are here legally, contributing to our society, paying taxes, are not subject to the same benefits, the same social safety net that the rest of us are.” Third—as Barack’s modest SB 755, now on the governor’s desk, would mandate—was a university study of the impact of all the changes on recipients of what would now be called Temporary Assistance to Needy Families.

Barack then recounted a personal experience, confessing that late one night the previous weekend he had been smoking a cigar on his condominium’s back porch, which overlooked an alleyway in which men often collected recyclable cans. “What I saw that evening was an entire family, at midnight. A man with a shopping cart, behind him a mother pushing a baby cart, baby inside, at midnight. This was their visible means of support. This is the job that awaited them if they weren’t on welfare. We have an obligation to the family. We have an obligation to that child.”

Subsequent speakers like moderate Republican Kathy Parker also thanked Barack for his work, and with only Miguel del Valle voting no, the Senate passed the measure by a vote of 56–1–1. Early Sunday morning the House did as well, but in Sunday’s news stories, Barack stressed that “it’s vital for us to see what we can do within our budget to make sure” the roughly twenty-two thousand legal immigrants in Illinois whose AFDC assistance was ending on July 1 were somehow protected by the state. Welfare recipients “generally are not represented down here in Springfield,” Barack drily told one reporter. “They don’t have powerful lobbies. They do not contribute to our political candidates.”<sup>40</sup>

Unhappy senators voted 49–9, with Barack in the minority, to approve the state’s 1998 budget only minutes after receiving copies of the huge final bill. In his Hyde Park Herald column, Barack wrote that “this session will largely be remembered for what it failed to accomplish” because legislators “dropped the ball on issues that are critical.” Senate Republicans’ failure to pass Edgar’s Democratic-backed education funding reform was the greatest disappointment, because, Barack noted, the final budget bill “actually increased the percentage of state dollars going to the wealthiest school districts.” That was why “I chose to vote against the budget.” Barack also complained about Senate Republicans’ refusal to call a vote on a utility deregulation bill that would reduce residential rates by up to 15 percent. On welfare reform, “I spent a good deal of time this spring negotiating with the Governor’s office and Senate Republicans to come up with a welfare reform plan that would truly move people into jobs. To a large degree we were successful,” particularly with increased day-care funding plus $10 million for elderly and disabled legal immigrants who would lose their Supplemental Security Income due to the federal reforms.

On the Judiciary Committee, Barack and Democratic staffer Gideon Baum had spent considerable time working with Republicans on a comprehensive, three-hundred-page Juvenile Justice Reform Act that might pass during the Senate’s brief “veto session” in the fall. “The vast majority of juvenile offenders are functional illiterates,” Barack told the Chicago Defender’s Chinta Strausberg, “high school dropouts who don’t feel comfortable in terms of succeeding in the marketplace or in school.” That meant “we have to put together prevention programs that work.”

Barack told Herald readers that “I remain optimistic and enthusiastic,” but to another community newspaper he admitted being “disappointed that partisan bickering led by Republicans hurt our school children.” His voting record registered 100 percent on “party support” as well as with the American Civil Liberties Union, and his personal scorecard showed that three Senate bills Barack had introduced would be signed into law: his community college student directory, the welfare impact study mandate, and the municipal administrative hearings measure. He told the Chicago Daily Law Bulletin’s Dave Heckelman that the latter measure would “make sure that the courts don’t get clogged up with a lot of small cases involving quality-of-life issues that can better be handled in an adjudicative setting.”

Barack told Illinois Issues that the hurried, last-minute passage of a state budget bill no one had had time to read symbolized “the major flaws” in Illinois’s legislative process. He cited Wisconsin and Minnesota as superior examples. “Those states have a strong tradition of progressive politics. State government is a leader in making things happen in the state. Illinois is more of a forum for dividing up the spoils and cutting deals. For me, at least, it doesn’t make sense to be here just to bring in a few pork projects for my district. The reason we are here should be to develop policies that help people, that make this state a more promising place for our children to live. And if you’re not possessed of that passion or vision, then you shouldn’t be here.”

A few years later, Barack recalled that “I was surprised” during that first spring session “at the degree to which lobbyists, particularly for monied interests, had influence over the details of the legislative process. People probably overestimate the power of lobbyists and special interests on big, well-publicized issues . . . but probably nine-tenths of the legislation that we deal with is highly technical, unspectacular issues that affect people in ways that aren’t immediately apparent,” just as Barack had told Rob Fisher that spring. “It’s those kinds of issues where lobbyists exert a great deal of control,” because “they have the capacity to sustain their position down there because they’re paying attention to it and nobody else is, and they’re better informed about the issue than anyone else is.”

Barack had also come to realize “how little the public pays attention to Springfield.” Chicagoans focused on city and national politics, “but they have very little awareness of state government.” Ironically, that “makes life easier on a lot of legislators here in Chicago because, as long as they don’t involve themselves in a scandal, it’s very hard for a challenger to mount a challenge against an incumbent legislator.” On the other hand, “you don’t have the court of public opinion to appeal to because nobody’s listening to you . . . and for me that’s frustrating I think because there are often times where I’m in debates in Springfield where my opponents will acknowledge that my position is the right one, at least privately, but there’s nothing that I can do to change their votes.”<sup>41</sup>

Barack’s modest campaign fund allowed him to supplement the $47,000 in state Senate funds allocated for his district office and staff with modest additional payments to Cynthia Miller, U of C grad student Will Burns, and his 1995–96 campaign staffers Carol Harwell and Ron Davis for small amounts of their time, but the only donors who contributed as much as $1,000 to him were a trio of labor unions—AFSCME, SEIU, and the Chicago Teachers Union—plus regular benefactor John Schmidt, with Tony Rezko’s companies topping the chart at $2,000. Barack was unaware that Rezko simultaneously was failing for weeks at a time to provide heat to tenants of buildings like 7000 South Sangamon Street in Englewood that were owned by his Rezmar Corp. Lawsuits filed against Rezmar by the city drew no public attention.

Prior to the session's end, Dan Shomon told Barack, "You need to see the rest of the state," one that stretched more than two hundred miles farther south from Springfield. When Barack asked why, Dan said, "you have to vote on bills for all of Illinois" and "you need to see how people vote in southern Illinois and what the issues are." The two southernmost state Senate districts were represented by a pair of white Democrats who were sometimes jokingly called "the coal brothers," because coal mining had long been an economic linchpin for the counties that sat just above the Ohio River to the east and the Mississippi River to the west. Senator Jim Rea of Christopher held a fund-raiser late each July at the Rend Lake Golf Course just north of Benton, and once Barack agreed to a weeklong road trip, Shomon told him to pack just khakis and polo shirts and planned an itinerary.

Taking Barack's Jeep Cherokee and their golf clubs, they visited Chester on the Mississippi; Metropolis—population six thousand—on the Ohio; Du Quoin, which hosted the southern Illinois state fair; plus Mt. Vernon and the appropriately named Carbondale. "It was really a great week," Shomon recalled, even with the heat and humidity, and Barack was able to talk with Democratic activists like lawyer John Clemons and farmers Steve and Kappy Scates. When Barack one day asked for Dijon mustard at a TGI Friday's, Shomon lamented his big-city tastes, but Jim Rea remembered that Barack "made a great impression" at the Rend Lake golf tournament. "We had a fabulous turnout," including fellow senators Bruce Farley from Chicago and James Clayborne from Metro East.

Farley, one of the Senate's most popular characters, teased Barack and Clayborne about having to protect them, a joking allusion to the "Little Egypt" region's longtime reputation for virulent racism and "sundown towns." But Shomon recalled that "the whole trip was great," and Barack "had a great time." Barack remembered how white southern Illinoisans seemed "completely familiar to me" because "they were all like my grandparents." Shomon thought "it was really a revelation to him that he had a lot of appeal as a politician" to people in such an unlikely locale.<sup>42</sup>

In mid-June, a lengthy criminal trial got under way in federal court in Springfield, but only at the end of July, when Jim Edgar took the stand, did national newspapers like the New York Times pay any attention. On trial were a pair of businessmen who had contributed more than $270,000 to Edgar's gubernatorial campaigns and then had received a $7 million contract for their company, Management Services of Illinois (MSI), from the state Department of Public Aid, whose officials they had plied with extravagant gifts. Edgar testified that he knew nothing about the contract, even though MSI had been his largest contributor during his 1994 reelection race. The Times noted what it called Illinois's "regular intertwining of campaign finance and government business," and on Saturday, August 16, both defendants were convicted. The Chicago Tribune said the case had "rekindled debate about reforming the state's campaign finance" laws and represented "an ominous warning to the capital city's government and political community."

Then, just four days later, Jim Edgar announced that he would not run for a third term as governor or challenge Senator Carol Moseley Braun, whose time in Washington had been plagued by controversies. The Washington Post stated that the MSI verdict had "cast a cloud over his administration," while the New York Times cited how the "immensely popular" governor had suffered "a bruising legislative defeat for his education financing reform package” months earlier from Senate Republicans. In Springfield, most Republicans were privately ecstatic because the “cool and aloof” Edgar had endorsed Secretary of State George Ryan, a former House Speaker, as his designated successor. “Ryan’s down-to-earth demeanor and willingness to deal and compromise,” the Chicago Tribune reported, promised to make him a far more effective governor than the standoffish Edgar.

Even before the MSI verdicts, Mike Lawrence, Edgar’s former press secretary and a longtime Illinois newsman, had been preparing a proposal for the Joyce Foundation’s Larry Hansen to extend the campaign finance reform effort that retired U.S. senator Paul Simon had cochaired six months earlier. Far more influential than his press secretary title might suggest, Lawrence had left the Edgar administration in midsummer to join Simon at Southern Illinois University’s Public Policy Institute. The MSI prosecution had begun with a letter to Lawrence from an anonymous whistleblower, and Simon’s earlier task force had “highlighted anew the question of whether law-making in Illinois is for sale.” Lawrence had already enlisted the support of the League of Women Voters and the newly rejuvenated Illinois chapter of Common Cause, which had named canny, high-energy radio newsman Jim Howard as its new executive director just months earlier.

Lawrence said the new effort would “work with representatives of the governor’s office and all four legislative caucuses to . . . help them find common ground” on reform proposals. All five chiefs of staff had agreed to cooperate with the bipartisan Simon-Lawrence duo, and the legislative chiefs pledged to “identify lawmakers who are sincerely interested in reform and enjoy the confidence of their caucus leadership.” But Lawrence told Joyce that although “many officeholders and their staffs perceive they must do something to avoid even more animosity toward incumbents” from voters, “legislative leaders are not excited about curbing their ability to fund the campaigns of their members because . . . vital re-election support helps keep their members in line.” But with the MSI convictions highlighting “the relationship between state contracts and contributors,” Lawrence hoped to build a consensus among the four caucuses’ representatives plus “a commitment to pursue legislation embodying that consensus.” A few weeks later, even House Speaker Michael Madigan stated that “action should be taken to eliminate the gravy train in Springfield,” but campaign finance expert Kent Redfield said, “I just think the chances of something passing the legislature until after the 1998 election is zero.”<sup>43</sup>

In late August, Barack spoke at Robeson High School in his district’s Englewood neighborhood and praised a restructuring intended to provide “focused, individual attention,” since “that’s what students need here.” He stressed that “we have to see concrete improvement in student achievement, not for the school, not for the principal and the teacher but for the students themselves. If they want to succeed in a global, technological society such as ours, they are going to have to be able to read, write and compute and understand the sciences at a higher level.” The Chicago Annenberg Challenge reached the midpoint of its five years in mid-1997, just as the board made its largest allocation of dollars to date. Notable was a grant of $750,000 to Bill Ayers’s close friend and UIC colleague Michael Klonsky’s Small Schools Network, which had requested only $270,000 and was also receiving $337,000 that the Joyce Foundation’s board had approved in late July. As CAC board chair, Barack met with CPS CEO Paul Vallas and school board president Gery Chico to discuss a possible “Public Education Fund” that could boost CAC’s efforts by generating additional matching funds, and Joyce allocated $771,000 to the Consortium on Chicago School Research, which was evaluating the impact of CAC’s grants.

Barack's Senate post had him speaking to small gatherings such as the Hyde Park Chamber of Commerce and the Park Manor Neighbors Community Council, but he still had time to attend the second Saguaro Seminar gathering in Boston. The next evening he and Michelle had dinner at the home of Northwestern Law School's Bob Bennett, who had hosted them in Italy. Barack and Michelle also made a weekend visit to Washington, D.C., staying with old friend Rob Fisher and his wife Lisa and having an early dinner at a highly regarded restaurant just east of the White House. Michelle and Lisa enjoyed teasing their husbands "about having big heads and that they were lucky that they had us around so they wouldn't get so big," Lisa laughingly recalled. Rob remembered that after dinner, Barack "had some really nice cigars," and with both men attired in olive suits and sporting sunglasses, the two couples strolled by the White House, with the women purposely staying behind. "We're not walking next to you! You are too ridiculous!" Michelle declared. "Two weirdos in olive suits smoking cigars with sunglasses on!"

Back in Chicago, Barack had breakfast one morning with Charles Halpern, president of the Nathan Cummings Foundation, and his colleague Stephen Heintz, who were launching a new public policy think tank and were looking to recruit a diverse board. Joyce Foundation president Debbie Leff had recommended Barack to Halpern, and he recalled being "extremely impressed" with Barack, who he thought had "this quality of presence—how grounded, focused, and centered he was." Heintz felt similarly and said they had a "fabulous conversation" during which Barack consented to join their nascent board.

That summer, Barack also agreed to become chairman of the Woods Fund's board, as the foundation moved to focus its community organizing grants on "issues that require city-wide, state-wide or national attention," including "reforms in the juvenile justice system." In the Chicago Defender, Barack advocated a complete overhaul of political fund-raising. Democrats Bill Clinton and Al Gore have "raised huge sums of money the same way most Republicans did, by appealing to the various special interest lobbyists," Barack observed, but "everyone recognizes that the system is broken and . . . I think the public wants the system fixed, which will require some form of public financing" of campaigns. That "would be an incentive for candidates to run without reaching out to the special interest groups."

On September 29, classes began at the U of C law school. Barack's Racism and the Law drew twenty-five students and remained unchanged from prior years, although Barack did add two new readings at the end of the quarter. Michael Lind's "The End of the Rainbow" appeared in the September–October issue of Mother Jones magazine, and "Affirmative Action's Vortex" was a chapter from Paul M. Sniderman and Edward G. Carmines's new Reaching Beyond Race, which a Washington Post essay had highlighted the weekend Barack and Michelle were visiting Rob and Lisa Fisher. The Post said the political scientists' findings were "very bad news for supporters of affirmative action as well as the Democratic party" because they indicated a pressing need to "return to color blind policies that appeal to America's sense of fairness and historical commitment to equality." In the chapter Barack assigned to his students, Sniderman and Carmines argued that affirmative action "represents a dilemma for liberalism," because "even as many liberals reject affirmative action as a violation of fairness, it has come to symbolize the very commitment to fairness for many others. The liberal, Democratic coalition . . . is thus in danger of being politically damned if it continues its commitment to affirmative action, and damned if it does not." They also contended that "the idea that class-based affirmative action provides a way out is an illusion," the same argument Barack's student Chapin Cimino had developed in her now-published paper for him the previous fall.

Barack's Con Law III attracted fifty-eight students, and to accommodate the upcoming Senate veto session in late October and mid-November, Barack arranged for it to meet on most but not all Mondays, Tuesdays, and Fridays. He began the course by asking students "what do we mean by equality?" and threw out a basketball hypothetical including the possibility that "no white men under 6'5" can play," one careful notetaker recorded. Then, beginning with the Constitution, the next eight class meetings traced the U.S. Supreme Court's race cases from Johnson v. M'Intosh (1823) and Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857), through the post-Civil War era, with Barack telling his students that Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) would "prove to be as pernicious as Dred Scott." Considering that McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents (1950) went "most of the way" toward holding that segregated schooling was unconstitutional, Barack asked students whether four years later "is Brown anything new?" He characterized Brown v. Board of Education (1954) as a "rare case of when the Supreme Court gets out ahead of society," and since "the Court is political and needed support," Barack questioned why the justices confronted school segregation before addressing voting rights. After Brown II in 1955, Barack asked "what are courts supposed to do with 'all deliberate speed'?" and "what is the mandate from the Brown II Court?" He challenged students to consider Justice Clarence Thomas's powerful critique of Brown's implicit assumption that absent racial integration, black students were incapable of attaining educational parity with whites. By the 1970s, the Court was "looking at equality, not integration."

Then the course's equal protection focus shifted to the familiar standards of "rational basis" and "strict scrutiny" before devoting three classes to the Court's gender discrimination cases. The final third of the quarter tackled substantive due process, with Barack unsurprisingly asking, "Why is travel a fundamental right, but education is not?" When they reached the Court's abortion cases, Barack asked, "should viability be the drawing line?" as the Court repeatedly had held, and how would students apply Planned Parenthood v. Casey's (1992) opaque "undue burden" standard? He also challenged the class to consider William Rehnquist and Antonin Scalia's contention that Roe v. Wade (1973) should not have constitutionalized a right to abortion in the first place.

Michael Risch, a careful 3L notetaker (and a future law professor), remembered Barack as "a prepared, engaged teacher who led very good discussions" and made sure all sides were aired. "I would not have been able to guess his personal viewpoints from the way he taught." Andrew Trask, also a 3L, agreed that Barack "was just as likely to probe the logic of an argument he likely agreed with as one he did not," and always gave "students who did not share his likely viewpoint a fair hearing," such as when he "let an outspoken conservative student critique an affirmative action case" and himself pointed out "where the critique had particular strength."

At the end of autumn, student evaluations gave Barack a respectable 8.92 on UCLS's 10-point scale in the Race class, but an unusually low 7.84 in Con Law III, with 7.27 for "guiding and controlling discussion." The Con Law III final exam posed two questions, one about cloning and the other about a school district creating a boys-only Afrocentric academy, and answers could not total more than fifty-two hundred words. After grading the exams, Barack sent students a seventeen-page, single-spaced discussion of the best answers. "It might be argued that the moral judgments at issue with respect to cloning are far more profound than the moral questions involved in consensual sodomy," Barack wrote. "A slim majority of you favored" the boys-only school, he told them, "based on a justifiable skepticism in the prospect of truly integrated schools and an equally justified concern over the desperate condition of many inner city schools.”<sup>44</sup>

In October, Auma, her husband Ian Manners, and their five-month-old daughter Akinyi visited Chicago for a week and stayed with Barack and Michelle at East View. Maya, who had finished her master’s degree in education at NYU a few months earlier and was working at an experimental middle school on Manhattan’s Lower East Side, was there too, and Auma and her family also got to see Craig and Janis Robinson and their two young children. Barack played several rounds of golf with Ian at the nearby Jackson Park course, but the beginning of veto session loomed.

Barack hoped that the long-pending Juvenile Justice Reform Act could be improved, telling reporters, “what we haven’t addressed in this bill is the preventative side that prevents kids from getting into the system in the first place . . . we can’t just write off these kids at 14, 15, 16.” The Senate’s consideration of campaign finance reform would wait until the spring, but Barack emphasized that Illinois needed to authorize state matching funds for federally supported health care for uninsured children.

In early November, there was joyful news at East View: after more than a year of trying, Michelle was pregnant. Yvonne Davila, one of Michelle’s closest friends from their time together in the mayor’s office, knew that it had been “hard for her to get pregnant” and remembered Michelle showing up at her front door with the good news. Barack was busy gathering the petition signatures he needed so he could appear on the uncontested March 1998 primary ballot. He and U of C grad student Will Burns competed to see who could get the most signatures. Barack would face Yesse Yehudah, a little-known Republican candidate, in the subsequent general election. The Hyde Park Herald reported that Yehudah was chosen “solely because of his unusual sounding name” in the hope of creating “voter confusion when confronted by the choice of Obama versus Yehudah.”

Barack also was distracted by local and statehouse political tussles. In a Chicago Reader story chronicling the demise of IVI-IPO, Barack stated that “What it means to be an independent or progressive is less clear today than in the past . . . during the years of the Daley Machine.” But when he saw his comments in print, he immediately sent a letter to the editor declaring that “we continue to need strong, independent grassroots organizations.” In Springfield, the final week of veto session was marked by intense disagreements over lame-duck governor Edgar’s long-stalled education funding reforms. Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller reported that “Several Senate Democrats said they couldn’t remember a more raucous caucus than yesterday’s knock-down-drag-out fight over school funding,” noting that the twenty-eight senators split seven yes and eleven no, with ten abstaining, in one private vote. The next day the Senate but not the House passed the funding bill, and Edgar called a one-day special session for December 2 so Chicago Democrats who supported his plan could pressure recalcitrant House members to approve it.

Barack announced that in January he would introduce a proposed amendment to the Illinois Constitution guaranteeing health care coverage for all state residents, and he and Michelle teamed up to organize a University of Chicago panel to discuss the need for juvenile justice reform based on a newly published book by Bill Ayers. Bill had developed a strong interest in the subject as a result of his wife Bernardine Dohrn’s work directing Northwestern Law School’s Children and Family Justice Center, and Bill’s book, A Kind and Just Parent: The Children of Juvenile Court, like the Center, focused on the local Cook County Juvenile Court. Written in a conversational style, the book included a description of Hyde Park stating that “our neighbors include Muhammad Ali, former mayor Eugene Sawyer, poets Gwendolyn Brooks and Elizabeth Alexander, and writer Barack Obama. Minister Louis Farrakhan lives a block from our home and adds, we think, a unique dimension to the idea of ‘safe neighborhood watch.’”

At the November 20 U of C event, “Juvenile Justice: Predators or Children,” Bill read from his book before Barack, his law school colleague Randolph Stone, two teachers from the Cook County Temporary Detention Center, and a former offender who had spent seven years at that Center offered their comments. Bill made clear his stance that “We should call a child a child. A 13-year-old who picks up a gun isn’t suddenly an adult.” Barack shared Bill’s view that the legal system treated too many juveniles as adults, telling the Defender that “the current bill unnecessarily incarcerates nonviolent offenders.” Barack also publicly recommended Bill’s book, telling the Chicago Tribune it was “a searing and timely account of the juvenile court system, and the courageous individuals who rescue hope from despair.”<sup>45</sup>

For the third Saguaro gathering, Barack had an easy drive to Indianapolis, where Mayor Stephen Goldsmith hosted the event, but in Illinois, momentum began to build to consider campaign finance reform during the legislature’s upcoming spring session. The Joyce Foundation and Southern Illinois University, the institutional home of former U.S. senator Paul Simon and his now-deputy Mike Lawrence, agreed to put a combined $100,000 behind “Making Campaign Finance Reform Happen.” With that funding, the widely respected Lawrence spoke with the chiefs of staff to all four legislative leaders, starting with Senate Republicans’ Carter Hendren, and had them ask that their bosses select a caucus member to take part in such a working group. “I would appreciate it if you didn’t give me a hotdog” eager for press coverage, Lawrence said, because he hoped to build consensus behind closed doors before going public with any specifics.

Not by coincidence, Simon’s longtime friend Ab Mikva, the now-retired federal appellate judge who had served alongside Simon three decades earlier in Springfield, called Emil Jones and suggested that Jones name Barack as the Senate Democrats’ representative. Almost a year had passed since Barack first asked Jones to give him “tough assignments,” and Barack immediately said “sure” when Jones followed through on Mikva’s suggestion. Senate Republicans named Barack’s Judiciary Committee colleague Kirk Dillard, a former Edgar aide who was also close to Pate Philip, the most crucial of the Four Tops, to represent them. House Republicans chose Jack Kubik, a Cook County suburbanite who already had announced he would leave the legislature after 1998 and whom Illinois Common Cause executive director Jim Howard thought was “hugely trusted and respected on both sides of the aisle.” House Speaker Michael Madigan selected Gary Hannig, a trusted deputy from rural Montgomery County, south of Springfield. As Howard explained, “Gary was Mike Madigan.” Lawrence and Dillard knew each other from the Edgar administration, and a few months later Lawrence would remark that Barack, like Kirk, “was viewed as a rising star,” but Dillard and Carter Hendren wondered if Emil Jones’s selection of someone as junior as Barack meant “the Democrats really didn’t think it was going to go anywhere.”

But Barack’s interest was sincere, and he devoted his last Hyde Park Herald column of 1997 to advocating “a tough gift ban prohibiting legislators and top state officials from receiving anything of value from someone who does business or lobbies with the state.” Barack also called for “a shorter campaign season” by moving Illinois’s primary elections from March to May or September.

Over the holidays, Barack and Michelle made their annual trip to Honolulu to see Madelyn Dunham, who was now seventy-five years old. During the fall, Madelyn had been one of Barack’s top five campaign contributors, with her $1,000 equaling a Teamsters Union local plus two well-known Illinois donors, Irving Harris and Lewis Manilow, and topped only by Tony Rezko, who gave a total of $4,500. Right after New Year's, the law school's winter quarter began, with Barack's Voting Rights class drawing an unusually small enrollment of eleven, perhaps because it met early Monday mornings and late Friday afternoons. It was "such an intimate class," Indira Saladi remembered, and Felton Newell was impressed by "how well he knew the material." Students' grades were based on their twenty-plus-page papers, for which Barack met with them individually, and at the end of term Barack's overall teacher-evaluation score returned to an impressive 9.6 out of 10.<sup>46</sup>

Barack's primary concern in Springfield remained the Juvenile Justice Reform Act. He told the Defender that the updated, 310-page draft "still doesn't contain the kind of prevention strategies or mechanisms I think need to be more emphasized." He also explained that he was backing John Schmidt, who had been an important supporter ever since Project VOTE!, over black gubernatorial contender Roland Burris because Schmidt had sought his endorsement before Burris entered the race. Both men also faced conservative southern Illinois congressman Glenn Poshard for the opportunity to take on Republican consensus candidate George Ryan in the November general election. Asked by the Defender to address the burgeoning controversy over President Clinton's relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky, Obama "said it's too early to tell if Clinton should resign."

On January 29, Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Carl Hawkinson brought the Juvenile Justice Reform Act, on which he had worked for years and which the House had now overwhelmingly passed, to the Senate floor. The committee had approved the bill 9–0, with Barack voting present, the day before, and although Hawkinson expressly thanked Obama "for his work on the bill," he knew Barack would again vote present—a polite no—on the Senate floor. Barack explained his position in the lengthiest remarks he had made since arriving in the Senate a year earlier.

I think there are some wonderful things in this bill, and I think the basic principles underlying this bill are terrific. I think the notion that we should catch young people early and make sure that they understand that there are consequences to their actions is vital and critically important, particularly in urban areas. . . . I think the notion that we should get parents responsible for the actions of their children is vital.

But he had two particular concerns, number one being "the issue of prevention dollars to go with this program" so that young offenders could receive "the support services they need to get on the right track." Barack's second worry was that by authorizing concurrent juvenile and adult sentences, with the latter kicking in if the offender failed to successfully complete the former, the bill "will result in more incarcerations of young people" if insufficient assistance was available. "We should be able to make distinctions between those young people who are serious offenders and do need to be locked up, and those young people who can still be salvaged, still be saved," Barack emphasized. He feared Illinois would "continue down a path where our main strategy for dealing with juvenile crime is to lock kids up. That is an unsustainable, unconscionable approach. It is not smart in terms of crime fighting. It is not the kind of state I want to live in, where we are afraid of our children and we are continually building more prisons as opposed to building more schools." With only Rickey Hendon and Donne Trotter voting no, the Senate passed the bill 50–2, with three other Democrats joining Barack in voting present.<sup>47</sup>

On the campaign finance issue, Mike Lawrence in late January met privately with each of the four caucus designees as well as Jim Edgar's youthful deputy chief of staff, Andy Foster, who would represent the governor, before bringing the group together for its first meeting. Lawrence's initial conversation was with veteran House Democrat Gary Hannig, who recommended they start with the least controversial items, and Lawrence later explained, "I give Representative Hannig credit for the approach that we took." On the eve of that first session, Lawrence told Paul Simon that "Foster and the four legislators have expressed optimism that consensus can be reached on some reforms," such as banning fund-raising while the legislature was in session, strengthening disclosure laws, and prohibiting personal use of campaign funds. However, Lawrence believed "consensus will not be reached" on limiting the overall amounts of contributions or expenditures. In early February the group gathered for an initial discussion, and word of it quickly reached Capitol Fax's Rich Miller, who described the members as "widely respected legislators who should have the ability to convince their respective caucuses to accept their recommendations," including "up and coming state Sen. Barack Obama."

The fourth Saguaro Seminar meeting, on politics and civic engagement, took place in Los Angeles on February's second weekend. In Springfield, Barack introduced nine bills and the proposed constitutional amendment he had announced months earlier. The most notable of the bills would increase the standard individual tax exemption from $1,000 to $2,500 for families with incomes below $25,000, to $2,000 for ones between $25,000 and $50,000 and to $1,500 for those between $50,000 and $75,000. The next Monday Barack used the bill to make a modest press splash, describing his proposal as a modest corrective to how Illinois's state Constitution mandated a flat income tax rate—presently 3 percent—for everyone, regardless of income. Illinois "has one of the most regressive tax systems in the country," one "where a millionaire pays the same tax rate as a single parent who's making a minimum wage," Barack emphasized. The proposed amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 48, would add a new section, Universal Health Care Coverage, to the state Constitution's Bill of Rights: "Health care is an essential safeguard of human life and dignity, and there is an obligation for the State of Illinois to ensure that every person is able to realize this fundamental right. On or before May 31, 2002, the General Assembly by law shall enact a plan for universal health care coverage that permits everyone in Illinois to obtain decent health care on a regular basis."

Life in the capitol offered both levity and tragedy. Emil Jones, understandably displeased with how the Senate's Republican president treated him, found some humorous revenge when a stranger said he looked familiar and asked, "'Are you in politics?' 'I'm in the Senate,'" Jones replied. "What's your name?" the person asked. "Pate Philip," Jones shot back, delighted that at least one Illinoisan thought Pate Philip was a very dark-skinned African American. Far more unforgettable was the death of Decatur Democratic senator Penny Severns from breast cancer at age forty-six. Three years earlier Severns had been the Democratic nominee for lieutenant governor, and she had been hoping to run for secretary of state before her illness became publicly known in December. Although for eleven years she had represented the "conservative, working class, religious community" of Decatur, her constituents had not known that for five years Severns had been in a committed but deeply closeted relationship with a woman fourteen years her junior, former Associated Press Springfield bureau chief Terry Mutchler. Many people in the statehouse knew or suspected as much, and while Severns dreamed of being governor, she and Mutchler had to live "a life that we strove to kept hidden." On February 24 Barack joined Senate colleagues at Penny's funeral in Decatur.<sup>48</sup>

The Wednesday-night poker games from the year before resumed with gusto that spring, although they were now in the kitchen of the simple 7th Street house where Terry Link stayed. Mike Lieteau explained that “some of the senators had reservations about going out to Panther Creek” because they played with chips “right off the bar,” which was “a little too public” for anyone worried “that you could be exposed.” The weekly gatherings now included Republican senator Tom Walsh, from Chicago’s western suburbs; veteran Democratic senator Denny Jacobs, from western Illinois’s Quad Cities area; Illinois Manufacturers’ Association lobbyist Boro Reljic; and occasionally Mike Lieteau’s cousin Fred Fortier, who had become one of Senate Democrats’ two Judiciary Committee staffers. Tommy Walsh was a playful jokester, who added “a lot of fun to the group,” remembered unrelated Larry Walsh. Denny Jacobs was one of the Senate’s most outspoken members. Widely viewed as the father of Illinois’s 1990 Riverboat Gambling Act, Jacobs had never resigned himself to Emil Jones’s leadership of the Democratic caucus. An old-style politician, Jacobs’s blow-ups were legendary. ““They misquoted me in Peoria! They misquoted me in Peoria!”” Democratic staffer Cindy Huebner remembered him once screaming into a phone. “What did they say? ‘They said that I said this guy should be hung by his thumbs until he turns blue. I didn’t say that! I said he ought to be hung by his balls until he turns blue!’ He was furious.”

Tommy Walsh quickly realized that Barack and Mike were “good friends, and he took liberties with Mike that he didn’t take with anybody else.” Walsh also recognized what a politically significant trio Barack’s Democratic poker buddies were. Waukegan’s Terry Link had made the Lake County Democratic Party a significant presence in state politics, and Larry Walsh’s Will County Democrats, just like Denny Jacobs’s power base in the Quad Cities, represented major areas of Democratic strength outside Chicago’s Cook County. Although Barack “never made it real obvious that what he was doing was networking for the future,” Walsh explained, “being a friend of Terry Link’s was a good thing” for any Democrat who might run statewide in Illinois. Tommy would bring a pack of cigarettes to the game, have one or two, but otherwise make them available to Barack and Denny. Barack “wore the same thing to every card game”: a sweatshirt and sweatpants that “looked like pajamas,” so his workday clothes would not reek of smoke. Six-packs of beer abounded, and come 10:30 P.M. or so, they ordered two big pizzas. They usually adjourned at midnight because Larry Walsh went to mass every day at 7:00 A.M.

Everyone saw Barack as a conservative card player, who was never afraid to fold, but it “became a standing joke” that he would never admit he had lost money over the course of a night, even though he often did. “Maybe I broke even,” Barack would say as the others smirked. “The ego was that he could never lose,” Mike Lieteau explained, and when Barack did lose a hand, “I always remember him making a point of saying, ‘I played that hand right,’” Tommy Walsh recalled. “Yes sir, Senator, you played it like a champ!” Tommy teasingly replied. One night only Barack and Mike Lieteau remained in on a hand, with Barack insistently raising before Mike surprised everyone by winning. Barack “became more agitated” once he realized “he had lost all his money.” Barack was “legitimately annoyed,” for “Mike should never have been in that hand,” but Barack called Lieteau “an idiot” for having stayed in. Mike defused the moment by saying, “I may be an idiot, but I’m not the one leaving mad with no money,” forcing even Barack to laugh.

Even at the capitol, Mike could tease Barack in ways no one else did. Telecommunications bills were handled by the Energy and Environment Committee, and one morning Barack was listening to the policy arguments. Mike slid in beside him. “Why are you sittin’ in on grown folks’ conversations, brother?” he teasingly asked. A serious legislator indeed, “Barack wanted to actually hear the testimony,” Lieteau recalled.

By early 1998, the paperback edition of Dreams From My Father had been out for eighteen months, a common time frame for publishers to offload their remaining copies of poorly selling titles onto the “remainder” market. Brad Jonas owned three Chicago-area used-book stores, including one in Hyde Park, and he regularly purchased remaindered books. He had met Barack at his daughter’s Hyde Park school and had been highly impressed. Early in 1998 Jonas acquired the last four thousand copies of Kodansha Globe’s edition of Dreams for the grand sum of $900—22 cents a copy—and in early 1998 Dreams From My Father was suddenly more visible around Chicago than at any time since its initial publication in hardcover.

One bookstore browser who recognized the author’s name and bought a copy was Jim Reynolds Jr. Barack had begun playing pickup basketball every so often at the tony East Bank Club in River North in addition to Hyde Park, and Reynolds, an African American municipal bonds dealer, sometimes played there too. Reynolds had recently left Merrill Lynch to cofound his own firm, Loop Capital Markets. Seven years older than Barack, Reynolds had graduated from a South Side vocational high school before attending college in Wisconsin and taking his first job at Paine Webber. “You’re a pretty good writer,” Reynolds told Barack the next time he saw him. “I know I’m a good writer,” came the self-confident response.

“From that,” Reynolds said, “we became friends. We really just started talking a lot. Our careers were mirroring each other’s because I had just started Loop Capital” the same year Barack had entered elected office. “We actually started spending a lot of time together. We started playing basketball together on a planned basis. I used to go to Springfield a lot because of my business, and every time I went, I would call him, and I would usually use his office as my home base. So we just became very close friends, very close,” playing nine holes of golf every few weeks at the Jackson Park Golf Course just below Hyde Park. Over the next six years, no one else in Chicago, or anywhere in Illinois, would be a more pivotally helpful figure in Barack’s life than Jim Reynolds.<sup>49</sup>

In Springfield, Mike Lawrence’s campaign finance reform group met on successive Wednesday mornings. Paul Simon wrote and thanked the participants for their time, adding a handwritten note to Barack: “I also am enthusiastic about your political future!” Lawrence was increasingly confident that his group would agree to “bar use of campaign funds for personal benefit of candidate or his/her family, effective upon the bill becoming law,” as he told his participants in a memo asking them to assemble for a four-hour dinner meeting at the Renaissance on Tuesday, March 10. “The goal,” he wrote, “will be to come to agreement on a package” and “we then will refer our consensus legislation to staff for drafting.” In a subsequent memo to Senate Republican staffers Glenn Hodas and Peg Mosgers, who would write the bill, Lawrence explained that “the majority of those in our group believe the legislation should spell out as explicitly as possible what is not allowed.”

The legislature took a one-week break for the March 17 primaries, with Barack receiving all 16,792 Democratic votes cast, far more than upcoming Republican opponent Yesse Yehuda’s 401. But other results sent shock waves through Illinois politics. Conservative downstate congressman Glenn Poshard defeated African American former attorney general Roland Burris and Barack’s friend John Schmidt for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination with just 38 percent of the vote. In Chicago, progressive

Mexican-born state senator Chuy Garcia had faced an all-out challenge mounted by Mayor Richard Daley's increasingly muscular political machine. Daley, furious at Garcia's charges that the city was trying to gentrify the Little Village and Pilsen communities, had his top Latino operative marshal hundreds of organization loyalists against Garcia. A decade earlier Danny Solis had been Barack's UNO organizing colleague, but by 1996, Solis had built UNO into a major political force that backed the mayor. Daley had appointed Solis the 25th Ward's alderman when the seat became vacant, and Solis ally Tony Munoz, an otherwise unknown Chicago police officer, was slated against Garcia. Barack quietly had sent his hardest-working young supporter, Will Burns, and some other U of C youngsters to help Garcia, but on election night, Munoz and the Daley organization came out on top with 54 percent of the vote. The next morning Capital Fax observed that "Chicago state legislators will now fear Mayor Daley even more," and Garcia told the Chicago Reader that the city now had "a new type of machine, and the mayor is the chairman." Garcia's Senate colleague Miguel del Valle called Solis Daley's "mouthpiece," but Solis insisted, "I don't believe that I've sold out my philosophy of what I'd like to do for my community just because I am part of the Machine." Al Miller, Harold Washington's former press secretary, warned that "anytime anyone raises his head a little bit higher, the Daley folk want to knock it down." Hyde Park's decades of relative independence made it a unique exception to organization influence, but even a Hyde Park legislator had to be wary of drawing Daley's anger.<sup>50</sup>

Barack remained underwhelmed by the impact of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge, asking his board colleagues whether there was evidence of positive trends in student achievement. When legislators returned to Springfield, Capitol Fax reported that Lawrence's group was close to agreeing on "a sweeping campaign reform package," including a ban on personal use of campaign funds, but Lawrence knew that the crucial question was whether he and his good friend Carter Hendren, Pate Philip's chief of staff, could convince the Senate president to bring the agreed-upon package to a floor vote with his support. Even though the House had previously passed a broader bill, including a limit on the size of contributions, in private all four caucuses opposed such a ceiling, and everyone knew that passage by the House had occurred only because they were certain Philip would kill it in the Senate.

At the end of March Barack joined U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun, state representative Barbara Flynn Currie, and 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle in speaking at a memorial service for Hyde Park political activist Saul Mendelson, who two years earlier had been an outspoken critic of Alice Palmer's attempt to reclaim her Senate seat from Barack. On April 1, Barack resigned from the Senate's State Government Operations Committee because Emil Jones had named him to the slightly more interesting Revenue Committee. Republican chairman Bill Peterson found Barack to be "cordial, conscientious," and "easy to get along with," but poker buddy Denny Jacobs took a dimmer view once Barack joined the committee. "He began asking the witnesses four million questions," Jacobs recalled. "I leaned over and said, 'Hey, enough already! Learn on your own damn time, will you?'" Barack, fellow Democrat Pat Welch realized, "didn't really want to be on Revenue," because the committee's name was "a misnomer—it was a tax break committee, because every bill was to give somebody a tax break." Welch recalled that he and Barack often voted "no" together. When Welch cast a surprising "yes," Barack asked why. "That one helped my district, so I had to vote for it." "Oh," Barack lightheartedly responded. "So that's how this committee works." Jacobs disliked Revenue for a different reason, because "there's no money on Revenue." To "fund your campaigns," he explained, a senator had to be on "committees where you could at least ask for contributions.”

In mid-April The Economist, the internationally respected British news weekly, published a one-page account of life in Springfield written by an unnamed former capitol aide. Asserting that the statehouse has “a code of ethics that makes Capitol Hill resemble a convent,” the magazine reported that “one local journalist responded to a complaint that his newspaper had not exposed a state legislator’s activities by saying ‘If we cover one mistress, we’d have to cover all of them.’ Exposure of all could fill several newspapers each week,” The Economist stated. It added that while some legislators “are serious and hardworking, a great many others come to Springfield to have a good time.” Some drank on the floor, “and at least one has been said to carry cocaine in his briefcase.” In the evening, “bars fill up quickly. Sex among the legislators, married or single, is so common as to be invisible. Higher-ranking members can put their girlfriends on the payroll” and “in many offices . . . low-grade sexual byplay is the order of the day.” Capitol Fax frowned on the story, but then reported that legislators were nervous that the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was seeking access to logs of phone calls made from the floor of the House. “Calls to extramarital lovers could be detected,” publisher Rich Miller warned.

In mid-April Barack had to write a check for $13,329 to the IRS to cover the balance of the $41,872 in federal taxes he and Michelle owed on a combined 1997 income of $168,903—putting them in a 36 percent tax bracket. With Barack earning only a few thousand dollars now from Miner Barnhill, his $50,000-plus from the U of C law school plus his additional $48,000 from the state Senate and $11,000 from the Joyce Foundation topped Michelle’s $60,000-plus salary at the University of Chicago. Only briefly by phone did Barack take part in the inaugural New York meeting of Charles Halpern’s nascent new think tank, but he did hold two consecutive Saturday town hall meetings for constituents as well as an evening fund-raiser at a downtown Chicago hotel.

Five days before the fund-raiser, Barack’s top contributor, housing developer Tony Rezko, was featured in a Chicago Tribune story describing how he and his partner Dan Mahru’s Rezmar Corp., in addition to rehabbing mixed-income apartment buildings, was working with Barack’s former law firm colleague Allison Davis to begin building medium-priced town houses throughout Kenwood, the neighborhood just north of Hyde Park. Before long, Howard Stanback, whom Barack knew well dating back to the 1987–88 negotiations over the O’Brien Locks site, was working with Davis and Rezko too.<sup>51</sup>

For one of his occasional Hyde Park Herald columns, Barack summarized the spring 1998 session by reporting that the education bill approved months earlier “failed to tackle the structural inequities that arise between districts as a result of our state’s disproportionate reliance on local property taxes to fund education.” He had to reconcile himself with how at each of his town meetings, “constituents cite education as the single most important issue facing our district and the state as a whole.” In addition, “one of my top priorities” is “to curb the distorting effects of money on the political process,” especially because Illinois has “almost no rules at all regarding how much candidates can accept.” He predicted that the campaign finance reform proposal “will probably not contain everything I’d like to see . . . but it will contain tough new rules regarding disclosure, personal use of campaign funds, and gifts from lobbyists.”

At the end of April, Mike Lawrence told journalists “we do have what I regard as a consensus,” and he hoped they could announce it during the first week of May. Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller noted that the caucus representatives had only agreed on bullet points, and that at least one of the Four Tops did not want to endorse it until actual statutory language was drafted. Miller said that Common Cause's Jim Howard "has maneuvered himself into a position to effectively assert veto power over the final product," because Carter Hendren and Pate Philip did not want to have Howard publicly lambaste Senate Republicans. Yet Philip was still angling to get a later date for state primary elections included in the package even though Lawrence's group had nixed the idea, an effort that angered House Speaker Mike Madigan.

The Juvenile Justice Reform Act returned to the Senate floor after Governor Jim Edgar's amendatory veto. Illinois's 1970 Constitution gave the governor the authority to put forward "specific recommendations for change" in legislation, and in this instance Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Carl Hawkinson urged the Senate to agree to Edgar's modest changes. The Senate unanimously approved the revised bill, with Barack telling reporters that "the governor's suggestions are sound" and expressing pleasure that the funding issues that led him to vote "present" four months earlier had been remedied. "The vast majority of young people in trouble with the law are young people who aren't getting attention at school, have maybe dropped out of school, and are caught in circumstances of poverty, possibly substance abuse—a host of problems that with effective intervention would be cured," Barack optimistically stated. "Counseling programs for families" and "after school programs for kids" should help teenagers get "back on track."

Four months earlier, Barack's aunt Zeituni Onyango had taken early retirement from Kenya Breweries and had written to Barack asking if she could visit him during a multistop tour of the United States. On Tuesday evening, May 5, she arrived at Chicago O'Hare, called the Obamas' home, and spoke to Michelle, who told her that Barack was in Springfield. She took a taxi to East View, and the next morning Michelle put Zeituni on the train to Springfield, where Barack was waiting for her on the outdoor platform and then took her to the Renaissance Hotel and an evening reception. At the end of the week, she rode back to Chicago in Barack's Jeep Cherokee, staying with Barack and the now seven-months-pregnant Michelle for ten days before boarding a train to Boston to see her brother Omar Onyango Obama.<sup>52</sup>

Back in Springfield the next week, the ongoing campaign finance reform discussions remained almost everyone's top concern, but on May 13 the Senate unanimously passed a bill that received almost no public attention. HB 705 created the Children's Health Insurance Program, or "KidCare," a three-year "Medicaid look-alike" program to provide coverage to children whose low-income, working parents lacked health insurance. Senate Appropriations Committee "budgeteers" Steve Rauschenberger and Donne Trotter played lead roles in shepherding the measure forward, but inside the Public Health and Welfare Committee, which approved the bill on May 7, Barack had helped encourage conservative Republican chairman Dave Syverson to embrace the effort, just as he had with the welfare reform program a year earlier.

For Senate Republicans, it was essential that the program be only a benefit, not an entitlement, but once again expert Democratic staffer Nia Odeoti-Hassan was impressed by the extent to which conservative Republicans could be coaxed into backing a significant if limited expansion of public benefits. Barack also played a behind-the-scenes role in adding a progressive provision that doubled Illinois's personal tax exemption to the budget bill that the Senate would unanimously approve on the final day of the session.

The second and third weeks of May featured day-by-day developments regarding the campaign finance measure. Common Cause's Jim Howard told reporters, "I'd rather get good reform than not get great reform," and on Thursday morning, May 14, Mike Lawrence and his quartet of legislators finally went public with their consensus proposal at a statehouse news conference. Howard jokingly told Barack he needed to speak into the microphones if he wanted to run for higher office, but Barack did not enjoy the joke. "I'm not running for higher office," he coldly responded in what Howard took as "a very arrogant, very condescending kind of putdown." In contrast, Mike Ragen, the veteran Democratic staffer whom Emil Jones had assigned to help Barack on the measure, found him "very nice, very cordial" and "a prince of a guy to deal with." Republican senator Kirk Dillard warned reporters that "this is the toughest of all topics for a legislator," but Senate president Pate Philip made clear that he did not want failure to pass such a measure to be a cudgel Democrats could use against his members, or Republican gubernatorial candidate George Ryan, in the upcoming November election.

Mike Lawrence gave the four legislators a set of talking points to use in privately presenting the proposal to their caucuses. He said that Illinois news media was extremely interested in the issue, and that the consensus "addresses some of the major complaints raised in a reasonable way that will not impact your ability to campaign competitively." The proposal's three major ingredients—a ban on legislators accepting personal gifts worth more than $100, a requirement that members file their campaign disclosure reports electronically, allowing for immediate journalistic access, and a prohibition on the conversion of campaign funds to personal use—"will be viewed as major reform by the media." Lawrence warned that a failure to move on all three would be seized upon by "campaign opponents and critics. . . . Let's bite the bullet and do it now."

Barack would have gone further and imposed limits on how much contributors could give, but even Lawrence's three points drew intense flak from Democratic colleagues like downstaters Denny Jacobs and Vince Demuzio, as well as African American rivals Rickey Hendon and Donne Trotter. Denny Jacobs understood that Barack had received the assignment because he was "perceived to be Mr. Clean," given his reputation for refusing to let lobbyists buy him any food or drink. "Rickey gave him a hard time, I gave him a hard time, Donne gave him a hard time," Jacobs recalled, and Vince Demuzio really unloaded. "Who the hell are you, Mr. Newbie, Mr. Good Government, trying to change all this?" Barack's fellow freshman Debbie Halvorson recounted. "We did just fine before you got here." Kirk Dillard, Barack's Republican counterpart, remembered Barack calling the experience "brutal" and telling him that Demuzio had condescendingly asked, "Son, how much money do you have in your campaign account? You're negotiating on my behalf" yet would never face meaningful Republican opposition.

Downstate moderate Pat Welch, who held one of the most competitive seats, saw the acrimony as "pretty much an upstate-downstate split," while lame duck Chuy Garcia thought it was more "new school versus the old school." Chief of staff Mike Hoffmann, the only non-senator to attend caucus, recalled that "it got kind of heated, especially Denny," and Emil Jones remembered that Barack "caught pure hell. I actually felt sorry for him," but Jones spoke up firmly for Barack. "It may not be something that we want, but this is the direction that things are going, so we might as well be on the track," just as Mike Lawrence had suggested. Jones remembered that Barack "stuck to his guns" and "he was able to win the majority over." Hoffmann was impressed that "Barack did a nice job of maintaining his composure" and was able to "separate the issue" from the personalities and thus avoid "making it personal." North Side senator Howie Carroll thought Barack "did an excellent job with it," one that "moved him up to the top of the pack” among state Senate Democrats.

Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller called the reform proposal “potentially historic,” and Paul Simon sent Barack a thank-you letter, predicting that “in the years to come it will be one of the things that you will be proudest of in your legislative years.” But Simon and everyone else knew that most of the credit went to Mike Lawrence. House Democrat Gary Hannig, who realized that he, Obama, and Dillard “were seen as traitors by some of the people in our own caucuses,” viewed Lawrence as “the guiding light that kept the committee alive” during a process that had begun as “a little bit of a long shot.” Hannig sensed that Barack was “very idealistic about how to approach this,” but in the House as in the Senate, “there was a lot of skepticism with the Speaker, a lot of skepticism with my caucus” over actually calling the bill for a floor vote. Kirk Dillard knew that Pate Philip “clearly thought that we needed to make changes to protect the institution of the legislature and some members from themselves,” but the final consensus “never would have happened without Mike Lawrence.” Andy Foster, Governor Edgar’s young representative, had found Barack “very collegial, very funny,” with “a good sense of humor,” and recalled both Barack and Dillard “joking about the beating they’re taking in their caucuses.” Everyone believed that “if Pate went along with something, everybody was going to be okay with it,” and come Monday morning of the session’s final week Capital Fax reiterated that “the future of this bill is in the hands of Senate President Pate Philip.”

On Wednesday evening, Barack and Kirk Dillard appeared on the telecast of Illinois Lawmakers with host Bruce DuMont. It was Barack’s first time on the show. They acknowledged that a “grandfather clause” had been added to the bill to placate angry old-timers by allowing legislators to convert to personal use whatever sum they had in their campaign accounts as of June 30. Barack explained that “it’s difficult to get everybody on board” and that he reluctantly had agreed “to grandfather something in that will soften up the resistance and get on board the majority of members.” The crucial decision took place between Mike Lawrence, Pate Philip, and Carter Hendren. “Mike and I had that discussion and I went in and talked to Senator Philip about it. I remember that very vividly, and that was the way to pass the bill,” Hendren recalled. “We didn’t really like it, but we did it.”

On Thursday night, with only twenty-four hours to go, Lawrence believed that everything was almost in order, but he asked Barack how best to word one provision so as to preclude a constitutional challenge. Barack promised to have the language first thing in the morning. On Friday, Barack was late and then apologized for having left the crucial passage in his office. Lawrence recalled that “I blew up at him,” but Barack just chuckled and replied, “Gee, Mike, you’re really intense.”

The Senate convened at noon and Pate Philip’s all-powerful Senate Executive Committee sent HB 672 to the floor on a vote of 12–0–1. “The real strategy here was to get it to the floor,” Mike Lawrence explained, for “we figured all along that if legislation reached the floor, members would have to vote for it whether they wanted to or not.” Philip had been true to his word, and early in the afternoon, Kirk Dillard rose to present the bill, thanking staffers Glenn Hodas, Peg Mosgers, and Mike Ragen for their work on it. “Having spent hundreds and hundreds of hours with Barack Obama on this over the last few months,” Dillard said the measure was “the most important piece of campaign finance reform in twenty-five years in the state of Illinois.” Then Barack followed, acknowledging that “this is one of the most difficult issues” because “it’s something that everybody feels affects them directly.” But “this bill moves us in the right direction” and is not “overly onerous.” After Dillard was questioned extensively by Denny Jacobs and several other members, the vote was called and HB 672 passed by an overwhelming margin of 52–4–1.

An hour later the Senate adjourned, and the bill moved to the House to await passage there. HB 672 had begun life as a modest piece of legislation, introduced by ranking Republican Tom Cross, who shared a Springfield house with minority leader Lee Daniels, before becoming the vehicle onto which the Lawrence group's measure was appended. Democratic representative Gary Hannig already had House Speaker Mike Madigan's approval, because "you never agree to anything until you ran it by the Speaker," but at 10:00 P.M., Cross told reporters the bill needed more study over the summer. Lawrence knew that meant Daniels "did not want this to become law," but when Lawrence asked Madigan to take the bill away from Cross, as the Speaker could do, Madigan refused. With his apparent triumph now headed for last-minute defeat, and with Jim Howard angrily announcing that Common Cause would declare war on House Republicans, Lawrence called Pate Philip and reminded him that Republican gubernatorial nominee George Ryan, a former House speaker, would be highly vulnerable to Democratic attacks that Republicans had torpedoed campaign reform. "This really gives the Democrats an issue," Lawrence emphasized, and with Carter Hendren agreeing, Philip called Ryan, who readily agreed to call Daniels and lean on him with everything he had.

"Daniels protested, but Ryan insisted," Capitol Fax's Rich Miller reported. Well after midnight, Madigan called HB 672 and recognized Tom Cross, who immediately yielded to Jack Kubik, the House Republican member of Lawrence's group, who brightly remarked, "I thought you'd never ask me," and presented the bill. For close to an hour, Kubik faced an onslaught of objections and remarks from representatives on both sides of aisle. As 2:00 A.M. neared, Madigan closed the debate and called the vote. Just as in the Senate, the number of professed opponents magically shrank and the bill passed by an overwhelming margin of 102–3–13.

Proponents and journalists reacted ambivalently to the victory. The ban on lobbyists' gifts ended up with twenty-three exceptions, including golf and tennis fees as well as "meals or beverages consumed on the premises from which they were purchased." Jim Howard, complaining that "Springfield is a snake pit," admitted "there are parts of it that stink" and acknowledged that "the gift ban has more holes than St. Andrews Golf Course." Pate Philip later remarked that "it was so watered down it was a joke," but Paul Simon and Mike Lawrence called the end result "a very good package," with Lawrence believing that the ban on personal use of campaign contributions was "the most far-reaching aspect of this bill."

Attention quickly turned to the fact that lawmakers had five weeks in which to augment their campaign accounts before the June 30 "grandfather clause" took effect, and Capitol Fax noted that "some lobbyists are reporting an unusually heavy number of fundraising calls this month." In a Chicago Tribune op-ed, former League of Women Voters director Cindi Canary, now heading the new Joyce Foundation-supported Illinois Campaign for Political Reform, commended Barack and his colleagues for "this landmark legislation." She later reflected that "the central big win, which I don't think any of us realized at the moment, was the electronic disclosure," because it made contribution data readily available on the Web.

Illinois political scientist Kent Redfield, who had assisted the Lawrence group early on, noted that the bill "doesn't address the fundamental question about the role money plays in public policy" and therefore would "force few changes in the real-world relationship between cash and politics," particularly with how the Four Tops funded their vulnerable members' campaigns. Illinois would still have "the least regulated campaign finance system of any state,” and the resulting concentration of power “makes most legislators essentially irrelevant to policymaking.” Without a limit on how much could be contributed, the wealthiest interest groups would continue to have an outsized impact, with the Illinois State Medical Society, at almost $1.5 million a year, and the Illinois Education Association, at $1.2 million, topping the chart.

Barack was worried about citizens’ cynicism about government. “They believe they have no influence on the process since they don’t have the money of special interest groups. With the gift ban and the ban on Springfield fundraisers that are contained in this legislation, I think at least some of this confidence will be restored.” But he vowed to “continue to push for strict limits on campaign contributions by individuals and political action committees to reduce the amount of money spent on campaigns.” Two years later, Barack admitted that “we didn’t go as far as I would like” because of the “deep-rooted resistance among a lot of my colleagues.” He acknowledged that “many of the lobbyists are very well-informed and do a good job of advocating the interests of the people they represent,” yet it remained true that “there is a culture in Springfield where lobbyists buy legislators dinner every night,” and the Campaign Finance Reform Act had not changed that.

Overall, Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller declared 1998 had been “the most boring legislative session in memory,” and with Illinois running an annual budget surplus of almost $1 billion, there had been a raft of “new spending plans . . . dreamed up.” Legislative leaders had allocated $200 million toward “member initiatives,” or what the Tribune called “a massive buffet of pork projects,” particularly for districts where legislators faced competitive fall races. Barack bragged that he and Hyde Park state representative Barbara Flynn Currie, the number-two House Democrat, had obtained $4.6 million for the rebuilding of the Lake Michigan shorefront between 55th and 79th Streets. Looking toward the fall, Barack’s Springfield aide, Dan Shomon, along with Courtney Nottage, Emil Jones’s chief legal counsel, prepared to challenge the prospective third-party Senate candidacy of Myra Handy, a South Shore podiatrist. Ron Davis and Tom Johnson, just like two years earlier, filed a challenge before the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners. Handy failed to respond to multiple notices or to appear when a public hearing was convened, and the board barred her from the ballot for not filing the necessary paperwork.<sup>53</sup>

Just after the spring session, Barack and Michelle attended the annual benefit dinner of the Arab American Action Network, a group their friends Mona and Rashid Khalidi had helped found several years earlier. Many of the group’s Palestinian and Jordanian American members lived or worked in the westernmost portion of Barack’s district. The Obamas wrote a tax-deductible check for $100 and sat at a table with the Khalidis to Michelle’s right and keynote speaker Edward Said and his wife on Barack’s left. Barack had heard Said speak many times before, at the front of a Columbia University classroom more than fifteen years earlier, when he and Phil Boerner had thought Said was a “flake.”

Rashid Khalidi had just written an op-ed in the Chicago Tribune stressing that “much of the Palestinian population is today much worse off than when the Oslo accords were signed in 1993,” yet Khalidi was in no way anti-Jewish, explicitly noting that the Holocaust was “the modern era’s greatest human atrocity.” When conversing with Barack about Palestine, Mona Khalidi recalled, “you felt that he understood, and you felt that he was not taking an opposite position,” but he always seemed “very, very careful” about what he said. At home in East View, where the Obamas had a German-Jewish neighbor who was a passionate supporter of Israel and an active member of the NRA-affiliated Illinois State Rifle Association, it was much the same. Harry Gendler remembers Barack as a “very polite person” who willingly tolerated “me poking fun at him about environmental issues,” particularly Barack driving to and from Springfield all by himself in his Jeep Cherokee. “Barack and I had a running joke” about that not being green, and Gendler also watched as “Barack always hid his smoking,” often “smoking in the car.” Barack was “happy to talk about the Second Amendment,” but whenever Harry raised the subject of Israel, Barack’s demeanor changed. “He would turn poker face, turn ice cold” and “told me that we need a more balanced approach—that’s the term he used.” Barack “did not want to have an exchange of ideas or thoughts on that topic” and indeed “always walked away.”

In early June Barack again participated by phone in the second steering committee meeting for Charles Halpern’s think tank. Halpern recently had had breakfast with Barack in Chicago, and Barack had “emphasized the importance of not becoming another centrist organization taking safe positions on safe issues.” He and Halpern had discussed the “serious possibility” of Barack “giving up law practice & teaching” and devoting “perhaps 75 percent” of his time to head up a Chicago office of the new organization while remaining in the Senate. The next Monday Barack was in Washington, D.C., to speak at a Brookings Institution event addressing “Cities and Economic Revitalization.” Barack focused on the “spatial mismatch between job growth and the people who are unemployed” and a parallel “skills mismatch” that was rooted in “an extraordinarily inequitable system of public education finance.” He also warned that “unless we . . . fundamentally restructure the public schools . . . it’s going to be very difficult to sustain whatever progress has been made” in the economic redevelopment of beleaguered cities. Most problematic were “extraordinarily poor and isolated communities” like Chicago’s Englewood, where residents needed access to transportation to locales where jobs were more available. Barack recounted how a recent meeting of the influential Commercial Club of Chicago’s Civic Committee had discussed “a fairly bold package of proposals to deal with the regionalism issue.” Major corporations had exhibited “some recognition of mutual self-interest” in the plan, but House Speaker Mike Madigan had said “‘it sounds Soviet’ . . . which indicates that there is going to be some political resistance,” Barack drily observed. Later that week in D.C. the Saguaro Seminar’s fifth meeting took place, focusing on faith and social capital. Martha Minow remembered that with participants like conservative Republican political operative Ralph Reed, there was “a big fight” featuring “fiery debates about religion and politics.” That “was not a happy meeting,” she recalled.

In mid-June Barack was reelected chairman of the Chicago Annenberg Challenge board, and he also joined the board of Leadership for Quality Education, the Commercial Club offshoot now headed by his friend John Ayers. In early July Barack completed a lengthy questionnaire for Project Vote Smart detailing his position on a large number of issues. “Abortions should be legally available in accordance with Roe v. Wade,” and affirmative action was desirable across the board, but Barack endorsed only three out of sixteen principles concerning crime, including “increase state funds for programs which rehabilitate and educate inmates” and “provide funding for military-style ‘boot camps’ for first-time juvenile felons.” On the economy, Barack checked “increase funding for state job-training programs,” and on education he endorsed charter schools but not vouchers for students’ parents. He also supported “state-funded tuition and fees” for students attending public institutions of higher education who maintain a B average. Barack chose “undecided” on term limits for legislators, on a balanced-budget constitutional amendment, and now, unlike in 1996, on same-sex marriage too. On a list of eight “social issues” such as “increase state funding for Head Start,” Barack endorsed all except “favor banning smoking in public places,” a reflection of his own ongoing addiction to cigarettes. On state taxes, he did check “greatly increase” for tobacco, and on state spending he chose “greatly increase” for both K–12 education and health care and “slightly increase” for welfare while endorsing a two-year limit on cash assistance.

At 3:00 A.M. on Independence Day, July 4, Michelle woke Barack with the news that she was about to give birth. “Things went fairly smoothly” from there, and a few hours later Michelle gave birth to an eight-pound, fifteen-ounce girl whom they named Malia Ann, her middle name honoring Barack’s mother. The baby’s midsummer arrival allowed both doting parents to devote large amounts of time to the newborn, and following Michelle’s maternity leave the U of C allowed her to shift to part-time status once the new academic year began. A Chicago Sun-Times gossip column noted Malia’s birth, and among those sending congratulations was former U.S. senator Paul Simon, who reported that his wife was reading Dreams From My Father and said, “I want to be supporting you for statewide office one of these days.”

Soon after Malia joined the family, Barack’s aunt Zeituni arrived back in Chicago after seeing Omar Onyango in Boston and then Abon’go Malik in Washington. Staying now at the nearby Ramada Inn where Barack had first announced his candidacy, Zeituni indulged in an excess of shopping, including a desktop computer. When Barack drove her to O’Hare for her return trip to Nairobi, her luggage was $300 overweight and Barack “used his credit card to pay the extra charges.” Zeituni recalled that Barack barely suppressed his anger at the cost, which “did not sit well with him” now that Malia’s birth would further stretch the couple’s already stressed finances.

Michelle used Malia’s arrival to attempt again to get Barack to quit smoking, without success, and the baby’s arrival led to a significant decline in their increasingly spotty attendance at Trinity United Church of Christ. Two weeks after Malia’s birth, Barack again participated by phone in a third steering committee meeting for the new think tank. When a draft budget was prepared covering the next twelve months of the nascent start-up, Barack and another young steering committee member, David Callahan, were penciled in as committing 50 percent of their time to the new venture.

Barack spent only a little time that summer at Miner Barnhill, but it was a banner season for the small law firm. In mid-June, the Mitsubishi auto company agreed to a $34 million settlement with the EEOC regarding the rampant sexual harassment at its Normal, Illinois, assembly plant, which had first been challenged in the lawsuit that George Galland, Jon Belcaster, and Barack had helped litigate on behalf of several dozen women employees. Mitsubishi had agreed a year earlier to pay $9.5 million to those plaintiffs, but the EEOC settlement benefited about 350 women in what the Tribune called “the biggest sexual-harassment case in U.S. history.” Then, in early August, Judd Miner finally achieved “a clear-cut win” in the long-running Barnett case, alleging that Chicago’s city council districts unfairly disadvantaged black voters. A newly hired Miner Barnhill paralegal, Scott Lynch-Giddings, termed it “a big day at the firm” in his diary, and just how big was documented only months later when the federal district judge hearing the case awarded attorneys’ fees and tax-free costs to Miner Barnhill. Judge Elaine Bucklo ordered Chicago to pay the firm $5,127,994 for attorneys’ time going back to 1992 and an additional $526,472 in documented costs.<sup>54</sup>

In mid-August Barack traveled to Carbondale, in far southern Illinois, to witness Governor Jim Edgar sign the campaign finance reform Gift Ban Act into law at the Southern Illinois University Public Policy Institute that Paul Simon and Mike Lawrence directed. Earlier in the summer, Edgar had been sorely tempted to amendatory veto the legislation in an effort to bar the transfer of money from one campaign fund to another, a move that would defenestrate the Four Tops and require repassage of the bill during mid-November's veto session. That would have guaranteed the easy death of the entire measure, and over the course of the summer, Mike Lawrence "pleaded me out of it," Edgar recalled. He agreed to approve the bill as passed, as "kind of a favor to Mike and Paul Simon," calling it "an important step forward" at the signing ceremony, where he thanked the four lead legislators by name. Barack devoted a Hyde Park Herald column to its enactment, noting how "the process was truly bipartisan" and succeeded only because "each of us was willing to take some heat from our respective caucuses." Barack explained that limits "had no chance of passage," but he would "continue to be a strong advocate of contribution limits and public financing of campaigns," because "without such limits and public investment, it's hard to see how we can fully eliminate the influence of big money over the process."

Over the summer, Barack's district staffer, Cynthia Miller, moved his office seven blocks westward from 2152 East 71st Street to 1741, but Cynthia was "completely done and bored" with handling the minutiae of constituent requests that fell to a state legislator's local aide. Barack's district included a good part of the 6th Ward, which earlier that year had acquired an energetic new alderman, Freddrenna Lyle, who "started pushing legislators to come and do things besides legislate." In mid-September Barack joined Lyle and two city Streets and Sanitation Department representatives to listen to and respond to a two-hundred-person crowd concerned about "garbage pickup, tree-trimming, vacant lots and bushes, weed-cutting, alley cleanliness and rodent control," none of which a state senator had anything to do with.

Cynthia recruited her close friend Jennifer Mason to replace her, and both women overlapped for a month in the early fall before Cynthia left for a months-long trip abroad. Both young women received about $2,750 a month in salary, but unknown to Barack, as of August 1998 he on paper acquired an additional district employee, one whom neither he nor anyone else ever met. In fact, "William Higgins" did not exist, but he represented a long-standing Illinois tradition, the "ghost employee." From 1998 to mid-1999 the ever-elusive Mr. Higgins received $780 a month from the state Senate Democratic caucus, with the stipend increasing to $850 a month in 1999–2000 and $950 per month from July 2000 forward until at least February 2003. Who actually pocketed, or divvied up, the grand total of at least $48,950 in state funds that was paid to Mr. Higgins remains unknown, but Barack had no control over or easy access to the caucus payroll records, which were handled entirely by the Springfield-based Democratic leadership staff.<sup>55</sup>

What did concern Democrats statewide were the poor prospects of gubernatorial nominee Glenn Poshard and incumbent U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun. The southern Illinois congressman's conservative views, especially on abortion, made him unappealing to many progressive Democrats, but his principled refusal to accept campaign contributions from political action committees left him at a huge disadvantage against his Republican opponent. George Ryan was extremely popular among Springfield insiders, who knew him well from his ten years in the House and eight years each as lieutenant governor and now secretary of state. Capitol Fax's Rich Miller praised Ryan as "a genuinely nice man," someone who "has always understood that politics is about interpersonal relationships," and "one of the most loyal politicians you'll ever meet." But a growing scandal in the sprawling bureaucracy that issued commercial driver's licenses threatened to tarnish Ryan's campaign with reports that up to $150,000 in bribes had been paid into Ryan's campaign coffers. Three low-level state employees were soon indicted, but what gave the scandal indelible poignancy were reports that a fiery 1994 accident in which six children had died was caused by an illegally licensed truck driver. Polls still showed Ryan maintaining a lead of at least 10 points over Poshard, while Moseley Braun, who had attracted widespread criticism during her first six years in Washington, was trailing conservative young Republican state senator Peter Fitzgerald by a much narrower margin.

In late September, Barack introduced U.S. representative Jesse Jackson Jr. at the annual dinner of the Chicago chapter of Democratic Leadership for the 21st Century. DL21C, as everyone called it, was a group for aspiring young politicians, so the Jackson-Obama pairing was a natural. Calling Jackson "one of our genuine rising political stars," Barack said he "exemplifies all that's good and right and hopeful about politics." One of DL21C's key figures, young lawyer John Corrigan, found Barack's performance more memorable than the main speaker's, remembering that he "blew me out of the water."

In early October the U of C law school's autumn quarter commenced, with Barack again teaching both Con Law III and Racism and the Law. Con Law was unusually small, with only sixteen students, while the race seminar attracted twenty-eight. It "was packed entirely with people who were liberals," 2L Jay Hines-Shah remembered, and Barack "would really challenge us, pushing us constantly to examine our beliefs." Given the subject, the composition of the class was unsurprising, but a good many U of C law students were astonished to learn that the incoming class of 180 1Ls included only one self-identified African American. The number of black law students had been declining for several years, but the composition of the new class of 2001 made it starkly evident that the U of C law school "had a horrible track record for diversity," as 2L Nat Piggee rightly observed. With Barack teaching only upper-class students and spending hardly any additional time in the building, that decline may have escaped his notice, and Barack's own student evaluations remained excellent, with those two autumn classes garnering overall marks of 9.17 and 9.07.

Barack taught both classes while running his own relatively modest reelection campaign against Republican Yesse Yehudah. A host of recently graduated law students, plus young community organizer John Eason, volunteered to do leafleting under the direction of Ron Davis, but when Barack saw a passel of yard signs jointly promoting both Yehudah and Moseley Braun, he overreacted. Dan Shomon was on leave managing a Democratic challenge to an incumbent Republican senator in the southwestern suburbs when Barack called. "You're not going to believe it! There are Yehudah-Moseley Braun signs all over!" "So what?" Dan replied. "He's a Republican." "No, no. I could lose. I really could lose," Barack insisted. "What is wrong with you? You're not going to lose—you're the Democrat!" Dan responded. Barack "was in panic mode," Dan recalled, and Shomon had to call a graphic designer to order up some direct-mail pieces and yard signs so as to assuage Barack's absurd nervousness. As Democratic chief of staff Mike Hoffmann observed, "Dan did a lot" for Barack.<sup>56</sup>

In mid-October Barack submitted handwritten responses to questionnaires from two gay rights groups. He now answered "Undecided" to both "Do you support legalizing same-sex marriage?" and "Would you support a bill to repeal Illinois legislation prohibiting same-sex marriage?" Concerning abortion, he volunteered "perhaps for very young teens" when asked about parental notification requirements regarding pregnant minors. The Chicago Tribune "enthusiastically endorsed" Barack's reelection, saying he "has emerged from his first term as one of the most impressive members of the General Assembly."

The next weekend, Barack headed to Tarrytown, New York, for the sixth Saguardo Seminar, and Martha Minow remembered Barack showing her a picture of three-month-old Malia and saying that “Michelle was not happy that he was away” from home. Participants were so impressed with Barack’s ability to synthesize and reframe others’ comments in ways that demonstrated their underlying common ground, Minow recalled, that “we started to nickname him ‘Governor’” and asked “‘When are you running for president?’ It became a joke.”

Back in Chicago by Monday, one of Barack’s new soon-to-be Senate colleagues, Kimberly Lightford, came to Miner Barnhill to introduce herself. A trio of younger, Chicago-area senators—Lightford from the Far West Side and adjoining, mainly black suburbs; Ira Silverstein, an Orthodox Jew from the Far North Side; and Lisa Madigan, daughter of House Speaker Mike Madigan, from the Northwest Side—had won their March primaries and faced little more Republican opposition than Barack. Madigan, just thirty-two years old, had an introductory lunch with Barack over the summer, and Democratic leader Emil Jones Jr. told the thirty-year-old Lightford that she was too young for the Senate but should meet both Barack and James Clayborne, saying they were “the future of the Senate.” Barack warned Lightford to temper how much she should expect to accomplish in Springfield, advising her to concentrate on a few particular policy topics. Kim thought Barack was a “very charming, nice guy,” and was all the happier when he pulled out his Friends of Barack Obama checkbook and gave her a $250 campaign contribution.

For his general election race against Yehudah, Barack had done a modicum of fund-raising, bringing in a total of $54,000 during the fall, $23,000 of which came from political action committees, including $5,000 from the Illinois Education Association and $3,000 from the Illinois Trial Lawyers Association. His friend John Schmidt, his Joyce Foundation board colleague Carlton Guthrie, and his U of C Law School colleague Martha Nussbaum topped individual contributors with $1,000 each. Old personal friends like Altgeld Gardens school principal Dr. Alma Jones, St. Sabina’s Father Mike Pflieger, Sidley’s Gerri Alexis, Northwestern’s Bob Bennett, and Hope Center colleague Sokoni Karanja all gave from $200 to $500, as did new friends Jim Reynolds and Dr. Eric Whitaker, whom Barack had first met playing pickup basketball at Harvard.

After giving his check to Kim Lightford, Barack headed to Loyola University of Chicago on the city’s Far North Side, where progressive lobbyist Doug Dobmeyer had organized a two-day public policy symposium whose plenary speakers included Barack and Aurie Pennick, who a decade earlier had funded Barack’s work at DCP. Eager to demystify Illinois government, Barack told the audience that “there is very little policy making that takes place in Springfield that is subject to consistent, ongoing, thoughtful public debate. In fact, the rules and the processes that are set forth in Springfield are primarily designed to constrict debate as much as possible and to localize the decision-making power in as few hands as possible.” One example was how “the vast majority of Americans would like to see serious gun control” but “it doesn’t pass because there is this huge disconnect between what people think and what legislators think and are willing to act upon.”

Equally pressing was “the more fundamental issue of what do we do with this burgeoning number of people who have no health insurance and are one illness away from bankruptcy or worse.” Barack’s organizing roots were evident as he explained how “the people who are guilty of disempowering the population are not only the bad guys. . . . Sometimes it’s also us, sometimes it’s the experts or the advocates who are not that much better at advocating on behalf of and with the communities that they purport to represent, so that the lobbyists down in Springfield who represent a host of good causes that I strongly believe in oftentimes have very few troops behind them, have not engaged in conversations with the very communities that they're representing, and the legislators are aware of that." While generally the good guys "lose because they have less money and less resources," to prevail politically "would take more than simply being armed with good facts and making good presentations, it would also have to do with the fact that they had mobilized a constituency around these policy questions."

Barack expressly advocated "public financing for campaigns" and said he was concerned that the Juvenile Justice Reform Act had been overwhelmingly approved "despite the fact that policy research argued against the bill" and without the communities that would be most affected by it knowing what it would do to minority youth. "Policy research for the working poor" should address "issues of economics that diverse populations have in common" as a way to "resuscitate the notion that government action can be effective," because "there has been a systematic . . . propaganda campaign against the possibility of government action and its efficacy, and I think some of it has been deserved. The Chicago Housing Authority has not been a model of good policy-making, and neither necessarily have been the Chicago Public Schools." The most fundamental question was "how do we structure government systems that pool resources and hence facilitate some redistribution, because I actually believe in redistribution, at least at a certain level to make sure that everybody's got a shot," and "regional organizations" bridging urban-suburban boundaries were one promising option.<sup>57</sup>

A few days before the November election, Barack signed two identical, grammatically incorrect four-sentence letters to a pair of state housing officials urging them to support Allison Davis and Tony Rezko's efforts to construct a ninety-seven-unit Kenwood apartment building that would house senior citizens. Barack would later say he did not remember such mundane correspondence, which exemplified the neighborhood-related minutiae his new district aide, Chicago native Jen Mason, dealt with regularly. The next day the Sun-Times joined the Tribune in endorsing the "highly regarded" Barack for reelection, and a news story in the weekly Hyde Park Herald termed Barack "wildly popular."

On Election Day, Barack swamped Yesse Yehudah by 45,486 to 5,526, winning more than 89 percent of the vote, but Democratic U.S. senator Carol Moseley Braun and gubernatorial nominee Glenn Poshard both lost. Moseley Braun carried Chicago by almost 400,000 votes, yet lost to Republican Peter Fitzgerald statewide by just under 100,000. In contrast, the conservative Po-shard's Chicago margin was 160,000 votes less than Moseley Braun's, and he lost statewide to Republican George Ryan by only 120,000. Capitol Fax's Rich Miller wrote that "Poshard could have won if he had simply introduced himself to voters," but "he was virtually invisible as far as TV ads go," a direct result of his refusal to accept corporate and political action committee contributions. Poshard had won the Democratic primary despite being outspent more than two to one by John Schmidt, but George Ryan outspent Poshard by almost three to one, a margin of more than $6 million.

Democrats did capture the secretary of state's office, with African American Jesse White, the Cook County recorder of deeds, winning more than 55 percent statewide, and also the race for state comptroller, where thirty-year-old Dan Hynes, whose father was a well-known Cook County Democrat, won more than 58 percent in defeating conservative Republican state senator Chris Lauzen. Republican attorney general Jim Ryan won reelection with more than 60 percent of the vote, and Capitol Fax declared that Ryan and Hynes "are the future of their respective parties." Sun-Times political columnist

Steve Neal similarly contended that “such rising stars as Rep. Jesse L. Jackson Jr. and state Sen. Barack Obama of Hyde Park are strong possibilities for statewide office.”

Barack told the Tribune he intended to develop what the paper called “a specific program for universal health care,” but almost nothing happened during the legislature’s veto session. In the Senate, Republicans had picked up Penny Severn’s seat and no Democratic challengers had prevailed, leading to more grumbling about Emil Jones’s political judgment. In the wake of that disappointment, chief of staff Mike Hoffmann moved to the comptroller’s office and was replaced by Courtney Nottage, previously Jones’s legal counsel. On the veto session’s first Wednesday evening, Barack told Terry Link they needed go to Springfield’s Lincoln Library before their poker game because Barack was signing copies of Dreams From My Father at a reading. Proceeds from the book sales would go to the Illinois Coalition for Community Services. Link did not even know Barack had written a book, but senators such as Debbie Halvorson and Pat Welch and staffers such as John Charles and Dave Joens helped make for “a great crowd” and a good many sales.

Joens asked Barack to appear on the University of Illinois at Springfield’s Inside Illinois Government TV talk show, and on the last day of veto session Barack taped a thirty-minute appearance with host Jack Van Der Slik. Barack mentioned the “increasing Palestinian community” in the western part of his district, his desire to create “greater tax equity in the state,” and explained that “the committees are really where the action is in Springfield. . . . Most of the substantive debate and the changes take place in committee, before or after committee. That’s where the negotiations take place.” In the Judiciary Committee, “we see a lot of bills that purport to be tough on crime,” but Republican chairman Carl Hawkinson was so “very fair and very thoughtful” that “oftentimes in committee, we can bottle up some of the more egregious demagoguery that often takes place around issues of crime.” Judiciary “can still be a very frustrating committee,” and Barack also felt “certain frustrations being in the minority.” But his biggest complaint was how regressive Illinois’s tax system was, especially the constitutionally mandated flat income tax. In Springfield as in Chicago, “there is a difference in culture between the insiders and the outsiders, and I try to be an outsider who can work with the insiders.” Pointing to wealthy Peter Fitzgerald’s recent U.S. Senate victory, “money as opposed to just organization is the currency for winning elections, and I think that is something that I’m very troubled with.” Asked about potential writing plans, Barack replied, “I may spend next summer writing something having to do with public policy” and “I may combine my interest in politics and law to write something a little more academic.”

Two weeks before Christmas Barack had another Annenberg Challenge board meeting, as well as Miner Barnhill’s holiday party, this year at George Galland’s home in Evanston. Then Barack, Michelle, and five-month-old Malia flew to Honolulu to spend Christmas with his grandmother Madelyn and his sister Maya, who flew in from New York. With Madelyn all alone in the same modest tenth-floor apartment on South Beretania Street where she had lived for more than thirty years, the Hawaii trip had become an annual Christmastime tradition as well as a welcome respite from Chicago winters.<sup>58</sup>

The U of C Law School’s winter quarter began the Monday after New Year’s, with Barack again teaching Voting Rights on Monday mornings and Friday afternoons. It attracted only ten students, one of whom, Laura Mullens, had had Con Law III with Barack the previous autumn. “He was very careful to be inclusive and to be respectful of people with dissenting points of view,” Laura remembered. She lived south of the law school, in Woodlawn, and she shopped at a grocery store farther south that had “very kind” employees and where she was the only southern white female customer. She always wrote a check when paying, but one time when her total came to maybe $42, the automatic TeleCheck service declined her check. “That made me mad,” because she was “meticulous” with her checking account. “How dare you think my check’s not good.” In fact, Barack had had a similar experience when he was purchasing a set of golf clubs at a discount sports store outside Chicago. “I’m sorry, sir, we can’t accept your check,” Barack recounted to Dan Shomon. “I think he ended up using a credit card,” Shomon recalled, but Barack and Laura each suspected that their zip codes—60615 for East View, but the far more heavily black 60637 for Laura—were subject to redlining in credit scoring just as in home mortgage lending. When Laura proposed writing her course paper on the practice, Barack jumped at the idea, recounting Laura’s experience to Shomon as additional support for his idea of introducing a bill to combat such discrimination.

On Wednesday, January 13, Barack was sworn in for his second term in the Illinois Senate—this one, unlike his first, for four years, pursuant to the Senate’s staggered, three-terms-per-decade structure. The Chicago newspapers greeted the new session with stories suggesting that the free passes the city’s superb museums gave to legislators violated the new gift ban provision. “Of all the things we have to worry about in terms of influence peddling in Springfield, museums fall pretty low down on my list,” Barack remarked, saying he had never used his. “The whole intent of the gift ban was to get at the obvious and serious ethical infractions that have occurred on occasion in the past.” Newly elected Chicago Democrats Lisa Madigan and Ira Silverstein joined Barack and Terry Link in the junior members’ suite of adjoining offices in first-floor room 105, with Barack shifting from 105D to 105B, and just before the swearing-in Barack met the youngest and most junior new Republican, thirty-four-year-old Dave Sullivan, who had been appointed to replace a senator who had passed away just after the November election.

Sullivan had served for six years as an executive assistant to George Ryan, now Illinois’s new Republican governor, and in every Springfield bar legislators and lobbyists were celebrating Ryan’s election. Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller conceded that Edgar was “a pretty decent governor” but was “almost completely incapable of working with the General Assembly.” Many members agreed with Debbie Halvorson’s description of Edgar as “cold and distant.” Miller wrote that Ryan’s inauguration felt “like a breath of long-awaited fresh air,” and Springfield newspaperman Bernie Schoenburg explained that the former House Speaker “was of the legislature and understood it.” Ryan’s arrival promised to transform the relationship between the governor’s office and the Senate because, as Miller wrote, Ryan and Pate Philip “are great friends” and “are very close.” But Ryan’s campaign against Glenn Poshard had shown that Ryan was now doing “his best to throw off his reactionary roots,” giving Emil Jones an opportunity “to take advantage of the coming clashes by publicly siding with Ryan and taunting Philip to follow the lead of his governor.” Edgar recalled that he and Jones had never had much of a relationship because Jones “was looking for jobs” and “I didn’t trade a lot on jobs and things like that.” But Ryan was a political trader, and Rich Miller predicted that “gun control should be the juiciest opportunity for Jones to create division between Ryan and the gun-loving hunter Philip.” Miller likewise warned that Ryan’s greatest weakness is that “he trusts his friends too much.”

With the Senate in session only occasionally before late February, Barack was able to give a Martin Luther King holiday lecture at Loyola University of Chicago’s law school and join his friend Matt Piers and wife Maria Torres for dinner at Bob Bennett and Harriet Trop’s home. Michelle was about to return to a heavier schedule at the U of C, and the Obamas were thus looking to hire a full-time babysitter. By late that winter they had hired Glorina Casabal, a friendly woman in her mid-forties, whom they would pay at an annual rate of $16,000. “With a full-time employee suddenly on our payroll,” Barack later wrote, family finances became ever more strained.

One piece of financial good fortune came via a lecture agency, Jodi Solomon Speakers Bureau, which for several years had listed Barack as available to talk about “A Story of Race” based on his book. That winter Carleton College, a well-respected liberal arts institution in central Minnesota, agreed to pay $3,500 for Barack to keynote its Black History Month convocation in early February. Barack began his remarks by apologizing for a cold he had caught from seven-month-old Malia, and he spoke informally about how some people questioned his involvement in politics just as others had doubted the value of community organizing. Everyone needed to commit themselves to “something that is bigger than yourself” and to embrace what Martin Luther King Jr., drawing on the Hegelian dialectic, had “called a both/and mentality” rather than the “either/or mentality” that constricted most public debates. Saying that “you have to have some hope to get out of your own private life,” Barack implicitly referenced Rev. Jeremiah Wright in declaring that “there’s something audacious about hope.”

Barack’s relatively brief speech left considerable time for questions. The first led Barack into a long discussion of welfare reform and the need for more jobs that paid a living wage. “The minimum wage right now is so low that even people who are working full-time essentially do not get out of poverty.” But “political power has shifted in this country to suburban areas that don’t see a lot of unemployed people,” and job-starved inner-city neighborhoods were witnessing “the disintegration of the fabric of community life.” In such areas, churches often were the only “institutions that are still cohesive enough and bring people together,” and “the most successful community development organizations . . . are typically ones that are housed in churches or based in an ecumenical effort among a group of churches.” In Barack’s experience, “if you try to just mobilize people around a purely economic or political agenda, it won’t sustain itself and get at some of the very difficult, knotty problems that exist.”

Barack also bluntly volunteered that “affirmative action is more important symbolically in some ways than it is as a practical matter. First of all, affirmative action does not function once you get out of college unless you are in a very narrow range of government jobs.” Chicago was more than 30 percent black, but “if you go into any major office building you will not see more than five percent black people in there, and most of them are secretaries, receptionists, and delivery people.” The federal EEOC “does a miserable job” combating employment discrimination “because it’s been starved for funding by Congress,” and Barack referenced his experience in Donnell v. Comdisco Inc. by telling the audience that he had one client who had been “called nigger by the CEO of a Fortune 500 company in front of the entire office.” Barack acknowledged that “there are some legitimate grievances from the majority community in any form of affirmative action,” because “some individuals may be marginally harmed.”

Finally, Barack said that while “it is not a healthy thing for our civic life that unions have become so beaten down,” it was also the case that “in Chicago, the Teachers Union needs to do some work to get out in front of change as opposed to being a barrier to change.” Overall, “the union movement has been fairly myopic” in focusing simply on “issues of wages and benefits.” Unions need to “think about the people who are unemployed and not only the people who are already in the union.” They also should consider “how do we tie our own benefits and wages to performance of a corporation and think of ourselves as shareholders in that company as opposed to simply employees.”<sup>59</sup>

Back in Illinois, increased attention focused on the growing number of death row inmates who were being fully exonerated of the murders they previously had been convicted of committing. Northwestern University’s Center on Wrongful Convictions was responsible for most of the legwork, and on February 5, Anthony Porter was freed from death row just two hours before his scheduled execution. George Ryan remembered turning to his wife that day and saying, “How the hell does that happen? How does an innocent man sit on death row for fifteen years and gets no relief?” Porter’s near-death experience “piqued my interest,” Ryan later told the Chicago Tribune’s Steve Mills. Six days after Porter’s release, Rich Miller wrote in Capitol Fax that statehouse denizens “can feel the buzz growing on the death penalty issue” as everyone waited to see what Ryan might do.

In mid-February Emil Jones gave Barack a significant new responsibility by naming him to succeed Donne Trotter as one of Senate Democrats’ three members on the powerful Joint Committee on Administrative Rules. JCAR, as everyone in state government called it, oversaw whether executive branch agencies were properly implementing state laws. The committee could impose a ninety-day delay on any agency rule it found questionable, and executive branch officials were required to respond. Barack listened and did not speak at his first JCAR meeting, but within two months he became cochairman of the twelve-member, officially nonpartisan committee. Veteran southern Illinois Democrat Jim Rea, who previously had known Barack primarily socially, was immediately impressed. “Gosh almighty, where did this guy come from?” he remarked to another colleague. “He’s sharp, he’s asking the right questions, and he wants the answers to those before there’s any action taken.”

JCAR rarely attracted news coverage, and as February 23’s primary elections approached, most eyes were on U.S. representative Bobby Rush’s challenge to Chicago mayor Richard Daley, who was approaching ten years in office. The Tribune endorsed Daley for a fourth term in a rave editorial praising him for “the transformation of the Chicago Public Schools” under mayoral appointees Paul Vallas and Gery Chico. The Trib stated that “Rush has been a good congressman,” but Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller lambasted Rush’s “ineptitude” in running “a less-than-stellar campaign.”

Born in southwest Georgia, the fifty-two-year-old Rush had come to Chicago at age seven and enlisted in the U.S. Army when he was seventeen. In the late 1960s, Rush emerged as one of the leading members of the Chicago chapter of the Black Panthers, serving almost six months in prison on a misdemeanor gun charge. After finishing college, in 1975 Rush unsuccessfully challenged 2nd Ward machine alderman William Barnett, but eight years later, with Harold Washington winning the Democratic mayoral nomination, Rush defeated Barnett and joined the City Council, taking an active interest in South Side environmental issues. In 1992 Rush successfully challenged U.S. representative Charlie Hayes for his historic 1st District seat, held by a succession of African Americans ever since Oscar De Priest in 1928 had become the first black member of Congress since 1900 and the first African American ever elected to Congress from outside the South.

Ten days before the primary, polls showed Daley with an overwhelming 65 to 13 percent lead over Rush. Congressional colleague Jesse Jackson Jr. was one of the few elected officials backing Rush, and when votes were tallied on February 23, Daley crushed Rush 72 to 28 percent, winning almost 45 percent of the African American vote citywide and even carrying Rush’s own 2nd Ward. A decade earlier, Daley had received 4 percent of the 2nd Ward vote. In defeat, Rush attacked black business leaders “who have aligned themselves as part of the Daley machine,” but Chicago journalists marveled at how easily Daley had triumphed in a city that almost every day was earning its title as “the murder capital of the nation.” Washington Post columnist E. J. Dionne asked his Saguaro Seminar colleague to explain Daley’s success. Barack said Daley had benefited from an “aversion to ideology and an emphasis on management.” He also explained that political power based on “pinstripe patronage” to wealthy professionals and the campaign contributions that resulted made for a more impregnable mayor than in eras when a payroll patronage machine might split and generate serious challengers. Nowadays, without such a base, “it’s harder for folks to build their own independent organizations.” Tribune columnist Bruce Dold wrote that Chicago’s “African-American political leadership seems to be floundering” and quoted an unnamed alderman as predicting “I’m sure that somebody’s going to come after Bobby, especially after he encouraged candidates to run against incumbent aldermen.” Dold added that “there is talk that state Sen. Barack Obama or [17th Ward] Ald. Terry Peterson would challenge him for his congressional seat.”<sup>60</sup>

That February Barack introduced sixteen bills and reintroduced his call for a state constitutional amendment mandating universal health care coverage. His bills sought to lessen low-income workers’ tax burdens and to require the state Department of Human Services to establish three pilot job skills enhancement programs. SB 1055, the Check Acceptance Firm Act, sought to remedy what had happened to Barack and Laura Mullens. Companies would be required to provide “information verification services for retail sellers with respect to a consumer’s personal check to make available by means of a toll-free telephone number the reasons for not accepting the consumer’s check. Requires the reason to be sent to the consumer within 14 days after the request was made.”

On March 1 Barack and Jesse Jackson Jr. jointly keynoted Northwestern Law School’s Diversity Week. One white 2L thought Barack was the more memorable speaker due to “the level of substance in what he had to say.” Rich Miller of Capitol Fax noted that “nothing much of substance is happening this year” in Springfield, although legislators were complaining about the campaign finance law because they still viewed “campaign funds as their own private cash.” When the chairman of the House Executive Committee showed up audibly drunk at a 10:00 A.M. hearing, newspapers across the state wrote stories about “debating under the influence.” Rich Miller protested that the presence of “an allegedly drunken legislator in and of itself is not news. Lots of legislators, executive branch officials and, yes, even journalists have worked day in and day out with the smell of booze on their breath,” and he reiterated how “most business conducted in Springfield is done after hours, often over a few drinks.” Barack spoke with a reporter investigating the millions Illinois was spending annually on instructional courses for corporate executives at firms such as Chrysler, with overhead payments going to the Illinois Manufacturers’ Association and the Illinois Chamber of Commerce, two of the state’s top campaign contributors. “I don’t think the state should subsidize these folks at the same time we are not able to adequately fund programs for welfare mothers who are trying to move into the work force,” Barack complained.

By the second week of March, the George Ryan–Pate Philip friendship was indeed coming apart. Ryan wanted to name House minority leader Lee Daniels, no friend of Philip’s, as chairman of the state Republican Party. A bitter argument ensued, and Rich Miller reported that Ryan told “several people afterwards that he had never been spoken to so harshly in his entire life.”

By early March Barack was privately pondering whether he should leave the state Senate and Springfield’s incestuous political life for more remunerative work and then reenter electoral politics some years later. Barack discreetly spoke with two of the most senior partners at Sidley & Austin: Newton Minow and Eden Martin. Barack had come to know Martin well on the boards of the Woods Fund and John Ayers's Leadership for Quality Education. Martin was just about to be named president of the Commercial Club of Chicago and its highly influential Civic Committee, Chicagoland's most powerful private sector post.

On Friday, March 12, after a Woods Fund board meeting, Barack asked to speak with Eden, and after their conversation, Martin dictated a memo to file memorializing it. Barack was "immensely talented" and "has long term political ambitions," but he "is now thinking about . . . whether he wants to continue to forego the kind of opportunities and income that might be available in the private sector. In particular, he is thinking about the possibility of working for a foundation for several years, after which he would have built up some equity and might have an opportunity to re-enter elective politics. He has talked to Newt and me separately about his thinking" and "I had a long visit with him today." The Joyce Foundation board was in the process of selecting a replacement for Debbie Leff, who four months earlier had been named president and CEO of Second Harvest, a national network of food banks that was the country's sixth largest charity. In a few weeks, Joyce would appoint Cousteau Society executive Paula DiPerna as Leff's successor, and that search plus his experience at Woods had given Barack a good sense of how financially influential foundation leadership roles could be.

They also discussed Barack's joining Sidley to do a very different and more remunerative sort of law than he did at Miner Barnhill. If Barack wants "to return to the practice essentially full time," Martin wrote, "he ought to talk to us about the possibilities." He noted that Barack "has had no significant trial experience. He is also interested in the possibility of a business practice, but recognizes he would have to learn the craft. I think it is very possible that he will call Tom Cole," the head of Sidley's corporate transactional practice, Martin noted.

Two weeks after Barack's conversation with Martin, he and Michelle flew to Boston to attend the wedding of Barack's old Harvard friend Dan Rabinovitz. After the ceremony and reception, they had drinks with Rob and Lisa Fisher, and Barack raised the prospect of leaving the state Senate for a better-paying private-sector job. Michelle made clear her strong desire that Barack leave Springfield behind so she would not have to continue being a single parent three or four nights each week when the Senate was in session. Rob and Lisa went away with the impression that such a move was just as likely as Eden Martin's memo documented.<sup>61</sup>

On March 17, Illinois's top news was that Governor Ryan had hesitantly signed off on the execution of Andrew Kokoraleis, who seventeen years earlier had participated in several mutilation murders. "The idea of pulling the trigger on a human life had Ryan really freaked out," Capitol Fax's Rich Miller reported, much to the amazement of the governor's longtime friend Pate Philip, who could not fathom Ryan's hesitation. "What the hell's wrong with you, George?" an angry Philip asked Ryan over the phone as fellow senator Ed Petka looked on. Then Pate "literally just slammed the phone down." Petka later said this exchange was "the beginning of the end" of Ryan and Philip's friendship, but Ryan told the Chicago Tribune he was confident he "did the right thing" in letting the execution proceed. Meanwhile, the Tribune reported from Washington that defeated mayoral candidate Rep. Bobby Rush "hasn't missed a beat" on his congressional work.

Barack's Senate schedule forced him to miss a Chicago Annenberg Challenge meeting where his friend Jim Reynolds was elected to the board, but as chairman Barack already had complained to education researchers Anthony Bryk and Mark Smylie that the board was not happy with the timeliness and usefulness of their evaluation reports, which CAC was liberally funding. Barack sought out coverage from the African American press for his SB 883, the Transportation to Work Act, telling one Chicago weekly that “one of the greatest barriers that welfare recipients face as they return to the workforce is a lack of adequate transportation,” because “only about 6 percent of welfare recipients own a car—and most jobs are not located on public transportation routes.” As he had argued for three years, “in order for an individual to successfully move from welfare to work, they must first be able to get to their place of employment, and secondly, if they have children, have the means to get them to day care.”

On March 18, the Senate passed Barack’s modest SB 929, amending the Illinois Enterprise Zone Act to extend such tax abatement zones, of which half a dozen existed in Chicago’s low-income areas, from twenty to thirty years. Republican senators Christine Radogno and Steve Rauschenberger spoke against these urban tax breaks, but Barack’s bill passed easily, 45–10. Then Barack’s Judiciary Committee friend Kirk Dillard, who voted for it, filed a motion to reconsider, and the bill was brought back to the floor for reconsideration on Tuesday, March 23. Barack defended the zones’ economic development value, arguing that “they’ve had a track record of success throughout the state,” and that if Republicans were truly “interested in accountability, then we should be looking not just at enterprise zones, but at a whole host of corporate tax breaks that we provide throughout the state.” Barack’s Democratic colleague Bobby Molaro, a seven-year Senate veteran, questioned the motion to reconsider, saying he could not recall when a bill had been subject to such action, but it was clear that Pate Philip was against the Senate allowing a Democratic bill benefiting inner-city areas to become law. When the new tally was taken, all thirty-two Republicans—eighteen of whom had voted in favor of Barack’s bill five days earlier—voted to kill it, with two Democrats, Jimmy DeLeo and John Cullerton, who were no fans of Emil Jones, failing to vote. The outcome “was a shock,” Barack’s colleague James Clayborne recalled years later, because Barack “thought he had an agreement” and was “greatly disappointed” by the Republicans’ turnaround.

Barack had far better success that same day with his check verification measure. “This bill was generated actually from a student of mine at the University of Chicago Law School,” he told his colleagues, and it passed unanimously, 58–0. The next day the Senate unanimously approved Barack’s job skills enhancement bill and a more modest one amending the Health Care Surrogate Act, but on Thursday, when an uncontroversial Republican bill, the Certified Capital Company Act, was brought to the floor, Barack gave fuller voice to the anger he was still nursing from two days earlier. “I can’t help but comment on the fact that the vast majority of these credits the other side of the aisle is going to be voting unanimously on . . . are no different from the enterprise zone legislation” the Republicans killed on Tuesday, and with no greater accountability provisions. “I do not understand why we are getting no objection from various members on the other side of the aisle who objected to my bill because of accountability, but I don’t hear a peep out of any of you with respect to” this one. “I would hate to feel cynical and think that it is only because of partisanship that the enterprise zone legislation has stalled and this bill and other bills . . . have not. . . . I would urge all of you on the other side of the aisle to seriously consider . . . treating all of the tax credit bills . . . in the same manner and evaluating them in the same process.”

Steve Rauschenberger responded that he felt such “a great deal of discomfort” with this bill that he had met with the sponsors five times to ensure that adequate accountability provisions had been added to the legislation. “I understand Senator Obama’s concerned and frustrated with our action on enterprise zones,” but Rauschenberger urged passage of the pending bill. Barack replied that had he been given “the courtesy of the opportunity to amend, that would have occurred as well.” Barack’s Democratic colleague Pat Welch said, “I agree with Senator Obama, but I don’t think that agreeing with Senator Obama means that we shouldn’t support this bill.” Barack was alone in voting present, with the only two no votes cast by Democratic leader Emil Jones and his closest Senate friend, Bill Shaw.

Later that afternoon, when a bill authorizing prosecution as an adult of anyone fifteen or older who was charged with aggravated battery with a firearm in a school zone, Barack again voiced his disappointment. Just a year earlier, this provision had been removed as part of the Juvenile Justice Reform Act because “there is really no proof or indication that automatic transfers and increased penalties and adult penalties for juvenile offenses have, in fact, proven to be more effective in reducing juvenile crime or cutting back on recidivism.” But now they were about to “increase penalties further for juveniles and try them further as adults.” Barack and four other African American senators all voted present as fifty-two of their colleagues voted yes.<sup>62</sup>

Barack’s unhappiness was also manifest in his unusually sour remarks when the Associated Press asked him about new U.S. senator Peter Fitzgerald, his former Springfield colleague. “Based on his record in the state Senate, I would not see Mr. Fitzgerald being a mover and shaker in Washington,” Barack said. His Democratic colleagues shared his woe over the session so far, and when Barack wrote his first Hyde Park Herald column of the year in early April, he emphasized how “taxpayers are often overpowered by large financial interests in Springfield,” such as payday loan companies that “gouge consumers.” He also expressed concern about a tuition tax credit proposal for parents with children in private and parochial schools, fearing that its $180 million cost could “potentially drain resources from our chronically underfunded public schools.” Barack complained to one reporter that “it’s hard to mobilize support for programs that cost money but benefit low-income folks,” and he remained disappointed about the lack of support for the Earned Income Tax Credit bill he had again introduced in early February. “I don’t understand the logic,” Barack told a journalist in a direct echo of John McKnight. “We take this money from people and then spend it on public services they might not need if they had more in their pockets.”

Barack’s first two years in Springfield had convinced him of the underappreciated importance of state-level policy making, as he told his incipient think-tank colleagues on April 13, but that Tuesday was also runoff primary day, and Barack had become involved in two contentious aldermanic races. In the 15th Ward, he backed independent challenger Ted Thomas, an ACORN colleague of Barack’s longtime friends Madeline Talbott and Keith Kelleher, who defeated the Daley machine with 56 percent of the vote. In his home 5th Ward, Barack supported incumbent Barbara Holt, who recalled that he took “me around to speak with his neighbors in East View one Saturday.” But Holt’s energetic challenger, South Shore attorney Leslie Hairston, emphasized what the Tribune termed “questions about Holt’s responsiveness to residents’ gripes” amid complaints that Holt spent too much time at City Hall and too little in her ward. Holt led Hairston 44 to 30 percent in the initial primary, but the trio of eliminated candidates all endorsed Hairston and evidence grew that Mayor Daley’s forces were quietly mustering in support of Holt. Their involvement “may have been her kiss of death” in proudly independent Hyde Park, and on April 13 Hairston easily defeated Holt 55 to 45 percent.

On April 15 Barack and Michelle owed the IRS a whopping $18,401 in additional 1998 taxes. Michelle had earned more than $66,000 from the U of C, and Barack $56,000 from the law school plus another $48,000 from the Senate. His law firm income was barely $10,000, but his board service brought in an additional $9,500 from Joyce and $6,000 from Woods, even though neither foundation yet realized that once Barack had become a legislator two years earlier, a little-known Illinois law adopted in late 1995 with no visible news coverage prohibited him from accepting such honoraria. The Obamas' charitable giving was only $1,100, with $400 going to Trinity United Church of Christ and $100 to the Illinois Coalition Against Handgun Violence. With Malia's babysitter Glorina Casabal costing well over $1,000 a month, family finances remained tight and Barack later said "there were a lot of stresses and strains" between him and Michelle during that time.<sup>63</sup>

That same day, Barack introduced Laura Mullens, the law student who had piqued his interest in discriminatory credit scoring, to the House Financial Institutions Committee. Laura realized that committee members were not expecting a white female with a Georgia accent when Barack said that one of his constituents would testify in support of his Check Acceptance Firm Act. Dan Shomon recalled that Laura impressed the committee, and SB 1055 was unanimously approved. Thanks to Barack, Laura's trip to Springfield was "one of the most educational experiences I had in law school."

As April turned to May, Capitol Fax's Rich Miller wrote that in Springfield "the feeling of bipartisanship and good will towards the governor is still very high," mainly because "Illinois once again has a governor who actually likes people and is willing to rub elbows with them." Barack and his three white Democratic colleagues—Terry Link, Larry Walsh, and Denny Jacobs—had renewed the Wednesday-night poker games, and by early 1999 Terry had refinished the basement of his Springfield house, hosting the games there rather than in his kitchen. Lobbyists Mike Lieteau, Phil Lackman, and Dave Manning remained mainstays, as did Republican senator Tommy Walsh, and in early 1999 the group added another regular, Walsh's good friend and fellow Republican senator Dave Luechtefeld, from Okawville in far southern Illinois.

Often called "coach" for his years leading high school basketball teams, Luechtefeld had noticed Barack right from the start. "He certainly caught your attention when he spoke," and it was obvious "he was looking for something bigger than this from day one," Luechtefeld explained. He sensed the discomfort many urban Democrats felt toward Barack, perhaps because of the "little bit of cockiness, little bit of arrogance" that Barack's self-confident manner exuded. Barack was very respectful toward Luechtefeld, who was more than two decades older, but at his first poker game, Luechtefeld was surprised when Barack "pulls out a cigarette" because he did not expect Barack to be a smoker. Barack "loved to play poker, there was no question about that," and with a growing roster of regulars that soon included Illinois Manufacturers' Association lobbyist Boro Reljic plus occasional participants like Democratic senator Lou Viverito, the Wednesday-night gatherings sometimes split into two adjoining tables. The players also came up with an unofficial code name—a "committee meeting"—in a less-than-successful attempt to shield their pastime from knowledgeable secretaries. With the new players, the monetary stakes crept upward, and after losing one painful hand to tightfisted Barack, Larry Walsh remembered complaining, "Doggone it, Barack, if you were a little more liberal in your card playing and a little more conservative in your politics, we'd get along a lot better!"

In late April Emil Jones officially named Barack as the Democratic spokesman on the Public Health and Welfare Committee, replacing seventy-five-year-old Margaret Smith. At a late April town hall meeting in Woodlawn, Barack and Barbara Flynn Currie were confronted with dozens of people unhappy with their support of a bill that would limit local school councils' power to fire principals. Barack refused to back down, saying principals who clearly were doing a good job deserved protection, and he advised people to get "involved in larger organizations that have a reach beyond this district."

On May 4, Governor Ryan spoke to assembled legislators, proposing a $12 billion public works construction program he called Illinois FIRST—Fund for Infrastructure, Roads, Schools & Transit. The savvy Ryan had gotten the Four Tops, even Pate Philip, to agree to the scope of the program, if not its financing, prior to his announcement, and Ryan later claimed that when he first detailed its pork barrel potential to the quartet, "the drool was running out of their mouths." Capitol Fax's Rich Miller swooned over Ryan's "elegantly written" speech, in which the governor mentioned by name forty-nine legislators whose districts the program would benefit. Barack was busy supporting a House bill to allow pharmacists to substitute generic for more expensive brand-name drugs if the generics had been approved by the federal Food and Drug Administration. Barack told his colleagues, "I actually spoke to FDA officials in Washington to try to get this clarified," and they had confirmed that "the generics are equivalent of the brand-name drugs," as did "physicians that I talked to independently." That effort won overwhelming Senate passage of HB 2256, and that same day the House unanimously approved a somewhat weakened version of Barack's Check Acceptance Firm Act, with SB 1055 then returning to the Senate.

Despite its unanimous approval by both houses of the legislature, within days Barack's Check Acceptance Firm Act was fatally derailed. "I've got bad news for you," former Senate Judiciary Committee staffer Matt Jones told Dan Shomon one morning. "'Your bill is dead.' 'Why?'" Dan asked Matt, who was now a contract lobbyist. "One of the credit scoring companies just hired me. You're done." Dan gave Barack the bad news—"it's dead"—and Barack told Laura what had happened: "the TeleCheck people woke up and killed it in the Senate." Her experience with SB 1055 had been educational indeed, or at least educational in the ways of Springfield. "Lobbyists spend most of their time killing bills," Capitol Fax had noted a few weeks earlier, and in early May, Miller observed that spring 1999 "will likely be remembered as the session held for the benefit of rich white guys." That was "not to say that all sessions don't usually benefit rich white guys," Miller quickly added, "but this one just seems to be more blatant."<sup>64</sup>

George Ryan's long immersion in the ways of Springfield was unintentionally highlighted when he named four lobbyists to a seven-member ethics panel he had created following his inauguration. "I was surprised that the governor wasn't more mindful of the possible perceptions that were raised by putting lobbyists on the commission," Barack told the Chicago Sun-Times. "I think it would be advisable to put people on the commission that are not perceived to have major interests in Springfield." Barack was not much happier with Ryan's huge Illinois FIRST initiative. It would fund "one of my top priorities," the remodeling of South Lake Shore Drive, the handsome divided highway that linked Hyde Park to downtown Chicago, plus it would pay for the reconstruction of nine miles of the Dan Ryan Expressway south of Bronzeville. But it would be "funded by regressive taxes that will hurt families," because most of the money would come from doubling Illinois's annual vehicle registration fee from $48 to $96 and tripling the title fee for vehicle purchases from $13 to $50. “Regardless of your income or whether you own a Lexus or a Ford Escort, vehicle owners will pay the same fee,” exacerbating a state taxation system that was already “one of the most regressive in the United States.”

In early May, Senate president Pate Philip made news regarding a bill that would increase criminal penalties for anyone who assaulted a sports referee or umpire. Barack’s Republican Health Committee colleague Dave Syverson was presenting the bill when Rickey Hendon asked whether it would cover professional wrestling, where referees were often fair game. Syverson responded, “I don’t want to burst your bubble, but when it’s part of the act, that would not be included.” Hendon replied, “I’m going to let some of my professional wrestling friends know that you think it’s just an act, and perhaps when they’re here they can lobby you personally and see if you can get out of a choke hold!” Judiciary chairman Carl Hawkinson spoke in support of the bill, but then Philip objected, declaring that “every once in a while, that referee or that umpire ought to get popped, and you ought to pop ’em good!” Then the vote was called, with only thirty-three senators—including Barack—backing the bill and twenty-two bipartisan opponents voting either no or present.

Reporters and columnists jumped all over Philip’s remark, but an unrepentant Philip told the Chicago Tribune, “They make more mistakes and everybody gets so mad at them, it isn’t even funny. . . . I just say maybe they deserve a pop once in a while.” Tribune columnist Bob Greene labeled Philip “stunningly moronic,” and the suburban Daily Herald, calling Philip “more inflammatory than usual,” editorialized that the state Senate’s “level of sportsmanship . . . sometimes sinks pretty low.” In contrast, Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller defended Philip, arguing that “he embodies older, white, suburban, working class values” and that “his critics ought to take a breath and relax.” Even twenty years later Philip continued to stand by his call to arms, saying he was a longtime Chicago Cubs, Chicago White Sox, and Chicago Bears season ticket holder. “Everybody around me bitches about the referees, the calls, like you cannot believe!” Barack had little personal interaction with Philip, but the Senate president reminded him of someone he had known well, as he explained on the floor one day to Republican friend Dave Sullivan. “One of the strangest things for me serving here in the Illinois Senate is that Pate Philip looks just like my grandfather!”<sup>65</sup>

Much Senate attention focused on a pair of protectionist bills aimed at boosting the businesses of liquor distributor William Wirtz and Pepsi bottler Harry Crisp, a pal of Philip’s, with Barack voting against both. He also voted against an open-ended deregulation measure sought by Illinois-based banks. “We should have a sense of what exactly this body, this chamber is giving up in terms of its regulatory powers, and I have not heard yet a clear understanding of what exactly those powers are. What legislative regulations and powers do we have that we’re potentially sacrificing as a consequence of this bill?” Giving banks carte blanche is “not the way to go,” Barack warned, but only moderate suburban Republican Christine Radogno joined him in voting no.

Barack also took to the floor to advocate passage of a House bill requiring that at least two-thirds of the child support payments received by the state go to children, because at present “of the $88 million that we collect in child support, we only distribute $8 million of that to the children who are supposed to be the recipients.” Some Republicans thought that too much, and the bill passed with only thirty-four yes votes. The next day Barack became even more peeved when a House bill extending the duration of one particular enterprise zone in Metro East so as to benefit a specific company was called for passage.

Taking “a business-by-business approach to the extension of the enterprise zones,” in place of his earlier bill that Republicans had killed, would be “highly subject to politics,” Barack warned, but even he voted yes.

As the final week of the spring session approached, attention turned to the $65 million that each caucus would receive for so-called member initiatives as part of Governor Ryan’s huge Illinois FIRST proposal. One evening Barack joined conservative Republican senator Laura Kent Donahue on Bruce DuMont’s Illinois Lawmakers telecast, explaining that he believed Illinois had done “as good a job as any state” in aiding welfare recipients’ transition to work. Barack expressed guarded support for Illinois FIRST, but emphasized that programs that “benefit the most vulnerable in the state” must not suffer as a result. When DuMont asked if the twenty-year, $50-million-per-year commitment that FIRST entailed might prove problematic during an economic downturn, Donahue agreed, saying it was “too big, too fast.” Barack expected to support it but was unhappy about how Illinois was “putting a little bit too much of a bite on working-class families” while the Revenue Committee on which he sat had “voted on about $200 million worth of tax breaks” this year alone.

When Chicago Republican senator Walter Dudyycz the next day offered a resolution instructing Illinois’s public universities to comply with FOIA requests for their admissions data submitted by a group well known for opposing affirmative action, Senate floor debate dissolved into angry discord. Rickey Hendon and the normally mild-mannered James Clayborne challenged the requester’s intent, with Hendon telling Dudyycz “don’t bring racism and racist legislation to the floor of the Senate.” Dudyycz was in no way racially insensitive, as even Hendon knew, but Barack felt compelled to speak too, stressing that the requesting organization, the Center for Equal Opportunity, “is systematically attempting to dismantle affirmative action in public universities all across the country.” Barack readily volunteered that “we know, by definition, that affirmative action means that the minority students may have lower test scores than the white students. . . . That’s the essence of affirmative action.” But if and when the scores were publicized, then “immediately, essentially every minority student on that campus” would be “under suspicion as being incompetent, unqualified,” and “under a cloud that they could not erase.” Barack acknowledged that “reasonable minds can differ on the issue of affirmative action” because it was “a difficult, complicated issue,” but he urged senators to vote against the resolution, and Dudyycz angrily withdrew it.<sup>66</sup>

When the final week began on May 24, the Senate spent all of Monday evening debating a bill to allow riverboat gambling to expand into northwestern Cook County, to permit nonstop gambling on all ten Illinois riverboats, and to underwrite the reopening of a racetrack owned by a well-connected millionaire. The bill had passed the House three days earlier, and veteran senators said they had never seen such intense lobbying on any bill. Emil Jones, who was otherwise pro-gambling, was against a bill he thought offered nothing at all to the parts of Chicagoland that were most in need of economic development. Pate Philip insistently championed the measure, and early in the debate, Barack took the floor. “I am not philosophically very keen on gaming as an economic development strategy,” because “oftentimes it tends to be regressive” with regard to the people from whom it sucks money. In addition, “what does disturb me deeply” is how “we are giving away, at least initially, $65 million in tax breaks to people who I think we would all acknowledge are pretty fortunate and doing pretty well.” In stark contrast, “during this session, sitting in Public Health and Welfare . . . I watched us, again and again, reject and refuse the requests of people in deep need in this state—personal attendants who are caring for the disabled and are making the minimum wage, and we told them ‘You know what? We can’t give a raise. We’ve got a tight budget here.’ We had bills that would raise Medicaid eligibility for low-income senior citizens. Said we couldn’t do it. Sixteen million dollars. Couldn’t find it in the budget. We had a bill that would have shifted the median income of eligibility for subsidized day care. Cost, ten million dollars. We couldn’t do it. And many of us sitting here today said to people in desperate need that we couldn’t provide those kinds of tax breaks or we couldn’t provide those kinds of subsidies because we are fiscally responsible. And yet, here we are today.” Barack’s disgust was audible. “I’ve been observing this process for the last three days of people trading their votes, making deals” on the gambling bill, “and I think we should be ashamed of ourselves after saying ‘No’ to that many people who need some real help in this state, that we are actually willing to go ahead and vote for a piece of legislation that helps people who don’t need it.”

Later in the debate, Emil Jones warned that the bill’s inclusion of an explicit, 20 percent minority set-aside provision would open the measure to easy legal attack because Barack had advised him that the inclusion of a specific quota, rather than a more diffuse goal, was clearly unconstitutional. When the vote was called, with Barack voting no, Philip appeared to have defeated Jones by a one-vote margin, 30–29, with Philip’s good friend Ed Petka, who firmly opposed gambling, voting yes. Then anyone who had ever doubted Emil Jones’s political savvy quickly learned a lesson. Jones requested a verification of the thirty affirmative votes, in which the presence of every member was to be confirmed. But pro-gaming Democrat Evelyn Bowles had left the chamber, and the result was a 29–29 tie, with the measure’s proponents now forced to negotiate with Jones to see what further division of the pie could change his no to a yes.

Eleven Democrats, including some who were not enthused with Jones, had voted with Philip and against their own leader, but the backers of a boat for northwest Cook County now deployed county board president John Stroger’s top two campaign contributors, Tony Rezko and Al Johnson, as well-chosen emissaries to Emil Jones. Barack told the Chicago Defender’s Chinta Strausberg that the bill would “do very little to develop the South Side, West Side or south suburbs,” and that “if we’re going to have a boat it should be in an economically distressed area” of Cook County, not in prosperous northwestern Rosemont, “where very few blacks live.” Capitol Fax’s Rich Miller believed the vote had become “a very personal fight” between Jones and Philip, grounded in part by the perception that Philip “doesn’t treat Jones as an equal,” but Jones’s race-conscious approach to the proposal’s shortcomings did not sit well with some white Democrats.

By the time the Senate convened at 1:00 P.M. on Tuesday, Al Johnson and Tony Rezko’s entreaties had succeeded: in exchange for $30 million in what Miller called “black pork”—$6 million per year for five years for poor communities—Emil Jones backed the bill. Like Jones, three other African American Chicagoans—Rickey Hendon, Donne Trotter, and Jones’s sidekick Bill Shaw—switched their votes as well. After a brief, pro-forma debate, the bill passed 31–27, with Ed Petka and several other anti-gaming Republicans peeling off since their votes no longer were needed.

That night at the governor’s mansion, an end-of-session party brought out high spirits all around. The next morning Capitol Fax reiterated that 1999 was “The Year of the Rich White Guy.” With Illinois benefiting from what one lobbying firm’s session summary called a “red-hot economy,” the final budget as passed provided for $2 billion more in state spending than Governor Ryan had proposed three months earlier. The firm called the spring session “one of the most exciting and productive in recent legislative history,” but Barack firmly disagreed. “It’s very hard to separate yourself from the interests of the gaming industry if you’re receiving money,” he told National Public Radio in an interview excerpt broadcast the same day that Capitol Fax reported that Pate Philip had received $257,000 from gambling interests during the spring session and Emil Jones $86,000.

But Barack set off more fireworks on former Chicago alderman Cliff Kelley’s WGCI radio show when he told African American listeners that Springfield’s legislative black caucus “is not functioning as it should” because “we don’t have a unified agenda that’s enforced back in the community and is clearly articulated.” The next day’s Chicago Defender put Barack’s remarks on its front page under the headline “Obama: Illinois Black Caucus Is Broken.” Barack explained that “mistrust between the Black Caucus members in the House and the Black Caucus members in the Senate” dated back several years to disagreements about former governor Jim Edgar’s education funding proposal. He told another interviewer that the Wirtz and Crisp special-interest distributorship bills had highlighted the caucus’s disunity. “We were struggling to come up with a negotiating position the entire session,” he explained. “I don’t think we ever had a well-defined agenda, and so we were unable to leverage our votes at the end,” as Emil Jones had so successfully done on the hard-fought gaming bill. Black legislators “don’t need to be monolithic, but if we’re going to be effective, we’re going to have to have an agenda and unify around that agenda on at least some of these high profile issues where we potentially do have some leverage.”

Barack had expressed similar criticisms of his African American colleagues to fellow senator James Clayborne, but voicing such views on a premier radio program was taking it to another level. Barack “was somewhat impatient,” Clayborne remembered, “that we didn’t have the unification that we should have, that he wanted to unify us and move an agenda forward.” Clayborne had “told him ‘Unfortunately, if you jump out there too soon, you’ll turn people off. You’ve gradually got to work your way through the maze to try to get some unification and get us focused on an agenda.’”

When new young African American senator Kimberly Lightford joined the Black Caucus in January 1999, she quickly realized just how poisonous the closed-door dynamics were. Lightford had been surprised by what a cool reception her Democratic colleagues gave her, with southern Illinois veteran Vince Demuzio, Barack, and Miguel del Valle among the few senators who greeted the thirty-year-old warmly, often calling her “kiddo.” She knew that some senators saw her “as this little girl” and expected her to perform secretarial tasks, yet at the first Black Caucus meeting after her arrival, Barack nominated her as chairperson to succeed Donne Trotter. Kim quickly learned that the position was more difficult than she imagined because of Trotter and Hendon’s dislike for Barack. “We could barely have meetings in caucus because Donne and Rickey would give him hell.” Barack “wouldn’t argue with them,” he “would just leave. He avoided confrontation so well,” Kim recalled. “They felt he was arrogant” and believed he “had pretty much tricked Alice out of her seat.”

Hendon acknowledged that some meetings of both the Black Caucus and the larger Democratic one “got really heated,” with Barack sometimes agreeing with white senators like Denny Jacobs or Terry Link rather than with the Chicago African Americans. “There were some pretty raucous caucuses,” Bobby Molaro recalled, and George Shadid would specifically remember Rickey Hendon more than once telling Barack, “you ain’t black enough.” Hendon and Trotter’s personal behavior toward Barack remained just as problematic as it had been two years earlier. “I was so bothered by the both of them, and I was extremely bothered with Senator Hendon because he's loud and he's obnoxious," Kim Lightford recalled. Barack's public criticism of his black colleagues upped the ante, and "Donne more than Rickey took real offense at that," well-connected lobbyist Larry Suffredin remembered. Everyone realized that Trotter was one of the Senate's smartest members, but his sharp tongue was never at a loss for new, insulting put-downs based on Barack's surname. By 1999 Donne was "always referring to him as 'Senator Oh-My-Mama, trying to tell us all what to do,'" Suffredin recounted.<sup>67</sup>

By the end of the spring 1999 session, Barack's disappointment with the Senate was manifest to almost everyone who knew him. "He just felt frustrated," poker buddy Larry Walsh knew. "Springfield was not challenging enough for him." Lobbyist and poker friend Dave Manning saw it similarly. "I think there was some frustration in having his family back home and having to come here all the time, often to accomplish very little" in a minority caucus that suffered under Pate Philip's rule. The two House members with whom Barack had the most contact felt likewise. Barack "began to feel quite frustrated at the inability to make things happen," Hyde Park's Barbara Flynn Currie recalled. Tom Dart, whose largely white House district encompassed much of Chicago's politically influential 19th Ward and who shared Barack's policy interests, used the same adjective as all the others. "I remember him just being frustrated with the fact that so much of it was just personality driven" rather than policy focused. "I remember distinctly those conversations," Dart explained. "Real frustration."

Barack voiced similar feelings to friends who had nothing to do with Springfield. Miner Barnhill colleague John Belcaster would use the same word as Barack's political friends. Barack felt "tremendous frustration" about "being in the minority party. . . . His frustration was palpable, and he would articulate it." Miner Barnhill consultant and occasional golf partner Whit Soule would recall Barack grouching about being "a potted plant" in a system where the lobbyists "were drafting the legislation" and "the party leaders basically cut all the deals." With Miner Barnhill's Paul Strauss Barack "talked about how corrupt it was," and writer friend Scott Turow would remember Barack calling and saying, "Man, I've got to get out of this place." Ed Wojcicki of Illinois Issues listened to Barack vent and remembered him saying: "There's really only five jobs I really want, now that I see what it's like. I want to be attorney general, or I want to be U.S. senator; I want to be president of the Senate." None of those were presently available, but to the Springfield denizens to whom he was closest, Barack had broached another possibility, one that Sun-Times political columnist Steve Neal had cited immediately after U.S. representative Bobby Rush's loss in the mayoral primary in February: challenging Rush for his congressional seat in the March 2000 Democratic primary.

Barack shared this with Dan Shomon and with Will Burns, who had joined the Senate Democratic staff six months earlier. Burns recalled that "part of it was wanting to get out of Springfield" combined with "a sense that Bobby was vulnerable" because everyone knew Rush had run a "horrible" mayoral campaign. But Barack was also considering that Donne Trotter might challenge Rush. Burns knew "there was a little weird competitive thing between him and Donne," one that had been building for two years now. Trotter was extremely well respected within the Senate, as much on the Republican side as on his own. Trotter's excellent working relationship with Republican budget expert Steve Rauschenberger was recognized by everyone in the capitol. "We could work with Donne," conservative Republican Ed Petka explained, and Trotter's unquestioned status as the best-dressed man in Illinois politics, with a proclivity for colorful bow ties, drew admiration too. Petka saw Trotter as "an African American Paul Simon," who also wore bow ties, and even Pate Philip saw Trotter as “a classy guy.” Donne “was a cooperative guy, and you could trust him,” Philip explained. “I always liked him.”

No matter how handsome and smart Trotter was, the cosmopolitan roots and academic pedigree of his eleven-years-younger junior colleague had led Donne to view Barack with an antipathy that would take years to finally dissolve. Trotter’s own undergraduate degree was from humble Chicago State University, and his disdain for everything the U of C represented manifested itself in his interactions with Barack’s young acolyte Will Burns, who had now earned two degrees there. Burns recalled, “The first time I met Donne Trotter, he called me . . . a fucked-up motherfucker” because of Burns’s ties to the U of C and to Barack. Trotter saw Rush’s mayoral run as a sign that “maybe he doesn’t want to be” in Congress, and in some quarters resentment still festered about how Rush had taken out Representative Charlie Hayes in the 1992 primary. Some of Trotter’s friends thought “Bobby was just not being effective,” and Trotter’s political godfather, powerful Cook County Board president John Stroger, “didn’t have any love for Bobby Rush, so I had that potential support behind me,” Donne recalled, especially because Stroger’s son Todd could then inherit Trotter’s Senate seat. Black lobbyist and former state representative Paul Williams remembered “there was a feeling that Bobby was vulnerable,” and Trotter believed that in a one-on-one matchup, all of the disenchantment with Rush could coalesce behind him. Trotter’s best friend Rickey Hendon had seen how “from the very beginning, Barack demonstrated ambition,” and with Barack now poised to deny Trotter a clean shot at Rush, Donne “clearly resented this new guy trying to jump over him.”

As Barack pondered a congressional run, in June he went to Santa Fe for the seventh Saguaro Seminar session and then back to Chicago for meetings of the Chicago Annenberg board and the legislature’s Joint Committee on Administrative Rules. Everyone involved in the Annenberg effort now understood that the four-year-old program was not producing dramatic improvements at most of the scores of schools it was assisting. As Northwestern professor Charles Payne told the board, “the moment CAC decided to work with and fund over 220 mostly lower tier schools, we knew there was not going to be a deep impact,” in large part because data showed that recipient schools were getting an average of only $49,000, hardly 1 percent of most schools’ annual budgets. The board agreed to adopt a “Breakthrough Schools” initiative whereby most of CAC’s remaining funds would be concentrated on eighteen particularly strong schools.

At the end of June, Barack flew to New York for the first true board meeting of the incipient think tank that was now calling itself the Network for American Renewal. The advance concept paper envisioned programs addressing “Shared Prosperity and Human Well-Being” and “Renewing American Democracy for the 21st Century.” Cofounders Charles Halpern and Stephen Heintz imagined this first gathering as “potentially an historic occasion,” and Barack’s fellow board members included former Colorado congressman David Skaggs and Public Allies cofounder Vanessa Kirsch. Barack told his colleagues that “part of the opportunity and challenge is to develop norms and values that unify us as Americans but are also inclusive of the norms and values brought by other cultures.” He also “stressed that while the Network does not plan to focus on issues of race and culture with specific projects, we must address these issues in all our activities” and must also consider “how we include people who are not sharing in prosperity,” because “whatever ails this country ails poor folks worse.” One proposed project would focus on “Asset Building,” such as “inner-city entrepreneurship.” Barack noted that the “concept of ‘ownership’ is an extremely powerful American notion,” and he “expressed special interest in the notion of community assets,” again echoing John McKnight.

Another anticipated focus was “Democracy and Devolution,” with Barack citing his own past experience in noting how “‘motor voter’ registration is not really at all significant. The problem is not voter registration but voter participation. How do you engage citizens in their government?” He complained about how in Illinois “hundreds of millions of dollars in tax breaks were approved without knowing what impacts they will have,” and no matter what the group might initiate by way of “devolution” at the state level to anticipate “resistance on the part of legislators who like things the way they are.” A key question was “Where do citizens collectively assert their rights and interests,” which “is central to the current state of democracy”?<sup>68</sup>

Back in Chicago, on July 1 Barack made his first move toward a congressional race by agreeing to Dan Shomon’s idea of conducting a small, discreet poll of 1st District voters to explore just how vulnerable Bobby Rush might be. Dan asked his three closest Springfield friends, Senate Democratic staffers John Charles and Adelmo Marchiori and former staffer Jeff Stauter, for their confidential help, explaining that “Barack is thinking about doing this.” Adelmo knew that “the relationship between Barack and Shomon was the tightest on staff,” and although they thought Barack “was going somewhere, we still questioned Shomon’s bromance with Obama,” Jeff recalled. “I had the software to do the poll,” John explained, “some statistical sampling software that I’d picked up along the way” while polling for state Senate campaigns. Shomon bought “a list of phone numbers from a vendor” there in Springfield for $450, and “we put together this poll,” Adelmo remembered. “We were completely on our own personal time,” making sure no word of their project seeped back to chief of staff Courtney Nottage. Working out of Stauter’s lobbyist office, they “spent night after night calling” residents of the 1st Congressional District, which ran from 26th Street down to 103rd Street on Chicago’s South Side, then westward through Englewood to encompass predominantly white Beverly and parts of suburban Evergreen Park, Oak Lawn, Alsip, and Blue Island. “You test your opponent’s negatives,” and “we would have done a favorability of Barack and Rush,” they remembered. Overall they completed about three hundred calls, four young white men asking respondents who were more than 75 percent African American to voice their feelings about former Black Panther leader Rush. The bottom-line question was “Is it doable? Is it worth taking the shot?” and John Charles recalled that after a week’s worth of phone calls, “our numbers showed that it was possible.”

Barack was encouraged by the amateur poll, but the tallest barrier to launching a challenge was right at home: Michelle. “With every political run that Barack made, my instinct was to talk him out of it,” she later recounted. Malia was just celebrating her first birthday, and with Barack in Springfield for so much of the spring, and then out so many evenings at political events like a “Second Thursday” DL21C speaking appearance, Michelle “was in a lot of ways a single mom, and that was not her plan,” her close friend Susan Sher explained. This campaign would be far more demanding than either of Barack’s state Senate wins, making an already bad situation far worse, no matter what the outcome, and Michelle told Barack she was opposed to it.

As Barack surveyed his closest political friends, he heard far more opposition than support. Carol Harwell declined to be involved, and Terry Link and Denny Jacobs each said such a challenge would be “foolish” and “stupid.” So did Mike Lieteau. “I told him he shouldn’t run,” Mike said, and warned Barack that even he would support Rush. “Bobby was a personal friend of mine” and “was very supportive of me personally and very supportive of telecom issues, so I had no choice.” Politically savvy lawyers John Schmidt, Matt Piers, and Newton Minow said the same. “I thought it was a terrible idea,” Schmidt recalled, and Piers remembers, “I thought it was crazy.” Minow was even blunter: “Are you nuts? Barack, I think this is a mistake.” African American acquaintances responded similarly. Sokoni Karanja had long thought Barack eventually would run for mayor but felt this was “a bad move. I said, ‘Barack, what are you doing? You can’t beat Bobby’” and “‘folks are going to react badly’” to him trying. Lobbyist and former state representative Paul Williams told Barack, “you aren’t the guy for the blackest district in the country,” and former Harold Washington aide Tim Wright, who had been Rush’s chief of staff before a recent falling-out, advised Barack that “This isn’t the race, this isn’t the time.” When Barack asked 6th Ward alderman Freddrenna Lyle to lunch and revealed his plan, “I explained that I thought the seniors in my area remembered Bobby when he was with the Panthers, and they had a connection to Bobby that I thought was unbeatable,” irrespective of how poor a mayoral race Rush had run or how good a state legislator Barack was.

Barack was encouraged by a Chicago Tribune Sunday magazine story in which well-known black businessman Dempsey J. Travis, once a top supporter of Harold Washington, said that Barack and Jesse Jackson Jr. were Washington’s successors: “there are people we have coming up who have shown they have the class, the intellect and the people skills to do exactly what Harold did—strong people who are bright, sophisticated, sharp. Razor sharp,” Travis stressed. “Harold lives on in these people.” Barack also took pleasure from a Hyde Park Herald interview with him headlined “Hyde Park’s Own Renaissance Man.” He made no mention of the congressional possibility but cited three top local challenges: “the continuing under-performance of the public schools,” whether residents feel “confident that they can raise and educate their children here in safety,” and how to “foster economic development and economic integration . . . to include the larger South Side,” because Hyde Park was in danger of becoming “an island of prosperity within a sea of poverty.”

As Barack continued his private conversations about a congressional run, he did receive some positive feedback. State representative Tom Dart, whose district was part of Rush’s, encouraged Barack to run. So did both 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle, whom Rush had opposed when she defeated two primary challengers back in February, and, more surprisingly, new 5th Ward alderman Leslie Hairston. Barack had not supported Hairston when she took on incumbent Barbara Holt, and Hairston also knew how other Side South politicians disliked Barack because of the perception that “you think you’re better than us.” A $2,000 contribution from Barack’s campaign account to Hairston’s was a thank-you for her support.

A trio of independent-minded young black professionals also responded positively. Thirty-two-year-old Tim King was a South Side native and Georgetown University law graduate who in 1995 had become president of a struggling Roman Catholic high school, Hales Franciscan, after finding teaching far more fulfilling than the law. King’s work at Hales won rave reviews, with a laudatory Chicago Reader profile detailing his unceasing commitment and a Chicago Tribune editorial praising him for taking in an orphaned sixteen-year-old who then graduated from Hales and headed to college. Barack had visited Hales to introduce himself, and the two had “hit it off” and would see each other at the East Bank Club and in Hyde Park. When Barack told Tim, “I’m thinking about running for Congress,” Tim echoed the thought: “Really? I’m thinking about running for Congress!” Barack “looked at me very seriously” and said, “If we both run, there’s no chance either one of us will be able to win.” Tim concurred: “You’re absolutely right, and I defer to you.”

Tim agreed to be an active supporter, as did Barack’s friend Jim Reynolds, whose thriving Loop Capital firm now employed Barack’s brother-in-law Craig Robinson. “Jim, I’m thinking about running for Congress,” Barack remarked one summer day while they played golf, and Reynolds eagerly signed on. So did a brand-new acquaintance, Judy Byrd, another Georgetown University law graduate who had met Barack years earlier while working in Chicago city government under Howard Stanback. Like Reynolds, Byrd’s friends included a number of well-heeled Chicagoans, and she offered to set up a lunch to introduce Barack to four or five friends who were “all women of some means.”

Neither Barack nor Donne Trotter told the other about their plans, but each one spoke privately to Emil Jones, who remembered that Barack “told me that he might run for Congress, so I said, ‘I think you’d be good, go ahead and run.’ I said, ‘You are aware that Donne Trotter’s running as well, and that being the case, I cannot be involved . . . I cannot choose between my membership.’” Trotter had the same conversation with Jones. “Emil in my mind was neutral,” Donne explained. “His whole thing is he didn’t want us using his staff to fight,” as Barack already surreptitiously was, and word went out from Jones that no staffers could take leave to work on either campaign: any departure would be permanent.

Thanks to his lobbyist friend Vince Williams, who knew firsthand that “the mayor was very interested in getting to know Barack,” Obama also called on Richard Daley, who had badly thrashed Rush just five months earlier. Daley seemed friendly and receptive, reinforcing Barack’s assumption that Daley would quietly welcome a challenge to someone who had challenged him. Barack mentioned his meeting with Daley to Madeline Talbott, who along with new 15th Ward alderman Ted Thomas was more than willing to have ACORN back Barack. “Both Barack and I felt like Bobby was very vulnerable,” Madeline recalled, even though “no one knew who Barack was.” Barack also mentioned his meeting with Daley to former judge and House member Ab Mikva, who believed “Rush was no great shakes as a congressman” and encouraged Barack to challenge him. But Mikva also tried to dissuade Barack from misunderstanding Daley’s stance. Barack “thought that he would get Mayor Daley’s support,” telling Mikva that “at the end . . . the mayor stood up and said, ‘Well, good luck to you.’ And Barack said, ‘Well, I read that that maybe he’s open.’ And I said, ‘No, it’s closed, because that’s what the old man’—Daley’s father—‘used to say, ‘Good luck to you, fella,’ and that meant that you were on your own.’”

Barack had a similar exchange with John Kelly, a young white Irish lobbyist to whom Emil Jones had taken a liking and who had important family connections in Chicago politics through his uncle, powerful Cook County assessor Jim Houlihan. Kelly was just getting immersed in the world of Springfield, and although Barack “seemed very politically calculating,” he was not “a mainstream player in Springfield . . . because he wouldn’t go out at night.” Kelly thought the congressional race “was a natural progression for him” when Barack mentioned it, asking for his support. But during a summer golf outing at Ravisloe Country Club, in south suburban Homewood, Barack told Kelly that “The key thing is where the mayor’s going to be.” Kelly replied, “‘It’s very clear where the mayor’s going to be: the mayor’s going to be with Bobby Rush.’ And he said, ‘Why are you so hell-bent on the fact that he’s going to support Bobby Rush?’ I said, ‘Cause it’s kind of Politics 101, Barack. He beat Bobby Rush, and he knows that he can beat him again, and he’d rather have him there than you there.’ He said ‘Why?’ And I go, ‘Because he doesn’t know if he can beat you. Bobby Rush is a known quantity: they know that they can beat him. They don’t know where you're going to end up.'" Barack "looked at me kind of like it was shocking to him," and Kelly realized that Barack's "huge" political naiveté stemmed from him not being from Chicago.

Chuy Garcia, a 1998 machine victim, said that Daley "had seen Bobby's full potential in the challenge against him," and "didn't see him as a larger threat." But Daley "saw a lot more crossover potential" with Barack, whose "credentials were pretty impressive, so the potential for trouble was much bigger." As Kelly had told Barack, it indeed was Politics 101: "Why should a sitting mayor help someone who can eclipse him down the road: in debate, in credentials, in being an alternative to the mayor?"<sup>69</sup>

One benefit of the huge Illinois FIRST appropriations that Barack had reluctantly backed was the ability it gave senators to direct sizable grants of state funds to quietly chosen recipients, and over the summer, Barack completed the paperwork to channel $462,000 to seven fortunate organizations. He directed almost half of that, a whopping $200,000, to the Citizenship Education Fund's LaSalle Street Project, to assist in "setting up [a] venture capital business for underserved areas." The fund, a nonprofit arm of Rev. Jesse Jackson Sr.'s Rainbow/PUSH, had initiated the project a year earlier as a spinoff of its two-year-old Wall Street Project, which was aimed at drawing investment dollars to poor neighborhoods. Taking its name from Chicago's premier banking street, it was supported by Jim Reynolds as well as the Chicago Urban League. Crain's Chicago Business labeled the project "far more of a publicity tool than a power broker" in a story highlighting how local heavyweights were backing the highly similar Social Investment Forum of Chicago. Karin Stanford, the fund's executive director, had just resigned and given birth to a child, and two years later the LaSalle Street Project would be shuttered after news that Jackson Sr. had fathered Stanford's daughter.

Barack also funneled $100,000 to the South Side YMCA for construction of a child development center and $50,000 apiece to two youth service programs for teen mentoring efforts. A trio of smaller grants, including one for a senior day care van and $20,000 for South Shore's Black United Fund, rounded out Barack's summer gift list. In mid-July the weekly Hyde Park Herald reported that both Donne Trotter and Barack were considering challenges to Rush. Trotter said "nothing is definite" but he was "leaning in that direction." Local activist Alan Dobry stated that "the congressman is vulnerable," and Trotter said that "my question is what has he done. I think he's a great individual, but if your friends aren't doing the job you expect them to, you don't just leave them there." Barack told the Herald, "I haven't made a decision yet" although "it will need to be fairly soon."

By July 25 Barack finally had Michelle's reluctant acquiescence, and he began contacting his oldest and closest friends, asking them to make the maximum $1,000-per-person contribution. Hasan Chandoo immediately wrote a check, as did Gerry Alexis, Rob Fisher, Jeff Cummings, Jean Rudd, Bettylu Saltzman, and Michelle's friend Cindy Moelis. Barack already had $1,000 apiece from Judd Miner and his young friend Robert Blackwell, and before the end of July, Debbie Leff, Douglas Baird, and Newton Minow gave as well. On July 28 Barack mailed both an official "Statement of Candidacy" and a "Statement of Organization" for Obama for Congress 2000 to the Federal Election Commission. Jean Rudd's husband Lionel Bolin was again listed as the campaign's official treasurer, with Barack and Michelle's friend Craig Huffman joining sister-in-law Janis Robinson as two assistant treasurers. Cynthia Miller had just returned to Chicago from abroad, and she plus Al Kindle, 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle's top political worker, and Amy Szarek, a young fund-raiser who had worked on Carol Moseley Braun's unsuccessful 1998 race, started pulling things together as Dan Shomon and Will Burns, Barack's two most dedicated aides, began planning to leave Senate staff to take charge of the incipient campaign.

On August 1 the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times caught up to the Herald's report from two weeks earlier. Barack said he was "seriously considering" a race and expected "to make a final decision" in "the next couple of weeks." Four days later the Defender followed up, with Barack saying he had been discussing "a possible candidacy" for "the last two months" and would continue "seriously considering" a run "for the next several weeks." Both Toni Preckwinkle and local state representative Barbara Flynn Currie felt strongly that Barack needed to get started as soon as possible if he was going to challenge a well-known incumbent, but ten days into August Barack told the Herald, "I will be making a decision before Labor Day." He explained that "it's important for me to discuss the possibility of my candidacy with a wide range of community leaders" and "that process has not yet been completed." The next day he told the Sun-Times' Lynn Sweet that "at this point, it looks like we are going to go ahead with this," and Donne Trotter told her that he too was "more than likely" to run.

That same day, August 11, the campaign rented the first of two offices, on 87th Street near Cottage Grove Avenue, arranged phone service, and issued its first payroll checks to Will Burns and Amy Szarek. On Saturday Al Kindle took Barack to march in black Bronzeville's biggest annual event, the Defender-sponsored Bud Billiken Day parade, which featured marching band and drill team competitions as well as a full array of South Side politicians. "No one knew who he was," Kindle recounted. "People were asking 'Who is he?'" and Barack "seemed a little embarrassed," Kindle remembered. "You could see how humbling it was in his face." Capitol Hill's Roll Call included Bobby Rush in a story on endangered incumbents, saying Rush "has been viewed as vulnerable to a Democratic threat" since his mayoral thrashing, but the Sun-Times' Steve Neal warned that Rush "has a solid base of about 40 percent of the vote." Neal predicted that Barack could outpace Rush in fund-raising, collecting at least $500,000 for the race, and the mayoral disaster had shown that Rush's organization "is relatively weak." Donne Trotter "will attempt to portray Obama as a newcomer to the South Side," and a black weekly warned that Barack "is likely to get some unwanted opposition from friends of former state Sen. Alice Palmer," who "has not forgiven Obama."

Neal believed that "Trotter and Obama are genuine threats" to Rush, but former senator Paul Simon was far more cautioning when he had breakfast with Barack one mid-August morning. Simon emphasized that Barack must win public endorsements from prominent African Americans in order to credibly challenge Rush, but Barack had already been told by senior figures like former attorney general Roland Burris that they would not support him. "My instinct is that you will be portrayed as 'the white man's candidate' for this seat," Simon warned in a prescient thank-you letter, "virtually portraying you as an Uncle Tom."<sup>70</sup>

Barack turned his attention toward another round of fund-raising calls, with $1,000 checks coming in from his uncle Charles Payne, Davis Miner colleague Paul Strauss, Sidley & Austin's Eden Martin, Jim Reynolds and his wife Sandra, John Rogers Jr., Pat Graham, and Tony Rezko and his wife Rita. A second and larger campaign office was secured just south of 95th Street on Western Avenue, and by the end of August Cynthia Miller was on the payroll, soon to be followed by campaign manager Dan Shomon. In the world of Springfield, it "was a big deal" when Shomon and Will Burns gave up their Democratic caucus jobs to sign on with Barack, with some colleagues such as Cindy Huebner wondering "why in the hell is Barack doing this?” Paul Simon’s sidekick Mike Lawrence reacted similarly when Barack checked in with him by phone. “Why are you doing that?” Mike asked. “I don’t think it’s a good idea. I think your future is statewide,” not South Side.

Eager for press attention, Barack capitalized on a big mid-August power failure to propose toughening a state law that failed to require utilities to reimburse customers for damages unless an outage lasted more than four hours and losses totaled at least $30,000. Barack devoted a Hyde Park Herald column, a Chicago Tribune op-ed, and a letter to the editor of the Chicago Defender to the problem, his biggest outreach effort to date. He, Shomon, and deputy campaign manager Will Burns began recruiting friends and acquaintances like young organizer John Eason and Democratic activist John Corrigan to devote time to the campaign. Like Will, his good friend Eason thought the race was actually about more than a congressional seat. “You just wanted this guy to go as far as he could, and you wanted to do whatever you could to get him to go as far as he could, and ultimately I think what we’re all thinking is ‘Oh, we can get another Harold Washington. We’ll get him in as mayor,’ and even he talked about that.” Of course “nobody would say anything publicly against Daley,” but “it was the same trajectory as Harold: you run for Congress and you get attention on the national stage and that’s just so you can run for mayor. . . . You want to be mayor of Chicago,” and Barack “knows that’s what I want to hear.” But underlying everything, Eason realized, was Barack’s intense aversion to Springfield. “I remember him saying he needed to get out of Springfield desperately—he desperately needed to leave Springfield.”

Barack also drew public attention, even on the Defender’s front page, by decrying how Governor Ryan in mid-August had vetoed his bill mandating that at least two-thirds of child support payments actually go to the children. “One of my biggest concerns in the legislature has been helping people move out of poverty,” and HB 1232 was “a pretty common sense” effort in that direction. Barack vowed to seek an override come mid-November’s veto session, but a Saturday town hall meeting at a Baptist church in Englewood attracted just twenty people. Barack called for a moratorium on capital punishment and tried to educate the tiny crowd by pointing out how “some of the biggest contributors to Governor Ryan’s” and even “Emil Jones’s campaigns are gaming interests.”

Barack devoted much of mid-September to another burst of fund-raising calls, with $1,000 checks coming in from his brother-in-law Craig Robinson’s good friend Marty Nesbitt as well as Nesbitt’s boss, wealthy real estate heir Penny Pritzker, John Rogers’s Ariel colleague Mellody Hobson, basketball buddy Eric Whitaker, law firm colleagues George Galland and Chuck Barnhill, real estate manager William Moorehead, and Harvard Law School professors Martha Minow, Larry Tribe, and Randall Kennedy as well as new supporter Judy Byrd. Barack prepared to step down as chairman of the Chicago Annenberg board, and in midsummer Howard Stanback had already succeeded him as chairman of the Woods Fund’s board, while at the same time Bill Ayers joined the board. On Tuesday, September 21, the campaign reserved a Palmer House ballroom in the downtown Loop for a Sunday-afternoon announcement ceremony five days later, and the next morning Steve Neal reported that Rush was gearing up for a reelection campaign. Former representative Gus Savage’s longtime chief of staff, Louanner Peters, would manage it, and while Citizens for Rush had only $94,000 in the bank, Rush had just put his wife Carolyn on its payroll. Rush had met Barack briefly seven years earlier during Project VOTE! and remembered him as “a very persuasive young man” with “a sunny disposition” and “a certain charisma about him.” That September, reaching out first to political science Ph.D. and Citizen Action veteran Don Wiener and then to political consultant Eric Adelstein, Rush wanted Wiener to research Obama's record. "I don't know much about him. He seems like kind of an Oreo to me."

As of August, Barack believed he had veteran political strategist David Axelrod and his longtime partner John Kupper lined up to be his primary media consultants, but that quickly came unglued. "We actually started doing the race," Kupper recalled, and had "started advising him," but then "we started getting calls saying 'You cannot work against Bobby Rush. If you do, you'll never work for another Democrat again,'" Kupper recounted. "There was pressure from the DNC [Democratic National Committee] and from Washington that caused us to get out of the race," and a direct-mail firm, Crouse Malchow, likewise backed away from Barack. Other well-known Chicagoland consultants like Pete Giangreco and Delmarie Cobb cited their past ties to Rush in declining to get involved, and Axelrod told Dan Shomon to call Chris Sautter, his D.C.-based former partner. Sautter flew to Chicago to have breakfast with Barack and Dan and accepted the handoff from Axelrod and Kupper.

Neal reported that well-known figures like John Schmidt and Newton Minow and prominent black financiers John Rogers and Peter Bynoe were supporting Barack, but warning signs loomed. Even though 17th Ward alderman Terry Peterson, like Schmidt a former aide to Richard Daley, had joined his City Council colleagues Preckwinkle, Hairston, and Thomas in backing Barack, Neal warned that the mayor "might have reason for concern if Obama should emerge as a potential challenger in the 2003 mayoral election. That's why Daley may be neutral for Rush." Neal also noted that even though Jesse Jackson Jr. "is friendly with Obama," he "doesn't want competition as the rising star of the Illinois delegation," and Jackson was "committed to Rush." If Barack won, both youthful Illinois "comptroller Dan Hynes and Rep. Jackson might get eclipsed," and so neither of their fathers, powerful former county assessor Tom Hynes and Jesse Jackson Sr., "want Obama to become the city's rising political star."<sup>71</sup>

Sunday's Chicago Tribune called Barack "one of the bright young stars of the local African-American political world" and reported that his campaign "claims"—a bit optimistically—"to have raised more than $100,000" already. That afternoon, an hour before Barack's event at the downtown Palmer House, Rickey Hendon introduced Donne Trotter to several hundred people at Trotter's South Side district office. Trotter had the support of two aldermen, but he did not have the support of his longtime mentor, 8th Ward committeeman and Cook County Board president John Stroger, who already had endorsed Rush. Barack's announcement drew a crowd of three hundred, with many of them laughing when Barack used a famous local phrase to declare that "Nobody sent me. I'm not part of some long-standing political organization. I have no fancy sponsors. I'm not even from Chicago. My name is Obama. Despite that fact, somebody sent me . . . the men on the corner in Woodlawn drowning their sorrows in alcohol . . . the women working two jobs . . . They're all telling me we can't wait." Directly attacking Rush, Barack said that "for the past seven years we've been looking for leadership, and it has not been forthcoming. We can't afford to wait another seven years." District residents "deserve to have a congressman who can make a real difference in their lives, and in the life of our community." Local television cameras captured Barack saying that leadership means "framing the debate on the national issues that affect us deeply: gun violence, economic development in the inner city, health care for the uninsured." He warned that the district "is one of the most economically distressed areas in the nation. Our schools still don't make the grade, and our kids are being cheated out of the opportunity to prepare themselves for a high-tech, highly competitive future. Too many of our youth have been lost to the streets. The culture of violence threatens our neighborhoods."

Rush “represents a politics that is rooted in the past, a reactive politics that isn’t very good at coming up with concrete solutions.”

WLS Channel 7’s evening newscast told viewers that Trotter and Obama were “serious competition” for Rush and that the primary “could be a close one.” Barack was described as a “civil rights attorney and the first black president of the Harvard Law Review,” while Trotter was called a “Springfield veteran.” Viewers were reminded of Rush’s “landslide” loss against Daley, and that he “may be vulnerable.” Barack told one print reporter, “I don’t believe Congressman Rush’s voter base is firm,” and he dismissed Trotter’s candidacy. “I’m not concerned about who else is in the race. By January we’ll know who’s serious and who’s not.” Monday’s newspapers paid little attention to the dueling announcement ceremonies, but when the Sun-Times followed up two days later with a serious look at the race, Barack said “the reason I’m running is not because he did poorly in the mayoral race.” Instead, “Congressman Rush’s record articulating an agenda for community building has been lacking . . . I think the mayor’s race has just underscored his inability to shape that proactive agenda that voters have been looking for.” Barack promised “not only a strong message but a lot of energy in our campaign,” and declared that “part of what we are talking about is a transition from a politics of protest to a politics of progress.”

David Axelrod had walked away from Barack’s campaign after the threatening phone calls from Washington, but he was happy to tell the Hyde Park Herald what he thought of the race. Increasing Barack’s name recognition throughout the entire congressional district should be the campaign’s top priority. “It’s a challenging task against a long-term incumbent who has universal name recognition. The one thing Barack may have is the ability to raise money and that obviously affects his name recognition.” Overall, “I think it’s a competitive race,” Axelrod said, “but I don’t think you should ever underestimate the power of incumbency.”<sup>72</sup>

OCTOBER 1999–JANUARY 2003

Barack's declaration of candidacy attracted little attention, and the next day was an immediate reminder that not until early December could he be a full-time candidate, for autumn classes at the U of C Law School got under way on Monday, September 27. While Voting Rights had been removed from early 2000's winter quarter schedule, in the meantime Barack was again teaching Con Law III and Current Issues in Racism and the Law. Con Law met three mornings a week at 8:30 A.M. and drew thirty-five students, and on the first day, Barack said he would have to reschedule several classes in November because of the veto session. Nate Sutton, a 3L, remembered being surprised by how quickly Barack learned students' names, and it soon became clear that Barack "really had a genuine ability to argue and understand both sides of issues" and "empathize or identify with the bases for arguments on both sides." Barack knew the cases "extraordinarily well," but even on issues like abortion "you would not know what his position was." In the race class, which attracted thirty-two students, 3L Joe Khan also realized how "very approachable" Barack seemed. Both courses remained unchanged from prior years, and 3L Andrew Abrams was impressed by how "enthusiastic and supportive of students" Barack was. When the quarter ended, the two classes gave Barack 8.92 and 8.74 on UCLS's 10-point scale, but a brand-new query was even more instructive. "Would you take a course with this professor again?" with three possible answers: yes, no, and "no influence." Barack's numbers were impressive indeed: a total of forty-three yeses, ten no-influences, and only a single no, just a fraction shy of 80 percent affirmative.

In the political realm, several significant people expressed displeasure about Barack entering the congressional race. Bobby Rush's unhappiness was to be expected. "I was shocked, disappointed, and, you know, frankly somewhat angry," Rush later recalled. "If there are ten issues, we agree on 9.5" of them. "I didn't see the rationale for it." Media consultant Eric Adelstein lined up Washington pollster Diane Feldman to work on Rush's campaign, and research guru Don Wiener began looking into Barack's Springfield record and perusing back issues of the Hyde Park Herald. By early October, Rush finally opened a campaign office, but "I don't think Bobby was taking it seriously," field consultant Jerry Morrison explained. Another month would pass before campaign manager Louanner Peters came aboard and spokesperson Maudlyne Ihejirika was hired.

With Cook County Board president and 8th Ward powerhouse John Stroger backing Rush, Donne Trotter's campaign was largely adrift, but Trotter hoped to raise sufficient funds to mount a credible effort, as much against his rival Obama as against Rush. But Barack's biggest problem was at home, because even though Michelle had said yes to the race, once it got started, her unhappiness was visible and sometimes audible. "What I notice about men, all men, is that their order is me, my family," etc., "but me is first," while "for women, me is fourth," Michelle observed. Barack admitted in one joint interview that "we've had our rough patches," and Michelle immediately added, "there were many." Their unceasing financial strains and the need for child care were constant factors. “They had a lot of student loans, and there was a lot of tension around that. Barack’s choices made her life harder,” Michelle’s friend Cindy Moelis recalled. “There was a lot of tension and stress,” Michelle agreed, and asked in retrospect whether she was both angry and lonely because of how much time Barack spent on politics, Michelle responded forcefully: “absolutely . . . absolutely.” Friends like Kathy Stell knew that Michelle had “an ambivalence about politics in general” that showed in the “skepticism and cynicism” she felt about politicians. Dan Shomon, now Barack’s full-time campaign manager, regularly witnessed Michelle’s disdain that her super-talented husband was “lowering himself” to electoral politics. Barack and Michelle had dinner every so often with Allison Davis, Bob Bennett, and their wives, and Allison remembered that sometimes “things were unpleasant” because “Michelle was really pissed about the Bobby Rush campaign.” That attitude also manifested itself whenever Michelle, with or without Barack, joined Bernardine Dohrn, Bill Ayers, and Mona and Rashid Khalidi at one of those couples’ dinners. Being a politician’s wife was not something Michelle welcomed, and “I remember lots of conversations” during which Michelle was “really resisting it and fighting, fighting it,” Bernardine recalled. Michelle “hates it . . . it’s not the life she imagined, not the life she’d prefer.” Craig Huffman, Michelle’s young protégé, knew that Barack’s political life “created enormous tension” at home. Craig remembered calling Barack one fall Saturday to discuss the campaign. “Something had happened, and Michelle, I could hear her in the background. She wasn’t happy with him, I’ll leave it at that,” he recounted. “Hey man, I need to go,” Barack apologized as he hung up. Like Kathy Stell and Bernardine Dohrn, Craig realized Michelle was not “enamored with politicians” and was not “the willing political wife.” That tension left Barack “chasing something that your partner’s not 100 percent on board with.”<sup>1</sup>

Eager to draw attention to his campaign, Barack challenged Rush to five debates, just as Rush had done with Mayor Daley. The Tribune and the Defender reported Barack’s challenge, but the incumbent ignored him, just as Daley had Rush. “My assumption was that the race would generate a lot of coverage and I could really focus on making arguments about what I would like to do in Congress,” Barack explained, but with the election five months away, Barack realized that “people really weren’t paying attention that much,” and after the two stories about his debate challenge, more than two weeks passed before any newspaper again mentioned Barack.

Thanks largely to Dan Shomon, as well as many former and present U of C law students, Barack’s campaign did draw a good number of weekend volunteers. With Will Burns as deputy campaign manager and Cynthia Miller as Barack’s scheduler staffing an office at 87th Street and Cottage Grove, and Shomon and fund-raiser Amy Szarek manning one at 95th and Western Avenue, leafleting and canvassing began. One weekend media consultant Chris Sautter joined Barack, Dan, and 4th Ward alderman Toni Preckwinkle on a daylong series of stops at neighborhood events. Preckwinkle took the lead in introducing Barack, but Sautter realized that “nobody knew who he was.” Later in the afternoon, Chris and Barack ended up playing pickup basketball with some teenagers who had no clue that Barack was a congressional candidate. It was “a relaxing day,” but even the pickup game underscored that “nobody knew Barack.”

Barack called friends and lobbyists to ask for the maximum $1,000-per-person contribution. “You really think you can win?” Scott Turow asked. Barack insisted that Rush was unpopular and vulnerable, and Scott reluctantly wrote a check. City of Chicago lobbyist Bill Luking gave Donne Trotter a $1,000 check at the end of September and soon learned that Barack was keeping an eye on the disclosure reports detailing contributions to his opponents. “Within days, Barack tracked me down and said, ‘I trust you will be helpful to all your friends running for Congress!’” Luking was surprised by how “very aggressive” Barack was, and some months later he also gave $1,000 to Barack. Jim Reynolds had introduced African American insurance executive Les Coney to Barack, and Coney agreed to contribute, but with young children at home, Les was less than eager to write a $1,000 check. Barack “kept following up to say ‘Hey, where’s that check, Les?’” and at the end of October, Coney handed it over. By then Barack had also garnered $1,000 apiece from friends like Bernard Loyd and Matt Piers, brother-in-law Craig Robinson, black financier Quintin Primo, black attorney Peter Bynoe and his wife, lobbyist Larry Suffredin, law school colleagues David Strauss and Lawrence Lessig and Lessig’s spouse, plus old Law Review colleague Julius Genachowski. Newt Minow prevailed upon his friend John Bryan, CEO of Sara Lee Corp., to write a check, and Valerie Jarrett’s boss Daniel Levin gave $1,000 as well. School principal Alma Jones, who had followed Barack’s career ever since mentoring him in Altgeld Gardens twelve years earlier, contributed $300.

Keeping up with his other obligations, Barack spoke at a mid-October forum on welfare reform and women of color, where he told listeners how “one of the things I’ve seen in Springfield is that budget concerns override a lot of moral issues or ethical issues or the desire for consistency.” Addressing a sympathetic crowd, Barack explained that “any program dealing with welfare is going to have a disproportionate impact on people of color because we are disproportionately represented. Any failure in the health care system to provide quality health care is going to disproportionately affect people of color because we are disproportionately in need of health care.” Barack stressed that “a black face or a brown face is painted on poverty in this country,” and as a result “a lot of the policies that are being implemented are targeted towards poor people, and it’s politically useful to feed into racist stereotypes to implement the policy.” Barack emphasized the importance of distinguishing “between those policies that help women, families, children, teenagers make intelligent choices in their lives and are thereby empowering, versus those policies that are essentially punitive and try to restrict choices.” For example, “I can envision policies and programs that offer abstinence as a choice to young women that are not punitive in attempting to reinforce oppressive notions of gender hierarchy because they also target young men and their irresponsibility in terms of how they think about sex.” Barack added that “the instinct of a lot of our constituencies out in the neighborhoods is that there is a problem that people take sexuality or childbearing too lightly and don’t consider this a sacred endeavor.” When anyone under fifteen years old is sexually active, “the average person thinks that’s a problem. We should make sure that we don’t just leave that discussion of values or choices to the right wing, in which case they are able to feed on people’s general notions to . . . mobilize a political constituency for themselves.” He concluded by warning that when progressives oppose abstinence programs, “we get painted into a corner as if we are pro-irresponsible sexuality, pro-teenage pregnancy, and so forth. I think that’s always a difficulty.”

At JCAR’s monthly meeting, Barack challenged a Department of Human Services (DHS) rule change that he believed would harm thirteen families receiving public assistance. DHS’s representative said they would happily discuss the details with Barack, who alone among his colleagues voted against the new rule. An effort like that drew no attention, but Barack’s campaign staff tried to put him in the public eye. “We had this free cable TV strategy,” Dan Shomon explained, to “get Barack on every possible free cable TV” public access program, of which several were aimed at African Americans. On one, with host Joe Green, Barack explained at some length his rationale for challenging Bobby Rush. In Congress, he, unlike Rush, would provide three types of leadership. First, “leadership at the national as well as local levels in terms of framing the debate and setting an agenda, a specific agenda that people can see, that’s clearly articulated.” Second, he would offer “leadership in organizing resources in the community.” And third, “we should expect out of our political leadership some moral leadership. I think that we need to talk about some of the attitudinal changes that we need to undergo within our communities,” including the need to “embrace a notion that academic excellence is important.”

Rush’s campaign finally got going, and he attacked the Chicago Housing Authority’s plan to tear down its infamous high-rises, while Barack was implicitly supportive. “A long-term strategy that involves the creation of mixed-income communities is preferable to the status quo,” Barack told the Hyde Park Herald, but he knew it would “require a solid commitment from every level of government.” The Rush campaign also castigated Barack for holding his announcement ceremony downtown rather than in the district. State representative Lou Jones, who had loathed Barack since their Alice Palmer face-off, proclaimed that Barack “did not know, understand, value or respect the people nor the institutions within the district enough to locate an announcement site among the constituents he says he wants to represent.” Barack’s campaign responded that “you always start your campaign where you can get the most and best press coverage,” and one bimonthly black newspaper commented that Barack “made a good impression at his announcement” and “has been having a strong presence at community events.” The South Street Journal added that some “still question his loyalty to the black community” because “Obama did not support Rush in the mayoral race” against Richard Daley, but it quoted Aldermen Leslie Hairston and Ted Thomas as praising Barack’s record in Springfield.<sup>2</sup>

By mid-October both campaigns scheduled professional polls to see where the race stood with voters, but on October 18 the race took a sudden and tragic turn. At 8:30 P.M., two gunmen pretending to be undercover cops shot and badly wounded twenty-nine-year-old Huey Rich, Rush’s out-of-wedlock son who bore his mother’s surname and had been raised by his grandmother, a member of Trinity Church. Rich suffered massive blood loss, lost consciousness, and underwent hours of surgery. Chicago newspapers gave the shooting front-page coverage as Rich remained in critical condition for more than seventy-two hours. The young man’s kidneys, lungs, and heart were all failing, and the attending physician told Rev. Jeremiah Wright “there is no brain activity.” Wright told Rush that Huey was brain dead, and he died without ever regaining consciousness. Newspapers gave front-page headlines to the death, and Rush, speaking at Jesse Jackson’s weekly Rainbow/PUSH rally, declared that “we’ve got to rid our communities of guns . . . guns don’t belong in a civilized society.”

As police detained one suspect and identified a second, reports emerged that Rich’s involvement in drug trafficking had led to the attack. Rush asked Jackson to officiate at the funeral at Trinity, but Wright, fearing the church would be used for a campaign rally, told Rush that he, not Jackson, would preside. Wright was dismayed to see reporters and television in attendance, and Huey’s grandmother told Wright to bar the press from the service. “Bobby’s not going to make my grandson’s death a show and a spectacle. He wasn’t there for this kid, and I’m not having him playing the role of grieving father,” Wright recounted her telling him. Mayor Daley and former senator Carol Moseley Braun were among the dignitaries who attended, and several years later both killers were convicted and sent to prison, with triggerman Leo Foster sentenced essentially to life without parole.<sup>3</sup>
